

ENCYCLOPEDIA of Comparative Iconography

THEMES DEPICTED IN WORKS OF ART

Edited by Helene E. Roberts

ENCYCLOPEDIA of Comparative Iconography

ENCYCLOPEDIA of Comparative Iconography

THEMES DEPICTED IN WORKS OF ART

VOLUME 1 & 2

A-Z

Editor

Helene E. Roberts

FITZROY DEARBORN PUBLISHERS

CHICAGO • LONDON

Copyright © 1998 by
FITZROY DEARBORN PUBLISHERS

All rights reserved including the right of reproduction in whole or in part in any form. For information write to:

FITZROY DEARBORN PUBLISHERS
70 East Walton Street
Chicago, Illinois 60611
USA

or

11 Rathbone Place
London W1P 1DE England

All Rights Reserved

ISBN 1-57958-009-2

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data is available.

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data is available.

First published in the USA and UK 1998

Typeset by Proof Positive/Farrowlyne Associates, Inc., Evanston, Illinois Printed by Publishers' Graphics LLC, Carol Stream, Illinois

Cover illustration:

Joos van Cleve, St. Jerome in His Study, circa 1524–1530, oil on wood panel, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum (Courtesy of the Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University Art Museums, Gift of Howland Warren, Dr. Richard P. Warren, and Mrs. Grayson M. P. Murphy)

CONTENTS

EDITOR'S NOTE AND GUIDE TO USAGE	page vii
ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES	xi
GENERAL READING LIST	xiii
ENCYCLOPEDIA ENTRIES A–Z	I - 957
NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS	969
INDEX OF ANCIENT MYTHOLOGICAL AND HISTORICAL PERSONAGES, PLACES, AND CONCEPTS	975
INDEX OF JUDEO-CHRISTIAN PERSONAGES, PLACES, AND CONCEPTS	989
INDEX OF REFERENCES TO THE BIBLE AND OTHER SACRED BOOKS	1001
INDEX OF OTHER CULTURES, RELIGIONS, AND MYTHOLOGIES	1007
INDEX OF ARTISTS AND WORKS OF ART	1011
INDEX OF AUTHORS, LITERARY TEXTS, COMPOSERS, FILMMAKERS, AND FOLKTALES	1051
INDEX OF OTHER NAMES AND TERMS	1065

EDITOR'S NOTE AND GUIDE TO USAGE

Several years ago, in the span of one weekend, I saw performances of two operas based on the Orpheus story: Claudio Monteverdi's La favola d'Orfeo and Philip Glass's Orpheus. During the same weekend, Jean Cocteau's film Orphée, on which the Glass opera was based, could be seen in Boston, as could Black Orpheus, the Brazilian film based on the same Greek myth. I also could have seen paintings based on the Orpheus narrative by Giovanni da San Giovanni, Odilon Redon, and George Frederic Watts at Harvard University's Fogg Art Museum in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and by Eugène Delacroix, and probably other artists, at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

A Greek myth that was the subject of poems in the seventh century B.C. was, 27 centuries later, still intriguing audiences and inspiring artists, novelists, poets, and composers. Not only did the Orpheus myth impress in its ability to endure, but it also impressed in its ability to sustain metamorphoses into a variety of forms, genres, and interpretations. Although the core of the original story remained recognizable, the varied presentations and the meanings to be garnered from them amounted to transformations. The Orpheus story is only one of many narratives from mythology, religion, and literature that animate the world's art. Without a knowledge of these narratives, much of that art is closed to modern interpretation and understanding.

It is the purpose of this encyclopedia to show the variety of uses to which these narratives and other themes have been put in the history of art and to discuss some of the changing interpretations as the themes pass through different ages, cultures, and forms. This encyclopedia orders iconographic narratives—in particular biblical, mythological, and literary texts—according to actions performed by the characters, to situations in which they find themselves, and to concepts relating to these situations and actions. Under the letter “A,” for example, instead of relating the stories of Aaron, Aeneas, and Ariadne, as many iconographic dictionaries do, this encyclopedia treats the themes of abandonment, abduction, and adultery. The authors discuss the major relevant iconographic narratives incorporating the theme, mention other less known narratives, and discuss the historical background of themes. The authors also pay attention to differences in the visual presentation of a theme, in particular to differences between the biblical and mythological treatments of the theme. They also suggest how a theme has evolved through time.

The essays also discuss various personifications, allegories, gestures, characteristics, and other subjects that recur in works of art. Essays on themes such as abundance, caricature, communion, fools/folly, pointing/indicating, and upside down trace the various ways these themes have been given different form and how they have been used for different purposes in art through the ages.

There are many excellent volumes available that retell the mythological, religious, and literary narratives that provide the iconographic sources for works of art and even some—although the number is fewer—that list and discuss works of art related to these themes. Furthermore, there are many monographs and articles that treat individual subjects—and the works of art that depict them—in detail. Although these excellent and irreplaceable studies exist (many of them are included in the lists of further reading in this encyclopedia), what is lacking are works that relate these various narratives and subjects to each other according to the similarities of their plots, situations, or imagery. Few existing reference books discuss how the descriptions relate to the works of art, and only a few of these existing studies discuss the differences in nuance and focus given to these subjects throughout history and in various cultures. There is, in fact, no reference volume that uses a comparative method to describe the use of iconography in art or that is organized from the point of view of actions, situations, or concepts, rather than by the personages in mythological, biblical, or literary narratives.

In many of these essays particular attention is paid to gestures, costumes, composition, and other techniques of visual expression associated with the themes. Many authors also include works of art by artists who have been neglected in the traditional histories of Western art. A list of “Selected Works of Art” that depict each theme and a “Further Reading” for each essay provide more sources of information about the themes and about the relevant works of art that depict them.

Because the telling of a narrative—or relaying a description of a theme—from a single source is like taking a snapshot in time, the collection of such narratives, themes, or snapshots from different ages, genres, and cultures forms a valuable album of photographs. From such an album one can compare, contrast, analyze, discover patterns, and make generalizations about how different artists and societies have appropriated narratives and themes. In fact, only through the comparison and analysis of many individual instances can patterns be isolated.

The contributors to this encyclopedia make several kinds of comparisons relevant to each theme. Several different narratives incorporating the theme are compared in essays. The sources of the narratives may range from ancient and classical mythology, to the great religions of the world, to literature, folktales, and popular culture. The essay on the theme of adultery, for example, compares the classical myths (including the adultery of Zeus with Danaë, Leda, and Europa and the adultery of Venus and Mars, Venus and Adonis, Paris and Helen, Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, Tarquin and Lucretia) with the Arthurian legends (Lancelot and Guinevere, Tristan and Yseult), with the Christian narratives (David and Bathsheba, Susanna and the elders, Joseph and Potiphar's wife, Christ and the woman taken in adultery), and with secular themes (including William Hogarth's Marriage à la Mode and Augustus Egg's Victorian Past and Present). The contributors may also compare the story line of a narrative to the way it is visualized in a work of art. The essay on apocalypse, for example, traces the way the biblical texts from the Book of Daniel and Revelation are depicted in different styles, from the Mozarabic style of the eighth-century Spanish monk Beatus of Liebana, through the more elegant, courtly style of English Apocalypse manuscripts and the large-scale French tapestries from Angers of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The author also includes discussions of the woodcuts of Albrecht Dürer and those of Lucas Cranach, complete with Protestant propaganda, as well as the watercolors of William Blake and the lithographs of Odilon Redon and Max Beckmann. The comparative method may extend this difference to discuss the way a narrative or concept is treated in the different genres of literature and of art, with especial focus on the comic and the symbolic.

The essays also trace the various interpretations given to a theme during different periods and cultures to account for varying social and political beliefs. A people defines itself through the configurations of its literary, religious, and mythical narratives. When a society begins to see itself in a different light, that change is often announced by a recasting of favorite stories or the introduction of new ones. In the essay on abandonment, for example, the focus in the narrative of the abandonment of Ariadne by Theseus shifts from the Greeks, who, wishing to absolve their hero Theseus of any guilt, show him unwillingly being led from the sleeping Ariadne by imperious gods or goddesses, to the Victorians, who, obsessed with the victimized female, focus on the distress of the abandoned Ariadne.

Many of the authors compare the situation described in the narratives with the realities of history. This comparative analysis can reveal national aspirations and fears, changes in economic and political fortunes, as well as sources of present-day customs and conventions. The author of the essay on abduction, for example, traces the laws and mores of various cultures condoning or condemning abduction and shows how vestiges of some of the ancient practices are still retained in modern marriage rituals. The essay even alludes to twentieth-century humans who claim they have been abducted by aliens from outer space, which have been identified in one case with the Babylonian goddess Ishtar. Like the allusive reflections of historical memory in ancient mythology, even the more secular present can conflate fact and fiction into new myths, especially when it comes to powerful images.

Although every essay uses one or more of these comparative approaches (narratives, styles and periods, interpretations, historical reality), few can use all of them within the confines of the allotted space. No restrictions have been placed on the authors in terms of form, structure, or content of their essays; furthermore, the variety of the authors' backgrounds and areas of expertise ensure that a diversity of approaches are represented. Although most of the authors were trained in the methods of traditional art history, they all share an interest in the subject and context of a work of art and do not confine themselves to the older traditional concerns of attribution, style, and form.

Art historical studies have shifted from a concentration on attribution, style, and form to a concern with the context of a work of art and with the wider ramifications of its subject matter. Art historians have broken down the enclosed world of stylistic influence to study the relation of works of art to historic events and economic forces, to psychological phenomenon and sociological findings, and to linguistic analysis and philosophic theories. Because of these changes, many people are interested not only in the style and form of a work of art but also in the human dynamics of the narratives and themes and their permeations and permutations. Art historians now study the themes depicted in works of art in relation to such subjects as gender and sexuality, politics and power, ownership and possession, ceremony and ritual, legitimacy and authority. It is the hope that this encyclopedia, by incorporating these perspectives, will add new insights to old iconographic usages.

Classical mythology, religious texts, and literary works provide such a rich imbroglio of relationships, situations, and associations that they have been appropriated for a variety of uses. The narratives describe instances of rape, ruination, empowerment, victimization, and inexplicable fortune, not to mention their descriptions of inescapable guilt, hubris, greed, pride, arrogance, passion, metamorphosis, sexual and gender ambiguities, courage, cowardice, and a host of other universal human predicaments. Each narrative is open to interpretation because of the shifting perspectives of diverse agendas. This encyclopedia is not a comprehensive guide to all narratives and all themes, but it presents some of the revealing comparisons that can be found in artistic depictions of these narratives. These comparisons, along with the "Selected Works of Art" and "Further Reading" that accompany each essay, suggest subject areas and directions for further research.

Each essay opens with a "title page" that lists the title and author of the essay and an outline of iconographic narratives, motifs, or periods covered. A work of art that depicts the theme precedes the discussion.

The encyclopedia also provides seven extensive indexes. The "Index of Ancient Mythological and Historical Personages, Places, and Concepts" allows the user to find and identify all references in the essays to the ancient and classical world, including ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia as well as ancient Greece and Rome. In this index the reader can find all the ancient gods, goddesses, heroes, and heroines mentioned in the essays (Achilles, Artemis, and Aeneas, as well as Horus, Ishtar, and Inanna); places, real and imaginary (Hades, Pompeii, Sardanapulus, and Thebes, for example); and personages (Akhenaton, Hammurabi, Socrates, and Hadrian, among many others). The indexes can also reveal the web of associations that characterize each narrative and concept. This first index, for example, reveals the many aspects of the story of Orpheus that are discussed in various essays. The most extended discussion, as one might guess, is to be found in the essay on love and death, but Orpheus is also covered in the essay on music, which discusses his ability to charm animals with his music as well as his associations with Apollo, David, and Jesus Christ. The essay on shepherds and shepherdesses also notes Orpheus's frequent depiction with animals and his affinity in this regard with some depictions of David. Orpheus is also discussed in Light I where, through mystical cults, he becomes associated with renewal, rebirth, and the light achieved after death. The essay on beheading notes how the head of Orpheus after death became an oracle of prophecy. The essay on automata alludes to this oracle head as possibly one of the masks, in a primitive form of automation, that imitated "speaking" as the wind blew through specially positioned holes. Orpheus's journeys, especially his journey to the underworld, are discussed in Journey/Flight; the fatal temptation to look at his beloved wife, Eurydice, in Gaze; and the death of Eurydice in Serpent's Bite.

In a similar fashion another index, the "Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts," lists the personages from the Old and New Testaments mentioned in the essays (Aaron, Abel, Abigail, Jesus Christ, Mary, John the Baptist) as well as places (Caanan, Jerusalem), saints (Agatha, Ambrose, Augustine), theological concepts (Immaculate Conception, incarnation), historical personages (Pope Innocent III, Martin Luther), and movements (Counter-Reformation, pietism, Society of Jesus) connected with the Judeo-Christian tradition. Jesus Christ and the Virgin Mary are mentioned and discussed in many essays as are many of the saints (John the Baptist in 20, Mary Magdalene in 15, Stephen in 4, Ursula in 3, and Philip and Regis in 1 each). Judas is discussed in 12 essays, the Last Judgment in 20, Martin Luther in 5, the menorah in 5, and the Antichrist in 4.

The "Index of References to the Bible and Other Sacred Books" lists specific references to texts cited in the essays. The "Index of Other Cultures, Religions, and Mythologies" includes references to the names and terms of Buddhism, Hinduism, and Islam, as well as those of the Aztec, African, Inuit, Celtic, Norse, and Native American cultures mentioned in the essays.

An "Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales" includes such iconographic sources as Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, Ovid's Fasti and Metamorphoses, Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, Alfred Lord Tennyson's Idylls of the King, Arthur Rimbaud's Saison en enfer, as well as Arthurian legends, Shakespearean plays, and Wagnerian operas. One of the more extensive indexes lists the artists mentioned in the essays and the lists of "Selected Works of Art" that accompany each essay. Anonymous works of art as well as known artists are included.

The "Index of Other Names and Terms" concentrates on those names and topics that complement the themes of the essays but are not themselves mythological, religious, or literary entities included in the other indexes. The intent of this index is to concentrate on those terms and names with iconographic associations. Under "A," for example, the reader can find a list of objects, such as apple(s) or absinthe, that have been mentioned as bearing clues to the meaning of scenes, as well as concepts and activities (abyss and alchemy) that are themes with a whole panoply of iconographic import, but that could not be included in separate essays. The themes of the essays themselves are also included in this index so that a reader can find additional, related discussions. Also listed are persons (Prince Albert and Jane Avril, for example) whom the authors see as becoming icons because of the way an artist depicts them or because of the position they play in a cultural context. Genre terms (allegory) and artistic movements (abstract impressionism) are also included in this index.

A general reading list of reference books that cover the mythological, religious, or literary narratives are listed separately from the essays and can be used in connection with all the essays. In order to avoid duplication, the "Further Reading" that accompanies each essay includes only references relating to the particular theme under discussion and refers to works in the general bibliography only when particular citations are made. The user of this encyclopedia should therefore be aware that for further research, both types of bibliographies are relevant.

The compilation of this encyclopedia, at least in its present form, would have been much more difficult, if not impossible, without the existence of two reference works: Henri van de Waal's ICON-CLASS: An Iconographic Classification System in 17 volumes, with its extremely helpful index and bibliography, and the Getty Art History Information Program's Union List of Artists (ULAN), compiled by James M. Bower, which, because it could be mounted on my computer, made the consistent editing of artists' names possible.

I would like to thank the people who have helped with this encyclopedia. The greatest credit goes to the individual contributors who have accommodated their extensive research and expertise to the pattern set. Their perceptions and imaginative insights into the use of mythic, religious, and literary themes give this encyclopedia its primary value. Special thanks go to Margaret A. Sullivan and Jeanne Marie (Monie) Adams for their sage advice on crucial decisions about the organization of this encyclopedia, to Jay Hurd for his help with initial mailings, and to Jennifer Skoda for all her help in checking details in the "Selected Works of Art" and the bibliographies.

HELENE E. ROBERTS
EDITOR

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Volume 1

Abandonment by Helene E. Roberts
Abduction/Rape by Andrew Stephen Arbury
Abundance by Liana De Girolami Cheney
Adultery by Sarah S. Gibson
Annunciation by Don Denny
Apocalypse by Don Denny
Apotheosis/Deification by Claire Lindgren
Arms Raised by Dimitri Hazzikostas
Artists/Art by Julie F. Codell
Ascent/Descent by Paul Grimley Kuntz and Lee Braver
Automata by Karen Pinkus
Avarice by Priscilla Baumann

Bacchanalia/Orgy by Sarah S. Gibson
Baptism by Don Denny
Bath/Bathing by Alicia Craig Faxon
Beheading/Decapitation by Diane Apostolos-Cappadona
Betrayal by Gina Strumwasser
Birth/Childbirth by Beth S. Gersh-Nešić

Calumny by Claire Lindgren
Caricature/Cartoon by Margaret A. Sullivan
Choice/Choosing by Elizabeth Powers
Comic by Barry Wind
Communion by Valerie (Hutchinson) Penmanen
Crucifixion by Alicia Craig Faxon

Damned Souls by Alicia Craig Faxon and Nancy Frazier
Dance/Dancers/Dancing by Alicia Craig Faxon
Dawn/Dawning by Rudolf M. Bisanz
Death by Elaine Shefer
Destruction of City by Eugene Dwyer
Devotion/Piety by Rudolf M. Bisanz
Dreams/Visions by Elaine Shefer
Drunkenness/Intoxication by Beth S. Gersh-Nešić

Ecstasy by Valerie (Hutchinson) Penmanen
Envy by Eugene Dwyer
Evil Eye by Eugene Dwyer
Excess by Eugene Dwyer
Expulsion by Sarah S. Gibson and Paul Grimley Kuntz

Fame by Liana De Girolami Cheney
 Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Female Beauty and Adornment by Elise Goodman
 Fools/Folly by Margaret A. Sullivan
 Fortune *by Liana De Girolami Cheney, Paul Grimley
 Kuntz, and Lee Braver*
 Funeral/Burial by Stephen Lamia

Gaze by Eugene Dwyer
 Grieving/Lamentation by Dimitri Hazzikostas

Hair/Haircutting by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Hanging by Janice McCullogh
 Harvesting by Brucia Witthoft
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne by M. Ann Simmons
 Honor/Honoring by Liana De Girolami Cheney
 Humors by Zirka Zaremba Filipczak
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress by Sarah S. Gibson

Imagination/Creativity by Liana De Girolami Cheney

Journey/Flight by Sarah S. Gibson and Alicia Craig Faxon
 Judaism by Nancy Frazier
 Judgment by Andrew Stephen Arbury
 Justice by Gina Strumwasser

Kiss/Kissing by Alicia Craig Faxon

Labor/Trades/Occupations by Stephen Lamia
 Labyrinth/Maze by Priscilla Baumann
 Laughter by Andrew Stephen Arbury
 Light I: The Lamp in the Niche by Erica Cruikshank-Dodd
 Light II: Divine, Natural, and Neon *by Helene E.
 Roberts*
 Logos/Word by Erica Cruikshank-Dodd
 Love and Death by Liana De Girolami Cheney
 Luxury by Eugene Dwyer

Volume 2

Madness by Fritz Laupichler
 Margins/Outsiders by Priscilla Baumann
 Marriage/Betrothal by Brucia Witthoft
 Martyrdom by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Masks/Personae by Elaine Shefer
 Melancholy by Corinne Mandel
 Metamorphosis by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Mirror/Reflection by Elaine Shefer
 Misfortune by Fritz Laupichler
 Money by Edward J. Nygren

Months by Shane Adler
 Music by Yona Pinson

Naked/Nude by Kathryn Moore Heleniak
 Night by Stephen Lamia
 Nightmare by Petra ten-Doesschate Chu

Offering by Erica Cruikshank-Dodd
 Order/Chaos by Paul Grimley Kuntz and Lee Braver

Path/Road/Crossroads by Christine M. Boeckl
 Patronage by Claire Lindgren
 Peace by Liana De Girolami Cheney
 Peasantry by Margaret A. Sullivan
 Penitence/Repentance by Christine M. Boeckl
 Physiognomy by Margaret A. Sullivan
 Plague/Pestilence by Christine M. Boeckl
 Pointing/Indicating by Fritz Laupichler
 Pregnancy by Beth S. Gersh-Nešić
 Protestantism by Christine M. Boeckl

Reading by Alicia Craig Faxon

Sacrifice by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Sanctuary by Claudia Hill
 Seasons by Shane Adler
 Self-Portraits I: Men by Christine M. Boeckl
 Self-Portraits II: Women by Fredrika Jacobs
 Serpent's Bite by Sarah S. Gibson
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses by Sarah S. Gibson
 Shipwreck by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Sin/Sinning by Christine M. Boeckl
 Sleep/Sleeping by Petra ten-Doesschate Chu
 Sport by Karen Pinkus
 Sublime by David D. Nolta

Temptation by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Toilet Scenes by Diane Apostolos-Cappadona

Upside Down by Janice McCullogh

Vanity/Vanitas by Liana De Girolami Cheney
 Vices/Deadly Sins by Liana De Girolami Cheney
 Virgin/Virginity by Diane Apostolos-Cappadona
 Virtue/Virtues by Liana De Girolami Cheney
 Visiting/Visitation by Alicia Craig Faxon
 Voyeurism by Eugene Dwyer

Whiteness by Shane Adler
 Widowhood by Karen Pinkus
 Witchcraft/Sorcery by Yona Pinson

Zodiac by Paul Grimley Kuntz

GENERAL READING LIST

General iconographic references that relate to many themes are listed here. In order to avoid duplication they are not repeated in the bibliographies accompanying each essay unless specifically cited. References to individual themes are listed with each essay but are not included here. Please note that many of these books are also available in other editions than the ones cited here.

- Achtemeier, Paul J., Harper's Bible Dictionary, San Francisco, California: Harper, 1985
- Addis, William Edward, and Thomas Arnold, A Catholic Dictionary, London: Paul, 1897; St. Louis, Missouri: Herder, 1960
- Aghion, Irene, Héros et dieux de l'antiquité: Guide Iconographique, Paris: Flammarion, 1994
- Alciati, Andrea, Emblems, Madrid, Spain: Editorial Nacional, 1975, originally printed in 1531 as Emblematum Liber
- Allardice, Pamela, Myths, Gods and Fantasy, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1991
- Allem, Don Cameron, Mysteriously Meant: The Rediscovery of Pagan Symbolism and Allegorical Interpretation in the Renaissance, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1970
- Allen, Maude Rex, Japanese Art Motifs, Chicago: A. C. McClurg, 1917
- Apostolos-Cappadona, Diane, Dictionary of Christian Art, New York: Continuum, 1994
- Armitage, John, Man at Play: Nine Centuries of Pleasure Making, New York: Frederick Warne, 1977
- Attwater, Donald, A Dictionary of Saints: Being an Index to the Revised Edition of Alban Butler's "Lives of the Saints," New York: P. J. Kennedy, 1958
- Aurenhammer, Hans, Lexikon der Christlichen Ikonographie, Vienna, Austria: Hollinck, 1959
- Avery, Catherine B., editor, The New Century Handbook of Greek Mythology and Legend, New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1972
- Bailey, Henry Turner, Symbolism for Artists, Worcester, Massachusetts: Davis, 1925
- Becker, Udo, Lexikon der Symbole, Freiberg, Germany: Herder, 1992
- Beckwith, Martha, Hawaiian Mythology, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1970
- Beigbeder, Olivier, Lexique des Symboles, Saint-Léger-Vauban, France: Zodiaque, 1969
- Bell, Robert E., Dictionary of Classical Mythology, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1991
- _____, Place-Names in Classical Mythology: Greece, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1988
- _____, Women of Classical Mythology: A Biographical Dictionary, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1991

- Bellinger, Gerhard J., Knaurs Lexikon der Mythologie, Munich, Germany: Knaur Droemer, 1989
- Benson, Elizabeth P., and Gillett Good Griffin, editors, Maya Iconography, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1977
- Benson, George Willard, The Cross: Its History and Symbolism, New York: Hacker Art, 1932
- Bernon, Satia, and Robert Bernon, Myth & Religion in European Painting, 1270–1799: The Stories as the Artists Knew Them, New York: Braziller, 1973
- Bianchi, George Henry, editor, The Mythology of Greece and Rome with Special Reference to Its Use in Art, London: Ward, 1877
- Bibliographie zue Symbolik, Ikonographie und Mythologie*, Baden-Baden, Germany: Verlag V. Koerner, 1968
- Bibliotheca Sanctorum*, Rome: Instituto Giovanni, 1961
- Biedermann, Hans, Knaurs Lexikon der Symbole, München, Germany: Knaur Droemer, 1989
- _____, Dictionary of Symbolism, translated by James Hulbert, Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, 1992
- Bles, Arthur de, How to Distinguish the Saints in Art by Their Costumes, Symbols, and Attributes, New York: Art Culture, 1925
- Bocian, Martin, Lexikon der Biblischen Personen, Stuttgart, Germany: A. Kroner, 1989
- Bonnefoy, Yves, Mythologies: A Restructured Translation of Dictionnaire des Mythologies et des Religions des Sociétés traditionnelles et du Monde antique, prepared under the direction of Wendy Doniger, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1991
- Bonnerjean, Biron, A Dictionary of Superstitions and Mythology, London: Folk, 1926; Detroit, Michigan: Singing Tree, 1969
- Brewer, Ebenezer Cobham, Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, New York: Harper, 1989
- Brunel, Pierre, Companion to Literary Myths: Heroes and Archetypes, London and New York: Routledge, 1992
- Bulfinch, Thomas, The Age of Fable, or Beauties of Mythology, Boston: Tilton, 1855
- _____, The Age of Chivalry, or Legends of King Arthur, Boston: Tilton, 1858
- _____, The Legends of Charlemagne, or Romance of the Middle Ages, Boston: Tilton, 1862
- Burland, Cottie, and Marion Wood, North American Indian Mythology, London: Paul Hamlyn, 1968
- Burn, Lucilla, Greek Myths, London: British Museum, 1964; Austin: University of Texas Press, 1964
- Butler, Alban, Lives of the Saints, New York: Kennedy, 1956
- Cahn, Walter, editor, Romanesque Sculpture in American Collections, New York: B. Franklin, 1979
- Camerarius, Joachin, Symbolorum et emblematum centuria quarta, Mogvntiae: L. Bourgeat, 1668
- Campbell, Joseph, The Masks of the Gods, New York: Viking, 1964
- Carpenter, Thomas H., Art and Myth in Ancient Greece: A Handbook, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1991
- Cats, Jacob, Alle de Wercken so Ouden als Nieuwe, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: J. J. Schipper, 1654
- Champeaux, Gérard de, and Dom Sébastien Sterckx, Introduction au Monde des Symboles, Saint-Léger-Vauban, France: Zodiaque, 1966
- Chetwynd, Tom, A Dictionary of Symbols, London and New York: Granada, 1982
- Chevalier, Jean, Dictionnaire des Symboles, Mythes, Rêves, Costumes, Gestes, Formes, Figures, Couleurs, Nombres, Paris: R. Laffont, 1969
- Choate, Ray, Illustration Index to Australian Art: Reproductions in Art Monographs and Exhibition Catalogues, Victoria, British Columbia: Latrobe University Library, 1990
- Christier, Anthony, Chinese Mythology, London: Paul Hamlyn, 1968
- Cirlot, Jean Eduardo, A Dictionary of Symbols, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1971
- Clapp, Jane, Sculpture Index, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow, 1970
- Clifton, Charles, Encyclopedia of Heresies and Heretics, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1992
- Coghlan, Ronan, The Encyclopedia of Arthurian Legends, Rockport, Massachusetts: Element, 1991
- Comay, Joan, and Ronald Brownrigg, Who's Who in the Bible, New York: Bonanza, 1980
- Comte, Fernand, Mythology, Edinburgh, Scotland: Chambers, 1991
- Cooper, Jean Campbell, An Illustrated Encyclopedia of Traditional Symbols, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1978
- _____, Symbolic and Mythological Animals, London: Aquarian, 1992
- Cosgrove, Denis, The Iconography of Landscape, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988
- Cotterell, Arthur, Dictionary of Mythology, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
- _____, The Macmillan Illustrated Encyclopedia of Myths and Legends, New York: Macmillan, 1989
- Coulson, John, The Saints: A Concise Biographical Dictionary, New York: Hawthorne, 1958
- Cross, Frank Leslie, and Elizabeth A. Livingstone, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983
- Crossley-Holland, Kevin, The Norse Myths, New York: Pantheon, 1980
- Daemmrich, Horst S., and Ingrid Daemmrich, Themes and Motives in Western Literature: A Handbook, Tubingen, Germany: Francke, 1987
- Daniel, Howard, Encyclopedia of Themes and Subjects in Painting: Mythological, Biblical, Historical, Literary, Allegorical and Topical, New York: Abrams, 1971
- D'Anvers, Nancy, Lives and Legends of the Evangelists, Apostles, and Other Early Saints, London: Bell, 1901
- _____, Lives and Legends of the Great Hermits and Fathers of the Church, with Other Contemporary Saints, London: Bell, 1902
- _____, Lives and Legends of the English Bishops and Kings, Medieval Monks, and Other Later Saints, London: Bell, 1904

- Dars, Celestine, Subject Cataloging of Paintings in Public Collections, London: Visual Arts, 1989
- Davidson, F. Hadland, Scandinavian Mythology, London: Paul Hamlyn, 1986
- Davidson, Gustav, A Dictionary of Angels, including the Fallen Angels, New York: Free, 1967
- Davidson, Hilda Rodrick Ellis, Scandinavian Mythology, London: Paul Hamlyn, 1986
- Deen, Edith, All the Women of the Bible, New York: Harper, 1955
- Delaney, John J., Dictionary of Saints, Garden City, New Jersey: Doubleday, 1980
- Deutch, Yvonne, editor, Man, Myth, and Magic: The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Mythology, Religion, and the Unknown, New York: Marshall Cavandish, 1983
- DIAL: A Decimal Index to the Art of the Low Countries, The Hague, The Netherlands: Rijksbureau voor Kunsthistorische Documentatie, 1974–1983
- Dictionnaire des arts, de l'histoire, des lettres et des religions*, Paris: Tardy, 1987
- Dictionnaire des courants picturaux: tendances, mouvements, écoles, genres du Moyen Âge à nos jours*, Paris: Larousse, 1992
- Dictionnaire des mythes littéraires*, Monaco: Editions du Rocher, 1988
- Didron, Adolphe Napoleon, Christian Iconography, or the History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages, London: H. G. Bohn, 1851
- Diel, Paul, Symbolism in Greek Mythology: Human Desire and Its Transformations, Boulder, Colorado: Shambhala, 1980
- Dorson, Richard Mercer, Studies in Japanese Folklore, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat, 1973
- Dowson, John, A Classical Dictionary of Hindu Mythology and Religion, Geography, History, and Literature, London: T. W. Lauaric, 1928
- Drake, Maurice, and Wilfred Drake, Saints and their Emblems, London: T. W. Lauaric, 1916
- Duby, Georges, editor, A History of Private Life, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 1987
- Duchet-Suchaux, Gaston, and Michel Pastoureau, The Bible and the Saints, New York: Flammarion, 1994
- Earls, Irene, Renaissance Art: A Topical Dictionary, New York: Greenwood, 1987
- Eberhard, Wolfram, A Dictionary of Chinese Symbols, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1986
- Edwardes, Marian, A Dictionary of Non-Classical Mythology, Delhi, India: Mittel, 1988
- Elkhaden, Saad, The York Companion to Themes and Motifs of World Literature, Mythology, History and Folklore, Fredericton, New Brunswick: York, 1981
- Ellis, Peter Beresford, A Dictionary of Celtic Mythology, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1994
- Evans, Edward Payson, Animal Symbolism in Ecclesiastical Architecture, London: W. Heinemann, 1896
- Evans, Joan, Monastic Iconography from the Renaissance to the Revolution, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970
- Every, George, Christian Mythology, London: Paul Hamlyn, 1970
- Farmer, David Hugh, The Oxford Dictionary of Saints, Oxford: Clarendon, 1978
- Ferguson, George Wells, Signs and Symbols in Christian Art, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1954
- Fingesten, Peter, The Eclipse of Symbolism, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1970
- Folklore, Cultural Performances, and Popular Entertainments: A Communications-Centered Handbook, New York: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Fontana, David, The Secret Language of Symbols, San Francisco, California: Chronicle, 1993
- Fox, William Sherwood, The Mythology of All Races, Boston: Marshall Jones, 1916
- Frazer, James George, The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, London: Macmillan, 1955; New York: St. Martins, 1955
- Frenzel, Elizabeth, Stoffe der Weltliterature, Ein Lexikon dichtungsgeschichtlicher Längsschnitte, Stuttgart, Germany: Kroner, 1988
- Funk and Wagnalls Standard Dictionary of Folklore, Mythology and Legend*, New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1949
- Garnier, François, Le Langage de l'Image au Moyen Âge: Signification et Symbolique; Grammaire des gestes, 2 vols., Paris, Léopard d'Or, 1988
- , Thesaurus Iconographique: Système Descriptif des Représentations, Paris, Léopard d'Or, 1984
- Gállego, Julián, Visión y Símbolos en la Pintura Española del Siglo de oro, Madrid, Spain: Aguilar, 1972
- Garrigan, Kristine Ottesen, Victorian Art Reproductions in Modern Sources: A Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1991
- Gaskell, George Arthur, Dictionary of All Scriptures and Myths, London: Allen and Unwin, 1923; New York: Grammercy, 1960
- Gill, Sam D., and Irene F. Sullivan, Dictionary of Native American Mythology, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Gillerman, Dorothy, editor, Gothic Sculpture in American Collections, New York: Garland, 1989
- Goldsmith, Elizabeth Edwards, Ancient Pagan Symbols, New York: Putnam, 1929
- Goodenough, Erwin Ramsdell, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, 13 vols., New York: Pantheon; Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press 1953–1962
- Gordon, Stuart, The Encyclopedia of Myths and Legends, London: Headline, 1993
- Grabar, Andre, Christian Iconography: A Study in Its Origins, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1968
- Grant, Michael, and John Hazel, Gods and Mortals in Classical Mythology, Springfield, Massachusetts: G. and C. Merriam, 1973
- Graves, Robert, The Greek Myths, 2 vols., Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1960

- _____, and Raphael Patai, Hebrew Myths, New York: Doubleday, 1964
- Gray, John, Near Eastern Mythology: Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, London: John Hamlyn, 1969
- Green, Miranda, Symbols and Image in Celtic Religious Art, London and New York: Routledge, 1989
- Griffith, Helen Stuart, The Sign Language of Our Faith, New York: Morehouse-Gorham, 1944
- Grimal, Pierre, The Dictionary of Classical Mythology, Oxford: Blackwell, 1981
- Guirand, Felix, New Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology, London and New York: Hamlyn, 1968
- Hackin, Joseph, Asiatic Mythology: A Detailed Description and Explanation of the Mythologies of All the Great Nations of Asia, New York: Crescent, 1963
- Hall, James, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art, New York: Harper, 1979
- _____, A History of Ideas and Images in Italian Art, New York: Harper, 1983
- Hamilton, Edith, Mythology, Boston: Little, Brown, 1942; London: New English Library, 1942
- Hanger, Eva Catherine, Symbols, Our Universal Language, Wichita, Kansas: McCormick-Armstrong, 1962
- Harnsberger, Carolina Thomas, Gods and Heroes, Troy, New York: Whitston, 1977
- Harper's Bible Dictionary*, New York: Harper, 1985
- Hart, George, Dictionary of Egyptian Gods and Goddesses, London and New York: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1986
- _____, Egyptian Myths, London: British Museum, 1990; Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990
- Hastings, James, Dictionary of the Bible, New York: Scribner's, 1962
- _____, editor, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, New York: Scribner's, 1962
- Havlice, Patricia Pate, World Painting Index, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow, 1977
- Heinz-Mohr, Gerd, Lexikon der Symbole: Bilder und Zeichen der Christlichen Kunst, Düsseldorf, Germany: E. Diederichs, 1971
- Henkle, Arthur, and A. Schone, Emblemata, Stuttgart, Germany: J. B. Metzlersche, 1976
- Herder Dictionary of Symbols*, Wilmette, Illinois: Chiron, 1986
- Hinks, Roger, Myth and Allegory in Ancient Art, London: Warburg Institute, 1939
- Hinnelle, John R., Persian Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1973
- Holwick, Frederick George, A Bibliographical Dictionary of the Saints, St. Louis, Missouri: B. Herder, 1924; repr. Detroit, Michigan: Gale, 1969
- Howatson, M. C., The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989
- Hulme, Frederick Edward, The History, Principles, and Practice of Symbolism in Christian Art, London: 1891; Detroit, Michigan: Gale, 1969
- Iconographic Encyclopedia: Sculpture and Painting*, vol. 3, Philadelphia: Iconographic, 1887
- Imel, Martha Ann, and Dorothy Myers Imel, Goddesses in World Mythology, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1993
- Index Iconologicus*, microfiche, Sanford, North Carolina, Microfilming Corporation of America, 1980
- Index of Christian Art*, card file, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University, Department of Art and Archaeology; Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks
- Index of Jewish Art: Iconographical Index of Hebrew Illuminated Manuscripts*, New York: K. G. Saur, 1978
- Ions, Veronica, Egyptian Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1968
- _____, Indian Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1967
- Jackson, Guida Myrl, Encyclopedia of Traditional Epics, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1994
- Jacobus de Voragine, The Golden Legend, 7 vols., London: J. M. Dent, 1900; translated by William Granger Ryan, 2 vols., Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1993
- Jameson, Anna Brownall Murphy, The History of Our Lord, London: Longman, 1865
- _____, Legends of the Madonna, as Represented in Fine Arts, London: Longman, 1864
- _____, Legends of the Monastic Orders, London: Longman, 1852
- _____, Sacred and Legendary Art, 2 vols., London: Longman, 1863
- Jobs, Gertrude, Dictionary of Mythology, Folklore, and Symbols, 3 vols., New York: Scarecrow, 1961
- Jordan, Michel, Encyclopedia of Gods, New York: Facts on File, 1993
- Jung, Carl Gustav, Man and His Symbols, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1964; London: Aldus, 1964
- Kaftal, George, Iconography of the Saints in Central and South Italian Schools of Painting, Florence, Italy: Sansoni, 1965
- _____, Iconography of the Saints in the Painting of Northeast Italy, Florence, Italy: Sansoni, 1978
- _____, Iconography of the Saints in the Painting of Northwest Italy, Florence, Italy: Le Lettere, 1985
- _____, Iconography of the Saints in Tuscan Painting, Florence, Italy: Sansoni, 1952
- Kaster, Joseph, Putnam's Concise Mythological Dictionary, New York: Perigen, 1990
- Kavenagh, Peter, Irish Mythology: A Dictionary, New York: Goldsmith, 1988
- Kazhdan, Alexander P., editor, The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1991
- Kirschbaum, Engelbert, and Wolfgang Braufels, editors, Lexikon der Christlicher Ikonographie, Freiburg, Germany: 1968
- Knipping, John Baptiste, Iconography of the Counter Reformation in the Netherlands: Heaven on Earth, 2 vols., Nieuwkoop, The Netherlands: B. de Graar, 1974
- Kravitz, David, Who's Who in Greek and Roman Mythology, New York: C. N. Potter, 1976
- Lacombe de Prezel, Honore, Dictionnaire Iconologique, Paris: Hardouin, 1770

- Landwehr, John, Emblem Books in the Low Countries, Utrecht, The Netherlands: Haentjens Dekker and Gumbert, 1970
- Lass, Abraham H., editor, The Dictionary of Classical, Biblical and Literary Allusions, New York: Fawcett Gold Medal, 1987
- Leech, Marjorie, Guide to the Gods, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1992
- Leeming, David Adams, The World of Myth, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990
- _____, and Jake Page, Goddess: Myths of the Feminine Divine, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994
- _____, and Margaret Adams Leeming, Encyclopedia of Creation Myths, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1994
- Leick, Gwendolyn, A Dictionary of Ancient Near Eastern Mythology, London: Routledge, 1991
- Levi d'Ancona, Mirella, The Garden of the Renaissance, Florence, Italy: Olschki, 1977
- Lexikon Iconographicum Mythologiae Classicae*, Zurich, Switzerland: Artemis Verlag, 1981
- Ljungman, Carl G., Dictionary of Symbols, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1991
- López, Santiago Sebastian, Iconografía Medieval, Donostia: Editorial Etor, 1988
- Lurker, Manfred, The Gods and Symbols of Ancient Egypt, New York: Thames and Hudson, 1980
- _____, Lexikon der Götter und Dämonen, Stuttgart, Germany: A. Kroner, 1989
- _____, Wörterbuch der Symbolik, Stuttgart, Germany: A. Kroner, 1991
- McCall, Henrietta, Mesopotamian Myths, London: British Museum, 1990; Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990
- MacCana, Proinsias, Celtic Mythology, Feltham, England: Newnes, 1995
- MacDonald, Margaret Read, The Storyteller's Sourcebook: A Subject, Title and Motif Index to Folklore Collections for Children, Detroit, Michigan: Neal-Schuman, 1982
- McKenzie, John L., Dictionary of the Bible, New York: Macmillan, 1965
- Man, Myth, and Magic: The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Mythology, Religion, and the Unknown*, New York: Marshall Cavendish, 1983
- Marburger Index: Photographic Documentation of Art in Germany*, microfiche, Munich, Germany: K. G. Saur, 1976
- Marle, Raimond van, Iconographie de l'art Profane au Moyen-âge et à la Renaissance et la décoration des demeures, 2 vols., La Haye, The Netherlands: Nijhoff, 1931
- Matthews, Caitlin, The Aquarian Guide to British and Irish Mythology, Wellingborough, England: Aquarian, 1988
- Mayers, William Frederick, The Chinese Reader's Manual: A Handbook of Biographical, Historical, Mythological and General Literary References, Shanghai, China: American Presbyterian Missionary, 1874
- Meadows, Gilbert, An Illustrated Dictionary of Classical Mythology, London: Jupiter, 1978
- Mercatante, Anthony S., The Facts on File Encyclopedia of World Mythology and Legend, New York: Facts on File, 1988
- Metford, J. C. J., Dictionary of Christian Lore and Legend, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1983
- Miedema, Hessel, Beeldespraek: register og D. P. Pers' Uitgave van Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, Doornspijk, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1987
- Moldenke, Harold N., Plants of the Bible, Waltham: Chronica Botanica, 1952
- Monroe, Kate M., and Isabel Stevenson, Index to Reproductions of American Paintings: A Guide to Pictures Occurring in More Than Three Hundred Books, New York: Wilson, 1948
- Monroe, Kate, and Isabel Stevenson, Index to Reproductions of European Paintings: A Guide to Pictures Occurring in More Than Three Hundred Books, New York: Wilson, 1956
- Moorman, Eric W., Van Achilles tot Zeus, Nijmegen, The Netherlands: SUN, 1987
- Morales, Jose Luis, and Marin Morales, Diccionario de Iconología y Simbología, Madrid, Spain: Tarus, 1984
- Murray, Alexander S., Who's Who in Mythology: Classic Guide to the Ancient World, 2nd ed., New York: Bonanza, 1989
- Musée Royal des Beaux-Arts, De Madonna in de Kunst, Antwerp, Belgium, Musée Royal des Beaux-Arts, 1954
- Narkiss, Bezalel, Index of Jewish Art: Iconographical Index of Hebrew Illuminated Manuscripts, Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 1976–
- New Bible Dictionary*, 2nd ed., Wheaton, Illinois: Tyndale House, 1982
- New Catholic Encyclopedia*, 15 vols., New York: McGraw Hill, 1967
- New Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology*, New York: Putnam, 1968
- Nicholson, Irene, Mexican and Central American Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1961
- Norman, Dorothy, The Hero: Myth/Image/Symbol, New York: World, 1969
- Ohlgren, Thomas H., Illuminated Manuscripts: An Index to Selected Bodleian Library Color Reproductions, New York: Garland, 1977; supplement, 1978
- _____, Insular and Anglo-Saxon Illuminated Manuscripts, New York: Garland, 1986
- Okayama, Yassy, The Ripa Index: Personifications and Their Attributes in Five Editions of the Iconologia, Doornspijk, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1992
- Olderr, Steven, Reverse Symbolism Dictionary, Jefferson, North Carolina: McFarland, 1992
- Osborne, Harold, South American Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1968
- Page, Michael, Encyclopedia of Things That Never Were, New York: Viking, 1987
- Page, Raymond Ian, Norse Myths, London: British Museum, 1990; Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990
- Panofsky, Erwin, Studies of Iconology: Humanistic Themes in the Art of the Renaissance, Cambridge: Oxford University Press, 1939

- Parrinder, Edward Geoffrey, African Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1967
- , A Dictionary of Non-Christian Religion, Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971
- Pauly, August P., Der Kleine Pauly: Lexikon der Antike, 5 vols., Munich, Germany: Taschenbuch, 1979
- Perowne, Stewart, Roman Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1960
- Pfleiderer, Rudolf, Die Attribute des Heiligen: Ein Alphabetisches Nachschlagewerk zum Verständnis Kirchlicher Kunstwerke, Wiesbaden, Germany: Fourier, 1989
- Piggott, Juliet, Japanese Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1969
- , Jewish Legends, London: John Hamlyn, 1986
- Pigler, Andor, Barockthemen: Eine Auswahl von Verzeichnissen zur Ikonographie, 3 vols., Budapest, Hungary: Akadémiai-Kiadó, 1974
- Pinsent, John, Greek Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1969
- Pochat, Götz, Symbolbegreppet i Konstvetenskapen, Stockholm, Sweden: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1977
- Poignant, Roslyn, Oceanic Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1967
- Praz, Mario, Studies in Seventeenth Century Imagery, Rome: Edizione di Storia e Letterature, 1974
- Preston, Percy, A Dictionary of Pictorial Subjects from Classical Literature, New York: Scribner's, 1983
- Puttock, Arthur Geoffrey, A Dictionary of Heraldry and Related Subjects, New York: Arco, 1985
- Réau, Louis, Iconographie de l'art Chrétien, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1955
- Reid, Jane Davidson, The Oxford Guide to Classical Mythology in the Arts, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993
- Revilla, Federico, Diccionario de Iconografía, Madrid, Spain: Ediciones Cátedra, 1990
- Richter, Gert, Lexikon der Kunstmotive: Antike und Christlich Welt, Munich, Germany: Bertelsmann Lexikon-Verlag, 1978
- Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, many editions
- Roberts, Helene E., and Rachel Hall, Iconographic Index to the New Testament Subjects Represented in Photographs and Slides of Paintings in the Visual Collections of the Fine Arts Library, Harvard University, New York: Garland, 1987
- , Iconographic Index to the Old Testament Subjects Represented in Photographs and Slides of Paintings in the Visual Collections of the Fine Arts Library, Harvard University, New York: Garland, 1987
- Rochelle, Mercedes, Mythological and Classical World Art Index: A Locator of Paintings, Sculptures, Frescoes, Manuscript Illuminations, Sketches, Woodcuts, and Engravings Executed 1200 B.C. to 1900 A.D., with a Directory of the Institutions Holding Them, Jefferson, North Carolina, McFarland, 1991
- Rollenhagen, Gabriel, Nucleus Emblematum Selectissimorum, Hildesheim, Germany: G. Olds, 1985
- , Selectorum Emblematum: Centuria Secunda, Ultrajecti: Janssonius, 1613
- Roscher, Wilhelm H., editor, Ausführliches Lexikon der Griechischen und Römischen Mythologie, 10 vols. and supplement, Leipzig, Germany: G. Olms, 1884
- Rosenberg, Donna, World Mythology: An Anthology of Greek Myths and Epics, Lincolnwood, Illinois: NTC, 1994
- Rovin, Jeff, The Encyclopedia of Monsters, New York: Facts on File, 1989
- Saavedra Fajardo, Diego, Empresas Políticas: Idea de un Principe Politico-Cristiano, Madrid, Spain: Editora Nacional, 1976
- Sachi Mestics, Giuseppina, Dizionario Universale di Mitologia, Milan, Italy: Rusconi, 1990
- Schefold, Karl, Gods and Heroes in Late Archaic Greek Art, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991
- Schiller, Gertrud, Iconography of Christian Art, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Arts Society, 1971
- Schmidt, Joel, Dictionnaire de la Mythologie Grecque et Romaine, Paris: Larousse, 1986
- Schmitt, Otto, and Karl-August Wirth, Reallexikon zu Deutschen Kunstgeschichte, Stuttgart, Germany: J. B. Metzler, 1937
- Seibert, Jutta, Lexikon Christlichen Kunst: Themen, Gestalten, Symbole, Freiburg, Germany: Herder, 1980
- Seigneuret, Jean Charles, Dictionary of Literary Themes and Motifs, London: John Hamlyn, 1987
- Shaw, Marvin S., A Viewer's Guide to Art: A Glossary of Gods, People, and Creatures, New York: Norton, 1991
- Sill, Gertrude Grace, A Handbook of Symbols in Christian Art, New York: Macmillan, 1975
- Simpson, Jacqueline, European Mythology, London: John Hamlyn, 1987
- Smith, Lyn Wall, and Nancy D. W. Moure, Index to Reproductions of American Paintings Appearing in More Than 400 Books, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow, 1977
- Smyth, Daragh, A Guide to Irish Mythology, Dublin, Ireland: Irish Academic Press, 1988
- South, Malcolm, Mythical and Fabulous Creatures: A Sourcebook and Research Guide, New York: Peter Bedrick, 1988
- Snodgrass, Mary Ellen, Voyages in Classical Mythology, Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO, 1994
- Spitzing, Gunter, Lexikon Byzantinisch-Christlicher Symbole der Bildwelt Griechenlands und Kleinasiens, Munich, Germany: Diederichs, 1989
- Stapleton, Michael, An Illustrated Dictionary of Greek and Roman Mythology, New York: Peter Bedrick, 1986
- Straten, Roelof, van Iconclass Indexes, Doornspijk, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1987—
- Stutley, Margaret, The Illustrated Dictionary of Hindu Iconography, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985
- Sykes, Egerton, Everyman's Dictionary of Non-Classical Mythology, London: Dent, 1952
- Tervarent, Guy de, Attributs et Symboles dans l'art profane, Geneva, Switzerland: E. Droz, 1958; supplement, 1964

- Thomison, Dennis, The Black Artist in America: An Index to Reproductions, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow, 1991
- Tripp, Edward, Crowell's Handbook of Classical Mythology, New York: Crowell, 1970
- Vaenius, Otho, Amorum Emblemata, Figuris Aeneis Incisa, Hildesheim, Germany: G. Olms, 1970
- Visscher, Roemer, Sinnepoppen, Naar de uitgave van 1614 bij Willem Iansz, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: M. Nijhoff, 1949
- Vries, Ad de, Dictionary of Symbols and Imagery, 13 vols., Amsterdam, The Netherlands: North Holland, 1981
- Waal, Henri van de, Iconographic Classification System, 13 vols., Amsterdam, The Netherlands: North Holland, 1973
- Walker, Barbara G., The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, San Francisco, California: Harper, 1988
- _____, The Woman's Dictionary of Symbols and Sacred Objects, San Francisco, California: Harper, 1983; London: Pandora, 1995
- Warrington, John, Who's Who in the Classical World, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995
- Waters, Clara Clement, Handbook of Legendary and Mythological Art, New York: Hurd and Houghton, 1871
- _____, Saints in Art, Boston: L. C. Page, 1899
- Webber, Fredrick Roth, Church Symbolism: An Explanation of the More Important Symbols of the Old and New Testament, the Primitive, the Medieval, and the Modern Church, Cleveland, Ohio: J. H. Jansen, 1938
- Werner, Edward Theodore Chalmers, A Dictionary of Chinese Mythology, Portland, Maine: Longwood, 1977
- West, Edward N., Outward Signs: The Language of Christian Symbolism, New York: Walker, 1989
- Whittick, Arnold, Symbols: Signs and Their Meaning and Uses in Design, 2nd ed., London: Hill, 1971
- Whone, Herbert, Church, Monastery, Cathedral, Tisbury, England: Compton Russell Element, 1977
- Who's Who in the Bible*, Pleasantville, New York: Reader's Digest, 1994
- Wilhelm, Christolph, Handbuch der Symbole in der Bildenden Kunst, Frankfurt, Germany: Safari Ullstein, 1980
- Wimmer, Otto, Kennzeichen und Attribute der Heiligen, Munich, Germany: Tyrolia, 1975
- Wittkower, Rudolf, Allegory and the Migration of Symbols, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1987
- Wright, Christopher, World Master Paintings from the Early Renaissance to the Present Day: A Comprehensive listing of Works by 1300 Painters and a Complete Guide to their Location Worldwide, London and New York: Routledge, 1992
- Wright, Frederic Adam, editor, Lempriere's Classical Dictionary of Proper Names Mentioned in Ancient Authors, London: Paul, 1949
- Zimmerman, John Edward, Dictionary of Classical Mythology, New York: Harper, 1964

ABANDONMENT

Helene E. Roberts

The following iconographic narratives are included in the discussion of the theme Abandonment:

OEDIPUS

PSYCHE

FOUNDLING HOSPITALS

MOSES

JESUS CHRIST

GENRE PAINTINGS OF

ROMULUS AND REMUS

BACCHANALIA

ABANDONED CHILDREN

ARIADNE

Angelica Kauffmann, Ariadne, 1782, oil on canvas, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie. (Courtesy of the Gemäldegalerie, Dresden, Germany)

The theme of abandonment usually concerns the weak and dependent, especially women and children, deserted by the strong and ruthless or the irresponsible and improvident. Children, like Oedipus left to die on a mountain top on the order of his father, and women, like Ariadne abandoned on an island by her lover Theseus, are examples from classical mythology. The reasons for abandonment may differ. Oedipus was abandoned because his father, hearing a prophecy that the child will someday kill him, ordered him to be exposed on a mountain top. Moses in the Old Testament, on the other hand, was abandoned in order to save him from the decree of the pharaoh to kill all Jewish male children. The indigent mother of Victorian genre paintings, who left her baby on the steps of a rich person's house or at a foundling hospital, may have done so to give the child the chance of a better life. The responses to abandonment also differ. Sometimes the mature victim, like Dido abandoned by Aeneas, was so distraught she killed herself, but in the stories of Cupid and Psyche the victim, Psyche, pursued the abandoner and effected a reconciliation. In many narratives, as in the stories of Ariadne or Olimpia, the abandoned woman was rescued by another man who pitied her plight and fell in love with her. While both literary and visual renditions of these stories usually focus sympathy on the victim, the main thrust of the story is often the heroic exploits of the abandoner. "The epic hero," writes literary historian Lawrence Lipking, "tends to define himself by leaving a woman behind" (p. xvi), and usually without dire consequences to himself. Modern sympathies may not be so different. In the case of the modern bride left at the altar, the situation is often given a comic twist.

Historian John Boswell describes how the circumstances of abandonment in myth and literature were based on the realities of existence throughout most of human history. Until the nineteenth century, children were regularly abandoned as a method of family limitation. In some ages as many as a third of the children born were abandoned, sometimes to die, but often they were left in the not unrealistic hope that they would be taken in, perhaps adopted, by other families. Before the medieval period, children were also regularly sold into slavery or prostitution, later into servitude. Abandonment of women by husbands and lovers was, and still is, a fact of life. Women less commonly abandon their families.

Moses and Oedipus are the abandoned children most often depicted in works of art. Moses set adrift in the bulrushes, for example, was painted several times by Nicolas Poussin, as well as by many other artists. In Poussin's painting of 1654 in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford University, Moses is tenderly set afloat in a small boatlike basket and serenely waves farewell to his distressed family on the shore. The scene of his finding, however, was the part of the narrative most frequently painted by artists. Other famous abandoned children are also usually depicted when they are saved, in the case of Romulus and Remus by a she-wolf, as in the famous Etruscan bronze in the Capitoline

Museum in Rome. Although it is a well-known image and a model that influenced many other versions of the theme, it is debated whether the she-wolf is the original bronze dedicated on the Capitoline Hill in 296 B.C.; the suckling infants were made in the Renaissance. The slew-footed Oedipus, wounded on the orders of his father to prevent his escape, was more often depicted in the medieval period than in the classical. In a classical red-figured vase painting, the young Oedipus clings to the shepherd who bears him away. In two medieval manuscripts the naked child is hung upside down by his feet, a recourse that, while it looks extremely painful, apparently was meant to protect the child from animals. The scene was repeated in a nineteenth-century depiction of the theme by Jean-François Millet. Abandonment figured in the lives of many children who grew up to be leaders and heroes, including Ion, Cyrus, Paris, Telephus, Poseidon, Sargon, Zoroaster, Zeus, and Sir Gawain.

During the Renaissance, demography, economic stability, and humanism converged in the organization of civic and secular institutions for the care of abandoned children. One of the most enduring was the Ospedale degli Innocenti founded in Florence, Italy, in 1419. Designed by Filippo Brunelleschi, the building is still regarded as a model of functional and aesthetic design. Not only did it follow mathematically derived principles of design and allow adequate room and communicating passages for the functions of the building, it integrated the activities of the hospital and its children into the community around the building. The hospital's care for the deserted children was expressed in a charming series of roundels on the facade, designed by Andrea della Robbia and installed in 1487, that show infants emerging from their swaddling clothes.

A foundling hospital established in 1739 in London also united artistic endeavors with the care of abandoned children. Thomas Coram, a successful sea captain, was moved by the number of abandoned children left to die in the streets and roads of England and by the high death rate of children in poor-houses. He enlisted the help of artist William Hogarth and others to found a home for the children. Hogarth's drawing The Foundlings, used as a headpiece for an appeal for the foundling hospital, was only a part of his contributions. Hogarth also served as a governor, donated money to the hospital, and took some of the foundlings into his home. He also created a number of paintings for the foundling hospital, including a portrait of Captain Coram. Other artists also contributed paintings, some of them portraits of supporters of the hospital, others on themes related to the abandonment and rescue of children. The Court room, for example, contained James Wills's Little Children Brought to Christ, Joseph Highmore's painting of the outcast Hagar and Ishmael, Francis Hayman's The Finding of the Infant Moses in the Bulrushes, Hogarth's Moses Brought Before Pharaoh's Daughter, and John Michael Rysbrack's relief Charity. The hospital soon owned one of the few art collections open to the public, a circumstance that led to its becoming a fashionable meeting place, well endowed with funds for its charitable work. In the mid-nineteenth century Emma Brownlow, whose father had been a foundling at the hospital and rose to become one of its officials, added a series of paintings depicting activities at the foundling hospital (Wood, pp. 69–71).

The adult most often depicted in art as a victim of abandonment is Ariadne, who was abandoned on the island of Naxos by her lover Theseus, whom she had helped to defeat the Minotaur and to escape from the labyrinth at Crete. The circumstances of the abandonment differ in various versions of the myth, but Greek vase paintings devoted to the scene concentrate on exonerating Theseus for deserting the woman who saved his life. The Athenians, who had adopted Theseus as their national hero, seemed eager to explain this potential moral failing as caused by the intervention of the gods. On a cup, perhaps by the artist known as the Foundry Painter, Hermes leads the reluctant Theseus away. On a lekythos Athena arouses Theseus lying at the side of the sleeping Ariadne. A small figure of sleep sits on the head of the blissfully smiling Ariadne to ensure she will not awaken. On a skyphos by the Lewis Painter, Athena is the culprit who drives the alarmed Theseus to his ship while a small winged figure drops a sleeping potion on Ariadne. On a hydria by the Syleus Painter, Athena pushes Theseus in one direction while Dionysus leads Ariadne in the other. The gazes of the two lovers meet as they defer to the gods who so cruelly separate them.

The intervention of the gods in the destinies of heroes at the expense of women is a theme repeated in the desertion of Dido by Aeneas in Virgil's Aeneid. Olimpia in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso suffers a very similar abandonment by Bireno, but here the story is used as a cautionary tale about falling in love with unscrupulous and undeserving men. Although from another age and genre, the men in these narratives may be another form of the young ambitious men who use women for financial or social gain then abandon them—a theme that can be found in modern novels, movies, operas, soap operas, and real life.

Ariadne abandoned by Theseus was also a theme painted by Renaissance, Baroque, and nineteenth-century painters. In most of these periods, however, it is the suffering of the abandoned Ariadne as she realizes that her lover has deserted her that provides the major focus of the paintings. In Carlo Saraceni's painting of the theme, a nearly naked Ariadne throws out her arms in distress as she sees Theseus's ship sailing into the distance. The rocky landscape looms over her despairing figure. Angelica Kauffmann painted several versions of this scene. Ariadne, in dishabille and partially silhouetted against a stormy sky, gestures with raised arms toward the departing ship. In one version a putto hides his tear-streaked face. Artists from the Renaissance to the modern period, and especially in the eighteenth century, were charged with creating something beautiful and removing all that was ugly and distasteful from their paintings. This mission made it difficult to create heroines expressing emotions that would disfigure the beauty of their faces. Angelica Kauffmann solved this problem by displacing the emotion onto the putto, yet his face, contorted with crying, is largely hidden by his bowed head, his curly locks, and his pudgy little hands.

The theme of the abandoned Ariadne was extremely popular in the nineteenth century and was painted by George Frederic Watts, John Vanderlyn, Henrietta Rae, Evelyn De Morgan, Herbert James Draper, Philip Hermogenes Calderon, William Blake Richmond, Gustave Moreau, and Frederick Leighton, among others (Kestner, pp. 100, 202). In an interesting variation Calderon shows Ariadne wading into the sea after the ship. The main variation, however—used by Watts, De Morgan, and Vanderlyn—shows a sleeping Ariadne. Vanderlyn's painting of the recumbent Ariadne remains the premier example of a nude in the nineteenth-century United States. Paintings of Ariadne in the nineteenth century shared exhibition space with paintings of a number of other abandoned women, including Psyche, Clytie, and Calypso. It was a particularly important theme for this period and one related to many paintings depicting the rescue of women in distress.

The Old Testament provides the abandoned child Moses, but the New Testament provides an example that disproves the rule that victims of abandonment were mainly women and children. Jesus Christ is abandoned by his disciples when he is arrested. There is a poignant interpretation of the scene in a panel by Sassetta in which Judas kisses Christ as a soldier places a rope around Jesus' neck. On one side of the painting a group of soldiers with raised spears prepare to arrest Christ, while on the other side the disciples, identified by their halos, rush away from the scene. A more poignant scene is that of the crucified Christ asking "Father, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matthew 27:46; Mark 15:34).

Another kind of abandonment occurs in the giving up of the usual restraints to abandon oneself to grief or religious ecstasy. The many scenes of Bacchanalia in ancient and modern works of art may be the best examples of this definition of the word. Bacchantes (maenads), female followers of the cult of Bacchus (Dionysus), were given to abandoned frenzy characterized by the drinking of wine, wild dancing, and the killing of wild animals. Euripides, in his play Bacchae, describes the nightmarish and grotesque abandonment of normal restraint when events provide an outlet for women's hostility and an escape from their frustrated lives. Devotion to Dionysus and the resulting release of repressed emotions gave the women great strength and destructive impulses. Empowered by the magic wand of Dionysus, they ravished the countryside, rending herds of cattle limb from limb, destroying crops, and scattering all resistance. Scandalized at a report about the women, intoxicated with wine, dancing on mountaintops, and practicing strange Bacchic rites, King Pentheus promised he would sell them as slaves or set them to work spinning for him. By preying on Pentheus's curiosity and perhaps on his unrecognized voyeuristic or transvestite longings, Dionysus lures Pentheus to dress in women's clothing in order to spy on the women's secret rites. But it is a trap, and when Dionysus reveals the spy to his maenads, they tear him limb from limb. In her wild abandonment to blood lust even Agave, Pentheus's mother, fails to recognize her son. A messenger describes how Dionysus placed Pentheus high in a pine tree and then reveals the intruder to his maenads. The women pull down the tree and Pentheus falls to the ground at his mother's feet. He cries for mercy from his mother, begging her not to kill him, her own son.

But she, with lips a-foam and eyes that run like Leaping fire, with thoughts that ne'er should be
On earth, possessed by Bacchus utterly,
Stays not nor hears.
(Euripides, pp. 65–66)

The fate of Pentheus is sealed as the maddened women take their revenge for their years of seclusion and repression.

Yea, all the air was loud
 With groans that faded into sobbing breath,
 Dim shrieks, and joy, and the triumph-cries of death.
 And here was borne a severed arm, and there
 A hunter's booted foot; white bones lay bare
 With rending; and swift hands ensanguined
 Tossed as in sport the flesh of Pentheus dead.
 (Euripides, p. 66)

Agave retrieves his head to pierce it with a wand and carries it in triumph back to the city. In her hysteria she thinks she has killed a lion with her bare hands. She brags to her father that she has forsaken the shuttle and the loom for the higher task of slaying wild beasts. With pride she waves aloft her trophy—the head of her son.

A Pompeian fresco from the House of Vettei depicts the death of Pentheus, but it hardly does justice to the grotesque frenzy of Euripides' play. The faces of the maenads are intense, although calm, and the swirling rhythms and the concentration with which they begin their ghastly dismemberment capture some of the diabolic fury of their act. In the nineteenth century, the Swiss painter Charles Gleyre took up the same theme in his Pentheus Pursued by the Maenads. In the foreground the fleeing Pentheus (a classical nude with a cape) makes an agonized gesture of despair as he looks for a place to hide in the rocky landscape. The possessed maenads, silhouetted against the sky, abandoned to unreasoning fury, have spotted their prey. Ciconian women also killed Orpheus in a similar frenzy.

The theme of abandonment has one meaning of being left or forsaken and another of giving oneself over to unusual and all-encompassing emotion that often drives the victim to antisocial behavior. As Lawrence Lipking points out, the two senses are related. Abandonment leads to excessive grief and feelings of hate and revenge that offend society and turn it against the victim. The outsider position in turn frees the abandoned one from social rules and renders her more free and powerful (Lipking, p. xvii). As a popular song describes the situation, "Freedom's just another word for nothing left to lose."

The theme of abandonment permeates Asian, ancient, classical, medieval, and modern art. Depictions of the theme help to delineate areas of human morality and responsibility toward others. The psychic trauma or the material deprivations usually accompanying abandonment make it a powerful and threatening experience, one that is, in some way, felt by everyone.

See also Adultery; Bacchanalia/Orgy;
 Drunkenness/Intoxication; Ecstasy; Widowhood

Selected Works of Art

Oedipus

Achilles Painter, Euphorbus with the Infant Oedipus, neck amphora from Vulci, 425–420 B.C., Paris, Cabinet des Médailles

Oedipus, manuscript illumination, thirteenth century, Pommersfelden, Germany, Schlossbibliothek (Cod. 295, fol. 52v)

Oedipus, manuscript illumination, fourteenth century, Munich, Germany, Staatsbibliothek (Cod. gall. 6, fol. 21)

Rosa, Salvator, The Rescue of the Infant Oedipus, etching, 1663, private collection

Daumier, Honoré, Oedipus and the Shepherd, painting, 1846–1847, New York, Thannhauser Collection
 Millet, Jean-François, Oedipus Taken Down From the Tree, painting, 1847, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada

Moses

Poussin, Nicolas, Moses Abandoned on the Nile, painting, 1654, Oxford, Oxford University, Ashmolean Museum

Poussin, Nicolas, copy after: Moses Placed on the Banks of the Nile, painting, mid-seventeenth century, Budapest, Hungary, Museum of Fine Arts

Poussin, Nicolas, Moses Set Adrift in the Bulrushes, painting, mid-seventeenth century, Dresden, Germany, Staatsammlungen

Bourdon, Sébastien, The Hiding of Moses, painting, mid-seventeenth century, Greenville, South Carolina, Bob Jones University Collection

Patel, Pierre, Landscape: Moses in the Bulrushes, painting, 1660, Paris, Louvre

Loth, Johann Carl, The Exposure of Moses, painting, late seventeenth century, Munich, Germany, New State Gallery

Moreau, Gustave, Young Moses, painting, 1878, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Romulus and Remus

River God Tiber, Greco-Roman sculpture, Paris, Louvre

She-Wolf (Lupa), Etruscan bronze, third century B.C., twins added during the Renaissance, Rome, Capitoline Museum

Torlonio Harbor Relief, Roman marble relief, Torlonio, Italy

Ariadne

Lekythos, Greek vase painting, Taranto, Italy, Museo Nazionale
 Foundry Painter, Cup, 500–475 B.C., Tarquinia, Italy, Museo Nazionale Tarquinense

Lewis Painter, Skyphos, 475–450 B.C., Vienna

Syleus Painter, Hydria, 500–475 B.C., Berlin

Saraceni, Carlo, Ariadne Abandoned, painting, early seventeenth century, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale

Kauffman, Angelica, Ariadne Abandoned, painting, 1782, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Watts, George Frederick, Ariadne on Naxos, painting, 1867–75, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Vanderlyn, John, Ariadne, painting, 1874, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts

De Morgan, Evelyn, Ariadne in Naxos, painting, 1877, London, De Morgan Foundation

Chassériau, Théodore, Ariadne, painting, mid-nineteenth century, Paris, Louvre

Psyche

Spranger, Bartholomaeus, Cupid Leaving Psyche, painting, 1587, Oldenburg, Germany

Heintz, Joseph the Elder, Cupid Leaving Psyche, painting, circa 1603, Nuremberg, Germany, Germanisches Nationalmuseum

David, Jacques-Louis, Psyche Abandoned, painting, 1788, private collection

Pajou, Augustin, Psyche Abandoned, marble sculpture, 1791, Paris, Louvre

Tenerani, Pietro, Psyche Abandoned, sculpture, 1817, Leipzig, Germany, Museum of Fine Arts

Jesus Christ

Duccio di Buoninsegna, The Betrayal, fresco, late thirteenth to early fourteenth century, Siena, Italy, St. Maria Assunta Opera Museum

Duccio di Buoninsegna, Betrayal of Christ, detail of back of Maestà Altarpiece, panel, 1308–1311, Siena, Italy, Cathedral Museum

Giovanni, Stefano di, Betrayal of Christ, painting, circa 1444, Detroit, Michigan, Museum of Art

Rembrandt van Rijn, Christ on the Cross, painting, 1631, Le Mas d'Agenais, France

Bacchanalia

Frenziad Maenad, Greek lekythos, circa 470 B.C., Syracuse, Italy, P. Orsi Museum

Death of Pentheus, Roman wall painting, circa A.D. 70, Pompeii, House of Vettii

De Volterra, Daniele, Pentheus and the Maenads, fresco, circa 1548–1550, Rome, Palazzo Farnese

Gleyre, Charles, Pentheus Pursued by the Maenads, painting, 1864, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum

Levy, Emile, Death of Orpheus, painting, 1866, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Vallotton, Félix-Édouard, Orpheus Dismembered by the Maenads, painting, 1914, Paris, private collection

Foundling Hospitals

Brunelleschi, Filippo, Ospedale degli Innocenti, 1419–1424, Florence, Italy, Piazza della S.S. Annunziata

Della Robbia, Andrea, Infants in Swaddling Clothes, terra-cotta roundels, 1487, Florence, Italy, Ospedale degli Innocenti

Hogarth, William, The Foundlings, drawing, engraved by Peter La Cave, 1739, London, Thomas Coram foundation for Children

Hogarth, William, Captain Coram, painting, 1740, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Hogarth, William, Moses Brought Before Pharaoh's Daughter, painting, 1746, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Hayman, Francis, The Finding of the Infant Moses in the Bulrushes, painting, 1746, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Highmore, Joseph, Hagar and Ishmael, painting, 1746, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Rysbrack, John Michael, Charity, marble relief, 1746, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Wills, James, Little Children Brought to Christ, painting, 1746, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Wilson, Richard, Foundling Hospital, 1746, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

West, Benjamin, Christ Presenting a Little Child, painting, before 1801, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Brownlow, Emma, The Foundling Restored To Its Mother, painting, 1858, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Brownlow, Emma, The Christening, painting, 1863, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Brownlow, Emma, The Sick Room, painting, 1864, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Anderson, Sophie, Foundling Girls in the Chapel, painting, circa 1855–1871, London, Thomas Coram Foundation for Children

Genre Paintings of Abandoned Children

De Bray, Jan, Clothing the Children at the Holy Ghost Orphanage, Haarlem, 1663, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Frans Halsmuseum

Hicks, George Elgar, The Infant Orphan Election at the London Tavern, painting, 1865, private collection

Holl, Frank, Deserted—A Foundling, study, 1847, private collection

Dixon, Alfred, Forsaken, painting, 1879, Sunderland

Storey, George Adolphus, The Orphans, painting, 1879, New York, Forbes Magazine Collection

Further Reading

Battisti, Eugenio, Filippo Brunelleschi: The Complete Work, New York: Rizzoli, 1981; London: Thames and Hudson, 1981

Boswell, John, The Kindness of Strangers: The Abandonment of Children in Western Europe from Late Antiquity to the Renaissance, New York: Pantheon, 1988; London: Allen Lane, 1989

Broeder, Frederick den, "A Weeping Heroine and a Mourning Enchantress by Angelica Kauffmann," Bulletin of the William Benton Museum of Art 1:3 (1974)

Estrin, Barbara L., The Raven and the Lark: Lost Children in Literature of the English Renaissance, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, 1985; London: Associated University Presses, 1985

Euripides, The Bacchae, twelfth edition, translated by Gilbert Murray, London: George Allen, 1913

Fuchs, Rachael Ginnis, Abandoned Children: Foundlings and Child Welfare in Nineteenth-Century France, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1984

Gavitt, Philip, Charity and Children in Renaissance Florence: The Ospedale degli Innocenti, 1410–1536, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1990

Kertzer, David L., Sacrificed for Honor: Italian Infant Abandonment and the Politics of Reproduction Control, Boston: Beacon Press, 1993

Kestner, Joseph, Mythology and Misogyny: The Social Discourse of Nineteenth-Century British Classical-Subject Painting, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989

Lipking, Lawrence, Abandoned Women and Poetic Tradition, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988

McClure, Ruth K., Coram's Children: The London Foundling Hospital in the Eighteenth Century, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1981

Nicolson, Benedict, The Treasures of the Foundling Hospital, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1972

Webster, T. B. L., "The Myth of Ariadne from Homer to Catullus," Greece and Rome 13:1 (1996)

Wood, Christopher, Victorian Panorama: Paintings of Victorian Life, London: Faber, 1976

ABDUCTION/RAPE

Stephen Arbury

The following iconographic narratives and related subjects are included in the discussion of the theme Abduction/Rape:

GENERAL	EUROPA (ABDUCTED BY ZEUS [JUPITER])	PSYCHE (ABDUCTED BY ZEPHYR FOR CUPID [EROS])
AMYMONE (ABDUCTED BY NEPTUNE [POSEIDON])	GANYMEDE (ABDUCTED BY ZEUS [JUPITER])	REBECCA (ABDUCTED BY BOIS-GUILBERT)
ANTIOPE, THE AMAZON (ABDUCTED BY THESEUS)	HELEN, AS A 12-YEAR-OLD GIRL (ABDUCTED BY THESEUS AND PIRITHOUS)	RINALDO (ABDUCTED BY ARMIDA)
BRISEIS (ABDUCTED BY AGAMEMNON)	HELEN (ABDUCTED BY PARIS)	PINABELLO'S LADY
CEPHALUS	HIPPODAMIA (OR DEIDAMIA) (ABDUCTED BY THE CENTAUR EURYTION)	SABINE WOMEN (ABDUCTED BY ROMULUS'S SOLDIERS)
CERBERUS	HYLAS (ABDUCTED BY WATER NYMPHS)	SITA (ABDUCTED BY RAVANA)
CYBELE (ABDUCTED BY SATURN)	ORITHYIA (ABDUCTED BY BOREAS)	THEOPHANE (ABDUCTED BY NEPTUNE [POSEIDON])
DAUGHTERS OF LEUCIPPUS, PHOEBE AND HILAERA (ABDUCTED BY THE DIOSCURI, CASTOR AND POLLUX)	PROSERPINE (PERSEPHONE) (ABDUCTED BY PLUTO [HADES])	ILLUSTRATIONS OF ABDUCTIONS IN FOLK AND FAIRY TALES
DEIANEIRA (ABDUCTED BY THE CENTAUR NESSUS)		ABDUCTIONS IN THE BIBLE
DEIRDRE (ABDUCTED BY TRISTAN)		LITERATURE/OPERA/ THEATER/BALLET

Correggio, Abduction of Ganymede, circa 1530, painting, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum. (Courtesy of the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna, Austria)

Abduction has been a part of most human cultures throughout history, and the theme is prevalent in the visual arts from the mythic abductions illustrated on ancient Greek vases to the terrorist kidnappings and alleged UFO (unidentified flying object) abductions of the late twentieth century portrayed in motion pictures. Many abductions in art are called rapes because the original meaning of the word was “to be carried off by force.” Sexual rape without abduction occurred in such narratives as the rape of Lucretia or the rape of Tamar. Most abductions involve women, although men and objects are sometimes abducted as well.

Abductions occur for various reasons. One rationale for abduction was to ensure the survival of the abductors’ clan. Since prehistoric times, women have been abducted by men from other tribes or groups without enough women. The infusion of females as a result of the abduction provided for the clan’s future generations. The abductors’ group would also benefit genetically by the infusion of new genes from the abducted women. The most famous example of this kind is the abduction of the Sabine women by the Romans, a popular subject in Renaissance and Baroque painting. Abduction was practiced by ancient Teutons and Scandinavians, and among certain southern Slavic groups marriage by abduction occurred into the nineteenth century.

Abduction has not always been considered a crime. Not only has abduction been justified as necessary for the survival of the abductor’s people, but it has also been used to express manhood, to demonstrate that women were property, and to maintain social control of women. In modern Western society, remnants of abduction survive in the practices of carrying the bride across the threshold, picking a best man, and having the bride stand to the left of the groom. All three customs date back to the abduction practices of the Germanic tribes. The future bride would have to be carried away, and the abductor would enlist the help of another male, the best man. The groom would place his abducted bride on his left so that his sword hand would be free to protect her.

In ancient Roman times the virgin was the future of the family bloodline; therefore, acts such as rape or abduction made marriage impossible. Raped women were considered corrupted and were of no value to the family. Abducted women were often treated the same way. The early medieval Europeans sometimes abducted women in order to extort consent from unwilling parents. Abduction was often the only way for a man to “acquire” a woman and thereby power as well. If the girl was deflowered after her abduction, then a marriage had been effected. The only consolation the parents would get at that point was a payment from the abductor. Often the woman consented to the abduction, but this was usually not admitted, for then she might become a slave. The code of Emperor Justinian

I nullified all marriages by abduction, although the Christian Church did not conform to this until the ninth century. In the twelfth century, Pope Innocent III determined that mutual consent made a marriage by abduction valid. If the parents accepted such a marriage, then the family honor and bloodline could be preserved. In the sixteenth century the Council of Trent adopted a similar principle. If the abducted woman could not exercise her free will, then the abduction was an impedimentum. If she consented of her own free will, however, then the marriage was valid. The abductor, however, was excommunicated. Current Roman Catholic canon law considers abduction a diriment impediment (a circumstance that disallows a valid marriage). Such an impediment, however, is not divine law and may be dispensed by ecclesiastical authorities.

In medieval romances of courtly love, such as Tancred and Iseult and The Pursuit of Diarmuid and Gráinne, young men were urged to show their valor by seducing and abducting the lady of the house. In reality there were proscriptions to prevent a young man from such a deed, yet it did occur. The numerous incidents of rape in romance literature attest to its occurrence in real life. And in fact abduction remained common until the twelfth century. Medieval society was obsessed with adultery, and aristocratic women were closely chaperoned or even secluded for fear of dishonor. Sometimes these women rebelled against being cloistered and instigated their own abductions. In such cases, women saw their abductors as liberators. In Tours, Corba of Amboise let her cousin abduct her as she left Mass. Thus, rather than being oppressive and enslaving, for some women abduction could be a powerful weapon for gaining their freedom.

Abduction and enslavement have been a part of many conquering cultures since ancient times. In more recent times abduction has been primarily for monetary or political profit. One of the great immoral acts of modern times was the abduction of men and women from Africa for sale into slavery. The profitable slave trade flourished from the late fifteenth to the mid-nineteenth century. Kidnapping and holding a victim for ransom is an all too common phenomenon in the twentieth century. The ransom could be money or some political demand, such as the release of prisoners. In this kind of abduction the abductor usually has little regard for the abductee; if the ransom is not met, the abductee is often killed. In such cases, abduction becomes terrorism.

Although it is usually men who abduct women, this is not always the case. According to the fourth-century writer Ephoros, ritualized homosexual abduction occurred in ancient Crete. A man would notify the family of the boy he intended to take. If the man was considered honorable, the family would only pretend to resist, and the lover would carry off the boy and remain secluded with him for two months. After that they would return to the city, and the lover would shower the boy with expensive presents.

The Bible has strong strictures against abduction. The laws of the covenant state that anyone who abducts someone shall be put to death (Exodus 21:16 and Deuteronomy 24:7). Yet there are several cases of abduction in the Old Testament. Lot was kidnapped from Sodom by four kings from the north. This is a case of abduction due to war and is illustrated in the Morgan Picture Bible from the thirteenth century. Lot was later rescued by his uncle Abraham (Genesis 14:12–16). Joseph was abducted by his 10 older brothers in revenge for being favored by their father, Jacob, for tattling on them to Jacob, and for bragging about his prophetic dreams. When Joseph came out to the field where his brothers were working, they carried him away and first put him down a well and then later sold him into slavery. Since both kidnapping and selling someone into slavery were punishable offenses, the brothers made up a story that Joseph had been eaten by a wild beast (Genesis 37:23–28). A medieval illumination in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris shows Joseph going out to his brothers in the field, being cast into the well, and then being sold into slavery.

As in many ancient cultures, biblical abductions were necessary for the survival of the tribe or occurred as a result of war. The Benjaminites abducted the virgin dancers of Shiloh to be their wives so they could repopulate the tribe after it had been decimated by battles with Israel (Judges 21:20–23). After attacking and destroying Ziklag, the Amalekites abducted David's wives, Ahinoam and Abigail. David later rescued them (1 Samuel 30:5–20). Another abduction was carried out as part of the personal political agenda of the abductor. Joash, the son of King Ahaziah of Judah, was abducted by his aunt, Jehosheba, for safekeeping from his grandmother, Athaliah. Athaliah had ordered a massacre of the rest of the royal family in an attempt to eradicate the house of David so that she could rule over Judah (2 Kings 11:1–12). Joash was kept hidden for six years and then crowned king of Judah, thus reestablishing the dynasty. Such an abduction would have been sanctioned by the Lord because after the coronation a new covenant was made between God, the king, and the people. In another case, however, Baruch and the prophet Jeremiah were abducted by Johanan and all the commanders from Judah and were taken to Egypt against the will of the Lord (Jeremiah 43:1–8).

The abductions that are most familiar and most often portrayed in art are those of classical mythology. These abductions usually result from sexual attraction and can lead to dire consequences. Most involve the abduction of a beautiful mortal by one of the gods. It was a completely mortal abduction, however, that had the most profound consequences. After the Judgment of Paris, Paris accepted Aphrodite's bribe of the most beautiful woman in the world and carried Helen off to Troy, thus beginning the Trojan War. This was Helen's second abduction, for she had been abducted at the age of 12 by Theseus and Pirithous. She was later rescued by the Dioscuri, who were responsible for an abduction of their own, that of the daughters of Leucippus, Phoebe and Hilaera. In Peter Paul Rubens's famous portrayal of this scene, the Leucippidae do not seem to protest their abduction. Briseis was another abductee in the Trojan War. She was carried off by Achilles after he had killed her husband, Mynes, and she became his favorite slave.

Agamemnon, in turn, seized Briseis from Achilles when Apollo ordered Agamemnon to return Chryseis to her father.

One of the best known mythical abductions is that of Persephone (Proserpina), the daughter of Demeter, the Greek goddess of agriculture. Zeus, the king of the gods, assisted in this abduction, and the myth explained the seasons. Persephone was abducted by Hades, god of the underworld, as she picked flowers on the plain around Mount Etna. In her despair Demeter let the Earth become barren, but when Persephone returned to her mother (as she did for half of each year), Demeter was happy and caused the Earth to be abundant with vegetation again. This story of death and resurrection provided appropriate decoration for Roman sarcophagi, such as the Persephone Sarcophagus in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy. One of the more dramatic representations of Persephone's abduction is the Baroque sculpture by Gian Lorenzo Bernini in the Borghese Gallery in Rome. Even more popular in art is the rape of Europa, one of Zeus's many loves. After transforming himself into a beautiful bull and luring Europa onto his back, he immediately swam across the sea to Crete, carrying Europa with him. The scene is probably best known from Titian's Renaissance painting in the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston.

Lesser known abductions are those of Amymone, Antiope, Dionysus, Orithyia, Psyche, Theophane, and Cephalus. Amymone was abducted by the sea god Poseidon after he saved her from being raped by a satyr. The Amazon Antiope was abducted by Theseus, the king of Athens, after she brought gifts to him aboard his ship, thus causing the war with the Amazons. The infant Dionysus, disguised as a kid goat, was taken by the Titans at the behest of the jealous queen of the gods, Hera. They tore him apart and devoured him except for his heart, which the goddess Athena rescued. Zeus gave the heart to Semele to eat so that Dionysus could be conceived anew. Orithyia, a daughter of Erechtheus, the king of Athens, was abducted by the north wind, Boreas, while she played by the river Ilissus. Princess Psyche was also abducted by one of the winds. Zephyr, the west wind, carried Psyche to Cupid's palace after the latter had fallen in love with her. Theophane was taken by Poseidon to the island of Crumissa. Poseidon then transformed Theophane into a ewe and himself into a ram to prevent her other suitors from finding them. The product of their union was the ram with the Golden Fleece. In a rare case of a man being abducted by a woman, Aurora, goddess of the dawn, carried off Cephalus, a handsome youth.

Sometimes beasts are the abductors or abductees. Eurystheus ordered Hercules to bring him Cerberus, the three-headed hound of the underworld, as one of his 12 labors. Hades consented, but only if Hercules could master the dog without using his weapons. This Hercules did, but Eurystheus was so frightened of the creature that Hercules took it back to Hades. Deianeira, the wife of Hercules, was abducted by the centaur Nessus. Hercules killed Nessus, but before the centaur died he gave Deianeira a poison, telling her it was a love potion. This poison later caused Hercules' death. Hippodamia was another woman abducted by a centaur. This occurred at her wedding when the battle of the Lapiths and the centaurs ensued. The dreaded harpies (whose name means "snatchers") abducted children and souls. They seized the daughters of Pandareos and delivered them as slaves to the Erinyes (Furies) in the underworld. Their exploits were sometimes depicted on tombs.

Homosexual abductions also occur in mythology. One such abduction was that of Hylas, a beautiful young prince who was taken away by Hercules after he killed the boy's father, King Theiodamus. Hercules took Hylas with him on the Argonauts' expedition, but Hylas was abducted again, this time by the nymphs of the river Ascanius after they saw his great beauty. The most famous homosexual abduction is the rape of Ganymede by Zeus. Taken by the boy's beauty, Zeus took the form of an eagle and transported the boy to Mount Olympus to be cupbearer to the gods. The abduction was portrayed by Renaissance and Baroque artists such as Michelangelo, Correggio, Rubens, and Rembrandt van Rijn. Michelangelo's drawing of Ganymede embodied the elements of Neoplatonic humanism. Based on Xenophon's explanation of the Ganymede story as a moral allegory of intellectual love, Renaissance humanists equated it with divine or spiritual love (the Christian soul enraptured by God) as opposed to carnal love. This concept was propagated in emblem books of the time, beginning with Alciati's Emblemata, first published in 1531. Alciati makes the spiritual meaning clear by titling the illustration of the rape of Ganymede Deo laetandum, or "rejoicing in God."

Abductions abound in non-Greco-Roman cultures as well. In Sumerian mythology, Dumuzi is abducted by demons to take the place of his wife Inanna in the underworld. Later it was decided he would have to remain there only half the year. In Hinduism, the demon Ravana, king of Ceylon, abducted Sita, wife of Rama, in his flying chariot and brought her to his capital city of Lanka. Rama rescued her after destroying Lanka. Another Hindu god, Skanda, son of Shiva, was a child abductor. In Celtic mythology Oisín (Ossian) was abducted by the fairy Niav (Niamh). She carried him off on her horse to Tir nan Og (the Land of Youth), where he remained for three centuries. There are also abductions in the Arthurian legends. The infant Arthur was taken by Merlin to Hector to be raised, Lancelot was abducted by the Lady of the Lake, Guinevere was carried off by Meleagance, and King Arthur was taken to the isle of Avalon after being mortally wounded in battle. In Norse mythology Loki was abducted by the giant Thiazi disguised as an eagle. When the eagle took too much of the meat Loki was cooking, he hit the bird with a staff. The eagle took off with the staff stuck to him and with Loki stuck to the staff. The eagle agreed to free Loki if he would help him abduct Idunn and her apples of youth from Asgard, the home of the gods. Loki lured Idunn out of Asgard into a forest where Thiazi, still in the form of an eagle, carried her off to Thrymheim. The other gods, however, forced Loki to bring her back. Disguised as a falcon, Loki abducted Idunn while Thiazi was away fishing and returned her to Asgard.

The Middle Ages and Renaissance also abound with tales of abduction, both religious and secular. The story of a nobleman's son taken captive is an example of a postbiblical abduction. A noble youth was abducted by a cruel heathen king and made to serve as his cupbearer. The youth spoke of St. Nicholas, the fourth-century bishop of Myra, before the king, causing the king to take the saint's name in vain. St. Nicholas suddenly appeared in all his glory and spirited the boy back to his family. The popular Renaissance tale of Rinaldo and Armida (recounted in the epic poem Gerusalemme liberata [Jerusalem Delivered] by Torquato Tasso) includes Rinaldo's abduction by the clever sorceress Armida. She bound the hero using a magic chain and bore him away in her chariot to her magic kingdom. He eventually abandoned her. Another epic poem of the period, Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, tells of the abduction of Count Pinabel's lady by the sorcerer Atlante, who carries her off on a hippogriff. This scene, as portrayed by Nicolas Poussin, is now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

Not surprisingly, abductions are also common in folk and fairy tales. Fairy-tale abductions are based on traditional stories of mortals carried away into fairyland. An early example is Malekin, a story related by Ralph of Coggeshall, a thirteenth-century monastic chronicler. Malekin was a child who was stolen from her mother's side while she worked in the fields. Often these abducted babies would be used as the fairies' tribute to hell. Sometimes fairies were taken captive by mortals, but they usually escaped, as did the fairy bride of Wild Edric, or pined away and died, as did the little fairy in Brother Mike. There are many tales of giants, ogres, dwarfs, and other creatures abducting beautiful women and carrying them back to their supernatural abodes. Many of these are enchanted abductors who turn into handsome princes, as in the story of Beauty and the Beast, or that of the Apache water monster who turns out to be a handsome husband for the young woman he catches by the water. Other abductions are caused by simple mortal love, as when Virgilius carries off the princess of Babylon. His intentions are honorable, however, and he brings her back to Babylon. Other abductions deal with evil, as when the devil carries off wicked people to hell. Perhaps the most famous mass abduction was that performed by the Pied Piper of Hamelin, who lured all the children of the town into a mountain cave with his music.

Finally, inanimate things may be the objects of abductions, often for the purposes of satire. In Alessandro Tassoni's story The Rape of the Bucket (1622), a bucket belonging to the city well of Bologna is stolen by the people of Modena as a trophy. The Bolognese offer entire towns and groups of people in an attempt to get the bucket back. Every scene begins seriously, but ends in a comical absurdity. Alexander Pope's The Rape of the Lock (1712–1714) is a mock heroic poem that satirizes the superficial concerns of society. Based on a true incident, a lock of hair is stolen, leading to a feud between two aristocratic families. In art, bizarre dreamlike imagery is evoked in Max Klinger's A Glove: Abduction (1881), in which a mysterious glove is abducted by a pterodactyl-like creature as two arms crash through a window in a vain attempt to retrieve it. In this work an ordinary glove has become anthropomorphized and sexualized into a fetishistic love object.

A new kind of abduction surfaced in the twentieth century—the abduction of humans by entities from UFOs. Stories abound of people who claim, often under hypnosis, to have been abducted by aliens from outer space. The idea of alien entities is found in most folklore. In his 1987 book Communion, Whitley Streiber associated one of his alien abductors with the Babylonian goddess Ishtar and felt that the entities he encountered were both physically real and rooted in the human unconscious. If not real, perhaps such UFO abductions are a modern outlet for a society that no longer believes in the spirits and demons of past ages.

See also Adultery; Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale; Marriage/Betrothal

Selected Works of Art

General

Primaticcio, Francesco, Woman Being Carried to a Libidinous Satyr, etching by L. D., 1547, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

Primaticcio, Francesco, Satyr Being Carried to a Woman, etching by L. D., 1547, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

Maulbertsch, Franz Anton, The Abduction, eighteenth century, Brno, Moravian Gallery

Monticelli, Adophe Joseph, The Abduction, nineteenth century, San Diego, California, Fine Arts Gallery

Scheffer, Ary, The Abduction, nineteenth century, Guéret, France

Delacroix, Eugène, Abduction of an Arab Woman by African Pirates, 1852, Paris, Louvre

Klinger, Max, The Abduction (from A Glove), etching, 1881, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Toulouse-Lautrec, Henri de, An Abduction, sketch, circa 1884, Albi, France, Musée Toulouse-Lautrec

Beardsley, Aubrey, The Rape of the Lock, drawings, 1896, for Satire by Alexander Pope

Cézanne, Paul, Abduction, 1867, Cambridge, Fitzwilliam Museum

Kollwitz, Käthe, Raped, etching and soft ground, from Peasants' War Series, 1907

Stuck, Franz von, Abduction of the Nymph, circa 1920, private collection

Chagall, Marc, The Abduction, 1920, private collection

Smith, David, The Rape, bronze sculpture, 1945, Boston, Massachusetts, Collection of Stephen D. Paine

Amymone (Abducted by Neptune [Poseidon])

Rape of Amymone, red-figure krater, circa 420 B.C., Vienna, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Coytel, Noël Nicolas, Abduction of Amymone, 1720, Valenciennes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Antiope, the Amazon (Abducted by Theseus)

Oltos, Abduction of Antiope, red-figure cup, circa 510 B.C., Oxford, Oxford University, Ashmolean Museum

Briseis (Abducted by Agamemnon)

Ricci, Sebastiano, The Rape of Briseis, circa 1700, present location unknown

Tischbein, Johann Heinrich the Elder, Briseis Taken from the Tent of Achilles, 1773, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Cephalus

School of Francesco Albani, Aurora Raping Cephalus, Modena, Italy, Galleria Estense

Jean-Antoine-Julien de Parme, Aurora's Rape of Cephalus, 1779, Madrid, Prado

Cerberus

Hercules and Cerberus, hydria, sixth century B.C. Paris, Louvre

Sabatini, Lorenzo, Hercules Carries Cerberus from the Underworld, ceiling painting, sixteenth century, Rome, Vatican, Sala Ducale

Schiavone, Andrea, Hercules Carries Cerberus from the Underworld, sixteenth century, Venice, Italy, Brass Collection

Campan, Jacob van, Hercules Hauling Cerberus out of the Underworld, circa 1645, Amsterdam, Rijksmuseum

Puget, Pierre, Hercules Abducting Cerberus, bronze sculpture, circa 1660, Karlsruhe, Germany, Landesmuseum

Cybele (Abducted by Saturn)

Le Brun, Charles, Saturn Abducting Cybele, drawing, before 1674, Paris, Louvre

Regnaudin, Thomas, Abduction of Cybele by Saturn, sculpture, late seventeenth or early eighteenth century, present location unknown

Daughters of Leucippus, Phoebe and Hilaera

(Abducted by the Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux)

Meidias Painter, Rape of the Leukippidae, hydria, circa 410 B.C., London, British Museum

Porta, Giuseppe, Castor and Pollux Carrying Off the Daughters of Leucippus, sixteenth century, Barnard Castle, Durham County, United Kingdom, Bowes Museum

Rubens, Peter Paul, Rape of the Daughters of Leucippus, circa 1617, Munich, Alte Pinakothek

Boeckhorst, Jan, Rape of the Daughters of Leucippus, 1637–1639, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Roussel, Ker-xavier, Abduction of the Daughters of Leucippus, 1922, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Deianeira (Abducted by the Centaur Nessus)

Abduction of Deianeira, black-figure amphora, circa 530 B.C., formerly in Basle

Appollonio di Giovanni di Tommaso, The Rape of Deianeira, fifteenth century, Cincinnati, Ohio, Art Museum

Pollaiuolo, Antonio del, Abduction of Deianeira, before 1467, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery

Giambologna, Jean Boulogne, Nessus and Deianeira, 1575–1580, Paris, Louvre

Reni, Guido, Deianeira Abducted by the Centaur Nessus, 1620–1621, Paris, Louvre

Rubens, Peter Paul, and Jordaens, Jacob, Nessus Abducting Deianeira, circa 1635, Hannover, Germany, Niedersächsisches Landesmuseum

Giordano, Luca, Rape of Deianeira, circa 1682, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Vanloo, Carle, The Centaur Nessus Assaulting Deianeira, 1740, St. Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum
 Diziani, Gaspare, Rape of Deianeira, eighteenth century, Geneva, Switzerland, Musée d'Art et d'Histoire
 Lagrenée, Louis-Jean-François, The Rape of Deianeira by the Centaur Nessus, 1755, Paris, Louvre
 Masson, André, The Centaur Nessus Abducts Deianeira, drawing, before 1950

Deirdre (Abducted by Tristan)

Abducted, fifteenth century manuscript Roman de Tristan, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé

Europa (Abducted by Zeus [Jupiter])

Rape of Europa, hydria, sixth century B.C., Villa Giulia
 Paolo, Giovanni di, Rape of Europa, circa 1460, Paris, Musée Jacquemart-André Titian, Rape of Europa, circa 1559–1562, Boston, Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum
 Veronese, Paolo, Rape of Europa, circa 1578–1580, Venice, Italy, Palazzo Ducale
 Bercham, Nicolaes, Rape of Europa, seventeenth century, St. Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum
 Reni, Guido, Rape of Europa, 1636–1637, Switzerland, private collection
 Albani, Francesco, Rape of Europa, 1630–1640, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Vouet, Simon, Rape of Europa, circa 1640, Madrid, Museo Thyssen-Bornemisza
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Abduction of Europa, 1632, New York, private collection
 Ricci, Sebastiano, Rape of Europa, early 1720s, Rome, Palazzo Taverna
 Lemoyne, François, Rape of Europa, early 1725, Moscow, Russia, State Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts
 Boucher, François, Rape of Europa, 1734, London, Wallace Collection, Paris, Louvre
 Vallotton, Félix-Édouard, Rape of Europa, before 1925, Bern, Germany, Kunstmuseum
 Beckmann, Max, Rape of Europa, watercolor, 1933, Murnau, Germany, Von Schnitzler-Mallinckrodt Collection
 Lipchitz, Jacques, Rape of Europa, bronze sculpture, 1938–1941, Paris, Musée National d'Art Niderbe; New York, Museum of Modern Art; Washington, D.C., Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden
 Pollock, Jackson, Rape of Europa, circa 1949–1950, Ilena Sonnabend Collection
 Nakian, Reuben, Europa and the Bull, bronze sculpture, 1945–1965, Washington D.C., Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden

Ganymede (Abducted by Zeus [Jupiter])

Rape of Ganymede, terra-cotta acroterial group, circa 470 B.C., Olympia, Greece, Archaeological Museum
Ganymede, Hellenistic marble sculpture, Madrid, Prado
Ganymede and the Eagle, Roman marble sculpture, Florence, Museo Nazionale del Bargello

Rape of Ganymede, nave capital, twelfth century sculpture, Vézelay, Ste Madeleine Filarete, Antonio di Pietro Averlino, Rape of Ganymede, bronze relief on doors, circa 1433–1435, Rome, St. Peter's Basilica Correggio, Abduction of Ganymede, circa 1530, Vienna, Kunsthistorisches Museum
Rape of Ganymede, anonymous woodcut for emblem "in Deo laetandum," in various editions of Andrea Alciati's Emblemata
 Michelangelo, Rape of Ganymede, drawing, 1532, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum, copy in Windsor Royal Library
 Tribolo, Niccolò, Ganymede Riding the Eagle, bronze sculpture, before 1550, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale del Bargello
 Bonasone, Giulio, Rape of Ganymede, engravings for emblems LXXVIII and LXXIX of Achille Bocchi's Symbolicarum quaestionum de universo genere, 1551, Bologna, Italy
 Lorenzi, Battista, Ganymede Riding the Eagle, marble sculpture, before 1594, Florence, Palazzo Pitti
Rape of Ganymede, woodcut for title page of Andreas Libavius's Alchymia...recognita, emendata et aucta, 1606, Frankfurt
 Passe, Crispin van de, Ganymede, engraved illustration for A Collection of Emblemes by George Withers, 1635, London
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Rape of Ganymede, 1636–1638, Madrid, Prado
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Abduction of Ganymede, 1635, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Natoire, Charles-Joseph, Jupiter Abducting Ganymede, circa 1731, Troyes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Marées, Hans von, Abduction of Ganymede, 1887, Munich, Germany, Neue Pinakothek
 Mariani, Carlo Maria, Abduction of Ganymede, 1981, Rome, Galleria Monti

Helen, as a 12-year-old girl (Abducted by Theseus and Pirithous)

Euthymides, Abduction of Helen, red-figure amphora, circa 510 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek
 Romanelli, Giovanni Francesco, Helen Carried off by Theseus, seventeenth century, Plymouth, City Museum and Art Gallery

Helen (Abducted by Paris)

Abduction of Helen, red-figure skyphos, circa 480 B.C., Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
 Fra Angelico, follower of, formerly attributed to Benozzo Gozzoli, Rape of Helen by Paris, panel, presumably from decoration of a chest, circa 1450, London, National Gallery
 Heemskerck, Maarten van, Panoramic Landscape with the Abduction of Helen, 1535, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Tintoretto, Rape of Helen, 1580–1585, Madrid, Prado

Courteys, Pierrs, Abduction of Helen, enamel on copper, before 1581, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Collection of the Prince of Liechtenstein
 Reni, Guido, Abduction of Helen, 1630–1631, Paris, Louvre
 Puget, Pierre, and Veyrier, Christophe, Paris Abducting Helen, marble sculpture, 1684–1688, Genoa, Italy, Galleria de Palazzo Rosso
 Giordano, Luca, Rape of Helen, 1686, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
 Ricci, Sebastiano, Rape of Helen, early eighteenth century, Parma, Italy, Galleria Nazionale
 Platzer, Johann Georg, Abduction of Helen, eighteenth century, London, Wallace Collection
 Daumier, Honoré, Abduction of Helen, lithograph, 1842
 Moreau, Gustave, Rape of Helen, circa 1852, Angers, Bessonneau Collection

Hippodamia (or Deidamia) (Abducted by the Centaur Eurytion)

Hippodamia and the Centaur, from west pediment of Temple of Zeus at Olympia, circa 460 B.C., Olympia, Greece, Archaeological Museum
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Abduction of Hippodamia, 1636–1638, Madrid, Prado

Hylas (Abducted by Water Nymphs)

Hylas and the Nymphs, opus sectile panel, mid-fourth century, Rome, Basilica of Junius Bassus
 Primaticcio, Francesco, Hylas Held by the Nymphs, ceiling fresco, 1541–1547, Château de Fontainebleau, Galerie d'Ulysse
 Furini, Francesco, Hylas and the Nymphs, seventeenth century, Florence, Appartamenti Reali
 Thorwaldsen, Bertel, Hylas Stolen by the Walter Nymphs, marble relief, circa 1831, Copenhagen, Denmark, Thorvaldsens Museum
 Millet, Jean-François, Hylas and the Nymphs, nineteenth century, Otterlo, The Netherlands, Kröller-Müller Museum
 Davies, Arthur B., Hylas and the Water-Nymphs, 1910, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Milles, Carl, Hylas and the Nymphs, marble sculpture, before 1940, Västerås, Sweden

Orithyia (Abducted by Boreas)

Romanelli, Giovanni Francesco, Boreas Abducting Orithyia, seventeenth century, Rome, Galleria Spada
 Pellegrini, Giovanni Antonio, Boreas Abducting Orithyia, early eighteenth century, Paris, Louvre
 Solimena, Francesco, Rape of Orithyia, 1701, Rome, Galleria Spada
 Boucher, François, Boreas Abducts Orithyia in the Presence of Her Sisters, 1769, Fort Worth, Texas, Kimball Art Museum
 Regnault, Jean-Baptiste, Boreas Abducting Orithyia, late eighteenth century or early nineteenth century, Tours, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Girodet-Trioson, Rape of Orithyia, 1825–1826, lithograph

Proserpine (Persephone) (Abducted by Pluto [Hades])

Abduction of Persephone, scene on Persephone Sarcophagus, sculpture, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
Abduction of Persephone, scene on the Velletri Sarcophagus, sculpture, second century, Velletri, Italy, Museo Civico Filarete, Antonio Averlino, Rape of Proserpine, bronze reliefs on doors, 1433–1435, Rome, St. Peter's Basilica Dürer, Albrecht, Abduction of Proserpine on a Unicorn, etching, 1516
 Abbate, Niccolò dell', Rape of Proserpine, circa 1570, Paris, Louvre
 Heintz, Joseph the Elder, Rape of Proserpine, circa 1595–1600, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Master I. D. C., Rape of Proserpine, scene of enameled plaque or mirror back from Limoges, before 1600, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Rape of Proserpine, 1636–1638, Madrid, Prado
 Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Pluto and Proserpine, marble sculpture, 1621–1622, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Abduction of Proserpine, circa 1628–1639, Berlin-Dahlem, Gemäldegalerie
 Elhafen, Ignaz, Rape of Proserpie, carved ivory, circa 1690, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Collection of the Prince of Liechtenstein
 Ricci, Sebastiano, Rape of Proserpine, circa 1700–1701, Milan, Italy, Zecchini Collection
 Troy, Jean-François de, Abduction of Proserpine, 1735, St. Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum
 Turner, Joseph Mallord William, Rape of Proserpine, circa 1839, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Chapu, Henri, Rape of Proserpine, marble sculpture, before 1891, Chantilly, France
 Gottlieb, Adolph, The Rape of Persephone, oil on canvas, 1942, New York, Collection Annalee G. Newman

Psyche (Abducted by Zephyr for Cupid [Eros])

Prud'hon, Pierre-Paul, Abduction of Psyche, circa 1808, Paris, Louvre; Pasadena, California, Norton Simon Museum
 Gibson, John, Psyche Carried by Zephyrs, marble sculpture, 1821–1822, Rome, Palazzo Corsini
 Burne-Jones, Sir Edward, Zephyr and Psyche, 1865, Paris, Robert Walker Collection
 Bouguereau, Adolphe William, Abduction of Psyche, 1895, private collection
 Godet, Henri, Rape of Psyche, bronze sculpture, 1896, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Rebecca (Abducted by Bois-Guilbert)

Delacroix, Eugène, Abduction of Rebecca, 1846, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art; 1858, Paris, Louvre

Rinaldo (Abducted by Armida)

Vouet, Simon, Abduction of Rinaldo, circa 1630–1631, Paris, private collection
 Poussin, Nicolas, Armida Carrying Off Rinaldo, circa 1637, Berlin, Bode Museum

Teniers, David the Younger, Rinaldo Sleeping in Armida's Chariot, before 1690, Madrid, Prado

Pinabello's Lady

Poussin, Nicolas, The Sorcerer Atlante Abducting Pinabello's Lady, pen and brown ink drawing, mid-1630s, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Sabine Women (Abducted by Romulus's soldiers)

Rape of the Sabines, manuscript illumination from City of God by St. Augustine, fifteenth century, The Hague, The Netherlands, Koninklijke Bibliotheek

Bassano, Francesco, Rape of the Sabine Women, sixteenth century, Turin, Italy, Galleria Sabauda

Il Sodoma, The Rape of the Sabine Woman, early sixteenth century, Rome, Galleria Nazionale Palazzo Barberini

Cortona, Pietro da, Rape of the Sabine Women, circa 1629, Rome, Capitoline Museum

Rubens, Peter Paul, Rape of the Sabine Women, circa 1636, London, National Gallery

Poussin, Nicolas, Rape of the Sabine Women, 1636–1637, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Rauchmiller, Matthias, Rape of the Sabine Women, carved ivory tankard, 1676, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Collection of the Prince of Liechtenstein

Schönfeldt, Johann Heinrich, Rape of the Sabine Women, before 1682, St. Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum

Giordano, Luca, Rape of the Sabine Women, late seventeenth or early eighteenth century, Copenhagen, Denmark, Statens Museum for Kunst

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Rape of the Sabine Women, eighteenth century, St. Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum

David, Jacques-Louis, Rape of the Sabine Women, 1799, Paris, Louvre

Degas, Edgar, Rape of the Sabine Women, 1861–1863, Pasadena, California, Norton Simon Museum

Picasso, Pablo, Rape of the Sabine Women, 1963, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Sita (Abducted by Ravana)

The Abduction of Sita by Ravana, manuscript illumination, nineteenth century, London, Victoria and Albert Museum, The National Museum of Art and Design

Theophane (Abducted by Neptune [Poseidon])

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Neptune Abducting Theophane, eighteenth century, Stuttgart, Staatsgalerie

Illustrations of Abductions in Folk and Fairy Tales

Ford, H. J., Virgilius the Sorcerer Carries away the Princess of Babylon, illustration to Virgilius the Sorcerer, 1900

Ford, H. J., The Eagle Carries off Little Wildrose, illustration to Little Wildrose, circa 1902

Ford, H. J., Chilmaq Carries off Almas, illustration to What the Rose Did to the Cypress, circa 1903

Ford, H. J., The Hawk Flies away with the Lamp, illustration to The Prince and the Princess in the Forest, 1906

Ford, H. J., Maia Carried off by the Cockchafer, illustration to The Strange Adventures of Little Maia, 1906

Ford, H. J., Seveninches Carries away the Princesses, illustration to The Three Crows, 1909

Abductions in the Bible

Lot Abducted by Four Kings from the North (Genesis 14:12–16), illustration to Morgan Picture Bible, thirteenth century, New York, Morgan Library

Joseph Abducted by His Brothers (Genesis 37:23–28), medieval manuscript illustration, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Joash Abducted by Jehosheba (II Kings 11:1–12)

Benjaminites Abducted the Daughters of Shiloh (Judges 21:20–23)

Jeremiah and Baruch Abducted by Johann (Jeremiah 43:1–8)

Ahinoam and Abigail Abducted by the Amalekites (I Samuel 30:5–15)

Literature/Opera/Theater/Ballet

The Infant Arthur Taken by Merlin and Given to Hector [Ector] for Safekeeping (Arthurian legend)

King Arthur, Mortally Wounded, Carried Off in a Barge by Three Mysterious Queens to the Isle of Avalon (Arthurian legend)

Lancelot Kidnapped by the Lady of the Lake (Arthurian legend)

Guinevere Abducted by Meleagance, Son of King Badgemagus of Gore (Arthurian legend)

Tasso, Torquato, Gerusalemme Liberata (Rinaldo Abducted by Armida/Charlemagne Cycle of legends), epic poem, 1581

Deirdre Abducted by Naisi (medieval Gaelic tale)

Gráinne Abducted by Diarmuid (The Pursuit of Diarmuid and Gráinne), medieval Gaelic tale)

Iseult Abducted by Tristan (Tristan and Yseult), medieval tale, Celtic origin)

Ariosto, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso (Angelica Abducted by Travelers), 1516

Ariosto, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso (Pinabello's Lady Abducted by the Sorcerer Atlante), 1516

Shakespeare, William, Titus Andronicus (Lavinia Abducted by Bassianus and Marcus), 1594

Shakespeare, William, Titus Andronicus (Lavinia Abducted by Demetrius and Chiron), 1594; abduction scene engraved by A. Smith after S. Woodforde, nineteenth century

Tassoni, Alessandro, The Rape of the Bucket, 1622

Pope, Alexander, The Rape of the Lock, 1712–1714

Richardson, Samuel, Clarissa (Clarissa Abducted by Lovelace), 1747–1748

Verdi, Rigoletto (Gilda Abducted by the Duke), 1851

Stevenson, Robert Louis, Kidnapped (David Kidnapped by his Uncle Ebenezer), 1886

Plomer, William, The Three Abductions, from The Family Tree, London, 1929

Persephone, ballet, 1956; choreography by Margarethe Wallman, music by Igor Stravinsky

Jones, Tom, and Schmidt, Harvey, The Fantasticks (The Mock Abduction of Louise by Gallo), 1960

Further Reading

Bryan, Courtland Dixon Barnes, Close Encounters of the Fourth Kind: Alien Abduction, UFO's, and the Conference at M.I.T., New York: Knopf, 1995; London: Weidenfield and Nicholson, 1995

Bryson, Norman, "Two Narratives of Rape in the Visual Arts: Lucretia and the Sabine Women," in Rape: An Historical and Social Enquiry, edited by Sylvana Tomaselli and Roy Porter, Oxford: Blackwell, 1989

Carroll, M. D., "The Erotics of Absolutism: Rubens and the Mystification of Sexual Violence," Representations (Winter, 1989)

Carter, John Marshall, Rape in Medieval England: An Historical and Sociological Study, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1985

Gravdal, Kathryn, Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991

Higgins, Lynn and Brenda R. Silver, ed., Rape and Representation, New York: Columbia University Press, 1991

Saslow, James M., Ganymede in the Renaissance, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1986; London: Yale University Press, 1989

Wolfthal, Diana, "'A Hue and a Cry': Medieval Rape Imagery and Its Transformation," Art Bulletin 75:1 (March 1993)

———, Images of Rape: The "Heroic" Tradition and Its Alternatives, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, forthcoming

Zeitlin, Froma I., "Configurations of Rape in Greek Myth," in Rape: An Historical and Social Enquiry, edited by Sylvana Tomaselli and Roy Porter, Oxford: Blackwell, 1989

ABUNDANCE

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Abundance:

ANCIENT WORLD

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

ABBONDANZA.

Cesare Ripa, Abundance, 1603, woodcut emblem from Iconologia. (Courtesy of the Houghton Library, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts)

Abundance, a common figure in allegory, is often depicted as a divine personification of a beautiful young woman crowned with flowers, fruits, and grains. In one hand she usually holds a cornucopia filled with flowers, fruits, and grains, and in the other hand a basket of the same. Next to her stands a barrel or urn containing the water that assists in cultivation, fertilization, and growth.

According to Greek mythology, the concept of abundance was associated with the god of time, Cronus, who devoured his children for fear of being overruled by one of them. His wife-sister Rhea, or Earth, pregnant with another infant, fled to Crete to save this child. At this island she gave birth to Zeus. Because of this noble act, Zeus showed gratitude toward his mother by admitting her to the firmament as a constellation and turning one of her horns into a wonderful cornucopia, or horn of plenty.

The cornucopia, according to J. E. Cirlot's A Dictionary of Symbols, in Greek and Roman mythology refers to the goat Amalthea who fed the infant Zeus (Jupiter) in a cave on Crete. One of the goat's horns was called cornucopia, the horn of plenty, because having been broken off, it was filled with a continuous supply of milk to feed the young god. Legend also relates that the daughter of King Melisseus of Crete fed the infant Zeus with goat's milk from this magical horn. Given this general symbolism, the horn becomes a sign of strength, the goat of nurturing motherhood, and the horn of plenty of abundance, endless bounty, fertility, fruitfulness, the gathered fruits of the Earth, the horn of Amalthea, "giver of wealth." Furthermore, the horn, phallus-shaped and hollow, combines masculine and feminine attributes, endowing the symbol with complex meanings (including that of the lingam, or symbol of generation, fertility, and fecundity). The cornucopia thus becomes an attribute of the deities of vegetation, vintage, and fate and of the mother goddess in representations of Demeter/Ceres and Tyche/Fortune as Fate, Fortuna, and Althea; it is also carried by Priapus as an attribute of fecundity in his capacity of god of gardens. The 1620 sculpture by Gian Lorenzo Bernini, Almathea Feeding Jupiter, in the Borghese Gallery in Rome, and the 1640 paintings of the same subject by Jacob Jordaens and Nicolas Poussin in the Dulwich College and Berlin galleries, respectively, are examples of the appropriation of these ancient myths and styles in seventeenth-century art.

The flow of richness in the cornucopia was compared to the continuous flow of the river that brings fertility, prosperity, and commerce. In particular the association involved the river Achelous, or Akeloos, in southwestern Greece, and its god of the same name. Hercules fought with the river god, who took the form of a bull, and broke off one of Achelous's horns. Upon his victory Hercules returned the broken horn to the river god, who, moved by Hercules' generous gift, awarded him a horn of plenty.

In art, horns as vessels, such as that held by the Venus of Laussel of 15,000 B.C., were associated with libations or liquid offerings (Biedermann, p. 77). The cornucopia also became an attribute of other rivers, such as the Nile, the Tiber, and the Arno. In ancient art representations of these great rivers appear in the Hellenistic sculpture of the Nile discovered in 1512 in Rome and presently housed in the Chiaramonti Museum of the Vatican. The Tigris and Tiber rivers were also personified in Hellenistic sculptures, some of which were discovered during the Renaissance and installed as fountains in the courtyard of the Belvedere Palace, a summer papal residence (Haskell and Penny, pp. 272–273, 310–311). During the Renaissance these two marble statues personified the richness of cities through commerce, industry, and agriculture. Now these marble works are in the Museum of Pio Clemente in the Vatican.

The blessing of goodness and plenty, such as Rome enjoyed with the Tiber, was painted by Giorgio Vasari in the fresco decoration of the Sala dei Cento Giorni in 1548, in the Palazzo della Cancelleria of Rome. The same theme was also depicted in Vincenzo Cartari's 1647 woodcut showing the Tiber River and in Giorgio Vasari's 1550 frontispiece for Leon Battista Alberti's book On Architecture.

In Clef universelle des sciences secrètes, P. V. Piobb points out that the cornucopia also represents prosperity, hence its association with the zodiacal sign of Capricorn. An ample supply of food, the basis of a nation's or an individual's well-being, flows from peace, justice, and good government. Therefore, abundance is often associated with these virtues, as in the celebration of the end of a war. Abundance is sometimes depicted on public buildings or on a tomb in allusion to the benefits enjoyed during the deceased's lifetime. Abundance may, like charity, be accompanied by several children. She may hold a sheaf of corn in her hand like her classical prototype Ceres, the goddess of agriculture. A ship's rudder, a symbol of guidance, control, and safety, which came to be associated with the idea of government, is another attribute of abundance dating from ancient Rome. It derives from the annual celebration of the grain harvest that was transported to the city primarily by boat. The rudder with terrestrial globe and cornucopia suggest that the worldwide rule of Rome brought about plenty.

In Greco-Roman tradition Tyche/Fortune/Fate stands on a globe, as in Andrea Mantegna's Triumphs of Caesar at Hampton Court in England. Like the globe upon which she stands, Fortune may be unstable and Abundance only temporary. Herodotus and Plutarch relate the story of King Croesus of Lydia in Asia Minor who has just shown the wise Athenian Solon his great treasure. Solon, unimpressed, warns the king that no worldly treasure can save him from an ignominious end and—should it come to that—“count no man happy until he dies.” He points to a funeral pyre in the background, where, indeed, condemned by the Persian conqueror Cyrus, Croesus does meet his end. The patrimony of great Croesus cannot save him, and what Solon forewarns becomes true. This parable also alludes to the Christian iconography of the land of milk and honey (Exodus 3:8, 33:3).

The concept of abundance as personification of richness can also be applied to political success, as illustrated in the frieze of the Ara Pacis Augustate (Altar of Peace, 9–10 B.C.). The imperial procession shows Augustus as a high priest preceded by lictors and flamines and followed by members of the imperial family. The procession is an apotheosis to honor Jupiter, the chief god, and to thank him for the economic and political wealth granted to the Romans. On one of the reliefs on the Ara Pacis a female figure of matronly aspect is seated in the center with two infants on her lap—probably Rhea Silvia with Romulus and Remus—as well as a Mother Earth (Tellus Mater), the personification of Rome itself. She is surrounded by various emblems of prosperity and abundance that flow from peace. The group became a well-established motif much later in Western art as a personification of charity.

The symbolism of grains (wheat, maize, ear of corn) derives from the Latin word frumentum, from the word fruire or fructus, meaning created or produced by the Earth. It alludes to cultivation or agriculture, fertilization, growth, and the regeneration of the Earth. According to Egyptian mythology, from where it transmigrated to Greek and Roman mythologies, the representation of the goddess in the zodiacal constellation Virgo holds a branch of wheat alluding to richness and abundance because wheat plants originated in the Jordan River valley. In Christian iconography, grains symbolize potentiality or the seed of life; the malamute in parvo allude to Earth and the human nature of Christ as well as to the Resurrection.

The symbolism of the word fruit derives from the Latin word fructus, meaning created or produced by the Earth. Representations of fruits, similarly to grains, allude to immortality, the essence and the seed representing the origin, culmination, and result of one state and the seat of the next. First fruits represent the best of that which is sacrificed; for example, in Christian symbolism, Christ is the First Fruit of the Virgin. Contrary examples can be found in the fruit of the Tree of Passion representing worldly attachment, the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge representing the fall or self-consciousness as separate from God, and the fruit of the Tree of Life representing immortality. In pagan ritual, similarly, fruits and flowers are often used as offerings in cults of the dead as well as in celebrations in the cult of Priapus.

The image of Abundance is very common in Italian art. Her principal attribute is a cornucopia full of grains and fruits. In the sixteenth century, Giorgio Vasari, one of the greatest masters of personification, used this image several times as a symbol of spiritual and earthly riches in his decorative cycles, such as in the Refectory of Monteoliveto in S. Anna dei Lombardi in Naples, the Sala dei Cento Giorni in Rome, and the Chamber of Fortune in his house in Arezzo. In the latter cycle, the Vasarian personification of abundance standing in front of a niche symbolizes the goodness of Earth, with her respective attributes of a cornucopia, fruits, flowers, and a barrel. The cornucopia she holds and the wooden barrel next to her are filled with fruits and flowers. Abundance carries on her head a basket filled with various grains. Vasari described this figure as Copia: “A cornucopia filled with fruits.” According to Vincenzo Cartari’s Imagini delli dei degli’ Antichi and Cesare Ripa’s Iconologia, Abundance personifies the copiousness and richness of Earth, and her attributes—cornucopia, fruits, and grains—allude to agricultural pastures and the cultivation of the Earth. In his depiction of abundance, Vasari appears to have combined two of his earlier images, Opulentia (Opulence or Plenty) from the Sala dei Cento Giorni and Abondanza (Abundance) from the Refectory of Monteoliveto. Vasari’s Abondanza anticipates Cesare Ripa’s description of this image in Iconologia as a fair young woman dressed in a green gown embroidered with gold, the color of the fields and of ripening grain, and with a wreath of flowers, the harbingers of abundance and delight, in her hair. She holds a horn of plenty—the cornucopia filled with fruit—at her right side, and in her left arm she bears a sheaf of various grains. Many fallen ears of grain lie at her feet, and in the foreground are bags of money and containers of gold and jewels.

The Neapolitan version differs dramatically in style from the one in Vasari’s Chamber of Fortune because it represents one of the 12 fruits of the Holy Spirit in conformance with the overall iconography of the refectory’s ceiling. Abundance delicately stands in a figura serpentinata posture with a large basket of grains and fruits in her arm and a cornucopia of the same at her feet. The British Museum owns a splendid drawing on this subject, with abundance depicted as a voluptuous female body barely covered by a veil. This design duplicates the personification of abundance in the Refectory of Monteoliveto (S. Anna dei Lombardi in Naples), where Vasari portrayed a sensual image of female beauty crowned with wheat and fruits and holding the same in baskets and cornucopia. These attributes allude to two types of richness and fecundity: one of the spirit, infused by the grace of God as represented in the beauty of the human body, and the other of the Earth, as seen in the overflowing contents of the basket and cornucopia. This Vasarian representation of abundance precedes Ripa’s emblem and sets the stage for the evolution of abundance’s iconography.

The horn of plenty alluding to abundance became a universal symbol of the wealth of nations and glorification of governmental achievements. Settlers in the New World used it to symbolize the land of richness on the state seals of Idaho and Wisconsin and on the national arms of Honduras, Panama, Columbia, Venezuela, and Peru (Aachen, p. 190).

Abundance is also associated with material happiness, as is felicity. This personification alludes to the Greek term eudaimonia, meaning “good luck” or “to be prosperous, well off, or happy.” Aristotle’s view of happiness is associated with his evaluation of individual fulfillment and the sum of pleasures needed. Thomas Aquinas elaborates on this theory by defining happiness in terms of pleasure with prudence, thus adding a theological dimension. In the Renaissance the personification of felicity fuses the ancient and medieval views of happiness and joy and is seen as part of the Holy Spirit’s gift of virtues.

Although the personification of abundance is a popular theme in Italian art, depictions of abundance are found in many cultures. The seventeenth century was the golden age of Dutch art as well as of civic prosperity in Holland. The abundance of this life was illustrated, not in personifications, but in still life paintings, in particular breakfast pieces such as Pieter Claesz Van Haarlem's Still Life with Lemon (1640), in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, The Netherlands, and Clara Peeters's Still Life with a Candle (1650), in a private collection. These paintings, however, represent another level of meaning, one not only associated with temporal well-being and a rich life but also with the moral implication of the brevity of life and warnings about riotous living. For example, the poet and writer Jacob Cats, in his emblem book Zinne-en Minne-beelden, uses fruit, such as the pomegranate, to symbolize fertility; however, the red seeds of this fruit also allude to the blood of martyrs (Segal, p. 33). Cats's moralizing poems and emblems encourage a life of sobriety and virtue. Artists such as Peeters and Claesz van Haarlem, following Cats's moral allusions, illustrate how illusory is the perception of the abundance of richness depicted in their still lifes, thus stressing a moral implication and a human limitation.

Abundance has submitted to many interpretations over time. In antiquity it referred mostly to economical and political wealth. In the Renaissance it focused on the personification and the individual moral and intellectual quality of richness. In the Baroque period it focused on the middle-class material richness and wealth accumulated through exploration and conquest.

See also Harvesting; Virtue/Virtues

Selected Works of Art

Ancient World

Venus of Laussel, prehistoric relief, 15,000 B.C., Laussel, France

Goddess of Plenty, Roman sculpture, late third century, Vienne, France

River Tigris, Hellenistic sculpture, third century B.C., Rome, Vatican, Pio Clemente Museum

River Nile, Hellenistic sculpture, third century B.C., Rome, Vatican, Chiaramonti Museum

River Tiber, Hellenistic sculpture, third century B.C., Rome, Vatican, Pio Clemente Museum

Renaissance

Vasari, Giorgio, Abundance, fresco, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari

Vasari, Giorgio, Abundance (Joy), fresco, 1545, Naples, Italy, Refectory of Sant' Anna dei Lombardi

Vasari, Giorgio, Abundance, drawing, 1545, London, British Museum

Janssens, Abraham, The Origin of the Cornucopis, oil on canvas, circa 1615–1620, Seattle, Washington, Seattle Art Museum

Seventeenth Century

Ripa, Cesare, Abundance, woodcut emblem, from Iconologia, 1603, Rome

Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Almathea Feeding Jupiter, 1620, Rome, Borghese Gallery

Jordaens, Jacob, Almathea Feeding Jupiter, painting, 1645, private collection

Poussin, Nicolas, The Nurture of Jupiter, oil on canvas, 1639, Dulwich Picture Gallery

Poussin, Nicolas, The Nurture of Bacchus, oil on canvas, circa 1630, London, National Gallery

Poussin, Nicolas, The Nurture of Bacchus, oil on canvas, 1639, Paris, Louvre

Claesz, Pieter, Still Life With Lemon, 1640, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Peeters, Clara, Still Life with a Candle, oil on canvas, 1650, private collection

Heem, Jan Davidsz De, Still Life with Lobster, oil on canvas, before 1684, Toledo, Ohio, Museum of Art

Kalf, Willem, Still Life with Nautilus Cup, oil on canvas, before 1693, Madrid, Museo Thyssen-Bornemisza

Kalf, Willem, Still Life with Metalware, oil on canvas, before 1693, Le Mans, France, Musée de Tessé

Further Reading

Achen, Sven Tito, Symbols Around Us, New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold, 1981

Alciato, Andrea, Emblematum libellus cum commentariis, Paris, 1531

Bryson, Norman, Looking at the Overlooked: Four Essays on Still Life Painting, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1990; London: Reaktion, 1990

Cartari, Vincenzo, Imagini delli dei degli' Antichi, Venice, Italy: 1557

Castriota, David, The Ara Pacis Augustae and the Imagery of Abundance in Later Greek and Early Roman Imperial Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995

Cheney, Liana, The Paintings of the Casa Vasari, New York: Garland, 1985

Cirlot, Juan Eduardo, A Dictionary of Symbols, New York: Philosophical Library, 1962; London: Routledge and Paul, 1962

del Vita, Alessandro, Lo Zibaldone di Giorgio Vasari, Rome: Istituto d'Archeologia e Storia dell'arte, 1938

Haskell, Francis, and Nicholas Penny, Taste and the Antique: the Lure of Classical Sculpture, 1500-1900, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1981

Katzenellenbogen, Adolph Edmund Max, Allegories of the Virtues and Vices in Medieval Art from Early Christian Times to the Thirteenth-Century, London: Warburg Institute, 1939; New York: Norton, 1964

Mâle, Émile, L'art religieux de la fin du Moyen Age en France, Paris: A. Colin, 1949

O'Reilly, Jennifer, Studies in the Iconography of the Virtues and Vices in the Middle Ages, New York: Garland, 1988

Piobb, P. V., Clef universelle des sciences secrètes, Paris, 1950

Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, Rome: Appresso Lepido Facij., 1603 Sebastian, Santiago, Alciato Emblemas, Madrid: Akal/Arte
y Estetica, 1993
Schama, Simon, The Embarrassment of Riches: An Interpretation of Dutch Culture in the Golden Age, New York: Knopf, 1987; London: Collins, 1987

Segal, Sam, A Prosperous Past: The Sumptuous Still Life in the Netherlands, 1600-1700, The Hague, The Netherlands:
SDU, 1988.
Valeriano, Piero, Hieroglyphica sive De sacris Aegyptorum, Basileae, Italy: Palma Ising, 1956

ADULTERY

Sarah S. Gibson

The following iconographic narratives are included in the discussion of the theme Adultery:

THE LOVES OF THE OLYMPIAN DEITIES

DANAË

LEDA

RAPE OF EUROPA

VENUS AND MARS

VENUS AND ADONIS

PARIS AND HELEN

AGAMEMNON AND CLYTEMNESTRA

LUCRETIA

THE ARTHURIAN LEGENDS

DAVID AND BATHSHEBA

SUSANNA AND THE ELDERS

JOSEPH AND POTIPHAR'S
WIFE

CHRIST AND THE WOMAN
TAKEN IN ADULTERY

SECULAR THEMES

Pieter Bruegel the Elder, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, 1565, oil on panel, London, Courtauld Institute of Art, Princes Gate Collection. (Courtesy of the Courtauld Institute of Art)

Adultery is defined as voluntary sexual intercourse between a married person and a partner other than the lawful husband or wife. Attitudes toward adultery and visual representations of it have fluctuated radically over time.

In the Bible, the seventh commandment (Exodus 20:14; Deuteronomy 5:18) forbids adultery, but some Israelites ignored the law, albeit not always with impunity. Mosaic law condemned to death by stoning anyone found guilty of committing adultery (Leviticus 20:10; Deuteronomy 22:22).

In ancient Greece and Rome there was no adultery unless a married woman was involved. If a man caught another in the act of illicit intercourse with his wife, he could kill the offender with impunity. Furthermore, the husband of a proven adulteress lost his citizenship if he continued to cohabit with her, and the adulteress herself was barred from all temples and religious rites. This harsh attitude was somewhat at variance with the indulgence allowed the gods in their adulterous affairs, but the deities, of course, possessed a different ethos. Furthermore, the frequently depicted amorous exploits of Zeus with unmarried maidens—adulterous to later centuries because of his marriage to Hera—would not have been so regarded by the Greeks themselves. It often seemed that the fruits of Zeus's infidelities populated half the Earth and the sky.

In ancient Rome the offended husband was allowed to kill the adulterer only under certain circumstances. A special court tried cases of adultery, and the usual punishment was banishment of the wife and her paramour to separate islands. The first Christian emperor, Constantine, however, introduced more severe penalties, making the adulterer's offense a capital crime. The Christian Church, along with secular authorities, continued to punish adulterous relationships rigorously.

Fidelity in marriage was always more binding for the woman, and even in the late twentieth century, with much wider tolerance of sexual freedom, a lingering social stigma, if not a legal punishment, was applied far more frequently to women than to men. Clearly, in societies where legitimacy of offspring is of paramount importance, adultery threatens to disrupt the orderly transmission of name and property.

Representations of adulterers in the visual arts of the Western world may be usefully divided into five major categories: those scenes relating to the classical Greek and Roman deities, those of legendary Greek and Roman mortals, those made famous in the Arthurian legends, those based on Christian religious themes, and those that are primarily secular. It should be noted that these categories are not always mutually exclusive; for instance, mythological themes sometimes take on Christian meaning.

The Loves of the Olympian Deities

The amorous exploits of Zeus (Jupiter), the king of the gods, who was married to his sister Hera (Juno), afforded a seemingly inexhaustible source of motifs for the visual arts. Many of the legends surrounding Zeus have subplots revolving around his jealous wife's revenge for his infidelities. In order to outwit her and also to conceal his lechery from his intended prey, Zeus often disguised himself. Thus, for example, he seduced Europa in the guise of a white bull, Leda as a swan, Danaë as a shower of gold, and Callisto in the form of the goddess Artemis (Diana). The sensual and erotic possibilities of these tales were fully exploited by artists and seemed to have had a special appeal for royal patrons.

Many of the representations of Zeus's philandering are based on stories told in Ovid's Metamorphoses and remain more or less faithful to the original sources, although the ancients themselves tended to allegorize the old fables in order to seek deeper meanings in what might otherwise be considered fairy tales. The moralizing habits of the Middle Ages led to a search for Christian meanings in the literature of fable, as when Danaë came to be seen as a symbol of the Immaculate Conception (Heckscher, p. 218) or as an allegorical figure of modesty (Seznec, p. 94). Christian doctrine is discerned in what would appear to be the least promising material. Thus, in a tour de force of allegorization, the Latin grammarian and writer on mythology Fulgentius could equate Leda with injustice and the swan with power. Their mating gave birth to scandal and dishonor in the person of Helen. A certain secular emphasis, however, dominated actual visual representations of the pagan gods and heroes in the Middle Ages. The deities conform to the medieval social canons of courtly life and manners and are dressed as fashionable knights and ladies.

With the advent of the Renaissance most artists seemed to distance themselves from such convoluted reasoning, in which Zeus disguised as the bull is equated to Jesus Christ and Europa to the human soul. Titian's paintings for Philip II, based on subjects taken from classical mythology, were not necessarily meant to be understood as elaborate allegories, masking philosophical or religious truths, although some art historians have argued otherwise. As a respectable genre, mythology often gave artists an opportunity to display their skills and patrons the chance to indulge in sensual delight, bordering occasionally on lasciviousness.

At the same time, the moralizing vogue died hard, particularly in the Netherlands. In 1604 Carel van Mander stated in Het Schilderboek:

Nothing on earth can protect an evil, godless man from the vengeful hand of God, so that in the end, no matter how long it takes, he will be paid for his misdeeds. . . . So this story of Mars who left Jupiter's service and the company of all the gods to be with Venus, illustrates to us how those who abandon God to follow lustful ways come to shame. (Lowenthal, p. 98)

By the eighteenth century, moralizing and allegorical messages were totally put aside. François Boucher's hedonistic paintings of the loves of the gods dealt with themes that had not been as popular since the early Renaissance. Mythology was once again a pretext for the creation of scenes of erotic liaisons.

One of the most popular stories from the Middle Ages to the French Revolution was that of Danaë, the beautiful daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos. Acrisius imprisoned his daughter in a tower of bronze to protect her from intercourse with men. Zeus (Jupiter), undaunted, visited her in the guise of a shower of gold, and she thus conceived Perseus. In the later Middle Ages she was represented most often as a contemporary princess surrounded by her ladies-in-waiting, while Zeus comes to her bearing golden jewelry. Jan Gossaert, called Mabuse, departed radically from this tradition in 1527 in presenting a childlike Danaë, gazing trustfully upward. In Rembrandt van Rijn's painting of 1636 in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia, Danaë resembles a reclining Venus, in whom the primary emotion is expectation, while the entire picture is suffused with a magical, golden light. Titian's Danaë in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, painted for Philip II in 1553–1554, is unabashedly erotic. Correggio's Danaë is one of four scenes depicting the loves of Zeus; the others are Leda, Io, and Ganymede. These paintings, too, are unequivocally erotic. In the Leda and Io paintings the actual act of coition is represented; the other two show moments just before and just after. That they do not descend into pornography is partly due to the fact that none includes the form of a man, only Zeus's various disguises. They are beautifully evocative rather than titillating, although much modern opinion will see in them only the exploitation of women by the act of rape, albeit consensual.

Visual renditions of the story of Leda were widespread in the decorative arts of the ancient world. Her story also offered ample opportunities for Renaissance and Baroque artists. The wife of Tyndareus, king of Sparta, Leda was the mother of Zeus's children Castor, Polydeuces, Clytemnestra, and Helen of Troy. Highly erotic versions of Zeus's approach to her in the guise of a swan were painted by Michelangelo (known only in a sixteenth-century copy) and Correggio. In the eighteenth century François Boucher and Charles-Joseph Natoire, among others, returned to the theme.

Europa was the daughter of King Agenor of Tyre. Zeus seduced her in the guise of a handsome white bull who by his gentleness enticed the girl to climb on his back. He then swam away with her to Crete, where she bore him Minos and possibly several other children. This tale also found many interpreters. Titian's painting of 1559–1562, in the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston, exhibits a certain ambiguity, in that the position of Europa's body suggests surrender as well as fear, and the arms suggest an embrace as well as a desire for self-preservation. There is also a certain humorous aspect to the picture afforded by the putto riding a dolphin and trailing behind; we are perhaps not meant to take this too seriously as a rape scene.

Zeus, of course, was not the only god given to extramarital affairs. The Odyssey and Metamorphoses both relate the tale of Aphrodite (Venus) caught in bed with her lover Ares (Mars) by her husband Hephaestus (Vulcan), the divine artificer. Hephaestus entangled them in a golden net so that all the gods might see and laugh. Among the many versions of this incident is Maerten van Heemskerck's painting of circa 1536 in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria. The art historian Ilja Veldman points out that although at first sight Heemskerck appears to have portrayed a purely pagan theme, he is, in fact, reconciling pagan mythology with Christian moral philosophy, a practice that began in late antiquity. By this means the old gods were given new interpretations and significance. Veldman believes that Heemskerck, in portraying the union of Mars and Venus, is using this subject as a symbol for physical love, or luxuria. He is exhorting men to honor justice, rectitude, and integrity, because the gods easily find a way of punishing wrongdoers, no matter how mighty. This interpretation is reinforced by the allegorical figures of Prudence and Justice on the verso of the panel.

In 1585 Hendrick Goltzius took up the same tale in an engraving that bears the following inscription:

Just as the sun god, with his dazzling light, reveals dissolute Mars and the shameful secret deeds of Venus, so God sees the misdeeds of an evildoer's life and does not permit things to take place in secret that are sinful. (Veldman, p. 40)

Both artists, therefore, used a tale from classical antiquity to mask a highly moral content that evidently struck a responsive chord in the sixteenth-century Netherlands (Veldman, pp. 39–43).

In later years renditions of this scene lose their moralizing tone, although its popularity continued. Typical examples are the versions by Joachim Wtewael painted in 1610, now in the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles, California; by Louis Chéron, painted in 1695, in the Tate Gallery in London; and by François Boucher, painted in 1754, in the Wallace Collection in London.

Both Botticelli and Piero di Cosimo used the love of Mars and Venus as allegories of the triumph of love over war. Possibly commissioned in connection with marriages, each of these panels suggests the theme of mutual love and both show Mars succumbing to the power of Venus. Both also convey a rich sensuality and contain overt sexual references—the rabbit and turtle doves in the Piero di Cosimo, the lance and conch-shell lance in the Botticelli.

Venus's love for Adonis also found many interpreters, again notably Titian. There are more than 30 painted or engraved copies of his painting of 1554, now in the Prado in Madrid. Unable to prevent her lover Adonis from going on the hunt in which he would be killed, Venus made him immortal by changing him into an anemone, a scene painted by Nicolas-Bernard Lépicié in 1769, now in the Châteaux de Versailles in France.

Adulteries in Greek and Roman Legend

The most famous of Greek adulterous relations was surely that of Paris and Helen, a liaison that precipitated the Trojan War. Almost as familiar was the adultery of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus, the resolution of which came at the end of the war.

Paris, who had married the nymph Oenone, was the youngest son of the Trojan king Priam and his queen, Hecuba. Selected to judge the dispute between Aphrodite, Athena, and Hera over the golden apple of Eris (Discord), Paris chose Aphrodite, who had promised him the most beautiful woman in the world. All were in agreement that this was Helen, daughter of Zeus and Leda, who unfortunately was already married to Menelaus, King of Sparta. When Paris either kidnapped or persuaded her to elope with him, Menelaus rallied the nobles of Greece for an armed expedition to Troy, which they besieged for 10 years. In Homer's Iliad Helen is portrayed as an unfortunate creature either pitied or hated by Trojans and Greeks alike. But in the Iliad her father-in-law Priam says to her, "I hold thee not to blame; nay I hold the gods to blame." This may have been what Menelaus thought too, because, although the classical sources are mixed about her ultimate fate, she appears to have returned to Sparta and reunited with Menelaus. Paris was wounded by a poisoned arrow and died when seeking a cure from Oenone, the wife he had abandoned, who refused to help him. Few representations remain to show the Greek artists' conception of Helen, but Paris was widely depicted judging the goddesses. There are also some paintings illustrating the abduction of Helen, such as a scene on an Attic red-figure skyphos of circa 480 B.C., in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. A related scene is Aphrodite Persuading Helen (to follow Paris), a relief sculpture of the first century B.C. or first century A.D., now in the National Museum in Naples, Italy.

By the Middle Ages the Trojans had become the heroes of romance, and it was unthinkable for a Trojan prince to so flout the chivalric laws of hospitality as to steal his host's wife. Paris was therefore often shown abducting Helen from Venus's island of Cythera, as in two fifteenth-century cassone panels in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. In manuscript illuminations, such as those in Le Livre des Estoires dou Commencement dou Monde (1350–1360), in the British Museum in London, Helen wears the fashions of the French and Flemish courts and Troy is shown as a late Gothic European city with turreted buildings and crocketed arches. Succeeding generations of artists reinterpreted the story in many ways. In the sixteenth century, Heemskerck, in Panoramic Landscape with the Abduction of Helen (1535–1536), in the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore, Maryland, chose to show the abduction of Helen in a wide panoramic landscape punctuated by temples and monuments of antiquity. In 1788 Jacques-Louis David painted a Paris and Helen, now in the Louvre in Paris, while he was clearly under the influence of the classical revival and stimulated by the excavations in Italy at Herculaneum and Pompeii.

Clytemnestra was the wife of Agamemnon, who was king of Mycenae, brother of Menelaus, and commander of the Greek forces at Troy. He returned from the Trojan War with a captive concubine, Cassandra, daughter of King Priam, to find that his wife had taken his cousin Aegisthus as a lover. Clytemnestra planned her husband's murder, details of which vary, as do her motives. Aeschylus indicates it was because of Agamemnon's sacrifice of their daughter Iphigenia at the outset of the war as well as his infidelities. Clytemnestra and Aegisthus also murdered Cassandra. The murders were later avenged by Agamemnon's son Orestes. Images of these murders appear in classical art, including a Greek bronze shield band showing the murder of Agamemnon (sixth century B.C.), in the Olympia Museum in Greece, and a bronze relief showing Clytemnestra killing Cassandra (seventh century B.C.), in the National Museum in Athens, Greece. Illustrations are also found in medieval narratives of the Trojan sagas, as in a fifteenth-century German manuscript from Guido delle Colonnés's Historia Destructionis Troiae, in the Bavarian State Library in Munich, Germany, that shows Clytemnestra and Aegisthus killing Agamemnon.

A frequently represented episode from Roman history recounted by Livy is more truly a rape, as it certainly did not involve consent. Lucretia, wife of Tarquinius Collatinus, was seduced by Sextus, son of Tarquinius Superbus. After confessing her dishonor to her father and her husband and begging them to avenge her, she stabbed herself. The suicide of Lucretia was a common theme; seventeenth-century artists positively reveled in this tale. Rembrandt, for example, in a 1664 painting in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., shows her quiet, desperate grief. Artemesia Gentileschi exploits the drama and anguish leading to Lucretia's suicide in a painting from about 1621, in the Palazzo Cattaneo-Adorno in Genoa, Italy.

The Arthurian Legends

The Arthurian prose and verse romances provided two outstanding tales of adultery for the delectation of the Middle Ages. Later falling into obscurity, the Arthurian saga was resurrected in the nineteenth century. Lancelot's affair with King Arthur's wife, Guinevere, was a focal point of the Arthurian saga, and the love of Tristan and Yseult was one of the most popular stories recounted in the tales.

In chivalric terms Lancelot was a knight without peer, but his adulterous relationship led not only to his own downfall but also to the ultimate destruction of Arthur's kingdom. Chrétien de Troyes's romance Chevalier de la Charette (circa 1170) seems to be the first to feature the romance of Lancelot and Guinevere, but there are many other versions of their affair.

Tristan and Yseult are often presented as tragic figures trapped by an inexorable fate through no fault of their own. Their deception of Yseult's husband, Mark of Cornwall, resulted not from willfulness, but because they accidentally drank a magic love potion. Scenes from their love story were endlessly depicted in medieval decorative arts—on enamels, embroideries, wall-paintings, manuscript illuminations, mirror backs, and jewel coffers. A particularly delightful conceit is a little ship built around a nautilus shell, with tiny figures of Tristan and Yseult playing chess on their voyage from Ireland to Cornwall, the trip on which they imbibed the magic potion. With mountings in silver parcel-gilt, the object was used as a saltcellar marking the place of the host at the dinner table. The piece, called the Burley House Nef, bears the mark of Pierre Le Flamand, Paris. Made in 1482–1483, it is now in the Victoria and Albert Museum in London.

The story of Tristan and Yseult's tryst beneath the tree with King Mark spying on the lovers seems to have been particularly popular. Depictions range from a misericord in Lincoln Cathedral (circa 1280), to a northern French ivory casket (1325–1340), in the British Museum in London. In 1443–1450 the motif appears again on a corbel from the house of Jacques Coeur in Bourges, France. The enormous popularity of these particular Arthurian tales is no doubt due to the appeal of the romances of love and chivalry and to the incorporation of the notion of Christian retribution and redemption reflected in the ultimate fate of the star-crossed lovers.

In the nineteenth century the romantic, sentimental, and narrative aspects of the tragedies were emphasized. Visual artists could refer to the text of Sir Thomas Malory's fifteenth-century romance, Le Morte D'Arthur, and Alfred Lord Tennyson, sometimes regarded as the fountainhead of the Arthurian renaissance in England, recreated many of the legends in his Idylls of the King and other poems. In 1874–1875 Julia Margaret Cameron prepared a series of photographic tableaux vivants to illustrate the Idylls, a few sets of which are still extant. Other illustrators of Tennyson include many of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood and Aubrey Beardsley.

Pre-Raphaelite artists, particularly William Morris, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, and Edward Burne-Jones, all painted characters and tales from the Arthurian sagas, including Morris's La Belle Iseult (also called Queen Guinevere) of 1858, now in the Tate Gallery in London. Morris's company executed a series of stained glass panels for Harden Grange, near Bingley in Yorkshire. Cartoons for the panels were designed by Morris, Rossetti, Burne-Jones, and several other artists. These works, in which the narrative element predominates, illustrate the craze for Camelot that swept Victorian England. If the adulteries seem to be somewhat glossed over and the protagonists viewed rather sympathetically, there is occasionally a suggestion that Camelot decays and disappears partly because of sensuality and spiritual blindness.

Christian Themes

Three major Old Testament narratives concern adultery, although in two of them the adultery is avoided. These are the stories of David and Bathsheba, Susanna and the elders, and Joseph and Potiphar's wife. All were depicted by numerous artists and retained their popularity over time.

The story of David and Bathsheba is related in II Samuel, chapter II. Bathsheba was the wife of Uriah, one of David's soldiers. David, who already had several wives, saw her from his palace and had her brought to him for the purpose of sexual intercourse. Ultimately David arranged for Uriah's death by sending him into battle. David then married Bathsheba, but their first-born son, conceived in the adulterous liaison, died. Although the prophet Nathan assured David that God would forgive him, the dire events of his later life apparently stemmed from his adultery. Depictions of the story usually center on David's first view of Bathsheba from his palace terrace or window, as in Jan Swart van Groningen's Bathsheba (1530–1540), in the Wallraf-Richartz-Museum in Cologne, Germany. She is shown innocently combing her hair in her garden, unaware of the king's lust. Artemesia Gentileschi painted her at least four times, as a graceful, seminude figure attended by her servants, including an early 1640s version in the Gallery of Fine Arts in Columbus, Ohio. Rembrandt was also fascinated with Bathsheba, culminating in a great work painted in 1654, in the Louvre, in which her pose and face reveal powerful conflicting emotions, caught between her duty to, and perhaps desire for, the king and fidelity to her husband. A certain sadness pervades the scene as she contemplates an ultimately unhappy fate.

The story of Susanna is recounted in an apocryphal addition to the book of Daniel. Susanna was the beautiful and faithful wife of Joachim, a Jewish exile in Babylon. Two lustful elders thrust themselves upon her as she bathes in her garden, threatening her with false accusations if she refuses their desires. Resisting their advances, she is indeed falsely accused of adultery with a young man, judged, and condemned to death. Daniel, inspired by God to cross-examine the elders, leads them to contradict one another, thereby demonstrating their false witness. Susanna is subsequently acquitted, a potent manifestation of the triumph of good over evil.

Pictorial renditions of this story stress the popular motif of the plight of an innocent person wrongfully accused. Susanna is the archetypal figure of innocence, first threatened and then miraculously saved. From early Christian times, the Susanna story was a popular theme. In a Roman catacomb painting of circa 350, she is shown as a lamb between two wolves. Her name is derived from the Hebrew word for lily, a flower associated with purity, and her story was easily assimilated with the themes of salvation and deliverance (Garrard, p. 185). Scattered representations appear in the fifteenth century, and by the sixteenth two traditional views, corresponding to different moments in the narrative, were firmly established. One shows Susanna unaware of the elders' lasciviousness, as in Tintoretto's painting of 1555–1556, in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria, where she regards herself idly in a mirror while the men regarding her lurk behind a wall. The more common tradition shows the dramatic moment of confrontation between Susanna and her tormentors, focusing the viewer's attention on the complex problem of virtue maintained in the face of evil and falsehood. Rembrandt painted such a scene in 1647, now in the Staatliche Museen Kulturbesitz, Gemäldegalerie in Berlin-Dahlem, Germany. Also typical of this inherently more dramatic scene are the paintings by Anthony Van Dyck of 1620–1621 and Peter Paul Rubens of 1610–1614, both in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany. In these and other portrayals the moralizing aspects of the tale are perhaps somewhat subordinated to the celebration of the nude figure. Both Gerrit van Honthorst, in his 1655 painting of the scene in the Borghese Gallery in Rome, and Artemesia Gentileschi, in her painting of 1610 in the Schloss Weissenstein in Pommersfelden, Germany, stress Susanna's horror and anguish.

Another example of adultery thwarted, but without immediately happy consequences, was related in the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife (Genesis 39:7–20). Joseph, son of Jacob and Rachel, was sold into slavery in Egypt by his brothers, where he entered the household of Potiphar, a captain of the pharaoh's guard. Unfortunately Potiphar's wife attempted to seduce him; as he fled from her embraces, she retained a piece of his garment that she then used as proof that he had molested her. Sent to prison as a result of this false accusation, Joseph nevertheless overcame his tribulations and eventually achieved royal favor and power. The episode with Potiphar's wife was cited as an example of the patriarch's chastity and as a prefiguration of Jesus Christ. Saint Ambrose interpreted the tale as an allegory of the death of Christ. The woman could steal Joseph's coat (or a piece of it) but could not steal his virtue; the state could deprive Christ of his mortal body but could not tempt his soul. Not as frequently portrayed in the visual arts as the stories of Susanna or Bathsheba, the tale of Joseph and Potiphar's wife nonetheless had a number of manifestations. Among these is a sixteenth-century tapestry designed mainly by Agnolo Bronzino, with contributions from Cecchino Salviati and Jacopo da Pontormo, now in the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence, Italy. The dramatic and erotic possibilities of the scene were realized in the second quarter of the sixteenth century in a painting by Pieter Coecke van Aelst in which the woman's nudity is covered only by a veil. With a singularly determined expression on her face, she clutches Joseph's cloak with both hands as she falls from the bed. An example from the seventeenth century is Antonio del Castillo y Saavedra's Life of Joseph (circa 1655), where a view of his precipitous flight from his tormentor is combined with the next episode of his life when he is delivered from prison. Artemesia Gentileschi created a more appealing image in about 1622–1633 of the wife and a Joseph who seems rather reluctant to leave, now in Harvard University's Fogg Art Museum in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

In the New Testament, the episode of Jesus Christ and the woman taken in adultery (John 8:3–11) concerns an adulteress brought before Christ by the Pharisees, who then asked for his judgment. Christ did not immediately reply but stooped to write something on the ground. When the Pharisees insisted, he responded, "He who is without sin, let him cast the first stone." At that the Pharisees began to turn away until finally only the woman was left. Jesus forgave her, telling her to go and sin no more.

Representations of this scene enjoyed widespread popularity, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. One of the most moving examples is Pieter Bruegel's small grisaille oil panel of 1565, now in the Courtauld Institute Galleries in London. In it the woman stands alone between the Pharisees and Christ and the apostles, her isolation reinforced by the void of the pavement in front of her upon which Christ writes. It is an image of austere monumentality and classic gravity.

Guercino took up the story in the early seventeenth century, giving it a similar calm, friezelike treatment. The narrative is summarized by the exchange of glances between the participants. The painting, from about 1621, is now in the Dulwich Picture Gallery in London. In 1917 Max Beckmann returned to the theme in a grotesque, almost caricatural image now in the Los Angeles County Museum. Discordant in color, with elongated figures and more than a hint of violence, his expressionistic treatment makes a strong impact upon the viewer, reinforcing the timelessness of the moral and the Christian notion of forgiveness of sin.

Secular Scenes

Images of secular adulteries have perhaps been less prevalent than those that are disguised as myth, legend, or allegory. They do, however, tend to reflect moralizing attitudes or emphasize certain comical aspects of a situation.

Dirk Bouts's two panels, The Justice of the Emperor Otto (1470–1482)—only one of which was completed by him, the other probably followed his design—in the Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts in Brussels, Belgium, tell a tale of justice and retribution, reminiscent of the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife. Derived from a tale found in the Pantheon of the twelfth-century historian Godfrey of Viterbo, the panels were designed for the town hall of Louvain, Belgium. The first panel shows the empress's false accusation of an honorable count. The second shows the attempt by his widowed countess to clear his name, whereby she endures the ordeal by fire unscathed. The guilty empress is therefore condemned to death by burning at the stake. Such moralizing histories were considered appropriate exempla for judges in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Bouts's treatment is undramatic, almost frozen, as if to underline the need for judicious consideration of crimes.

Augustus Egg's trilogy Past and Present (1858), in the Tate Gallery in London, was a contemporary depiction of adultery. The central panel shows the husband's discovery of his wife's infidelity while their children build a (collapsing) house of cards, at the base of which is a Balzac novel (French society was regarded by the English middle classes as unstable and dangerously immoral). The two children are seen again in the left of the side panel mourning the death of their father, with the suggestion that they are stigmatized by their mother's act. The right panel shows the ultimate fate of the woman, apparently abandoned by her lover, clutching her illegitimate child, and contemplating suicide in the river. The condemnatory attitude underlying this series is at variance with the Christian lesson of mercy toward the guilty and compassion for the fallen woman (unless we assume that it is subtly ironic, for which there is no evidence). It does, however, reveal a strong undercurrent of anxiety about the moral and social order running through Victorian England. Art historian Lynda Nead points out that there are few painted representations of the adulteress in mid-nineteenth-century England, although there are many of the ideal wife and even the prostitute and there were prints and illustrations of adulterous relations in the popular press. The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 allowed a man to divorce his wife for adultery, but a woman had to prove additional aggravating circumstances, such as bigamy or incest. It was essential that the family be protected from the taint of illegitimacy (Nead, pp. 50–51).

Men whose wives became involved in adulterous affairs that became public knowledge were often ridiculed. The ridicule could take various forms. In the Netherlands it was said that a cuckold's wife placed a blue cloak over his shoulders, as is shown in Pieter Bruegel the Elder's painting Netherlandish Proverbs or The Blue Cloak (1559), in the Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz in Berlin-Dahlem, Germany.

In England and elsewhere the expression "to put on horns" is most often used to refer to a cuckold. An amusing reference to this process appears on William Hogarth's painted (and engraved) tale of adultery in Marriage à la Mode, narrated in six paintings between 1743 and 1745, and now in the National Gallery in London. In this series Hogarth chronicles the disasters of an arranged marriage gone wrong. In the fifth picture of the six, in a scene in the countess's boudoir, we see a little child playing with a statue of Actaeon sprouting a very fine set of horns, in a clear reference to the earl.

The history of adultery is the history of a double standard whereby the extramarital affairs of men were tolerated but those of women were not. This is not always so evident in the visual arts. According to Georges Duby, the men of the Middle Ages were "obsessed" with a fear that their wives might commit adultery (Ariès and Duby, vol. 2, p. 82). Yet the romantic stories from the Arthurian legends were often concerned with adulterous affairs and were ubiquitous in the visual arts. The often depicted amorous exploits of the Olympian gods were unquestionably used as an excuse to create erotic images designed primarily for a male audience. And images based on biblical stories certainly carried moralizing messages to both sexes for a very long period of time.

See also Abduction/Rape; Marriage/Betrothal; Sin/Sinning; Temptation; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

The Loves of the Olympian Deities

Coxie, Michiel the Elder, The Loves of Jupiter, cycle of ten drawings, circa 1530–1540, London, British Museum
 Corinth, Lovis, The Loves of Zeus, lithographs, 1920

Danaë

Gossaert, Jan, Danaë, painting, 1527, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen
 Correggio, Danaë, painting, circa 1530–1534, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Primaticcio, Francesco, Danaë, tapestry, after 1540, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Titian, Danaë with Nursemaid, painting, 1553–1554, Madrid, Prado
 Titian, Danaë with Cupid, painting, 1545–1546, Naples, Italy, Galleria Nazionale di Capodimonte Rembrandt van Rijn, Danaë, painting, 1636, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Leda

After Michelangelo, Leda and the Swan, painting, sixteenth century, London, National Gallery
 Correggio, Leda and the Swan, painting, circa 1531–1532, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz
 Natoire, Charles-Joseph, Leda and the Swan, painting, 1731–1734, Troyes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Boucher, François, Leda and the Swan, painting, 1742, Stockholm, Sweden, Nationalmuseum
 Moreau, Gustave, Leda and the Swan, painting, 1846, Paris, Musée Gustave Moreau Cézanne, Paul, Leda, painting, 1886–1890, Merion Station, Pennsylvania, Barnes Foundation Collection

Rape of Europa

Rape of Europa, manuscript illumination, fourteenth century, Lyons, France, Bibliothèque de la Ville (Ms 742, fol.40)
 Dürer, Albrecht, Abduction of Europa, drawing, 1495, Vienna, Austria, Graphische Sammlung Albertina
 Salomon, Bernard, Abduction of Europa, woodcut from La Métamorphose d'Ovide Figurée, 1557, Lyons, France, Jean de Tournes
 Titian, Rape of Europa, painting, 1559–1562, Boston, Massachusetts, Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Rape of Europa, painting, 1628, Madrid, Prado
 Vallotton, Félix, The Rape of Europa, painting, 1908, Bern, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum

Venus and Mars

Botticelli, Mars and Venus, painting, circa 1438, London, National Gallery

Piero di Cosimo, Mars and Venus, painting, circa 1500–1505, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Gemäldegalerie
 Giordano, Luca, Mars and Venus Trapped by Vulcan, painting, Vienna, Austria, Gemäldegalerie der Akademie der Bildenden Künste in Wien
 Wtewael, Joachim, Mars and Venus Surprised by Vulcan, painting, circa 1606–1610, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
 Chéron, Louis, Vulcan Catching Mars and Venus in His Net, painting, 1695, London, Tate Gallery
 Boucher, François, Venus and Mars Surprised by Vulcan, painting, 1754, London, Wallace Collection

Venus and Adonis

Titian, Venus and Adonis, painting, 1554, Madrid, Prado
 Poussin, Nicolas, Venus and Adonis, painting, late 1620s, Fort Worth, Texas, Kimball Art Museum
 Poussin, Nicolas, Venus and Adonis, painting, circa 1625–1626, Providence, Rhode Island School of Design, Museum of Art
 Poussin, Nicolas, Venus and Adonis, painting, 1627, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
 Lépicié, Nicolas-Bernard, Adonis Transformed by Venus Into an Anemone, painting, 1769, Versailles, France, Musée National du Château de Versailles et de Trianon

Paris and Helen

The Meeting of Menelaus and Helen, Attic black-figured amphora, circa 550 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Hieron, The Meeting of Menelaus and Helen at the Fall of Troy, Attic red-figured skyphos, circa 480 B.C., Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
The Abduction of Helen, Attic red-figured skyphos, circa 480 B.C., Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
Aphrodite Persuading Helen, relief sculpture, first century B.C. or first century A.D., Naples, Italy, National Museum
The Return and Reconciliation of Menelaus and Helen, manuscript illustration from Le Livre des Estoires dou Commencement dou Monde, 1350–1360, London, British Museum (MS 20, D.I., fol. 181r)
The Arrival of Paris and Helen at Troy, Flemish manuscript illumination, Chronique Universelle dite de la Bouquechardière, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (M214, fol.84)
The Judgment of Paris and the Abduction of Helen, Cassone Panel, third quarter of fifteenth century, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
Paris and Helen with Their Retinue in the Temple of Venus, Cassone Panel, third quarter of fifteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Vivarini, Antonio, School of, The Abduction of Helen and Her Companions, painting, late fifteenth century, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
The Rape of Helen, Italian Majolica dish, 1540–1550, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Heemskerck, Maerten van, Panoramic Landscape with the Abduction of Helen, painting, 1535–1536, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 David, Jacques-Louis, Paris and Helen, painting, 1788, Paris, Louvre

Agamemnon and Clytemnestra

Clytemnestra Kills Cassandra, bronze relief from the Argive Heraeum near Mycenae, seventh century B.C., Athens, Greece, National Archaeological Museum
The Murder of Agamemnon, Greek bronze shield band, second half of sixth century B.C., Olympia, Greece, Archaeological Museum
Orestes Kills Aegisthus, Attic red-figured stamnos, early fifth century B.C., Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz
Clytemnestra and Aegisthus Kill Agamemnon, manuscript illumination, fifteenth century, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek

Lucretia

Tintoretto, Tarquin and Lucretia, painting, circa 1560, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
 Titian, Tarquin and Lucretia, painting, 1568–1571, Cambridge, Fitzwilliam Museum
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Lucretia, painting, circa 1621, Genoa, Italy, Palazzo Cattaneo-Adorno
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Lucretia, painting, 1664, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

The Arthurian Legends

The Tryst Beneath the Tree, ivory casket, 1325–1340, London, British Museum
The Tryst Beneath the Tree, stone corbel, 1376–1387, Bruges, Belgium, Gruuthusemuseum
The Tryst Beneath the Tree, wooden misericord, circa 1380, Lincoln, England, Cathedral
Roman de Tristan, French manuscript, early fifteenth century, Vienna, Austria, National Library of Austria (MS 2537)
Tryst Beneath the Tree, stone corbel, 1443–1450, Bourges, France, House of Jacques Coeur
The Burghley House of Nef, nautilus shell mounted in silver parcelgilt with mark of Pierre Le Flamand, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
 Morris, William, La Belle Iseult (Queen Guinevere), painting, 1858, London, Tate Gallery
Tristan, stained glass executed by Morris and Co., 1862, London, Victoria and Albert Museum, National Museum of Art and Design
 Doré, Gustave, The King's Farewell, from Guinevere, by Alfred Lord Tennyson
 Cameron, Julia Margaret, Illustrations to Tennyson's Idylls of the King and Other Poems, photographs
 Beardsley, Aubrey, Tristan and La Belle Iseult, illustration in Morte D'Arthur, by Sir Thomas Malory

David and Bathsheba

Franciabigio, The Story of Bathsheba, painting, 1523, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, David and Bathsheba, painting, 1526, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz
 Groningen, Jan Swart van, Bathsheba, painting, 1530–1540, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf-Richartz-Museum
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Bathsheba at the Fountain, painting, circa 1635, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, David and Bathsheba, painting, early 1640s, Columbus, Ohio, Museum of Art
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Bathsheba with King David's Letter, painting, 1654, Paris, Louvre

Susanna and the Elders

Susanna, catacomb painting, circa 350, Rome, Cemetery of Pretestato
Susanna, Crystal of Lothair II, engraved rock crystal, ninth century, London, British Museum
 Lotto, Lorenzo, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1517, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Tintoretto, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1555–1556, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Massys, Jan, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1567, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts
 Veronese, Paolo, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1580, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Bassano, Jacopo, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1585, Nîmes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1610, Pommersfelden, Schloss Weissenstein, Schonborn Collection
 Wtewael, Joachim, Susanna and the Elders, painting, circa 1611–1614, Gouda, The Netherlands, Het Catherin Stedelijk Museum Gasthuis
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1614, Stockholm, Sweden, Nationalmuseum
 Carracci, Lodovico, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1616, London, National Gallery
 Dyck, Anthony Van, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1620–1621, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1647, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz
 Honthorst, Gerrit van, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1655, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Ricci, Sebastiano, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1725–1726, Chatsworth, California, Trustees of the Chatsworth Settlement
 Loo, Carle van, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1765, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Chassériau, Théodore, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1907, Cardiff, National Museum of Wales
 Vallotton, Félix, Chaste Suzanne, painting, 1922, private collection
 Corinth, Lovis, Susanna and the Elders, painting, 1923, Hanover, Germany, Niedersächsisches Landmuseum

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife

Aelst, Pieter Coecke van, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, painting, second quarter of sixteenth century, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum 'Het Catharijneconvent'

Joseph Fleeing Potiphar's Wife, tapestry, mid-sixteenth century, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio, Sala de' dugento
 Rossi, Properzia de', Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, marble relief, circa 1570, Bologna, Italy, San Petronio
 Cigoli, Lodovico, Chastity of Joseph, painting, 1610, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, painting, circa 1622–1623, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
 Gentileschi, Orazio, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, painting, circa 1632, London, Hampton Court Palace
 Castillo y Saavedra, Antonio del, Joseph Tempted by Potiphar's Wife, painting, circa 1655, Madrid, Prado
 Cignani, Carlo, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, painting, 1671, Copenhagen, Denmark, Statens Museum for Kunst

Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1532, Budapest, Hungary, Szépművészeti Múzeum
 Aelst, Pieter Coecke van, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1540, Ghent, Belgium, Museum voor Schone Kunsten
 Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1565, London, Courtauld Institute of Art
 Allori, Alessandro, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1577, Florence, Italy, Santo Spirito
 Guercino, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, circa 1621, London, Dulwich Picture Gallery
 Metsu, Gabriel, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1653, Paris, Louvre
 Poussin, Nicolas, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1653, Paris, Louvre
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1644, London, National Gallery
 Tiepolo, Giovanni, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1751, Paris, Louvre
 Trumbull, John, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1811, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery
 Hayez, Francesco, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1841, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Beckman, Max, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, painting, 1917, Los Angeles, California, Los Angeles County Museum of Art

Secular Themes

Bouts, Dierick, and assistants, The Justice of the Emperor Otto, paintings, 1470–1473, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts
 Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Netherlandish Proverbs (The Blue Cloak), painting, 1559, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz
 Hogarth, William, Marriage à la Mode, painting, 1743–1745, London, National Gallery

Egg, Augustus, Past and Present, paintings, 1858, London, Tate Gallery

Further Reading

Ashe, Geoffrey, and Norris J. Lacy, eds., The Arthurian Encyclopedia, New York: Garland, 1986
 Corbett, P., “Brilliant Bumpkin: Guercino at Home,” Apollo 134 (November 1991)
 Eisenman, S. F., “Max Beckmann: An Early Expressionism,” Artweek 16 (January 12, 1985)
 Falkenburg, R. L., “Iconographical Connections Between Antwerp Landscapes, Market Scenes and Kitchen Pieces, 1500–1580,” Oud Holland 102 (1988)
 Garrard, Mary, Artemisia Gentileschi: The Image of the Female in Italian Baroque Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989
 Gould, Cecil Hilton Monk, The Paintings of Correggio, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1976; London: Faber, 1976
 Heckscher, W. S., “Relics of Pagan Antiquity in Medieval Settings,” Journal of the Warburg Institute 1 (1937)
A History of Women in the West, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1992
 Loomis, Roger Sherman, Arthurian Legends in Medieval Art, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1938; London: Oxford University Press, 1938
 Lowenthal, Anne W., Joachim Wtewael and Dutch Mannerism, Doornspijk, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1986
 Lyczko, J. E., “Dante Gabriel Rossetti: Studies in the Dantesque and Arthurian Imagery of the Paintings and Drawings” (Ph.D. diss., Bryn Mawr College, 1976)
 Navailles, J. P., “Physiologie du Couple et de la Vie Conjugale dans l'Angleterre Victorienne,” Gazette des Beaux-Arts 106 (December 1985)
 Nead, Lynda, Myths of Sexuality: Representations of Women in Victorian England, Oxford: Blackwell, 1988
 Panofsky, Erwin, and Fritz Saxl, “Classical Mythology in Medieval Art,” Studies of the Metropolitan Museum 5:2 (1933)
 Scherer, Margaret Roseman, The Legends of Troy in Art and Literature, New York: Phaidon Press for the Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1963; second edition 1964
 Seznec, Jean, The Survival of the Pagan Gods: The Mythological Tradition and Its Place in Renaissance Humanism and Art, New York: Pantheon, 1953
 Taggard, M. N., “Narrative Meaning in Antonio del Castillo's The Life of Joseph,” Gazette des Beaux-Arts ser. 6, 116 (October 1990)
 Tornabuoni, Lucrezia, La Istoria della Casta Susanna, Bergamo, Italy: Moretti and Vitali, 1992
 Veldman, Ilja M., Maarten van Heemskerck and Dutch Humanism in the Sixteenth Century, Maarssen, The Netherlands: Gary Schwartz, 1977
 Whitaker, Muriel A., The Legends of King Arthur in Art, Rochester, New York and Woodbridge, Suffolk, England: Brewer, 1990

ANNUNCIATION

Don Denny

The following iconographic narratives are included in the discussion of the theme Annunciation:

ANNUNCIATION TO THE VIRGIN MARY

ANNUNCIATION OF THE DEATH OF THE VIRGIN

THE ANNUNCIATION TO THE SHEPHERDS

THE ANNUNCIATION TO ZACHARIAS

THE ANNUNCIATION TO
ANNA AND JOACHIM

THE ANNUNCIATION OF SAMSON'S BIRTH

THE ANNUNCIATION OF ISAAC'S BIRTH

THE ANNUNCIATION OF BUDDHA'S BIRTH

OTHER ANNUNCIATIONS

Sandro Botticelli, The Annunciation, circa 1490, painting on panel, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery.
(Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

The word annunciation can be considered approximately synonymous with announcement, but it is much more commonly used to refer specifically to the Annunciation to the Virgin Mary—the event described in Luke 1:26–38, when the angel Gabriel appeared to Mary and informed her that she was to be the mother of Jesus Christ. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, this precise Christian meaning of the word was part of the English language before the more general meaning came into use. By association with the Annunciation to the Virgin, other comparable but less famous or momentous biblical occurrences are also regularly called Annunciations, and the term might be extended further to include various divine pronouncements even if they are not canonically designated as Annunciations. Such religious usages will form the limits of this article; it would be inappropriate in normal parlance to apply the term Annunciation to images of announcements in merely historical or genre settings.

The Annunciation to the Virgin is one of the most frequently repeated motifs in Christian art. The scene inevitably includes the angel Gabriel and Mary, sometimes these two alone. Often present, appearing above the two, is a white dove symbolizing the Holy Ghost mentioned by Gabriel: “The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee . . .” (Luke 1:35). In many late medieval and Renaissance examples God the Father appears at the top of the composition, usually with some indication that the Holy Ghost is descending from Him to the Virgin. The descent of the Holy Ghost, with or without the visible presence of God, may be understood as a reference to the impregnation of Mary. (In the liturgy the Feast of the Annunciation is on March 25, exactly nine months before the Feast of the Nativity.)

The physical relationship between Gabriel and the Virgin may take many forms, which have much to do with the expressive content of the images. In early medieval art the two usually confront each other with approximately equal force. Late medieval and Renaissance art offers a much greater variety. In many cases the angel bows with extreme respect before the Virgin, who draws back with a mannered refinement, as in Botticelli’s painting in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy. In an opposite mood, the angel may rush aggressively toward the Virgin, who manifests a complete submissiveness, as in the Annunciation on Matthias Grünewald’s Isenheim Altarpiece. Sometimes, especially in Northern European art, Mary is shown seated on the floor as an indication of her humility, in keeping with her words, “Behold the handmaid of the Lord” (Luke 1:38).

The enriched iconography of later periods also provides architectural settings of far greater variety and interest than those of early medieval Annunciations. Dutch painting of the fifteenth century places the action in the Virgin’s house, frequently, with rather obvious implications, in the bed chamber. These interiors are imagined as bourgeois residences of a contemporary style. In Italian art of the same period the settings, in keeping with Renaissance taste, are of a more elegant, formal, and generalized character. French and German Annunciations of the time are often located, with even greater disregard for the biblical narrative, in ecclesiastical interiors.

A wealth of symbolic details came to be involved in the representations, some of them common attributes of the Virgin, others specific to the meanings of the Annunciation. The white lilies that appear in innumerable examples are a familiar sign of Mary’s virginity. A less common sort of reference to a similar idea is seen in the wash basin and white towel—cleanliness connoting sexual purity—that appear in Robert Campin’s Merode Altarpiece, now in the Cloisters in New York. Many Annunciations include a glimpse of a small garden surrounded by a strong crenellated wall, like a fortification; this is the motif of the hortus conclusus, the enclosed garden, a symbol of Mary as fertile yet perpetually virginal. The device may be taken, in fact, as an allusion to the Virgin’s womb. There are many forms in Annunciation imagery that, by defining enclosed spaces or by illustrating the penetration of enclosed spaces, carry references to the Virgin’s unnatural impregnation and have further reverberations of a psychosexual content. A simple instance in the Merode Altarpiece is the beam of heaven-sent light passing through a circular window. A number of fifteenth-century Italian Annunciations show a birdcage, containing a single bird, hanging near the Virgin—as in Carlo Crivelli’s painting in the National Gallery in London. This might suggest Christ incarnate in the Virgin’s womb or, perhaps more plausibly, the soul temporarily imprisoned in the body.

Since the announcement of Christ’s advent marks the beginning of the Christian era, Annunciation iconography may contain allusions to a transition from the Old to the New Dispensation. In many of the images this is suggested within the architectural setting by a contrast between an older, heavier kind of architecture and a more modern, more distinctly Christian type of architecture in the Gothic style. Or the idea may be conveyed by including among the Virgin’s books the juxtaposition of a scroll, an ancient form of book, and a codex, associated with the Christian era. Mary is often interrupted in her reading of a devotional book in Renaissance paintings, as in Annunciation scenes by Robert Campin, Andrea del Sarto, Lorenzo Lotto, and Juan de Flandes.

One of the rare modern instances of Annunciation iconography is Dante Gabriel Rossetti’s Ecce Ancilla Domini! (Behold the Handmaid of the Lord), an unconventional version of the subject in which a handsome, wingless Gabriel extends a stalk of lilies toward a pale Virgin Mary sitting rather apprehensively on a narrow couch.

An Annunciation narrative different from that recounted in Luke occurs in the apocryphal Protoevangelium of James. Here the Annunciation to Mary occurs while she is drawing water. This is illustrated in early Christian and Byzantine images, such as the fourteenth-century mosaic in the Church of the Kariye Djami in Istanbul, Turkey, in which Mary, pitcher in hand, bends over a well while looking up in response to the angel's greeting. The same source describes how the young Mary was assigned, along with other maidens, to weave cloth for the veil of the temple. Consequently early Christian Annunciations often show her holding a distaff wrapped with wool. A peculiar late medieval variant of the Annunciation combined the theme with the story of the Hunt of the Unicorn, for legend taught that the unicorn could be captured only by a virgin. A number of fifteenth- and sixteenth-century tapestries show Gabriel as a huntsman sounding his horn while the unicorn leaps into the lap of Mary, who is seated in a hortus conclusus (Schiller, figs. 127–129).

Toward the end of the Middle Ages the apocryphal Annunciation of the death of the Virgin appeared. A noteworthy example is that on Duccio di Buoninsegna's Maestà Altarpiece, where the image is similar to the canonical Annunciation, except that Mary is elderly and the kneeling angel extends to her a palm branch, traditional symbol of victory over death.

Other than for the announcement of the Virgin's death, the term Annunciation has only been used to indicate a divine announcement of the birth of an especially holy person. The Annunciation to the shepherds, described in Luke 2:8–14, occurred in the fields at night after Christ's birth. In art the motif is usually shown in conjunction with the Nativity of Christ, sometimes in a distant background space and often in broad daylight. A dramatic nighttime image is depicted in Gentile da Fabriano's Nativity, a panel at the base of his Strozzi Altarpiece in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence. The Annunciation to the shepherds may contain an implied contrast between those who accept and those who reject or ignore the Christian message. This is symbolized in some instances by a distinction between a small flock of white sheep and one black goat, or, simply, by the difference between a shepherd who looks up in awe at the angel and another who turns away. Separate representations of the Annunciation to the shepherds are rare. Outstanding examples are a full-page miniature in the Pericope Book of Henry II, an eleventh-century German manuscript, and a large, tumultuous etching by Rembrandt van Rijn.

Luke also recounts, in his first chapter, the Annunciation made by an angel to the priest Zacharias, informing him that he and his wife Elizabeth were to be the parents of a son, "who shall be great in the sight of the Lord"—John the Baptist (Luke 1:15). At the beginning of Luke's Gospel in several early medieval Gospel books the Annunciation to Zacharias is represented simply, with Zacharias in priestly costume standing before an altar. Like Zacharias and Elizabeth, Joachim and Anna, the parents of the Virgin Mary, were childless and of advanced age when the birth of an offspring was announced to them, so that the event is somewhat marvelous. The apocryphal Protoevangelium of James describes the appearance of an angel to Anna, at home in Jerusalem, to inform her that she is to bear a child of great destiny. A concurrent angelic announcement to Joachim in the fields with his herdsmen told him of the child and instructed him to return to his wife in Jerusalem. The Annunciations to Anna and to Joachim are beautifully depicted by Giotto in the frescoes of the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy. Anna is shown kneeling in her house while the angel speaks to her through a small window. Joachim is visited by an angel as he burns an offering on an altar set out in the wilderness and then, in the following composition, is seen sleeping on the ground as the angel returns to hover over him in his dream.

Annunciations of important births also occur in the Old Testament. An angel appeared to the wife of Manoah and later to Manoah to inform them of the birth of Samson (Judges 13). The Annunciation of Samson's birth is shown on one of the engraved plaques of Nicholas of Verdun's Klosterneuburg Altarpiece. Its form is similar to that of the Annunciation to the Virgin, and it is presented as an earlier type of the New Testament event. An etching by Hendrik Goltzius in his series Promises of the Bible portrays a strangely indolent angel speaking to both Manoah and his wife. In the background the elderly couple appear again, making a burnt offering to the Lord. The subject is treated similarly in an etching by Cornelis Massys as plate 1 of his series The History of Samson.

The birth of Isaac to Abraham and Sarah was likewise preceded by divine prophecy, when three "men" visited the couple at their tent, as told in Genesis 18. In art the three are always represented as angels. After being served food, the angels announced that Sarah would bear a son, at which she laughed, for she was past the time of childbearing. In Christian interpretation the narrative came to have several meanings—for example, as a reference to the offering of the Mass in devotion to the Trinity. The Annunciation aspect of the narrative is emphasized in the Klosterneuburg Altarpiece, where, like the Annunciation of Samson's birth, it is seen as an early type of the Annunciation to the Virgin.

A Far Eastern parallel to the angelic Annunciation of Christ's advent is the Buddhist account of the appearance to Queen Maya, while she was asleep, of a white elephant descended from on high bearing in his trunk a white lotus flower (which might be compared to the white lily often proffered by Gabriel to the Virgin Mary). The elephant touched the queen's right side with his tusk then entered her womb, a moment marking the incarnation of the Buddha. In some versions of the narrative the event is merely a dream of the queen, in others it has a greater reality. The subject is repeatedly illustrated in early Indian art, as on a stone-carved relief of the second or first century B.C. from the Barhut Stupa, now in the Calcutta Museum in India. Here Queen Maya lies sleeping on a small bed, surrounded by kneeling attendant women, while the elephant floats above her.

See also Reading; Virgin/Virginity; Visiting/Visitation

Selected Works of Art

Annunciation to the Virgin Mary

Annunciation, Byzantine mosaic, circa 435, Rome, Basilica of Sta Maria Maggiore

Saint Albans Psalter, manuscript illumination, twelfth century, Hildesheim, Germany, Treasury of St. Godehard's (fol. 3)

Nicholas of Verdun, Klosterneuburg Altarpiece, metalwork, 1181, Klosterneuburg, Austria, Stiftsmuseum

Mosaic, circa 1315, Istanbul, Church of the Kariye Djami

Pucelle, Jean, Hours of Jeanne d'Evreux, manuscript illumination, before 1413, New York, The Cloisters (fol. 16)

Campin, Robert, Merode Altarpiece, circa 1425–1430, New York, The Cloisters

Fra Angelico, Annunciation, panel, circa 1440, Florence, Italy, St. Lorenzo

Leonardo da Vinci, Annunciation, oil on panel, late 1470s, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Crivelli, Carlo, The Annunciation, panel, transferred to canvas, 1486, London, National Gallery

Botticelli, The Annunciation, 1489–1490, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Flandes, Juan de, Annunciation, from San Lázaro Altarpiece, oil on panel, circa 1508, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Grünewald, Mathias, Isenheim Altarpiece, 1509–1513, Colmar, France, Musée d'Unterlinden

Sarto, Andrea del, Annunciation, oil on panel, 1512, Florence, Italy, Galleria Palatina

Lotto, Lorenzo, Annunciation, oil on canvas, 1520s, Recanati, Italy, Santa Maria Sopra Mercanti

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Ecce Ancilla Domini!, 1850, London, Tate Gallery

Denis, Maurice, The Annunciation, oil on canvas, 1890, private collection

Tanner, Henry Ossawa, The Annunciation, oil, 1898, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art

Annunciation of the Death of the Virgin

Duccio, Majestas Pediment: Annunciation of the Virgin's Death, panel, 1307–1311, London, National Gallery

Lippi, Fra Filippo, Barbadori Altarpiece of the Madonna and Child Between Two Saints and Angels, SS. Augustine and Frediano, Predella: Annunciation to the Virgin of Her Death, began 1437, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

The Annunciation to the Shepherds

Pericope Book of Henry II, manuscript illumination, circa 1010, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek (MS. lat. 4452, fol. 8r)

Bartolo, Taddeo di, Adoration of the Shepherds, before 1422, Siena, Italy, Sta Maria dei Servi

Fabrizio, Gentile da, Strozzi Altarpiece, 1425, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Bassano, Jacopo, Annunciation to the Shepherds, circa 1570, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen

Rembrandt van Rijn, The Annunciation to the Shepherds, etching, circa 1625

Pintoricchio, Adoration to the Shepherds, before 1513, Rome, Sta Maria del Popolo

The Annunciation to Zacharias

Harley Gospels (Golden Gospels), manuscript illumination, early ninth century, London, British Library (MS Harley 2788, fol. 109)

Giotto, Annunciation of the Birth of Saint John the Baptist, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Ghirlandaio, Domenico, Vision of Zacharias, 1485–1490, Florence, Italy, Sta Maria Novella

Severino, Lorenzo da San I, Scenes from the New Testament: Angel Appearing to Zacharias, before 1503, Urbino, Italy, St. Giovanni

Veronese, Bonafacio, Zachariah and the Angel, sixteenth century, Venice, Italy, Academy

Sacchi, Andre, Annunciation to Zacharais, circa 1635?, Rome, Lateran

The Annunciation to Anna and Joachim

Giotto, Joachim's Dream, fresco, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Bartolo, Andrea di, Apparition of the Angel to Saint Joachim, before 1428, Rome, Vatican, Pinacoteca

d'Alba, Macrino, Scenes from the Life of Saint Joachim: Annunciation to Joachim, before 1528, Frankfurt, Staedel Institute

Ferrari, Gaudenzio, Annunciation to Saint Anne, before 1546, Milan, Italy, Brera

Sicilante, Girolamo, The Angel Appearing to Joachim, ceiling, sixteenth century, Rome, St. Tommaso in Formis

The Annunciation of Samson's Birth

Nicholas of Verdun, Klosterneuburg Altarpiece, metalwork, 1181, Klosterneuburg, Austria, Stiftsmuseum

Saraceni, Carlo, Angel Appears to the Wife of Manoah, circa 1610, Basel, Switzerland, Historisches Museum

Lastman, Pieter, Angel Appears to Manoah and His Wife, circa 1625, London, E. Shapiro Collection

Tintoretto, The Annunciation by the Angel to the Wife of Manoah, before 1635, Lugano, Switzerland, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection

The Annunciation of Isaac's Birth

Hospitality of Abraham to the Three Angels, Byzantine mosaic, 526–547, Ravenna, Italy, San Vitale

Nicholas of Verdun, Klosterneuburg Altarpiece, metalwork, 1181, Klosterneuburg, Austria, Stiftsmuseum

Rubens, Peter Paul, Apparition of the Angels to Abraham, seventeenth century, Seville, Cathedral

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Sarah Told of Her Maternity, circa 1726, Udine, Palazzo Arcivescovile, Galleria

Chagall, Marc, Three Angels Visit Abraham, illustration for Bible, 1930, Nice, France, Musée National Message Biblique Marc Chagall

The Annunciation of Buddha's Birth

Relief, from Barhut Stupa, Sunga dynasty, second century
B.C., Calcutta, India, Indian Museum

Other Annunciations

Beardsley, Aubrey, The Mysterious Rose Garden, from The Yellow Book, 1895

Further Reading

Appiano Caprettini, Ave, Lettura dell'annunciazione: fra semiotica e iconografia, Torino, Italy: Gappichelli, 1979
Choppy, Etienne, L'Annonciation, Marseilles, France: Editions AGEF, 1991
Denny, Don, The Annunciation from the Right, New York: Garland, 1977
Gossmann, Elisabeth, Die Verkündigung an Maria im dogmatischen Verständnis des Mittelalters, Munich: Max Hueber, 1957

Gupta, S. K., The Elephant in Indian Art and Mythology, New Delhi, India: Abhinav Publications, 1983;
Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1983
Kirschbaum, Engelbert, ed. Lexikon der christlichen Ikonographie, Rome: Herder, 1968
Kolve, V. A., "The Annunciation to Christine: Authorial Empowerment in The Book of the City of Ladies," in Iconography at the Crossroads, edited by Brendan Cassidy, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Department of Art and Archaeology, 1993
Reau, Louis, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1955
Schiller, Gertrud, Iconography of Christian Art, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1971; London: Lund Humphries, 1971
Ward, John L., "Hidden Symbolism in Jan van Eyck's Annunciations," Art Bulletin 58:2 (June 1975)

APOCALYPSE

Don Denny

The following iconographic narratives and subjects are included in the discussion of the theme Apocalypse:

TOTAL PROGRAMS

CHRIST IN MAJESTY

THE WOMAN CLOTHED WITH THE SUN

DEATH ON A PALE HORSE

THE WHORE OF BABYLON

MODERN APOCALYPTIC
IMAGES

Albrecht Dürer, The Four Horsemen, circa 1496–1498, woodcut from The Apocalypse, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Lessing J. Rosenwald Collection. (Courtesy of the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.)

The word apocalypse in its original Greek sense refers to a “revealing” or “unveiling.” But the word is much more commonly and specifically applied to a type of visionary religious literature prophesying the end of the physical world. Such writings flourished between the second century B.C. and the second century A.D. In the canonical Bible the chief examples are in certain portions of the Book of Daniel (7–12) and in the last book of the New Testament, the Apocalypse, or the Revelation of St. John the Divine. Of all apocalyptic literature, the latter is of by far the greatest importance for iconographic tradition.

The Revelation of St. John the Divine, a work of extended, obscure, and very complex imagery and symbolism, has inspired correspondingly complex programs of illustration throughout the history of Christian art. Each major period has produced stylistic and iconographic interpretations of such apocalyptic phenomena as the Opening of the Seven Seals (Revelation 5–8), the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse (Revelation 6:1–8), the Two Witnesses (Revelation 11), the Woman Clothed with the Sun (Revelation 12:1–2), the Seven-Headed Beast (Revelation 12–13), the Adoration of the Lamb (Revelation 7:9–17), the Whore of Babylon (Revelation 17), the Heavenly Jerusalem (Revelation 21), and many more. It is impossible in a short article to describe all these visual riches; rather, a brief survey of a few of the more outstanding pictorial cycles can be offered.

Many heavily illustrated manuscripts of commentary on Revelation and Daniel were produced in early medieval Spain by the eighth-century monk Beatus of Liebana. These sets of images, repeated often in tenth- and eleventh-century books (with Daniel illustrations forming only a small part of the program), refer not to the commentary but to the original biblical text. The paintings are executed in the so-called Mozarabic style, an art of intense color and bold, semiabstract design.

A later and quite different body of medieval illustration is found in numerous English apocalypse manuscripts of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; here the material is cast in an elegant, courtly style that might seem at odds with the violence and cosmic extravagance of the written source. The distinctive set of late-fourteenth-century French tapestries preserved in Angers provides another example of a late medieval apocalypse cycle, but in a very different scale and medium.

With the development of printing techniques in the fifteenth century, many apocalypse illustrations were produced in popular woodcut block-books. At a far higher aesthetic level is the group of 14 woodcuts made by Albrecht Dürer in the 1490s, a technical and expressive tour de force and one of the most widely known of all apocalypse programs. Among other graphic series of note are the 21 woodcuts by Lucas Cranach the Elder and his workshop appearing in a Bible published at Wittenberg in 1522—illustrations strongly influenced by Dürer’s prints but with the insertion of numerous bits of explicit Protestant propaganda—and a set of 24 engravings, extraordinary for their Mannerist elaboration, produced in 1561 by the French goldsmith Jean Duvet.

As Christian themes gradually declined in importance over the following periods, major apocalypse illustrative cycles were seldom undertaken. But during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries a revived feeling for mystical, fantastic, and emotionally charged imagery led to several brilliantly personal interpretations of Revelation. Around 1810 William Blake brought his fervent imagination to a set of 12 watercolors on apocalyptic motifs. In 1899 Odilon Redon, illustrator of many bizarre texts, published a 12-piece portfolio of lithographs in which figures from the apocalypse are treated in concentrated black-and-white visions comparable to the mood of symbolist poetry. German Expressionist Max Beckmann provided 27 hand-colored lithographs for an edition of the Apocalypse issued in 1943; a set of 15 apocalypse illustrations, also color lithographs, was produced by the Mexican painter Rufino Tamayo in 1959.

Among the vast array of apocalypse imagery a few subjects gained significant currency as separate motifs. During the Middle Ages the most widespread of these autonomous motifs was taken from the fourth chapter of Revelation. An august figure, to be understood as Christ the Lord, is seen seated on a throne and surrounded by four “living creatures”—a lion, an ox, a man (or angel), and an eagle, all with wings—and 24 “elders” wearing crowns. This vision was generally taken as a prophesy of the Second Coming of Christ. The assorted attendant figures are quite enigmatic, but exegetical thought came to invest them with much symbolic content. The four “living creatures,” which had appeared earlier in the prophesy of Ezekiel (1:5–14), were understood in early Christian times as signifying the four Evangelists: the lion, Mark; the ox, Luke; the angel, Matthew; the eagle, John. The representation of the enthroned Christ surrounded by the four winged creatures is a familiar subject in early medieval art through the twelfth century and is found in manuscript painting, ivory carving, frescoes, and other media. This iconographic device, commonly called Christ in Majesty, departs from the biblical text in some respects: the four creatures carry books or scrolls as references to the writings of the four Evangelists, and Christ usually makes a gesture of blessing with his right hand and holds a book in his left.

As monumental architectural sculpture rapidly developed in the twelfth century, the Christ in Majesty motif was repeatedly used to fill the tympana of church doorways. The Second Coming was thus one of the great eschatological themes of Romanesque sculpture, providing an alternative to the Last Judgment seen on other portals. The large spaces of the portal designs there often included the 24 elders, crowned and holding musical instruments. Especially fine examples of such ensembles are at the church of St.-Pierre in Moissac and on the western facade of Chartres Cathedral, both in France. The Moissac tympanum, dating from around 1125–1135, surrounds an immense Christ with a crowded assemblage: directly beside him are the four winged creatures; closely bracketing the central gathering are two extravagantly tall angels; and the remainder of the space is filled by the elders, small actively posed figures disposed in several horizontal rows. The Chartres portal, of a slightly later date, is markedly more formal and stately in character: the tympanum is of relatively modest size and contains only Christ and the four winged creatures, all simply arranged so that there is a generous interval between the figures; the elders, as well as a series of angels, are relegated to the archivolts, forming concentric arches that create a strong neutral frame around the tympanum; the 12 apostles are aligned on the lintel below the tympanum.

Another apocalyptic vision that formed an important independent tradition is the Woman Clothed with the Sun (mulier amicta sole) of the twelfth chapter of Revelation—a woman with the moon under her feet and her head crowned by 12 stars, who “brought forth a man child, who was to rule the nations . . .” (Revelation 12:5). The woman was readily seen as an image of the Virgin Mary in cosmic glory. By the end of the Middle Ages impressive works of art centered around this theme. Such is the late-fifteenth-century altarpiece in Moulins Cathedral in France, where the Virgin, holding the Christ Child, is enthroned above a thin crescent moon, a large yellow sun expanding behind her and angels holding over her head a golden crown decorated with stars; additional angels gather around the space, with two, at the bottom, displaying a scroll bearing the relevant quotation from the apocalypse. The altarpiece is completed by shutters, showing, at left, the donor Pierre II, Duke of Bourbon, accompanied by Saint Peter, and, at right, the Duchess of Bourbon, Anne of France, with her daughter Suzanne and accompanied by St. Anne; the closed shutters represent the Annunciation to the Virgin. During the Counter-Reformation the motif was often taken up as a symbol of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin, a significant issue in Catholic dogma. Especially in seventeenth-century Spain, where Counter-Reformation feeling was strong, the Virgin Immaculate was often represented in this way. In numerous paintings Bartolomé Esteban Murillo depicted a very youthful Virgin, without the Christ Child, standing on a sickle moon, surrounded by bright sunshine, light clouds, and a host of tiny angels.

The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse (Revelation 6:1–8) have had a significant place in popular parlance and imagery. They are revealed at the opening of the first four seals: the Conqueror, holding a bow and riding a white horse; a figure signifying War, with a sword, riding a red horse; a figure perhaps suggesting Famine, holding a pair of scales, riding a black horse; and Death, riding a pale horse and followed by Hell. The four have sometimes been represented together as an autonomous image—for example, in a painting by Arnold Böcklin of about 1895, in the Gemäldegalerie Neue Meister in Dresden, Germany, in which the riders soar over a modern city. The riders also have been shown individually—as in Henri Rousseau’s remarkable painting War, at the Louvre in Paris, a free variation on the Apocalypse text, in which the rider is a fierce young woman waving a sword and torch while riding a black horse across a desolate field covered with naked corpses upon which feed a flock of dark birds. But the most frequently and famously repeated motif from this apocalyptic passage has been that of Death on a Pale Horse.

In a 1506 drawing at the British Museum in London Dürer shows Death as a skeleton holding a scythe (conventional symbol of the grim reaper) and sitting on a weak, bony horse. Salvador Dalí perhaps had that model in mind when making his dramatic drawing of a similarly mounted skeleton, holding a lance rather than a scythe, now at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. During the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries Benjamin West produced several variations of his epic composition Death on the Pale Horse. Here Death, followed by many dark grotesque monsters of hell, surges forward, brandishing in both hands piercing rays of light while his steed tramples a mass of defenseless figures, prominent among whom is a family of youthful parents and two small children; in a subordinate role at the right of the very wide work are the three other riders, on red, white, and black horses. In West’s culminating version of the theme (at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts in Philadelphia) the group of white-clad souls that appears upon the opening of the fifth seal is seen at the extreme right in the distant sky. In the first years of the twentieth century another American painter, Albert Pinkham Ryder, created an utterly different imagining of the motif: a lonely Death, scythe in hand, drives his horse around a racetrack set on an empty, featureless terrain (at the Cleveland Museum of Art in Ohio).

An important Christian subject thematically related to apocalyptic imagery is the Last Judgment, which has a very rich iconographic history. This subject, however, is not appropriate for inclusion here because the Last Judgment is not explicitly described in Revelation and, indeed, almost all of its traditional iconographic elements are derived from other sources.

Beyond any particular religious doctrine, the adjective apocalyptic is often applied to concepts and images concerned with vast general decline or destruction. An extensive, ill-defined body of representations, especially some of the expressionist art of modern times, may be considered apocalyptic in this sense. For example, Pablo Picasso’s mural Guernica has been called apocalyptic, referring to the bombing of the town of that name during the Spanish Civil War. The painting exceeds the limits of that one event to suggest in symbolic forms the enveloping horror of total mechanical military destruction. Many works of the contemporary German painter Anselm Kiefer show immense, unoccupied, decaying architectural interiors or blasted, lifeless, flat landscapes—dark visions subject to various subjective interpretations but strongly suggestive of a twilight universe with little or no hope. In the Firestorm series—large drawings in ink and charcoal filled by amorphous surges of blackness—American Robert Morris has devoted much of his time to the distinctly apocalyptic theme of nuclear holocaust.

See also Damned Souls; Death; Destruction of Cities; Order/Chaos

Selected Works of Art

Total Programs

Beatus of Liebana, Commentary on the Book of Revelation and the Book of Daniel, copy of eighth century manuscript, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (MS 664)

The Trinity Apocalypse, circa 1230–1250, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Trinity College Library (MS. R.16.2)

The Angers Apocalypse, tapestries, late fourteenth century, Angers, France, Castle, New Gallery

Dürer, Albrecht, The Apocalypse, woodcuts, 1497–1498

Blake, William, suite of 12 watercolors on Apocalypse motifs, circa 1799–1810, various collections

Redon, Odilon, Apocalypse de Saint-Jean, lithographs, 1899

Beckmann, Max, Die Apokalypse, before 1950

Tamayo, Rufino, Apocalypse of Saint John, fifteen lithographs, 1959

Christ in Majesty

Ivory Plaque, tenth century, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz

Portal Sculpture, west facade, circa 1145–1155, Chartres, France, Chartres Cathedral

Portal Sculpture, circa 1110–1120, Moissac, Sainte-Pierre

The Woman Clothed with the Sun

Master of Moulins, Virgin and Child Surrounded by Angels, late fifteenth century, France, Moulins Cathedral

Murillo, Estebán Bartolomé, The Immaculate Conception, Madrid, Prado

Rubens, Peter Paul, The Virgin as the Woman of the Apocalypse, oil on canvas, 1623–1624, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum

Blake, William, The Great Red Dragon and the Woman Clothed with the Sun: "The Devil Is Come Down," pen and watercolor, circa 1805, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Death on a Pale Horse

Dürer, Albrecht, King Death on a Horse, drawing, 1505, London, British Museum

Blake, William, Death on a Pale Horse, pen and watercolor over pencil, circa 1800, Cambridge, Fitzwilliam Museum

West, Benjamin, Death on a Pale Horse, 1802, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts

Ryder, Albert Pinkham, The Race Track, circa 1910, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art

The Whore of Babylon

Blake, William, The Whore of Babylon, pen and watercolor, 1809, London, British Museum

Modern Apocalyptic Images

Groux, Henry de, Cataclysm, oil on canvas, circa 1893, Paris, Flamand-Charbonnier Collection

Meidner, Ludwig, Apocalyptic Landscape, 1913, Los Angeles County Museum of Art

Picasso, Pablo, Guernica, 1937, Madrid, Reina Sofia

Echaurren, Robert Matta, The Taste of Apocalypse, 1957–1958, private collection

Kiefer, Anselm, To the Unknown Painter, 1983, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Carnegie Museum of Art

Morris, Robert, from Firestorm series, Frankfurt, Germany, Museum für Moderne Kunst

Further Reading

Bjelajac, David, Millennial Desire and the Apocalyptic Vision of Washington Allston, Washington, D.C. and London: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1988

Emmerson, Richard Kenneth, and Bernard McGinn, eds., The Apocalypse in the Middle Ages, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1993

Gassen, Richard W., and Bernhard Holeczek, eds., Apokalypse: Ein Prinzip Hoffnung? Ernst Bloch zum 100. Geburtstag, Heidelberg, Germany: Edition Braus, 1985

Gousset, Maria-Thérèse, "La représentation de la Jérusalem jusqu'à l'époque carolingienne," Cahiers Archéologiques XVIII (1974)

Gumpert, Lynn, The End of the World: Contemporary Visions of the Apocalypse, New York: The New Museum of Contemporary Art, 1983

Henkel, Kathryn, The Apocalypse, College Park, Maryland: University of Maryland Art Gallery, 1973

James, Montague Rhodes, The Apocalypse in Art, Oxford and London: Oxford University Press, 1931

Lewis, Suzanne, Reading Images: Narrative Discourse and Reception in the Thirteenth-Century Illuminated Apocalypse, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995

Van der Meer, Frederick, Apocalypse: Visions from the Book of Revelations in Western Art, New York: Alpine Fine Arts Collection, 1978; London: Thames and Hudson, 1978

Paley, Morton D., The Apocalyptic Sublime, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1986

Sharrett, Christopher, ed., Crisis Cinema: The Apocalyptic Idea in Postmodern Narrative Film, Washington, D.C.: Maisonnette Press, 1993

Williams, John, The Illustrated Beatus: A Corpus of the Illustrations of the Commentary on the Apocalypse, London: Harvey Miller, 1994

APOTHEOSIS/ DEIFICATION

Claire Lindgren

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Apotheosis/Deification:

ANCIENT

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

NINETEENTH CENTURY

Apotheosis of Faustina, Wife of Marcus Aurelius (or of Sabina), Roman relief, Rome, Capitoline Museum. (Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

Apotheosis constitutes the act of deifying a person, or placing him or her among the gods. It was an honor frequently bestowed on illustrious citizens of the Greco-Roman world, particularly on a deceased emperor or members of his family. This classical apotheosis or deification should not be confused with the ancient Egyptian concept of the pharaoh as a living god, nor should it be confused with the Christian belief in the resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ. For the act of apotheosis to occur, the individual had to have lived solely as a mortal, without any previous suggestion or acknowledgment of divinity. Simply put, apotheosis or deification took place after death. In the literature of Roman antiquity this was indicated by writing the name of the person followed by the two words afterwards deified, as Suetonius does in The Twelve Caesars.

In the visual arts, apotheosis is indicated in several ways: by a depiction of the individual ascending to another realm, by a depiction of the individual as a god, or by a depiction of the individual seated among the gods.

To the modern viewer the elevation of a human to divine status may seem quite strange, but it was more familiar in the ancient world. Two well-known relief sculptures from the second century A.D. share a similar format: The Apotheosis of Sabina (A.D. 136–138) and The Apotheosis of Antoninus Pius and Faustina (A.D. 161). In each instance a winged creature, in the former a female form, possibly Nike, and in the latter, a male, often identified as Aion, carries the deceased individual to the heavens. Depictions of the Campus Martius, site of the funeral pyres and consecration ceremonies, occupy the lower left corner of each relief. In the first relief, Sabina's husband, Emperor Hadrian, occupies the lower right corner and appears to be giving some sort of blessing to his departing wife. In the second relief, the tutelary goddess Roma occupies the lower right corner and seems to be waving farewell to the deceased Emperor Antoninus Pius and his wife, Faustina.

Portraits of an individual in the guise of a god indicate a belief that he or she has been deified. As previously stated, the Egyptian pharaohs were considered divine and did not have to achieve divinity, consequently the concept of apotheosis does not apply to them. However, after Alexander the Great's invasion of Egypt, he was proclaimed pharaoh at Memphis, and after visiting the oracular shrine of the god Ammon, he announced that he was the son of the god. Thus, as Alexander assimilated ancient Egyptian beliefs he achieved deification before his death. In 324 B.C. Alexander requested that he be treated as a god everywhere, including the Greek cities. Whether this was a true belief or a political move cannot be determined, but it did establish the idea of the ruler cult, which continued under the Ptolemaic rulers, Hellenistic kings, and certain Roman emperors. A depiction of the deified Alexander the Great is found on a coin struck by Lysimachos of Magnesia in about 286 B.C., years after Alexander's death. The portrait shows Alexander with the horns of Ammon sprouting from his temples. Another example of the conflation of Greek and Egyptian styles is found in a statue of Arsinoe II, wife and sister to Ptolemy II, made after her death. The inscription on the back refers to her as a goddess. These works illustrate the blending of ideas that mark the cosmopolitan nature of the Hellenistic world, in so far as their beliefs and art were concerned.

In the Roman world, statues of the deceased in the guise of a god also attested to deification, wherein the individual assumed the characteristics of a particular deity. The first occurred with Emperor Hadrian's beloved companion Antinous, who has been represented variously as Silvanus, god of uncultivated land, in a marble relief from about A.D. 130, as Bacchus in a statue of the same date, and as himself in another statue presumably commissioned after the cult of Antinous and the city of Antinoopolis were founded by Hadrian. Assumption of the attributes of a deity is not always an indication of apotheosis, especially in the case of a Roman emperor, for many emperors who were never deified had themselves depicted during their lifetime in the guise of a favorite god. One such emperor was Commodus, portrayed as Hercules in a bust of A.D. 190. He was murdered in A.D. 192 and never deified.

By far the most recognizable depiction of apotheosis presents it as a completed act. An early example is the Apotheosis of Homer, a votive relief dated to the second century B.C. and signed by Archelaos of Priene. It is a complicated composition full of symbolism and abstraction with figures arranged in registers and set in theatrical space. The artist has placed Homer at the bottom, crowned by personifications of the World and Time and with representations of the Iliad and Odyssey kneeling next to him. Personifications of Myth and History offer a sacrifice, while Comedy, Poetry, Tragedy, the Virtues, and Nature salute Homer. The register above this contains depictions of the Muses and Apollo, and at the top, Zeus, king of the gods.

An example from Roman times follows a similar pattern. The Gemma Augustea, a large (almost 10 inches wide) cameo of onyx with one white and one bluish black layer, probably dates to the reign of Tiberius, successor to the first emperor, Augustus. The work is divided into two registers. In the upper register, Augustus is seated next to Roma, the personification of the city who was also revered as a goddess. A personification of the World holds a crown over his head in a position similar to that depicted in the Apotheosis of Homer. Ocean and Earth, holding a horn of plenty, are close to World, while on the other side of Augustus and Roma, Tiberius steps from a chariot accompanied by Victory and a youth in battle dress. In the lower register, a triumph on the battlefield is depicted. It can be interpreted as preceding and supporting the apotheosis of Augustus in the upper zone.

After the fall of Rome, the theme of apotheosis was seldom, if ever, used. Once Christianity became the dominant religion in what had been the Roman Empire, an idea similar to apotheosis, that of achieving sainthood, was incorporated into religious practices. As previously stated, the chief difference between the two rests in the fact that the saint had to have exhibited qualities during his or her lifetime marking him or her as worthy of sainthood. Proof of the ability of this person to qualify for sainthood is only achieved after the long procedures of beatification and canonization. Thus, apotheosis in the Christian world differs from the pre-Christian meaning. Consequently, although depictions of Christian apotheosis may share some similarities with classical apotheosis, they are totally different concepts. In the ancient world statues of persons in the guise of a god attested to deification. In the Christian world statues and paintings of saints abound, with the saint easily recognized by the presence of a halo, which is derived from the ancient aureole or nimbus. In antiquity the aureole or nimbus was a visual expression of supernatural force or intellectual energy, and in the Christian era it became the symbol or indication of a sanctified or holy person. An excellent example of this use of the halo is Domenico Veneziano's St. Lucy Altarpiece, which depicts an enthroned Virgin and Christ Child flanked by St. Francis, St. John the Baptist, St. Zenobius, and St. Lucy. All the saints have halos floating above their heads, and the setting suggests an artist's interpretation of a veranda of a heavenly mansion. In a kind of Christian apotheosis, these symbols make clear the holy estate of the saints depicted, for they have been placed with God in the person of the Christ Child.

Depictions of the Ascension of Jesus Christ and the Assumption of the Virgin Mary exhibit stylistic similarities to The Apotheosis of Sabina and The Apotheosis of Antoninus Pius and Faustina. In Andrea Mantegna's Ascension, Christ stands on the solid mass of a cloud propelled toward heaven by angeletti; halos, rather like golden mists, crown the heads of the holy personages. In Titian's Assumption of the Virgin, Correggio's Assumption of the Virgin, and in numerous other paintings of the same title, hordes of angeletti escort the Virgin to heaven. In these works the figures of Nike and Aion found in ancient art have been replaced by the angeletti of the Renaissance.

Since the Renaissance, artists have used the word apotheosis in titles and designs to indicate the greatness of various rulers and generals. The artists flattered the subjects by suggesting they owed their power to sanctity and godlike qualities (e.g., Peter Paul Rubens's The Apotheosis of Henry IV).

In the nineteenth century Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres applied a definition of apotheosis closer to the classical meaning in the creation of a huge work, The Apotheosis of Homer, for a ceiling in the Louvre in Paris. Unfortunately, it was not placed on the ceiling but on a wall where, some believe, it is less effective. In the work Homer sits enthroned, crowned by Poetry, before an Ionic temple. At his feet are personifications of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Around Homer are grouped men whom Ingres believed to be the great geniuses of all time: Pindar, Phidias, Apelles, Aeschylus, Virgil, Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci, Dante, Fra Angelico, Nicolas Poussin, Nicolas Boileau, Molière, Jean Racine, Pierre Corneille, and William Shakespeare are all readily identifiable. Ingres considered these men "immortals" of the arts and letters worthy of reverence as "gods."

With Ingres's work apotheosis takes on an expanded meaning, for Homer is not placed within the company of the gods as the original definition would have it. He becomes the ideal to which later artists of all kinds are compared. Because the gods of classical antiquity are no longer worshiped, the idea of becoming such a god no longer exists, and apotheosis takes on a new meaning as simply a glorification or honor for achievement, closer to homage than deification.

This formula, placing an originator of a style or a highly respected person in the midst of his or her followers, became a recipe for later artists, beginning with Henri Fantin-Latour's Homage to Delacroix (1864) and his A Studio in the Batignolles Quarter (Homage to Manet) (1870). The latter work shows Édouard Manet painting while others, including Pierre-Auguste Renoir, Frédéric Bazille, Claude Monet, and Émile Zola, look on. The work has been caricatured by contemporary critics as the "Divine School of Manet."

In the modern secular world, even with this expanded meaning, the theme of apotheosis is no longer a popular subject for artists. The ancient meaning of apotheosis, the Renaissance concept, and the expanded nineteenth-century definition all seem to be as dead as those who in earlier times were chosen to be deified.

See also Gaze; Honor/Honoring; Martyrdom; Metamorphosis

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Alexander the Great, coin, struck by Lysimachos of Magnesia Antonianos of Aphrodisias, Antinous as Silvanus, sculpture, circa A.D. 130, Rome, private collection

Archelaos of Priene, Apotheosis of Homer, votive relief, second century B.C., London, British Museum

Arsinoe II, Egyptian sculpture (Ptolemaic period), St.

Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum

Antinous, Greek or Roman sculpture, many versions

Antinous as Bacchus, Greek or Roman sculpture, Rome, private collection

Gemma Augustea, Roman cameo, circa A.D. 30, Vienna, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Apotheosis of Antoninus Pius and Faustina, Roman sculpture, Rome, Vatican Museum and Galleries

Apotheosis of Faustina, Wife of Marcus Aurelius (or Sabina), Roman sculpture, 138–136 B.C., formerly part of the decoration of the Arch of Portogallo, Rome, Palazzo dei Conservatore

Ascent of an Emperor, ivory diptych, Roman, circa A.D. 430, London, British Museum

Renaissance

Giotto, Ascension of Saint John, fresco, 1320s, Florence, Italy, Santa Croce, Peruzzi Chapel

Banco, Nanni D' Antonio di, Assumption of the Virgin, marble gable on Porta della Mandorla, 1414–1421, Florence, Italy, Cathedral

Mantegna, Andrea, Ascension, panel of triptych, circa 1464, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Titian, Assumption of the Virgin, panel, 1516–1518, Venice, Italy, Santa Maria Gloriosa dei Frari

Fiorentino, Rosso, Assumption of the Virgin, fresco, 1517, Florence, Italy, SS. Annunziata

Andrea del Sarto, Assumption of the Virgin, panel, 1526–1529, Florence, Italy, Pitti Gallery

Correggio, Assumption of the Virgin, fresco in dome, 1526–1530, Parma, Italy, Cathedral

Vasari, Giorgio, Apotheosis of Duke Cosimo, completed 1565, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Rubens, Peter Paul, Apotheosis of Henry IV, 1621–1625, Paris, Louvre

Rubens, Peter Paul, Apotheosis of James I, circa 1629, London, Whitehall, Banqueting Hall

Le Moyne, François, Apotheosis of Hercules, 1733–1736, Versailles, France, Palais

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Apotheosis of a Poet, oil on canvas, circa 1750, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Apotheosis of the Pisani Family, ceiling fresco, 1761–1762, Villa Pisani

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Apotheosis of Aeneas, 1762–1766, Madrid, Palacio Real

Ricci, Sebastiano, Apotheosis of Saint Marziale, early eighteenth century, Venice, Church of St. Marziale

Mengs, Anton Raphael, Glory of Saint Eusebius, fresco, 1757–1759, Rome, Sant'Eusebio

Mengs, Anton Raphael, ceiling fresco, before 1779, Madrid, Palacio Real

Nineteenth Century

West, Benjamin, Immortality of Nelson, oil on canvas, 1807, Greenwich, London, National Maritime Museum

Vernet, Horace, The Apotheosis of Napoleon, 1821, London, Wallace Collection

Ingres, Jean Auguste, Apotheosis of Homer, 1827, Paris, Louvre

Wiertz, Antonie, Apotheosis of the Queen, 1852, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Wiertz

Ingres, Jean Auguste, Apotheosis of Napoleon, 1853, Paris, Carnevalet

Fantin-Latour, Henri, Homage to Delacroix, 1864, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Fantin-Latour, Henri, A Studio in the Batignolles Quarter (Homage to Manet), 1870, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Cézanne, Paul, Apotheosis of Delacroix, 1894, Paris, Collection Pellerin

Beardsley, Aubrey, The Apotheosis, from Salomé, by Oscar Wilde, 1894, London, British Museum

Further Reading

Bieber, Margarete, The Sculpture of the Hellenistic Age, New York: Columbia University Press, 1955

Brilliant, Richard, Arts of the Ancient Greeks, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1973

———, Roman Art from the Republic to Constantine, New York and London: Phaidon, 1974

Gould, Cecil Hilton Monk, The Paintings of Correggio, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1976; London: Faber, 1976

Hammond, Nicholas Geoffrey Lempriere, Alexander the Great: King, Commander, Statesman, Park Ridge, New Jersey: Noyes Press, 1980; London: Chatto and Windus, 1981

Hanfmann, George M. A., Roman Art: A Modern Survey of the Art of Imperial Rome, London: Cory, Adams and Mackay, 1964; New York: Norton, 1975

Havelock, Christine Mitchell, Hellenistic Art: From the Death of Alexander the Great to the Battle of Actium, London: Phaidon, 1971; New York: Norton, second edition, 1981

L'Orange, Hans Peter, Apotheosis in Ancient Portraiture, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1947

———, Studies on the Iconography of Cosmic Kingship in the Ancient World, New Rochelle, New York: Caratzas Brothers, 1982

Lucie-Smith, Edward, Henri Fantin-Latour, New York: Rizzoli, 1977

MacCormack, Sabine G., Art and Ceremony in Late Antiquity, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1981

Richter, Gisela, The Sculpture and Sculptors of the Greeks, London: Oxford University Press, 1929; New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, fourth edition, 1970

Rosenblum, Robert, Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres, New York: Abrams, 1967; London: Thames and Hudson, 1967

Smith, Edward Lucie, Henri Fantin-Latour, New York, Rizzoli, 1977

Strong, Donald, Roman Art, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1976

Strong, Eugénie Sellers, Apotheosis and Afterlife: Three Lectures on Certain Phases of Art and Religion in the Roman Empire, London: Constable, 1915; New York: Dutton, 1915

Suetonius, The Twelve Caesars, translated by Robert Graves, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1957

Tietze-Conrat, Erica, Mantegna: Paintings, Drawings, Engravings, New York, Garden City Books, 1955

Helmut Wohl, The Paintings of Domenico Veneziano, New York: New York University Press, 1980; Oxford: Phaidon, 1980

ARMS RAISED

Dimitri Hazzikostas

The following motifs and periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Arms Raised:

ONE ARM RAISED

ASIAN

NINETEENTH CENTURY

BOTH ARMS RAISED

MEDIEVAL AND RENAISSANCE

TWENTIETH CENTURY

ANCIENT AND CLASSICAL

SEVENTEENTH AND

EARLY CHRISTIAN

EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

Christian Sarcophagus with Orant, third century, bas-relief, Rome, S. Maria Antiqua.
(Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

In the corpus of world art, gestures involving raised arms are among the oldest and most universal. They can be symbolic or narrative, voluntary or instinctive, with varied meanings whose interpretation requires familiarity with the subject portrayed, and in its absence, careful consideration of other pertinent details such as the positioning of the hands and fingers, the use of one or both arms, and the physiognomic expression. From Aristotle's Physiognomics to John Bulwer's seventeenth-century Chirologia or Natural Language of the Hands and Johann Kaspar Lavater's 1786 Essai sur la Physiognomie, many attempts have been made to codify the meanings of hand and arm gestures, often resulting in pseudoscientific theories identifying specific body language as expressively indicating the dispositions of the human soul. The task of deciphering such nonverbal forms of communication, particularly in the visual arts, remains an important challenge.

Prehistoric handprints on cave walls at Gargas and Pech-Merle in France and at El Castillo in Spain imply the assertive gesture of the raised arm as a projection of human identity and also speak of the human desire to control the environment. The earliest representations of uplifted arms appear in Paleolithic rock engravings, the most notable of which is in the little cave of Addaura, near Palermo in Sicily. Drawn with unusual clarity and elegance, the engraving represents an assembly of human figures whose swaying movements seem to indicate the enactment of a ceremonial dance. As a natural accompaniment to their steps, these prehistoric dancers raise one or both arms in a rhythmic pace that works to suggest their shared ecstatic experience. A cave relief from an earlier period, the Venus of Laussel, raises her right hand to shoulder height and holds aloft a bison's horn. Here, the single raised arm effectively conveys the notion of strength, both by the vitality of the gesture and by the hand's firm grip on the horn, itself a potent symbol of fertility. From its very inception, then, the raised arm gesture functioned as both a mimetic vehicle for the expression of human action and a symbol of a deeper spiritual message. Several variants emerge, with distinct but often overlapping meanings that derive from the use of one or two arms.

One Arm Raised

In the Near East the raised right arm (less frequently the left) is principally a greeting gesture that can also signify homage or veneration when directed to a being of higher rank. This formal meaning of the gesture is often applicable in scenes on Sumerian and Akkadian seals that depict mortals in the presence of a deity. A famous monumental example, the Law Code of Hammurabi, portrays the Babylonian king standing before the sun god Shamash with his right arm raised, palm turned inward, in an attitude of respect (Frankfort, ill. 134). In Egyptian art the gesture characteristically appears with the palm facing outward and is more consistently confined to the right hand, in keeping with a widespread (but not universally shared) tendency to favor the right side and associate it with power and honor. A relief in the tomb of Seti I shows the pharaoh with his right hand raised to greet (or worship) the falcon god Horus (Lurker, p. 65). In Greek art the raised right hand also reinforces the spoken word of prayer. In literature the phrase "raising one's hand to the gods" (Aeschylus, Agamemnon) suggests the occasional use of the gesture as an acceptable alternative to the more conventional prayer with both arms raised.

Other important variants with a ritual significance include the ceremonial farewell to the dead. A gesture typical of male mourners in early Greek and Etruscan art (e.g., the Tomb of the Augurs) has the right arm raised over the brow and the palm flat atop the head. The gesture of aposkopēin, in which the right hand is raised to shield the eyes (presumably from the emanating radiance of the deity), is known from Minoan statuettes of worshipers and is used in later Greek art to suggest the act of witnessing, with gaze fixed in the distance, a god's imminent approach. A unique application of the aposkopēin in conjunction with a deity was the Colossus of Rhodes, the enormous bronze statue of the sun god Helios by Chares of Lindos that stood near the port of Rhodes. The god's right hand raised to the brow served as an eloquent attribute of his role as the ultimate embodiment of light. The same gesture recurs in the Christian theme of the Annunciation to the Shepherds in late Gothic painting. Taddeo Gaddi's version in Santa Croce in Florence, Italy, portrays one of the shepherds, startled by the angel's apparition, shielding his eyes in reaction to the overwhelming "glory of the Lord [that] shone round about them" (Luke 2:9).

When a divinity is depicted raising the right arm, the gesture is endowed with a prophylactic or apotropaic meaning. In Isaiah 62:8 Yahweh swears "by his right hand and by his mighty arm," and in Exodus 14:8 the fleeing Hebrews are under the protection of the Lord's "high hand." In Buddhist art of East Asia, some fully robed standing images of the Buddha display the right arm raised in the gesture of benevolence. Similarly in Homer, when Priam undertakes the hazardous mission to Achilles' tent to ransom his slain son Hector, Priam feels that a god is holding a hand over him (Iliad, 24.374). Beneath this magic protection of Hermes' outstretched right arm, the old king passes unseen through the enemy camp, safely reaching Achilles' tent. Other poetic references associate Zeus and Apollo with divine protection bestowed by the raised arm (Iliad, 4.249; 5.433). On the west pediment of the Temple of Zeus in Olympia, the figure of Apollo extends his right arm as a sign of protection or, perhaps, to signal victory for the human Lapiths engaged in battle against the centaurs. Gods of healing and childbearing are also represented with raised right hand: the Near Eastern goddess Gula, the patroness of physicians (sometimes shown with both arms raised); the Greek Eileithyiae, goddesses of childbirth; and the god Asclepius, who, according to Julian the Apostate, “stretched his saving hand out to the whole world.” Greek votive reliefs of the classical period show Asklepios curing a patient by extending toward him his healing hand.

On a more mundane and secular level, the raised right arm signifies greeting or signals verbal expression in dialogue situations, especially in classical Greek art (in lieu of the more lively gesticulation with both hands observed in conversation scenes of the archaic period). An important variant of the raised arm in speech is the rhetorical gesture, distinguished by the touching of the thumb and the index finger, leaving the other fingers extended. According to Quintilian, this gesture, when used by the orator, places stress on certain aspects of his speech and serves to stimulate the attention of the listener. Other applications of the raised right hand that mimic natural actions in human behavior include the pointing gesture and gestures of admonition, defense, refusal, and negation; the meaning is often conveyed through subtle placement of the fingers and a reliance on the viewer’s familiarity with the narrative.

The Romans, sensitized to the expressive power of gesture by a tradition of rhetorical training and their love of the theater, expanded the meaning of the raised arm in a political context. The outstretched right hand becomes in many cases the deliberate gesture of public address (adlocutio), identifying civilian or military leaders. A similar application can be found in scenes showing the Roman emperor’s arrival (adventus) on a horse, where his outstretched right arm proffers both greeting and reassuring authority. Literary parallels also can be found in the verses of the court poets Martial and Statius, who praise the emperor’s high right hand (alta manus dextra) or divine hand (divina manus), associating it with supernatural might. Late Roman art continues to identify the raised right arm with expressions of authority and magic power, especially within a new imperial iconography that increasingly stressed the divine nature of the ruler. From the third century A.D. onward, the raised right arm used as a sign of salvation in portrayals of certain Eastern deities, like the Syrian sun god (Sol Invictus) and the Egyptian Serapis, becomes fully adopted in the official images of the emperor.

The gesture also takes its place in early Christian iconography, notably in the Raising of Lazarus scenes from catacomb painting. In this New Testament theme, the power of salvation works through the sign of Jesus Christ’s outstretched right arm; the entrance of the tomb opens and Lazarus returns to life. In the fourth century, the raised right arm also becomes a sign of the blessing used by the clergy in most denominations of Christian worship. This gesture of benediction is characterized by the placement of the fingers: thumb, index, and middle finger are outstretched, while the two remaining (ring and little finger) are flexed against the palm of the hand (benedictio latina) or held with the little finger also raised (benedictio graeca).

In art, the gesture figures preeminently in portrayals of prophets, biblical kings, Christ Pantocrator, and the apostles. When Christ (more rarely a prophet or a church father) is holding a scroll or a codex in his left hand, the raised right hand takes on an added meaning, becoming a gesture of speech. In this juxtaposition, the scroll or codex signifies the written word of the Christian dogma, while the raised right hand signifies the voice of the spoken word of God, the divine Logos. Close parallels of this Christian gesture are found in the vitarkamudra and dharmachakramudra gestures of Buddhist art that also denote divine teaching.

Inspired by biblical narratives, artists of the Renaissance incorporate the raised arm gesture in a variety of symbolic ways. Leonardo da Vinci’s John the Baptist lifts his right hand and points a finger heavenward as a reminder that humans must ultimately confront divine judgment. In Leonardo’s painting of the Last Supper, Doubting Thomas’s raised hand and pointing finger serve to accentuate his questioning manner. On the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican, Michelangelo creates a number of meaningful juxtapositions of raised right and left arms. He portrays God the Father extending His right hand toward Adam, who languidly receives the gift of life through his outstretched left hand. The distinction in handedness here emphasizes God’s creative energy as opposed to the passive receptivity of the awakening man; in keeping with Christian theological notions, the right, the side of strength and virtue, is preferred over the less auspicious left, representing weakness and deceit. Michelangelo makes this association clear in the Fall of Man, where Eve takes with her left hand the apple that is offered up in the left hand of the snake (shown with a woman’s head and torso). In The Last Judgment, painted during the early years of the Counter-Reformation, a disquieted Christ raises his right arm in an ambiguous gesture that beckons the dead to rise as it holds out the terrible prospect of damnation. The Resurrection, by the Mannerist painter El Greco, reflects a calmer Christ whose raised hand affirms his divinity and emphasizes his weightless ascent above the Roman soldiers who writhe in tormented awe.

Subsequent use of the gesture in art elaborates on its implied meanings, often using the raised arm to express such polar opposites of human attitudes as wrath and love, greed and generosity, fear and bravery, vulnerability and strength, despair and joy. Jacques-Louis David employs the raised arm in The Oath of the Horatii to depict civic dedication, and again in The Death of Socrates to reinforce the condemned philosopher’s allegiance to his personal beliefs. In a nineteenth-century work by Henri Serrur, the hero Ajax, driven mad by the gods, raises his clenched fist in anger, while the victims of Théodore Géricault’s Raft of the Medusa lift their arms to signify the simultaneous moment of maximum anguish and hope. Eugène Delacroix’s painting The Bark of Dante shows the poet with arm raised, shielding his eyes from the glaring flames and horrors of hell. Auguste Rodin selects a similar gesture for one of the Burghers of Calais, not just as a means of drawing the viewer around the composition, but more importantly to suggest the fateful pathos of the figure’s bondage.

Modern references to the raised arm, often abstracted to stress form, inevitably rely on previous meanings applied to new metaphoric contexts, as in Max Ernst's The Elephant Celebes or Henri Matisse's Sorrows of the King. A drawing by Le Corbusier for a monumental sculpture intended to be placed between the High Court of Justice and the Governor's Palace in the capital of East Punjab, India, envisions a gigantic hand mounted on a tall wooden shaft. In the artist's words, "the open hand for giving, the open hand for receiving, ought to be chosen as a symbolic manifestation." In a similar manner, Rodin's earlier work The Hand of God acknowledges the gesture's rich iconographic tradition by presenting a hand and part of the forearm emerging from stone. Isolated and in the absence of any other details, the hand symbolizes the divine instrument of creative energy breaking through matter and brings the meaning of the gesture full circle to its primal, religious origin.

Both Arms Raised

The gesture of two raised arms constitutes the second category of iconographic meanings. In antiquity, the outstretched arms are primarily associated with prayer, reverence, and blessing. Mortals raise their hands to invoke divine powers, and the gods often reciprocate with similar gestures to dispense their favors or to indicate their epiphany. The practice of incorporating gestures of human prayer in the representation of the deity is common in the religious art of many ancient societies. Divinities with uplifted hands appear on Sumerian and Akkadian seals (Black and Green, ills. 7, 16, 73) and in the plastic arts and pottery of predynastic Egypt (Fazzini, et al., pl. 1, 2). The many arms of gods and goddesses in Hindu and Buddhist iconography, raised and carrying various symbols, denote divine power but also indicate the multiple natures and functions of these divinities. Images of Shiva Nataraja, the Cosmic Dancer, suggest the dualities present in the universe in terms of a complex pictorial allegory: the upper right hand holds the drum of creative rhythm, balanced by the flame of destruction in the upper left; his lower right hand performs the "fear not" gesture (abhayamudra) bestowing protection and peace, while the lower left pointing to the raised foot promises release from suffering (Zimmer, p. 152).

The association of the raised hands with divine power and protection is almost universal. The Egyptian goddess Nut, the personification of the vault of heaven, with arms extended upward, bends protectively over the Earth touching the western and eastern horizons. In Egyptian hieroglyphs, the sign of the raised arms stands for the ka, a principal aspect of the soul that, although lacking a clear definition, is generally believed to represent the individual's vital energy from which all life comes and to which all life returns after death. The funerary wooden statue of King Hor of the 12th dynasty in the Cairo Museum is shown with a rather sizable ka symbol atop the head (Michalowski, p. 380, ill. 330). Even when used separately, the signs of the arm and hand serve as determinatives for the words strong and protect. Here, too, the uplifted arms may have initially designated the protective divine spirit.

The gesture was adopted (possibly from Egypt) and invested with a similar meaning in effigies of the Minoan goddess. A faience statuette from Knossos of the Late Minoan period shows the goddess with arms uplifted, her hands tightly holding two snakes in a forceful display of her chthonic power. In two later examples, the bell-shaped goddesses from Gazi and Karphi, the raised arms rigidly bent at the elbows with hands turned inward (not unlike the Egyptian symbol for the ka) are schematically frozen into a ritual gesture of epiphany.

The gesture retains its importance in early Greece. In Homer, mortals entreat the gods by raising their hands, like the priest Chryses and Agamemnon (Iliad, 1.450; 3.275) or Odysseus (Odyssey, 20.97). Similarly, works of the Late Geometric and Orientalizing periods often represent worshipers in prayer (or, more rarely, divinities in their epiphany) with both arms uplifted. In classical Greece, prayer with both arms raised is sometimes mentioned in literature (Pindar, Nemean Ode, 5.11; Euripides, Hippolytos, 1190; Aristophanes, The Birds, 623; Callimachus, Hymnus in Delum, 107), but in the visual arts the gesture is not found again until the late fourth or early third century B.C. The bronze statue of a youth with uplifted arms (restored) in Berlin, known as the Praying Boy, which is sometimes mistaken for the Adorer by Boëdas cited in Pliny (Natural History, 34.73), most likely represents an athlete holding up a prize-wreath in his two hands. But Pliny also mentions examples of female adorers whose arms were presumably raised in the attitude of prayer (Natural History, 34.73; 78; 90). One such statue, probably early Hellenistic, is replicated in the so-called Livia in the Vatican and in other Roman variations in statuary and on coins of the early empire, sometimes identified by inscription as Pietas (Pietas).

This pagan iconographic type was adopted basically unchanged in early Christian art as the orant (orans), a male or female figure in frontal view with the arms raised at the height of the shoulders in pious supplication. In catacomb painting, the orant occurs primarily as an isolated image, but it may also be found in narrative scenes in conjunction with biblical characters noted for their faith and devotion to God (including Susanna, Daniel, and the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace). In isolation, the orant becomes the personification of Christian piety, often with exaggerated or oversized hands that give emphasis to the idea of prayerful entreaty, as seen in the Woman with a Veil in the Catacomb of Priscilla in Rome. Standing between two trees that suggest the Elysian fields, the same figure has an altered meaning; it now represents the human soul rejoicing in salvation or at rest in paradise. The orant is used with this meaning in portrayals of deceased persons, martyrs, and saints (e.g., the orant in the Catacomb of Domitilla; the saints of the mosaics of St. George in Thessaloniki; or orantes on Coptic funerary stelae), offering evidence of their piety, but also expressing their attained state of beatitude and the bliss of life eternal. For the early Christians, the appeal of this gesture depended perhaps on it being analogous to the figure of Jesus Christ on the cross—a hidden allusion to his Passion and Resurrection. Christ's triumph over death held the promise of life eternal for his followers.

The Virgin Mary also occasionally assumes the position of the orant in scenes of the Ascension (Rabbula Gospels, fol. 13v), where her presence (not historically justified) attests to her role in the Incarnation, adding credence to the dogma of the two natures of Christ, human and divine. During the Middle Byzantine period, the Virgin Orans also finds a favorite place in the apse of basilican churches, under the dominant image of Christ Pantocrator in the half-dome above (e.g., Cathedral of Cefalù in Sicily). In this position, facing the congregation from the upper tier behind the altar, Mary is at once the intercessor and paradigm of Christian prayer.

In much of ancient and medieval art the gesture of raised arms seems codified in repetitive symbolic images endowed with a formal semiotic value. Raised hands may also be found, however, in narrative contexts where their meaning is more a reflection of natural human behavior. Such narrative applications of the gesture range from the illustration of physical tasks that require objects to be held aloft, like the hurling of rocks or the brandishing of weapons in battle, to subtler characterizations that may reveal a mental attitude, mood, or feeling. It is this less tangible application that often calls for further interpretation, in a variety of situations.

Arms raised above the head with hands open or closed signify excitement and joy. In a marble statuette in the Cleveland Museum in Ohio showing Jonah's escape from the whale, Jonah emerges from the mouth of the beast with arms flung upward in prayerful joy for his deliverance from peril. As often observed in modern-day athletic competitions, the gesture can also signal a release from tension or indicate the surge of enthusiasm that follows the attainment of a long-awaited goal. An early example of this meaning of the gesture in pictorial narrative appears on the François Vase in Florence, Italy. The scene of Theseus's arrival at Delos after his ordeal with the Minotaur portrays an overjoyed sailor who, in anticipation of the ship's landing, exuberantly stretches both arms above his head.

Hands touching the head with arms bent at the elbows is a far more familiar ancient gesture found in Egyptian funerary painting, on Mycenaean sarcophagi, and on Greek Geometric vases. Originally a natural expression of grief, describing the wailing and tearing of the hair that were part of the cultic veneration of the dead, the gesture through repeated use grew into a convention of mourning. Such dramatic gestures of lamentation are atypical of classical Greek art, which introduced an iconography of calmer and more introspective gestures of mourning, creating a legacy that lasted well into the Middle Ages. Roman attitudes and the moral teachings of the church fathers that emphasized moderation in all spheres of life may also have helped to sustain this trend. There are only a few isolated Late Antique examples, like the scene of Dido's death in the Vatican Vergil, where the emphatic grieving gesture with hands raised atop the head is used to convey a mourner's uncontrolled grief.

Expressive poses incorporating raised arms become the hallmark of Late Gothic art, as its spiritual emotionalism coupled with an added focus on facial expression allowed for a freer exploration of human feelings. Italian painting of the trecento regularly uses exaggerated gesticulation as an empathetic device, especially in scenes of the Lamentation and Entombment (Barash, ills. 28–32; 48–49). The same attitude, even more pronounced, is typical of Baroque art, as its propensity for dramatic realism and open dynamic forms rekindled the interest in expressive gestures involving raised arms in both sculpture and painting. In Caravaggio's Entombment in the Vatican, the outflung arms of one of the Marys serve as the starting point of the falling diagonal of light that directs attention to the dead figure of Christ in the center; her uplifted gaze reflecting deep sorrow complements her grieving gesture.

In narrative contexts, other related meanings expressed by the impassioned raising of the arms include supplication, fear, despair, defiance, and martyrdom. A Roman fresco from Pompeii depicting the Sacrifice of Iphigenia shows the hapless daughter of Agamemnon with her arms raised in despair and supplication as she is being led away to the altar. Delacroix's Christ Asleep During the Tempest, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, juxtaposes the reassuring serenity of the sleeping Christ with the fear of his disciples that culminates in the anguished disciple standing with raised arms in the middle of the small boat. In Francisco Goya's The Third of May, 1808, which commemorates the execution of a group of Madrid citizens by French troops, one of the defenseless Spaniards appears with arms flung diagonally akin to a crucifix, a gesture that suggests both defiance and martyrdom.

Modern art has, for the most part, incorporated the traditional interpretations associated with raised arms, sometimes transposing the gesture to an abstract context that places greater emphasis on its acquired symbolism. Pablo Picasso, who often drew his inspiration from classical motifs, uses raised arms in Guernica to indicate the agonized death throes of a falling woman in the midst of destruction; in the Three Dancers he applies the schema of the raised arms to place the frozen balance of the central figure in sharp contrast with the gyrating movements and rhythmic buoyancy of the other two dancers. André Breton's thesis that "Beauty must be convulsive or cease to be" was repeatedly illustrated by the surrealist painters who adapted the raised arm gesture, sometimes using juxtapositions of disjointed human forms to create uneasy tensions or to convey an otherworldliness, as in much of Salvador Dalí's work. In Paul Delvaux's Venus Asleep figures raising their arms appear beside a reclining nude who is isolated in slumber; the haunting atmosphere of the scene aptly suggests the tense disquietude of a dream. Similarly, in his work The Hands, Delvaux's subjects raise their hands in mysterious sign gestures that express, in their inability to communicate, a characteristic alienation.

Italian sculptor Marino Marini in The Rider utilizes raised arms to create a dynamic axis that works to balance the rider's backward incline; the figure's apparently vain attempt to grab hold of something for support creates a visual metaphor that associates the gesture with the human struggle to maintain equilibrium, perhaps in the face of a modern industrialized world. Sometimes the precariousness of the human condition is eloquently expressed by the very absence of the familiar, as in the sculptural work Falling Man by Ernest Trova. His figures, devoid of arms, are rendered incapable of halting their plummet, a prospect that creates discomfort in the viewer because of the instinctive reliance on the arms and hands as essential, creative tools. Such twentieth-century images are the antithesis of da Vinci's Vitruvius Man, who firmly stands with raised arms pushing against the limitations of the circle that inscribes him, and, as the measure of all things, challenges the boundaries of his universe.

See also Devotion/Piety; Grieving/Lamentation; Pointing/Indicating

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Classical

- The Separation of Heaven and Earth*, in Papyrus of Nisi-Ta-Nebet-Taui, 1090–945 B.C., Cairo, Egypt, Egyptian National Museum
- Snake Goddess from Knossos*, faience statuette, late Minoan period, circa 1700–1550 B.C., Irakleia, Crete, Archeological Museum
- Minoan Goddesses from Gazi*, statuette, circa 1400–1200 B.C., Herakleion Museum, Crete
- Minoan Goddess from Karphi*, statuette, circa 1200–1000 B.C., Herakleion Museum, Crete
- Tomb of Augurs*, wall painting, circa 540–530 B.C., Tarquinia, Italy, Necropolis of the Monterozzi
- Tomb of the Baron*, wall painting, circa 510 B.C., Tarquinia, Italy, Necropolis of the Monterozzi
- Aulus Metellus* (“The Orator”), bronze statue, circa 100 B.C., Florence, Italy, Museo Archeologico
- Augustus from Prima Porta*, marble statue, A.D. 14–29, Rome, Vatican Museums
- Trajan’s Column* (details with “Adlocutio” scenes), A.D. 110–113, Rome
- Marcus Aurelius’s Equestrian Statue*, A.D. 166–180, Rome, Capitoline Museum
- Adventus*, relief from monument of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 180–190, Attic Storey, Rome, Arch of Constantine

Early Christian

- Orant Flanked by Trees*, marble sarcophagus, early third century, Rome, Museo Torlonia
- Raising of Lazarus*, fresco, early third century, Rome, catacomb of Callistus, Sacrament Chapel
- Orant (Donna Velata)*, fresco, mid-third century, Rome, Catacomb of Priscilla, cubiculum of the “Velatio”
- The Three Children in the Fiery Furnace*, fresco, mid-third century, Rome, catacomb of Priscilla, cubiculum of the “Velatio”
- Christian Sarcophagus with Orant*, third century, Rome, Sta Maria Antigua
- Veneranda Led into Heaven by Saint Petronilla*, fresco, mid-fourth century, Rome, catacomb of Domitilla, tomb of Veneranda
- Daniel in the Lions Den*, fresco, fourth century, Rome, catacomb of the Via Latina, cubiculum

Asian

- Standing Buddha*, gilt bronze, seventh century, Paekche Kingdom, Korea, Tokyo M. Nitta Collection
- Crowned Buddha from India*, stone relief, circa eleventh century, San Francisco, California, Asian Art Museum of San Francisco, Avery Brundage Collection

- Standing Buddha*, gilt bronze, fourteenth century, Yuan dynasty, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of the Arts
- Shiva, Lord of the Dance*, bronze statue, circa twelfth–fourteenth century, South India
- Vasudhara, Goddess of Abundance*, gilt bronze from Nepal, sixteenth century, private collection

Medieval and Renaissance

- Umbrian Master, Lamentation, tempera on panel, late thirteenth century, Perugia, Italy
- Giotto, The Apparition of Saint Francis at Arles, fresco, circa 1269–1300, Assisi, Italy, San Francesco
- Giotto, The Raising of Lazarus, fresco, 1303–1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
- Gaddi, Taddeo, Annunciation to the Shepherds, fresco, circa 1328, Florence, Italy, Santa Croce, Baroncelli Chapel
- Donatello, Entombment, bronze relief of high altar, circa 1445–1447, Padua, Italy, San Antonio
- Leonardo da Vinci, Study of Human Proportions According to Vitruvius, pen and ink drawing, 1485–1490, Venice, Italy, Accademia
- Leonardo da Vinci, Saint John the Baptist, oil on panel, circa 1513–1516, Paris, Louvre
- Leonardo da Vinci, Last Supper, oil-tempera mixture on wall, 1495–1497, Milan, Sta Maria delle Grazie, Refectory
- Michelangelo, The Creation of Man, ceiling fresco, circa 1511, Rome, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
- Michelangelo, Last Judgment, fresco, 1536–1540, Rome, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

- El Greco, The Resurrection, oil on canvas, 1600–1605, Madrid, Prado
- Caravaggio, Entombment of Christ, oil on canvas, 1603–1604, Rome, Vatican Museum
- Goya, Francisco, Execution of the Madrileños on the Third of May, 1808, oil on canvas, 1814, Madrid, Prado
- David, Jacques-Louis, The Oath of the Horatii, oil on canvas, 1784, Paris, Louvre
- David, Jacques-Louis, Death of Socrates, oil on canvas, 1787, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Nineteenth Century

- Serrur, Henri, Ajax, oil on canvas, 1820, Lille, Musée des Beaux Arts
- Delacroix, Eugène, The Bark of Dante, oil on canvas, 1822, Paris, Louvre
- Delacroix, Eugène, Christ Asleep During the Tempest, oil on canvas, 1854, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Géricault, Théodore, The Raft of the Medusa, oil on canvas, 1818–1819, Paris, Louvre
- Rodin, Auguste, Burghers of Calais, bronze, 1886, Washington, D.C., Smithsonian Institution, Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden

Twentieth Century

- Rodin, Auguste, The Hand of God, marble, 1906, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Ernst, Max, The Elephant Celebes, oil on canvas, 1921, London, private collection
- Picasso, Pablo, Three Dancers, oil on canvas, 1925, London, Tate Gallery
- Picasso, Pablo, Guernica, oil on canvas, 1935, Madrid, Reina Sofía
- Dalí, Salvador, Soft Construction with Boiled Beans: Premonition of Civil War, oil on canvas, 1936, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
- Matisse, Henri, The Sorrows of the King, gouache on papier-découpé, 1951, Paris, Musée National d'Art Moderne
- Marini, Marino, Rider, painted wood, 1951, Otterlo, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Kröller-Müller
- Le Corbusier, The Open Hand, sketch for monument for Chandigarh, East Punjab, India
- Trova, Ernest, Falling Man, chrome-plated bronze, 1964, New York, Whitney Museum of Art

Further Reading

- Barash, Moshe, Gestures of Despair in Medieval and Early Renaissance Art, New York: New York University Press, 1976
- Black, Jeremy A., and Anthony Green, Gods, Demons and Symbols of Ancient Mesopotamia: An Illustrated Dictionary, Austin: University of Texas, 1992; London: British Museum Press, 1992
- Cole, Bruce, Giotto and Florentine Painting 1280–1375, New York: Harper, 1976
- Demargne, Pierre, The Birth of Greek Art, New York: Golden Press, 1964
- Fazzini, Richard, Ancient Egyptian Art in the Brooklyn Museum, Brooklyn, New York: Brooklyn Museum; London: Thames and Hudson, 1989
- Frankfort, Henri, The Art and Architecture of the Ancient Orient, Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1970; New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1970
- Giedion, Sigfried, The Eternal Present: The Beginnings of Art: A Contribution on Constancy and Change, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1962
- Grabar, Andre, Early Christian Art from the Rise of Christianity to the Death of Theodosius, New York: Odyssey Press, 1968
- Haskell, Francis, History and its Images: Art and the Interpretation of the Past, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1993
- Langdon, S., "Gesture in Sumerian and Babylonian Prayer," Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (1919)
- Lurker, Manfred, The Gods and Symbols of Ancient Egypt: An Illustrated Dictionary, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1980
- L'Orange, Hans Peter, Studies in the Iconography of Cosmic Kingship in the Ancient World, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1953
- Michalowski, K., Art of Ancient Egypt, New York: Abrams, 1969; London: Thames and Hudson, 1969
- Zimmer, Heinrich Robert, Myths and Symbols of Indian Art and Civilization, New York: Pantheon, 1946

ARTISTS/ART

Julie F. Codell

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Artists/Art:

RENAISSANCE

NINETEENTH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Judith Leyster, Self-Portrait, circa 1630, oil on canvas, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, gift of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss. (Courtesy of the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.)

Interest in the status and personalities of artists and the role of art can be traced to antiquity. Although no works by Apelles, whose patron was Alexander the Great, survive, his name has come down in literature as the consummate painter, and he inspired Italian Renaissance artists. Another Greek painter, Zeuxis, was famous for his extraordinary realism, while Parrhasius and Apollodorus also have been remembered as esteemed painters who enjoyed fame and wealth in their own day. Works by ancient sculptors and architects, such as Phidias and Polyclethus, have survived, as have their writings on art. When considering the reputations and iconographies of artists, it is necessary to remember that painters, sculptors, architects, and craftsmen were considered separately; from antiquity through the Renaissance sculptors were aligned with manual laborers, while painters and architects were more likely to be elevated because of their knowledge of mathematics, perspective, mythology, and biblical texts. While Greek and medieval artists occasionally signed their works, their social status rarely rose above that of a workman. The mid-sixth-century B.C. architect and sculptor Theodoros of Samos created a bronze self-portrait and wrote an architectural treatise. Artists began writing on art during the fifth century B.C. Painting was taught as part of a liberal education. Pliny, who wrote in the middle of the first century A.D., praised Pamphilus, Apelles' teacher, as learned. At the end of the fourth century historian Duris of Samos wrote anecdotal books on the lives of painters and sculptors.

Yet, there seems to have been little public interest in artists as personalities. Painters had a higher status than sculptors, but generally the association with technical rather than conceptual knowledge marked the low status of artists, who sometimes ranked only slightly higher than slaves. Although he was the son of a sculptor, Socrates ranked artists as lowly, as did Plato and Aristotle, who praised musicians and poets but held artists in low esteem as mere imitators of the physical world. During the Hellenistic period contemporary with Aristotle, there was an increased interest in artists, art theory, and collecting, resulting in a lively art market. Art was taught in the schools, and Aristotle agreed this was appropriate. Alexander, once a pupil of Aristotle's, appointed Apelles court painter. By the late classical period, when the Stoic philosophers turned to subjectivity, writers praised works of art as important achievements. Nevertheless, works of art were often held in higher esteem than their creators, a situation described by Seneca, Plutarch, and Lucian.

In ancient Rome the visual arts were never included in a formal education, and during the Middle Ages the liberal arts, which made up the educational foundation of the period, disregarded the visual arts. Throughout the Middle Ages artists were considered artisans and were usually anonymous. By the twelfth century some interest in artists appeared, as in Dante's references to Cimabue and Giotto, reflecting the improved status of artists in Florence. Italian architects began to sign their works as early as the eleventh century. The rise of artists seems to have been an Italian phenomenon at first; northern European artists' status lagged behind. Painters' guilds began in Italy in the thirteenth century. Guilds regulated behavior, education, and production, and lumped artists variously with craftsmen (e.g., painters and druggists were in the same guild because they both ground chemicals). The elevated status of Renaissance artists was achieved after centuries of struggles by artists against the power and supervision of the guilds, exemplified by Filippo Brunelleschi, who refused to pay his guild dues and won his case against the guild. This struggle over the freedom of artists to work without restrictions, either economic or geographic, led in the sixteenth century to the establishment of artists' academies, which replaced the guilds and elevated artists from manual laborers to free intellectuals (Wittkower, pp. 2–9).

Although lives of the artists were the subject of literature before Giorgio Vasari (e.g., Filippo Villani, Antonio Billi, Antonio Magliabechian, Battista Gelli), his Lives of the Most Eminent Painters and Sculptors (1550) was the most inclusive and complete and became a model for later biographies in Italy and in northern Europe. Other important Renaissance treatises on art that served to elevate artists' status included Cennino Cennini's Il libro dell'arte (1437) and Leon Battista Alberti's De pictura (1435). Artists appear in the works of Dante and Boccaccio, often as humorous figures in the latter. With the appearance of artists in literature and in their own writings on theory, they emerge as subjects of art itself. Along with the artist as the subject of art, art-making and the nature of creativity also become subjects of art, literature, and philosophy.

The depiction of artists, whether by themselves or by other artists, has generally taken two courses, one related to the self-portrait to record or memorialize the individual subject, the other a representation of artists as a class. Lorenzo Ghiberti's possible self-portrait in his elaborate East Doors of the Baptistery of San Giovanni (circa 1435) or Michelangelo's depiction of his own face on St. Bartholomew's flayed skin in the Last Judgment (1534–1541) of the Sistine Chapel are examples of both. The first artist known to write an autobiography, I Commentari, Ghiberti reflects his own self-consciousness in his self-portrait. While Michelangelo's is a self-portrait, too, it also represents the artist as a saintly martyr, commenting caustically on his difficult relations with his papal patrons and perhaps more broadly on the subordination of artist to patron in post-Reformation Rome.

During the Renaissance the social and civic roles of artists became tied to their relations to wealthy patrons with social ambitions, as well as to their own increased education and assertiveness. Vasari mythologized Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo as charismatic prodigies with magical powers of draftsmanship and expressed the notion of the artist as genius, a marked distinction from the medieval notion of the artist as craftsman. Vasari's biographies are filled with anecdotal descriptions of artists' personality quirks. The spreading of these attitudes from Italy to northern Europe is represented by Albrecht Dürer's Self-Portrait of 1500, which depicts the artist as resembling a traditional icon of Christ. For Dürer, art was a matter of individual genius, and the artist resembled a divine creator (a theory articulated by Leonardo).

Not surprisingly, during the Renaissance artists became the subjects of paintings, and through the nineteenth century Renaissance artists symbolized art itself. The first painter depicted at work was St. Luke, who became the patron saint of painters' guilds. Many depictions of him painting the Virgin and Child were produced during and after the Middle Ages, and artists such as Rogier van der Weyden portrayed St. Luke at work. Famous artists are commemorated in frescoes attributed to Paolo Uccello in the fourteenth century and to Francesco Salviati in the sixteenth century, as well as in the popular multiple portraits of great artists of the past produced in the nineteenth century. Many nineteenth-century paintings depicting Raphael, Michelangelo, and Leonardo use these artists as symbols of art (e.g., Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres's Raphael and Fornarina, 1814, and J. M. W. Turner's Canaletto Painting Venice, 1833) and to elevate the status of artists by association (Levey, pp. 31–41). Artists such as William Hogarth in Hogarth's Studio, by E. M. Ward (1863), and Giovanni Antonio Guardi in Guardi Selling his Pictures on the Piazza, by Giovanni Bertini, represent nationalistic ambitions in art (Levey, pp. 40–60), in addition to efforts to achieve elevation and fame. Early portrayals of artists in their studios include Jan Vermeer's A Painter at Work (circa 1665), in which the painter sits with his back to the viewer, facing the model who is posed as a muse. Transforming an ordinary model into the muse, the artist creates allegories and symbols and elevates nature.

In the Renaissance the role of the artist emerged as a topic of interest, and some artists, such as Giotto, Titian, and Peter Paul Rubens (who was also a diplomat), were highly respected and economically well-off. However, the gradual decrease in church and state patronage, appearing first in the Netherlands in the seventeenth century and more rapidly throughout Western Europe in the nineteenth century, forced artists and the public to consider the new role of art and artist in a free market. Economic uncertainty and fragile social status were expressed in many artists' self-representations during and after the seventeenth century. Rembrandt van Rijn's numerous self-portraits present a remarkable sequence. They record his aging from his ostentatious youth to his philosophical maturity, as in his Self-Portrait of 1658, depicting the harsh realities and fragility of his life during a series of economic successes and failures caused by speculative market conditions and the highly competitive art market in seventeenth-century Holland.

Parmigianino's Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (1524) expresses the Mannerist play and distortion of Renaissance centrality and geometric order, evoking a new artistic psychological detachment and ironic wit while focusing on the artist's hands and face, as if to represent the struggle between the notions of artist as genius and as craftsman. In France, Nicolas Poussin's Self-Portrait (1650) presents a poised, gentlemanly, well-dressed, serious, and prolific artist amid his many canvases, a presentation designed to appeal to the rising Protestant middle-class patrons he served by alluding to the artist's diligence and to the act of collecting. His self-portrait amid his other paintings presents him as artist, connoisseur, collector, arbiter of taste, and man of erudition. Diego Velázquez, in Las Meninas (1656), depicts himself in the act of painting the royal family in the palace, in an attempt to present himself as a member, not only of the royal entourage, but also of the prestigious Order of Santiago, an aristocratic order whose membership would have recognized the elevated status of painters, but which Velázquez did not receive until near the end of his life. Francisco Goya also depicted himself in the act of painting the royal family in Charles IV and the Royal Family (1800), alluding to Velázquez's painting and to his own role as court painter to a monarchy about which he felt ambiguous and from which he dissented politically.

In England, Joshua Reynolds's self-portraits include one, painted around 1773, in doctoral robes, intended to present him as academic, literate, and aristocratic. His Rembrandtesque self-portrait presents him as the heir of the great master. Other examples of the representation of the artist with social and economic status include Thomas Gainsborough's rather arrogant self-portrait and his 1751 portrait of himself with his wife and child, painted in the family portrait style in which he depicted his aristocratic patrons' families grouped on their property. Hogarth's humorous conceit Self-Portrait with Pug (1745) is a portrait within a portrait and an allegory about painting's dual realistic and symbolic portrayal of people and objects. The painting's inclusion of books by William Shakespeare, Jonathan Swift, and John Milton intimate that the painter is part of the great British literary tradition, a longer, more acceptable tradition in England than that of painting, which had been mostly supplied by foreign artists. Indeed, throughout the nineteenth century Hogarth was considered the father of British painting, the first to restore painting to a higher status as a profession than it had enjoyed in England before him and the first to articulate an anticlassical British aesthetic in his book The Analysis of Beauty (1753), in which the beauty of line and form is synthesized with a moral purpose and contemporary subject matter.

During the romantic period writers and later artists began to articulate a compensatory spiritual superiority to counterbalance their increasingly precarious position in a speculative market. While Samuel Taylor Coleridge argued that artists were compensated by a higher spirituality as "the unacknowledged legislators of the world," many artists presented themselves as depressed or socially defiant in response to the loss of aristocratic and state patronage and the necessity of serving an anonymous public often uneducated in matters of art and taste. Hector Berlioz in his Symphonie Fantastique and Eugène

Delacroix in his Journals (covering the years 1822–1863) represent the artist as struggling to find a new social status and experiencing dichotomous moods of elation and depression. Gustave Courbet's self-portraits include his dandyish Self-Portrait with the Black Dog (1842), which may refer to Hogarth's painting, and The Man with the Pipe (circa 1845), depicting a disheveled bohemian artist. His life-size The Painter's Studio: A Real Allegory Summing Up Seven Years as an Artist (1854–1855) is a remarkable example of the complexities of artistic production in a free market. Portraying himself painting a landscape, a genre that proved lucrative for him, and seated beside a standing nude model/muse and a small country boy, the artist mediates between his friends and patrons on the right side of the canvas and the downtrodden social outcasts on the left side, references to Courbet's socialist views and to the marginalized groups to which many bohemian artists belonged in nineteenth-century France. Courbet depicts himself self-aggrandized in a realistic allegory in which the artist is the center, the linchpin of society, between the classes.

Frederick Leighton's immensely popular Cimabue's Madonna Carried in Procession Through the Streets of Florence (1855) is a Victorian tribute to the civic role and social status of artists in the Renaissance, an ambition much admired and envied by Victorian painters who goaded the monarchy and Parliament to support the arts on a comparable scale. Queen Victoria (who bought Leighton's painting) and Prince Albert did a great deal to promote the visual arts and crafts. The Pre-Raphaelites also contributed toward transferring romantic notions about the poet to the painter. Their portraits include William Holman Hunt's compelling, melancholic, dreamy-eyed portrait of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, which may allude to popular interest in mesmerism or hypnotism; Hunt's series of self-portraits, one at 34 in 1841, looking rather boyish, and another in 1845; George Frederic Watts's portrait of Rossetti; John Everett Millais's portrait of Ford Madox Brown reading, rather than painting; and Rossetti's own self-portrait of himself sitting for Elizabeth Siddal (1853). Also commenting on literature as a model for the artist are Ford Madox Brown's Byron's Dream (1874) and Chaucer at the Court of Edward III (1845–1851). Brown's The Last of England (1855), depicting the emigration of the Pre-Raphaelite sculptor Thomas Woolner, who is unable to make a living in his homeland, reflects the plight of the Victorian artist. Rossetti's many paintings of the life of Dante, such as Dante's Dream (1856) and Dante at the First Anniversary of Beatrice's Death, model Dante as the archetypal artist. Millais's Sir Isumbras at the Ford (1856–1857) uses the medieval knight as a symbol of the artist. Millais's Lorenzo and Isabella (1848–1849), based on a poem by John Keats that is in turn based on a story from Boccaccio, is an elaborate symbol of the artist's social and economic dilemmas set in the Renaissance, a period of great importance to Victorian artists. Other possible veiled representations of the artist appear in Hunt's depictions of Jesus Christ, as in The Light of the World (1855–1856) and The Scapegoat.

Artists sometimes substituted their own self-images for those of heroes, as in Benjamin Robert Haydon's Curtius Leaping the Gulf (1842), in which the artist represents himself as the hero martyr. William Dyce portrayed an imaginary moment in the boyhood of Titian in Titian's First Essay in Colour (1856–1857) to connect artistic genius with religious inspiration: the artist as mediator between divine inspiration and nature. In Millais's Self-Portrait the artist holds his palette and strikes a statesmanlike pose with a dignified gaze and dress. By the end of the century Aubrey Beardsley portrayed himself as a devotee of Pan, with pointed ears and tied to a statue of Pan. These examples reflect changes in the images of the artist in the nineteenth century, when they could be presented as heroic, spiritual, rebellious, or as bourgeois gentlemen. In literature artists were popular subjects, variously portrayed as supernatural, doomed by their position outside society, reckless and bohemian, usually poor, innocent or pure of heart, sensuous, the object of female desire, and generally resistant to domestication.

One classical myth popularly portrayed in nineteenth-century painting was the story of Pygmalion, the sculptor whose female nude came to life. Exemplified in Jean-Léon Gérôme's Pygmalion and Galatea (1890), the story in its nineteenth-century version reflects the changing role of the artist—from the civic one described by Joshua Reynolds and dominant from the Renaissance to the eighteenth century to the private one of the masculinized, eroticized, romantic bohemian whose studio was less a public educational space (e.g., workshop or atelier) than a private fantasy world. Edward Coley Burne-Jones produced a series of Pygmalion paintings: The Heart Desires, The Godhead Fires, The Hand Refrains, and The Soul Attains (1868–1870). The theme is again recalled in his painting King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid (1884). In Burne-Jones's depictions the tension between the artist's devotion to his art and to his beloved is resolved when the sculpted female image, both art and woman, becomes the object of his desire.

Other myths resurrected to represent artists in the nineteenth century were those of the semidivine figures of Prometheus, stealer of fire, and Hephaestus, the divine blacksmith (Jeffares, pp. 100–101). In the Promethean myth the protagonist defies the gods and is punished for his rebellious act. Prometheus was also identified as having created human beings out of clay. Many fictional artists were represented as doomed for their rebelliousness. The Hephaestus myth—the lame blacksmith created two golden female statues to help him walk—is transformed into artists with some physical deformity, such as the fictional artists in George Eliot's novel Mill on the Floss (1860), William Makepeace Thackeray's The Newcomes (1853–1855), and Theodore Watts-Dunton's Aylwin (1898).

Fictional women artists also provided comments on the role of gender in artistic production. Women artists appear in Charlotte Brontë's novel Jane Eyre (1847), in which Jane herself demonstrates artistic talent, Anne Brontë's The Tenant of Wildfell Hall (1848), Margaret Oliphant's The Three Brothers (1870), and Virginia Woolf's To the Lighthouse (1927), in which the character Lily Briscoe may be modeled on her artist sister Vanessa Bell. Artemisia Gentileschi's active portrayal of herself in the 1630s in Self-Portrait as "La Pittura," slightly disheveled and actively painting, combines realism and allegory. In this synthesis, later taken up by Courbet and Hogarth, the artist is both a portrayer of reality and responsible for heightening that reality by transforming it into something symbolic or spiritual. Gentileschi's painting comments on her work, rather than her physical appearance, and also discharges the suspicion that women artists were less capable or skillful than men. Judith Leyster's Self-Portrait reproduces one of her paintings within the painting, again to demonstrate her role as artist rather than as woman. Marie-Louise-Elisabeth Vigée-Lebrun's Madame Vigée-Lebrun and Child, painted in the 1780s, with both figures in classical dress, indicates her status as a fashionable painter for Marie Antoinette and emphasizes her beauty, for which she was well-known. Adélaïde Labille-Guiard's Portrait of the Artist with Two Pupils, Mlle Marie Gabrielle Capet and Mlle Carreaux de Rosemond (1785) depicts the artist in her studio, with its classical busts, with some of her pupils to signify a woman as a master of a workshop or atelier, positioned within the great artistic tradition that she has received and is passing to other women. Angelica Kauffmann's The Artist in the Character of Design Listening to the Inspiration of Poetry (1782) allegorizes the artist into a symbol of principles of design and depicts the notion of ut pictura poesis, by which painters argued that, like its sister art poetry, painting was elevated by subjects profoundly literary or historical, justifying the claim that artists should have the same status and respect accorded to poets, as Renaissance artists had argued. Paula Modersohn-Becker's series of self-portraits during her pregnancy represent her fertility; her creativity as artist and as woman intersect in the Self-Portrait (1906). Gwen John's self-portraits, such as her Self-Portrait (1900–1903) in the National Portrait Gallery in London, present the artist as defiant, with her arms akimbo. Her assertive Self-Portrait in a Red Blouse (1900) represents a confident artist who was in reality independent and equally unconventional in her art and in her life.

The popular image of the artist has been that of a bohemian, socially distant, even hostile, a cynical figure, usually masculinized and avant-garde. While in times past artists, especially academic artists, portrayed themselves as respectable middle-class family men, most modern representations of the artist's body have emphasized rebelliousness, an antisocial stance, and an alienation considered fundamental to artistic creativity. Artists' portraits of each other, broadly interpreted, express diverse attitudes toward artists competing for attention in the nineteenth century. The contrast between Ingres's drawing of a poised, aristocratic, and well dressed Niccolò Paganini in 1824, with his violin tucked under his arm and under his control, and Delacroix's portrait of Paganini in performance in 1836, eyes closed and body swaying, transcendental and removed from material reality, represents the difference between a neoclassical notion of the artist as civic and aristocratic or gentlemanly and the romantic model of the artist as spiritually superior to others, introspective, outside social norms, and transcendent in relation to the material world.

Among the modernists, the private alienated artist has been widely represented. Vincent van Gogh's Self-Portrait with Bandaged Ear (1889) represents perhaps the most anguished expression of the suffering artist whose vision remained unaccepted. Van Gogh did several self-portraits at the end of his life, portraying himself as intense and troubled in striking green and orange colors. Paul Gauguin's Self-Portrait with Yellow Christ (1889–1890) represents the artist between two of his works, a Crucifixion and a ceramic tobacco jar alluding to Gauguin's smoking habit and his work in clay. Here the artist is represented as divided between his spiritual and his material or even bestial self. Gauguin also represents himself as the suffering, struggling artist in the tradition of Albrecht Dürer and Michelangelo.

At the end of the nineteenth century, modernist artists were categorized among the insane and criminal. In the last two decades of the nineteenth century the Italian criminologist and physician Cesare Lombroso and his German disciple Max Nordau argued that modern artists were mad, their impressionist and postimpressionist styles "proving" the dissolution of civilization. Modern artists have inherited the romantic notion of the artist along with this turn-of-the-century argument that madness and artistic creativity were interrelated. These ideas were further mixed with artists' own realization that modern capitalism has little room for art and the modern state little patience for artistic rebellion. Modern alienation and marginalization are the products of both the romantic psychology of creativity and the popular psychoanalytical theories of Sigmund Freud, who was very interested in artistic creativity and wrote a treatise on the psychosexual sources of Leonardo da Vinci's Virgin and Anne. The German Expressionists painted many self-portraits laden with the psychology of alienation. Ernst Kirchner's Modern Bohemia (1924) depicts a European art world between the world wars in which the studio, filled with artists, models, books, flowers, and art objects, is nevertheless a lonely place where artists are isolated, escaping the claustrophobia by remaining isolated from one another, lost in their individual dreams. Marcel Duchamp's self-portrait Rose Selavy, in which he appears in drag, is a unique representation of the artist—disguised, sexually ambiguous, unredeemed by spiritual superiority, leveled by association with street life and popular slang. Duchamp undercuts centuries of debate over the artist's status, intellect, and masculinity in one stroke. Stanley Spencer's highly agitated and realistic portraits, such as his Self-Portrait of 1959 with wrinkles and a distressed expression, recall the aging Rembrandt; instead of philosophical stoicism and wisdom, however, Spencer's self-images are anxious and troubled. Such modern self-representations seem premised on the popular concept of artists as psychically troubled in the belief that such a troubled state was a precondition of creativity.

Throughout her life Käthe Kollwitz executed many self-portraits in charcoal, etching, lithography, and bronze. Her bronze Self-Portrait of 1936 represents a mature, wise, stoic image in the tradition of Rembrandt's late self-portraits. Leonora Carrington's Self-Portrait (1936–1937), which presents her in a surreal home with flying horses, is as much a statement about surrealism and its foundations in psychoanalysis as it is a self-portrait. Here the artist is identified with a style that seems to be her personality, emphasizing the idea that style is a personal expression, rather than a broad, culturally shared language.

Frida Kahlo's many self-portraits generally portray her as thwarted mother, sometimes as artist. In her Portrait of Frida and Diego (1931), Kahlo's husband Diego Rivera has the palette and she stands hanging on his arm, the demure wife; however, a banner over her head, an allusion to medieval allegorical paintings, cites her as the painter of portraits. Kahlo's portraits convey the difficulties of establishing a professional role for women artists, and, like Carrington, her self-portraits almost always allude to domestic life or settings as well as to style, in her case to Mexican folk art. Kahlo, like so many modern artists, takes on a role as a "primitive," a modern posture disguising the artist's legacy from civilization, in opposition to Renaissance artists, who portrayed themselves as inheritors of classical tradition embodying a high level of education and civilization. Modern artists generally prefer to portray themselves as rejecting civilization for a primitive or primordial state (e.g., Kahlo and Mexican folk art or Gauguin in Tahiti), reflected also in the inspiration many artists draw from non-Western art and cultures.

Pablo Picasso's series of himself at work with a nude model comments on the combined matrix of genius and masculine sexuality. In his drawings of himself drawing, Picasso depicts himself sometimes as a monkey, sometimes a Minotaur; for him the act of drawing was itself inscribed by sexual prowess (e.g., Dans l'Atelier, 1954) and a sign of that prowess.

Artists' portraits of other artists are also indicative of social attitudes toward artists, as well as of their interpersonal relationships. Anna Klumpke's Portrait of Rosa Bonheur (1898) shows the artist in her studio interrupted by the viewer while she is painting horses, her most famous subject. Despite her white hair, her eyes are alert and her gaze dignified and masterful, expressing the authority and success of a woman artist. Juan Gris's Portrait of Picasso (1912) is more an homage to Picasso as the founder of Cubism than a general statement about artists as a class. Alice Neel's striking Portrait of Andy Warhol (1970), presenting him nude from the waist up after his recovery from surgery following a shooting, depicts him as an aging, sagging, and vulnerable artist, contrary to his buoyant public persona.

Many artists have portrayed the theme of painting and sculpture allegorically. The figure used to represent painting or sculpture is usually, although not always, that of a female wielding the pencil, brush, or chisel. The allegorical paintings of Artemisia Gentileschi, William Hogarth, and Gustave Courbet have already been mentioned. To this list may be added Andrea Pisano, Frans van Mieris the Elder, François Boucher, Rosalba Carriera, and a host of others. Angelica Kauffmann's paintings of Painting (Colouring), Genius (Invention), Composition, and Design, all figures of women, decorate the ceiling of the Royal Academy of Arts in London.

In eighteenth-century literature the artist became a prominent character and sometimes hero/heroine in a fictional genre called the kunstlerroman. The most well-known example is Henry Murger's Scènes de la vie de Bohème (1851), from which other novels and operas were derived. The artist is often depicted as a bohemian, although sometimes only mildly or humorously so, as in George Du Maurier's Trilby (1894) or William Makepeace Thackeray's The Newcomes (1853–1855). Henry James's Roderick Hudson (1875) is about a sculptor. Other major writers who wrote about artists include Charles Dickens, George Eliot, Virginia Woolf, Wilkie Collins, George Gissing, Thomas Hardy, Rudyard Kipling, George Moore, Sir Walter Scott, Anthony Trollope, and Émile Zola. Poet Robert Browning created imaginary dramatic monologues spoken by Renaissance artists such as Fra Filippo Lippi and Andrea del Sarto in which they express the difficulties and pleasures of painting. In Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891) the artwork possesses a supernatural power, a popular theme in Gothic literature of the eighteenth century. In the nineteenth century artists were depicted first sympathetically as romanticized rebels and bohemians, later as foppish aesthetes and decadents, and finally as alienated or humorous as in Joyce Cary's The Horse's Mouth (1944). In James Joyce's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1914), in which artist refers to a broad category, the artist's development is seen as a troubled alienation from home and country, a kind of exile as payment for artistic freedom in a modern rootless world, not unlike the peripatetic lifestyles of many modern artists and writers, including Joyce. In Virginia Woolf's Orlando (1928) the artist moves across time, reflecting the role of history in artistic self-consciousness, and is embodied in both genders over time. Representations of artists also occur in popular literature and film, including films made from novels, such as The Horse's Mouth; The Agony and the Ecstasy, from Irving Stone's novel about Michelangelo; Moulin Rouge, about the life of Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec; and Lust for Life, about the life of Vincent van Gogh. Films also have portrayed the lives of Frida Kahlo and the sculptor Camille Claudel, contemporary and partner of Auguste Rodin. Most of these films emphasize the artist as sufferer, outsider, tortured soul, and renegade.

See also Fame; Labor/Trades/Occupations; Imagination/Creativity; Self-Portraits I: Men; Self-Portraits II: Women

Selected Works of Art

Renaissance

- Pisano, Andrea, The Art of Painting; The Art of Sculpture; The Art of Sculpture, marble sculpture reliefs, circa 1334–1348, Florence, Italy, Campanile
- Ghiberti, Lorenzo, Baptistry Doors, bronze sculpture, 1435, Florence, Italy, Baptistry
- Dürer, Albrecht, Self-Portrait, 1493, Paris, Louvre
- Parmigianino, Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror, painting, 1524, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Michelangelo, Last Judgment, 1534–1541, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Seventeenth Century

- Gentileschi, Artemisia, Self-Portrait as 'La Pittura', 1630s, London, collection of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II
- Leyster, Judith, Self-Portrait, circa 1630, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Poussin, Claude, Self-Portrait, 1650, Paris, Louvre
- Velázquez, Diego, Las Meninas, 1656, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait, 1658, New York, Frick Collection
- Mieris, Frans the Elder, Pictura (An Allegory of Painting), oil on copper, 1661, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum

Eighteenth Century

- Hogarth, William, Self-Portrait with Pug, 1745, London, Tate Gallery
- Boucher, François, Allegory of Painting, oil on canvas, 1765, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Madam Vigée-Lebrun and Child, 1780s, Paris, Louvre
- Labille-Guiard, Adélaïde, Portrait of the Artist with Two Pupils, Mlle Marie-Gabrielle Capet and Mlle Carreaux de Rosemond, 1785, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Kauffmann, Angelica, Painting (Colouring), Genius (Invention), Composition, Design, ceiling fresco, London, Royal Academy of Arts
- Reynolds, Joshua, Self-Portrait, oil on canvas, circa 1747, London, National Portrait Gallery
- Reynolds, Joshua, Self-Portrait with Bust of Rembrandt, circa 1773, London, Royal Academy
- Reynolds, Joshua, Self-Portrait, 1776, Florence, Italy, Uffizi
- Gainsborough, Thomas, The Painter and His Wife, 1772, Paris, Louvre
- Gainsborough, Thomas, Self-Portrait, 1787, London, Royal Academy of Arts

Nineteenth Century

- Goya, Francisco, Family of Carlos IV, 1800–1801, Madrid, Prado
- Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique, Paganini, 1819, Paris, Louvre
- Vernet, Horace, The Artist's Studio, 1820, Paris, private collection
- Hasenclever, Johann Peter, Studio Scene, 1836, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstmuseum
- Delacroix, Eugène, Paganini, 1831, Washington, D.C., Phillips Gallery
- Delacroix, Eugène, Michelangelo in His Studio, 1850, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
- Courbet, Gustave, Self-Portrait with Black Dog, 1842, Paris, Petit Palais
- Courbet, Gustave, Man with a Pipe, 1848–1849, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
- Courbet, Gustave, The Painter's Studio: A Real Allegory Summing Up Seven Years of My Life as an Artist, 1854–1855, Paris, Louvre
- Dyce, William, Titian Preparing for His First Essay in Colour, 1856–1857, Aberdeen, Art Gallery
- Gogh, Vincent van, Self-Portrait with Bandaged Ear, 1889, London, Courtauld Galleries
- Klumpke, Anna, Portrait of Bona Bonheur, 1898, London, Courtauld Galleries
- Gauguin, Paul, Self-Portrait with Yellow Christ, 1889–1890, private collection

Twentieth Century

- John, Gwen, Self-Portrait in a Red Blouse, 1900, London, Tate Gallery
- John, Gwen, Self-Portrait, 1900–1903, London, National Portrait Gallery

- Laurencin, Marie, Group of Artists, 1908, Baltimore, Maryland, Museum of Art
- Kirchner, Ernst Ludwig, Artist and His Model, 1910–1920, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle
- Gris, Juan, Portrait of Picasso, 1912, Chicago, Art Institute
- Kahlo, Frida, Portrait of Frida and Diego, 1931, San Francisco, California, Museum of Modern Art
- Kollwitz, Käthe, Self-Portrait, bronze, 1936, private collection
- Carrington, Leonora, Self-Portrait, 1938, New York, Pierre Matisse Gallery
- Duchamp, Marcel, and Man Ray, Rose Selavy, 1939, Paris, private collection
- Spencer, Stanley, Self-Portrait, 1959, collection of Mrs. Dennis Smith
- Warhol, Andy, Self-Portrait, 1942–1986, many versions
- Close, Chuck, Self-Portrait, acrylic on canvas, 1968, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Walker Art Center
- Neel, Alice, Andy Warhol, 1970, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art

Selected Works of Literature with Artist Characters or Protagonists

- Beardsley, Aubrey, Under the Hill, 1894–1896
- Broughton, Rhoda, Mrs. Bligh, 1892
- Cary, Joyce, The Horse's Mouth, 1944
- Collins, Wilkie, Hide and Seek, 1854
- Crane, Stephen, The Third Violet, 1897
- De Goncourt, Edmond, and Jules de Goncourt, Manette Solomon, 1867
- Dickens, Charles, Little Dorrit, 1855–1857
- Disraeli, Benjamin, Lothair, 1870
- Eliot, George, Romola, 1862–1863
- Eliot, George, Middlemarch, 1871–1872
- Eliot, George, Daniel Deronda, 1874–1876
- Galsworthy, John, Villa Rubein, 1900
- Gissing, George, Thyrza, 1878
- Gissing, George, The Emancipated, 1890
- Golding, William, Free Fall, 1959
- Goldsmith, Oliver, The Vicar of Wakefield, 1776
- Hardy, Thomas, The Well-Beloved, 1892
- Hatton, Joseph, The Tallants of Barton, 1867
- Holland, Clive, Marcelle of the Latin Quarter, 1900
- Howard, Blanche Willis, Guenn, 1883
- James, Henry, Roderick Hudson, 1876
- James, Henry, The Europeans, 1878
- James, Henry, The Madonna of the Future, 1886
- James, Henry, The Story of a Masterpiece, 1886
- James, Henry, The Tragic Muse, 1890
- James, Henry, The Private Life, 1892
- Jewsbury, Geraldine, The Half Sisters, 1848
- Joyce, James, Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, 1914
- Kipling, Rudyard, The Light That Failed, 1891
- Lee, Charles, Cynthia in the West, 1900
- Lee, Vernon, Miss Brown, 1884
- Lee, Vernon, Oke of Okehurst, 1890
- Lever, Charles, The Martins of Cro' Martin, 1847

Maugham, William Somerset, The Moon and Sixpence, 1919
 Moore, George, A Modern Lover, 1883
 Moore, George, The Confessions of a Young Man, 1888
 Moore, George, Celibates, 1895
 Nesbit, Edith, The Incomplete Amorist, 1911
 Oliphant, Margaret, Three Brothers, 1870
 Ouida, Two Little Wooden Shoes, 1874
 Pater, Walter, Imaginary Portraits, 1877
 Ritchie, Anne, Miss Angel, 1875
 Roberts, Morley, Immortal Youth, 1896
 Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, "Hand and Soul," 1850
 Scott, Walter, St. Ronan's Well, 1823
 Thackeray, William, Vanity Fair, 1847–1848
 Thackeray, William, The Newcomes, 1853–1855
 Trollope, Anthony, Barchester Towers, 1857
 Watts-Dunton, Theodore, Aylwin, 1898
 Wedmore, Frederick, Renunciations, 1893
 Wilde, Oscar, The Picture of Dorian Gray, 1891
 Wodehouse, P. G., "Rough-Hew Them How We Will," 1914
 Woolf, Virginia, To the Lighthouse, 1927
 Woolf, Virginia, Orlando, 1928
 Yates, Edmund, Land at Last, 1866
 Zola, Émile, L'Oeuvre, 1886

Further Reading

- Borzello, Frances, The Artist's Model, London: Junction, 1982
 Codell, Julie, "The Dilemma of the Artist in Millais's Lorenzo and Isabella: Phrenology, the Gaze and the Social Discourse," Art History 14:1 (March 1991)
 Honig Fine, Elsa, Women and Art, Montclair, New Jersey: Allanheld and Schram, 1978
 Garb, Tamar, Sisters of the Brush: Women's Artistic Culture in Late Nineteenth Century Paris, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1994
 Gillett, Paula, Worlds of Art, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1989
 Green, N., "Dealing in Temperaments," Art History 10:1 (March 1987)
 Harris, Anne Sutherland, and Linda Nochlin, Women Artists, 1550–1950, New York: Knopf, 1979
 Jeffares, Bo, The Artist in Nineteenth Century English Fiction, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1979
 Kris, Ernst, and Otto Kurz, Myth, Magic, and Legend in the History of the Artist: A Historical Experiment, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1979
 Levey, Michael, The Painter Depicted: Painters as a Subject in Painting, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1981
 Martindale, Andrew, The Medieval Artist: The Rise of the Artist in the Middle Ages and Early Renaissance, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972
 Pevsner, Nikolaus, Academies of Art, Past and Present, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1940
 Smith, Bernard, The Death of the Artist as Hero: Essays in History and Culture, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1988
 Soussloff, Catherine M., "Lives of the Poets and Painters in the Renaissance," Word and Image 6:2 (April/June 1990)
 Stewart, Grace, A New Mythos: The Novel of the Artist as Heroine, London: Eden Press, 1979
 Warnke, Martin, The Court Artist: On the Ancestry of the Modern Artist, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993
 Wittkower, Rudolf, and Margot Wittkower, Born Under Saturn: The Character and Conduct of Artists: A Documented History from Antiquity to the French Revolution, New York: Random House, 1963

ASCENT/DESCENT

Paul Grimley Kuntz and Lee Braver

The following symbols are covered in the discussion of the theme Ascent/Descent:

MOUNTAINS

LADDERS

TOWERS

MISCELLANEOUS

TREES

Paolo Veronese, Jacob's Dream, circa 1555–1556, Venice, Italy, San Sebastiano.
(Courtesy of Osvaldo Böhm)

The endless variety of symbols indicating ascent and descent, climbing up or climbing down, ascending and descending, must be attributed to the imperative—human, natural, and divine—to explore the heights and depths of the world. More than all other animals humans have pushed the limits of the vertical dimension of space, making it as true of mortals as of God, “If I ascend into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me” (Psalms 139:8–10).

Mountains, towers, trees, and ladders are all means by which people rise and are symbols of ascent and descent. The human being is the animal who strives to reach heaven and who falls into hell (homo ascendens et descendens), and when we employ these symbols we recognize that we rise and we fall.

The cultural evidence for this is the perennial appeal of the symbols, which the biblical prophets used to express their revelations, Byzantine, Romanesque, and Gothic architects used in their designs, and later churches display in their spires (Patrides, “Hierarchy”). One important work expressing the Judeo-Christian sense of hierarchy is Dante’s Divine Comedy, which challenges graphic artists to illustrate the levels of the pit of hell, the mountain of purgatory, and the heavenly levels of paradise. There are as many illustrations of Dante in the twentieth century as were earlier executed by Giovanni di Paolo, Sandro Botticelli, William Blake, and Gustave Doré. This divine hierarchy was also present in ancient Greece, which depicted Hades as the underworld while the gods enjoyed Mount Olympus as their home.

As with other animals that move, humans find themselves in space and in a landscape that is rarely flat or level. Hills and mountains rise up by degrees, land slopes down into valleys. To gain control over land, the top of the mountain makes possible vision in all directions, while the valley, however pleasant, is a place in danger of attack (e.g., “the valley of the shadow of death” from Psalms 23). Humans build towers and protect them by digging ditches, so extending the height and depth provided by the environment. Every culture has some holy mountains, where a prophet such as Moses ascends to meet with the Lord and receive the tablets of the Law. And every culture has valleys, sometimes accursed, as was the valley outside Jerusalem that held the foul city dump, Tophet, in the Valley of Hinnom (II Kings 23:10; Isaiah 30:33; Jeremiah 7:31–33). Primitive groups believed that above the clouds of heaven is the abode of gods and in the pit of hell are the devils. People live in a middle world, beneath heaven and above hell, and in that ambiguous realm good and evil are mixed, so that constantly everyone is faced with choices between them. The most striking example of this generic characteristic of the human moral predicament is the long tradition of depicting Adam and Eve beneath the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil and their expulsion from paradise (Genesis 2–3). Two great examples of this scene are those created by Masaccio and Michelangelo, in the Brancacci Chapel in Florence and in the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican, respectively.

To ascend is generally to become better by degree, and to descend to become worse. But there are also visual symbols of ascent that cannot succeed, as building the Tower of Babel is still a symbol of vain ambition. To occupy the place of gods produces the confusion of tongues (Genesis 11). The Greek myth of Otus and Ephialtes, two giants who stacked up mountains in order to reach the home of the gods, also shows the consequences of hubris. The Greek gods punished Sisyphus in Hades for his many deceptions by condemning him eternally to roll a giant boulder up a hill, only to have it roll down again just as it reached the summit. In medieval and Renaissance symbolism ascent may be merely riding fortune’s wheel up, to be followed by inevitable decline and ruin.

The ultimate of good and evil in vital terms is life and death. The natural world provides the symbols of light and dark as the associated characters of good and evil because above are sources of light, especially the sun, without which there can be no life. Since dark is only the absence of light, it is natural to assume that being in itself is good and that evil ultimately is nothingness.

The hierarchy of being can be constructed between self-subsistent being and all that is below and dependent on it, the necessary contrasted to the contingent. This range by degrees, including all the opposites—spiritual-material, living-dead, intelligent-brute—is expressed abstractly by the symbolic Tree of Porphyry, and diagrammed chiefly in books of logic and metaphysics. Unfortunately the best known book, The Great Chain of Being by Arthur O. Lovejoy (Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Press, 1936), a masterpiece of the history of ideas, pays no attention, other than Homer’s Golden Chain, to the visual arts. The few examples of chains are all from literary sources.

The Tree of Life is spread worldwide in many different forms. The Norse picture of the world is the evergreen ash tree, Yggdrasil, populated by humans created out of ash and elm trees. Is the mythic Tree of Life true in the sense that all species can be considered branches and that the trunk grew from common roots? Biologist Stephen Jay Gould points out that Charles Darwin’s Origin of Species, especially in its early chapters, employs the Tree of Life as a guide to construing temporally the mass of observed facts of kinship.

In two other ways the symbols of the vertical dimension are as much used in the modern world as they were in the medieval period, when artists were more deeply inspired to use symbols of heaven and hell than we are today. Economic success is attained by climbing a ladder, and the rails and rungs are sometimes compared to the spiral of the symbol of the United States dollar ($). We still represent visually the steps to be mounted to own one's own home or to rise to the eminence of chief executive. The reaction against materialism also takes the hierarchical form, in that spirituality is conceived as advancing beyond sensation to perception and from imagination to intellect. The ascent of spirit is commonly thought of as inner development, going beyond calculating reason to appreciation and devotion to ideals for their own sake. In particular, the depth psychology of Carl Jung finds significance in ancient myths, theology, and alchemy, as well as the arts that use symbols of mountains, towers, trees, ladders, and bridges. The spirit naturally seeks to rise, as the sparks fly upward. It is doubtful whether concern with symbolism would have developed apart from a revulsion against reducing all life to a dead and monotonous level, thus depriving us of what psychologist Abraham Maslow called "peak experiences."

Throughout the discussion of the meaning of mountains, towers, ladders, and trees we will observe that although these symbols can be found in very diverse cultures, there is a tension between their peculiar cosmological and moral connotations and the syncretistic tendency of Jungian thought to claim one essential underlying denotation. Many interpreters find essential meaning in one archetype of ascent and descent: the center and world axis, as in the iconographic philosophy of Mircea Eliade.

Salvation is sometimes a descent into the womb of mother Earth rather than an ascent to the heavenly father. Even in Western culture, with Mount Olympus as the home of Zeus and the other Greek gods and Sinai as the mountain of the covenant with the god of Israel, mountains were for centuries regarded by Europeans as blemishes on a good creation (Nicolson).

Mountains

Israelites were provided with Psalms to sing as they made pilgrimages to their temple in Jerusalem on Mount Zion. There are 15 "Psalms of Ascent," and the most famous verse is still used in worship by people far from the Holy Land and by those who are not descended from the Hebrews: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help" (Psalms 121:1). This is only one of many such expressions. It occurs in paintings with Chinese characters telling of mountain peaks that lead beyond the clouds to heaven. In India there is Mount Meru, which Hindus, Buddhists, and Jains believe to be the center of the world. From this center are spread out four lotus-petal continents, and the mountain is the seed-cup of the world lotus. From ancient Greece we are acquainted with temples built on high promontories, such as the Parthenon on the crest of the Acropolis at Athens. For many Native American peoples the mountain was itself the divinity. The Japanese also celebrate Mount Fuji, with its springs that provide water to the rice paddies.

The peak of the mountain is a place of exalted vision, as depicted in the middle panel of Matthias Grünewald's Isenheim

Altarpiece. Explorers commonly tell of their ecstatic experiences, as did Hudson Stuck and three others who in 1913 were the first to climb Mount McKinley in Alaska. We can therefore gain common feeling for the Hebrews, led by Moses from Egypt to Mount Sinai. The power of Yahweh was manifested in storm, fire, and lightning. The people must stay behind, awaiting the return of the prophet Moses.

The earliest representation of Moses receiving the Law from above is in a fresco in the Synagogue of Dura-Europus, now in Syria (third century A.D.). The image of Moses ascending the mountain became standard in Byzantine representations, particularly because Emperor Justinian established the great monastery of St. Katherine at the foot of Mount Sinai. A mosaic at Ravenna, Italy, presents a high mountain with a sharply precipitous drop from level to level, reminding us of the metaphor used by American monk Thomas Merton in his autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain (1948).

The Israelites had to remain below while Moses ascended the height. In Jewish and Byzantine art only the hand of God is shown coming from a heavenly cloud. It is said of Moses on the height that after fasting 40 days and 40 nights he spoke to the Lord "face to face," but in other texts it is only the Lord's backside that Moses can glimpse. Moses is given the aureole of a saint, and in Western art from the twelfth century until the eighteenth there are horns from his forehead or cheeks, such as those in the illuminated manuscript by Rudolf von Ems. Iconographer Ruth Mellinkoff accounts for this as a translation of the Hebrew by St. Jerome as a horned face. We now agree with the traditional Hebrew and Greek interpretation that the meaning more properly is that Moses' face was radiant. Rarely, Moses is shown with face veiled as he presents the tablets of the Law to the people.

The people grow impatient during their long wait for the divine terms of the covenant of Yahweh and induce Moses' brother, Aaron the priest, to melt down jewelry into a golden calf. This is commonly presented as an idol set upon a column or a monumental platform. The scene was a favorite of Renaissance and Baroque painters and perhaps best known because of Nicolas Poussin. Because the text tells of the daughters of Israel singing and dancing around the idol, the painter had the opportunity to depict an orgy. Moses is presented in anger because of the idolatrous infidelity of his people, and Moses in anger smashing the tablets is a standard episode of the Moses cycle. The best known, in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin, is by Rembrandt van Rijn.

The stones of the mountain, inscribed by the finger of God with the Ten Commandments, are not found in the earliest depictions. The ancients were acquainted with writing on a scroll, and only in the Middle Ages did Moses appear carrying the rounded-top stones. Jewish scholars have established that this shape, called compass-top, was first devised by Christian artists and borrowed by the synagogue, where it has become the most familiar symbol of Judaism as a religion (in contrast to the six-pointed Magen David used by the state of Israel).

Probably unique in Christian churches is the altarpiece of San Moisè in Venice, Italy. Rocks are piled up to replicate a mountain, with God the Father giving the Law to the prophet Moses. Both are bearded patriarchs, surrounded by angels with trumpets. At the foot of the mountain stands brother Aaron on the left and sister Miriam on the right.

The modern love of wild mountain scenery is evident in Henry Cheever Pratt's Moses on the Mount (1828–1829, formerly attributed to Thomas Cole). This work is unusual in that the human figures are tiny, dwarfed by the majestic mountains above the prophet and the priest. Paul Cézanne became fixated on nearby Mont Sainte-Victoire and painted it many times over the last two decades of his life. Fascination with mountains has received perhaps its most vivid modern treatment in the motion picture Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977). A seemingly random selection of people across the country become obsessed with the image of a mountain and engage in an all-encompassing pursuit of its meaning. Their quest ends with an alien race making contact with Earth at the mountain, perhaps a secular analogue to epiphany.

Towers

People have constructed artificial mountains across the globe, including pyramid tombs in Egypt, pyramids for sacrifice and worship in Aztec Mexico, and ziggurats in the river valley of the Tigris and the Euphrates. All are awesome means of attaining the height, and some have steps of ascent, sometimes strictly limited to use by the priesthood or royalty who attained divine elevation.

The most significant symbol of a tower in Western art is not associated with success in reaching heaven, but with human failure. The account of the Tower of Babylon is retold in the Bible as the Tower of Babel, and Babel now signifies the consequent confusion of tongues. The intent of the Babylonians is stated in Genesis: "Let us build us a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven" (Genesis 11:4). The account comes from Hebrews who were convinced that their true God had led Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees, and that it was proper to forsake a city noted for its tower. In contrast to true contact with God (as in the case of Jacob and his vision of a ladder let down from heaven), the attempt to build a tower to heaven became the symbol of human pride and the consequent confusion, the symbol of meaninglessness. The Hebrew scribes were also rejecting the Babylonian story of creation, which involved the copulation of the male and female deities and the imitation of the creation by the divine marriage rite of the king with the priestess in the temple on top of the tower.

In contrast to the rather standard construction of a ladder, which may vary somewhat in width and much in height and angles, the towers that are represented in medieval and Renaissance art have far greater variety. Sometimes it is depicted in the early stages being constructed of brick, as in a mosaic in St. Mark's Basilica in Venice, but more commonly its height may reach to the clouds of heaven. Sometimes it is an erect tower, square, with windows to indicate internal stories, but more frequently it is a construction with higher levels receding, often with a spiral staircase leading upward. There is usually an indication of scaffolding used by workmen, because the tower remains unfinished. Sometimes it has many surrounding buildings, for the biblical account is of a "city and a tower." In the version by Jan Brueghel the Elder (Brueghel de Velours) painted before 1625, there are two rivers and a busy city on what seems to be an island, with mountains in the background. In the nineteenth-century version by Gustave Doré, the stress is placed on the height piercing the clouds, while pagan worship occupies the foreground. Sometimes the general theme of pride of the high and never-to-be-finished structure is reinforced by representation of a king, Nimrod, in some pose of arrogance. Another way of pointing to the moral that pride is followed by destruction (Proverbs 16:18, 29:23, etc.) is to show a vast structure collapsing into a ruin.

The tower is not always a symbol of bad ascent and failure, indeed it is sometimes the opposite. The tower often means unassailable purity. St. Barbara, imprisoned by her father to protect her Christian virginity, is often pictured with a windowless tower. This also serves as a symbol of the Virgin Mary. The tower that signifies sainthood may have three windows, signifying the Holy Trinity.

Humanists of the Renaissance used the symbol of a tower-like mountain, usually with an external sprawling pathway that could be used to ascend the heights above the clouds. There are frequent representations of the Tablet of Cebes from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Cebes, a student of Socrates and a Pythagorean, is one of the speakers in the Phaedo of Plato. The text of his Tabula comes from a Neoplatonic manuscript of the first century A.D. It offers an explanation of a large picture on the wall of a temple of Cronus. The story is of a pilgrim traveling on a highway and visiting this temple. According to the allegory, life's meaning is found in learning to distinguish true from false, virtue from vice, and the way to cope with bad luck, and in spite of all misfortune to gain happiness in the end. There are 27 lessons to be learned, and the illumination leads by spirals up toward a temple at the summit.

The tower can be the symbol of the object of conquest for the soldier and by analogy the scholar's goal. Encamped in the plain beneath the forbidding height, the tabula militiae scholasticae are various tents (of wickedness?): ignorance, laziness, pleasure, fear, and three more. The steps up are the seven liberal arts, beginning with grammar, logic, and rhetoric (the trivium, contrasted to the quadrivium). The outer wall to be taken is the bachelor's degree, after which is the master's, and at the center of "arx Palladis" (citadel of wisdom) sits the ruler with a banner on which is written "glory."

Trees

Just as mountains and towers, trees under which we live and ladders that we construct for scaling walls serve as symbols of ascent and descent. In his poem "Birches," Robert Frost sums up the notion of ascent through trees:

I'd like to go by climbing a birch tree,
And climb black branches up a snow-white trunk
Toward heaven.

More profound than the ascent of the tree by climbing up its branches is the variety of tree forms used to symbolize the ascent or descent of the soul. A tree provides the instrument of the most egregious descent, in religious terms, of the soul in human history, the fall into original sin. The text of the fall, according to the Hebrew Bible, includes “a garden eastward in Eden,” where the Lord God “put the man. . . . And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.” God puts Adam in Eden “to dress it and to keep it,” with permission to eat of every tree except one that is prohibited: “Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die” (Genesis 2:8–17). Albrecht Dürer painted Eve being tempted by the serpent from the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, while Adam holds the Tree of Life.

The garden became a favorite with artists. The tree is symbolic of the unspoiled beauty of creation, good according to the Creator (Genesis 1 repeats “God saw that it was good” after most days of creation). Adam and Eve were perfect before they touched the forbidden fruit. God commanded that man and wife “shall be one flesh. And they were both naked, . . . and were not ashamed” (Genesis 2:24–25). Eve and Adam yield to the temptation of the serpent, “Ye shall not surely die . . . ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.” Eating of the fruit, their “eyes . . . were opened, and they knew that they were naked.” In shame they hide from the sight of God. Charged with disobedience they offer excuses; Adam blames Eve, and Eve blames the serpent. God curses the man to till the stony soil and the woman to bear children in pain. Man “is become one of us,” says the Lord, “to know good and evil” and doomed to die because he cannot “take . . . of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever.” An angel with a flaming sword forever keeps man from finding “the way of the tree of life” (Genesis 3:4–24).

Not all myths are like the story of lost paradise, and even in Hebrew scripture wisdom is available to those who seek it: “She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her: and happy is every one that retaineth her” (Proverbs 3:18). This is an optimistic version, that people retain and even increase their capacity for wisdom, and that the means are theirs if they choose to use them. But the Orthodox Christian version, influenced by St. Paul, is that the sin of Adam has left all descendants morally feeble and deformed. Only through a second Adam—Christ—comes redemption. The sacrificial death of the Savior is on a cross, and the interpretation is that the cross is of the wood of the tree of death, whose fruit the first pair ate. The place of the cross, Golgotha, is the site of Adam’s tomb. The reversal of the fall, initiated by the first woman, requires a second Eve, Mary mother of Jesus, and as the temptation came through the serpent (a satanic or devilish symbol) the foot of the woman bruises the serpent’s head (Genesis 3:15).

If the way for mortals to rise to the level of the divine is through wisdom, then the Tree of Life is also the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. Sometimes the two trees are identified explicitly (e.g., the missal of Archbishop Bernhard von Rohr of Salzburg). Those who hold to the Pauline doctrine of Adam’s fall would naturally present the tree whose fruit was forbidden as a tree of death.

The Orthodox Christian story of redemption through the death on the cross sometimes places the dying Savior on a tree, symbolizing new life coming from sacrificial surrender of life.

The cross as tree allows man and woman redeemed to be raised up and reconciled with God. The contemplation of the crucifix is a way to confess sins of Adamic disobedience and to open one to Christian forgiveness (Schiller).

The human genealogical descent of Jesus from Jesse is symbolized by the medieval Tree of Jesse, best known in the stained glass of Chartres Cathedral in France. The lineage runs from Jesse through David to one called in a hymn “great David’s greater son.” This is presented as a justification for Jesus as Messiah, or “anointed one,” “Christ.”

The symbol of the tree was central to the medieval reflection on history. The chief example is Joachim of Fiore, the abbot of Calabria, whose plan of salvation was the emergence of the age of the Son from the age of the Father and the fulfillment in a new age, the age of the Spirit. The abbot’s visions are rendered as the flourishing of trees.

In systematic thought about the cosmos no metaphysician employed the parts of the tree more than the Blessed Ramon Lull, Catalan knight and novelist, Franciscan missionary to the Muslims, extreme rationalist in theology. Long before Blaise Pascal and Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz, Lull had the idea of a calculating machine. In a basic question, he asked for the root, the trunk, the branches, the leaves, and the fruit. Drawings accompany his metaphysics, as they do Joachim’s prophecies. The leaves are sometimes named with the Aristotelian categories on one branch, and on its mirror opposite are the names of the primary aspects of reality of his own system. Lull wrote a book for preachers in which he taught them to think of a sermon as a tree and to follow the growth of the tree from root to fruit, to be sure that every aspect had been covered.

Tree then becomes symbolic of the whole, and a tree of being is intended to be a symbol of all of reality. When Immanuel Kant in the Critique of Pure Reason (1781) speaks of a “tree of categories” or Descartes compares the “whole of philosophy” to a tree in his Principles of Philosophy (1644), they probably were unaware of the rich heritage of Mesopotamian, Egyptian, and Hindu myth, as well as the fabulous Yggdrasil of Scandinavian myth. For centuries before the Enlightenment, logic texts had employed a diagram with many variations, a tree of being. It goes back to a founder of Neoplatonism, Porphyry, born in Tyre in about A.D. 232, who edited Plotinus. The ground of being is the One, and all else, emanation of the One. The most general category of universal is substance, which if corporeal is body, which if living is life, which if sensible is animal, which if rational is man. Man, in virtue of his soul and intellect, can gradually attain the One. This is the trunk. The branches represent, on right and left, corporeal or incorporeal, animate or inanimate, sensible or insensible, rational or irrational. One of the variations shows homo (man) springing from the originative pair, Adam and Eve, with Christian man from the regenerative pair, Jesus and Mary. Another shows homo holding on to the roots of being.

Is the tree of being always rooted in earth below and growing up toward the source of light? The Arbor Universalium, because of its concern with classification, reads downward from mineral body to plant to animal to man, when each succeeding level is higher. In the East and in the West there is the paradoxical upside-down tree. From the Katha Upanishad

(6:1): “its root is above, its branches below—the eternal fig-tree! that [root] indeed is the Pure. That is Brahma that indeed is called the Immortal on it all the worlds do rest, and no one soever goes beyond it.”

One of the most interesting trees was developed from the Sephiroth Tree, ten names of God, on which mystical Jews meditated to ascend to the eternal. The ten names, three in the core of the roots and seven branches, are the fronds of the palm tree.

Ladders

Just as the Tower of Babel in the biblical account requires that we recognize the Babylonian heritage of the symbol, so the story of Jacob’s Ladder in the patriarch’s dream at Bethel requires us to recognize an ancient Egyptian symbol. The Hebraic rejection of building a tower to heaven has become a symbol of vanity and of consequent confusion, whereas the ladder let down from heaven is the true way linking Earth to heaven.

To understand the many paintings, from the synagogue of Dura Europus to works by Marc Chagall, we need the text of the story. Jacob, obeying his father Isaac’s command not to marry a Canaanite but to find a wife from the family of his mother’s brother, is on a journey toward Haran.

And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And, behold, the Lord stood above it, and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. . . . And in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land. . . . And Jacob awaked out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place. . . . How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven. (Genesis 28:11–17)

At this point Jacob took the stone he had used as a pillow and set it up as a pillar. He poured oil on this mark of the place called Bethel, the “house of God” (Genesis 28:18–19). As a symbol of God’s presence another vertical monument is used, the pillar.

The Hebraic story of a ladder reaching from Earth to heaven was accepted by Christians, who, coming from various cultures, could build upon Egyptian and Hellenistic significances. Egyptians wore amulets of the ladder, and the cult of Orpheus offered a ladder to carry the soul to heaven. The most significant development was through Abbot John of the Monastery of St. Katherine at the foot of Mount Sinai. The abbot used Jacob’s Ladder as the symbol of the way to moral perfection. Known as St. Johannes Climacus (St. John of the Ladder), the abbot wrote down his philosophy in a book of 30 chapters, The Ladder of Paradise, each chapter a rung on the Ladder.

Abbot John was a master of Eastern Christian asceticism, and The Ladder was translated into many languages; as a result, in Eastern churches from Greece to Russia there are frescoes and icons depicting Jacob’s Ladder. St. Romuald and St. Benedict are also associated with ladders in Western or Latin Christendom.

The Hebrew text speaks of the Lord above the ladder, but Jewish art cannot represent Yahweh. Because God the Son took on flesh, Christian art can represent Jesus Christ welcoming those monks who succeed in advancing the 30 rungs described in The Ladder of Paradise. Each rung represents a vice to be overcome or a virtue to be gained. The highest rung is faith, hope, and charity. Not all ladders rise precipitously, but all are steep, and monks fall not only when the aspirants lose their hold and fall; devils torment and distract those striving upward. Angels may offer comfort, but at the base of the ladder is the beast ready to devour the damned.

Not all ladders of perfection are as threatening. Medieval artist Herrade von Landsberg, an Alsatian abbess, presents a less steep ascent and only half the number of rungs, 15. Her book is called Hortus Deliciarum (Garden of Delights), and there is a life for those who do not choose to climb, as the lord and lady, who live a pleasant life on the hillside.

There are innumerable illustrations of Jacob’s Ladder in manuscripts to accompany the text, as there are of Moses ascending Sinai and bringing back the Law, building the Tower of Babel, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. These also appear in many paintings that adorn churches and inspire aspiration to ascend. As with other symbols of ascent, iconographers Louis Réau and Engelbert Kirschbaum give accounts of the changing iconography over the centuries.

There are great differences between presentations of the images of Jacob’s dream. Some of the earlier examples divide sharply between Earth and heaven, in contrast to their union through the ladder with angels ascending and descending. Others differ in the presentation of the ladder, which in some is set away from the sleeping Jacob and in some is set so close to him that it appears to spring from the patriarch’s breast. This is evident in German woodcuts of the Reformation and Baroque periods. Another striking difference can be seen in works by two Spanish painters: Jusepe de Ribera, in whose painting a great flood of light from heaven is the ladder, and Bartolomé Esteban Murillo, in whose painting the ladder is crowded from top to bottom with angels. Nineteenth-century artists William Blake and Gustave Doré depart from the traditional straight ladder. Blake presents a spiral staircase with many angels, some embracing one another, some bearing gifts, others bringing children. Does the spiral signify gradual progress upward, with many turns? Doré depicts the ladder as a broad staircase with innumerable steps, which brings to mind Dante’s “Vision of the Golden Ladder.” Does this signify a way to the infinite open to many? By contrast a narrow ladder seems limited to a single file of climbers.

Most ladders used as symbols of ascent are probably what the artists observed house builders and roofers using, with wooden rails and rungs. But Ribera used only a broad shaft of light. A most interesting ladder can be observed in the painting by Paolo Veronese in the sacristy of the Church of San Sebastiano in Venice. From an opening in the sky comes a ladder of two narrow shafts of light with barely suggested rungs of light. The angels also may be read as luminous winged creatures of human form. Because angels have no material bodies, they have no weight, and Veronese has thereby presented a more heavenly ladder. In contrast to the dawn on the left side of the painting is the darkness on the right side. Rather than Jacob asleep with head on stones, he is awake and beholds the vision of the ladder of heavenly light. In the forest Jacob wrestles with an angel (in this case the angel must have a body as solid as flesh). It is not common, but there are medieval examples that combine Jacob wrestling with Jacob dreaming because the stories are told in separate chapters (Genesis 28:10–22 and Genesis 32:24–32).

Rather than a ladder for the angels, some artists provide the angels with stone steps, as did Blake and Doré. In Latin or Italian the word scala may mean either a ladder or steps. An example is from a fifteenth-century manuscript of an illuminated Divine Comedy (Samek-Ludovici and Ravenna). From the level of the Arrogant (bent over with stones) to the level of the Envious (with eyelids sewn shut), Dante mounts a wooden ladder. But in going to the level of the Irritable (wrapped in thick smoke), Virgil is shown climbing wooden steps. There are other drawings of the hill of Purgatory in which the transition from level to level is consistently by ladder.

Artists sometimes devise ladders to present complex theological concepts in very simple visual language. Hans Baldung invented a double ladder, one with three rails. Reading the story as fall and redemption of humankind, on one side Adam in his pride ascends while on the other Christ in his humility descends. Read in the other direction, however, it could also be the famous formula “God became man in order that man might become God.”

Are all ladders or steps theological? Not necessarily. The steps may correspond to a hierarchy of nature. Said Lull, “We begin at the imperfect, so that we might ascend to the perfect; and conversely, we may descend from the perfect to the imperfect.” To illustrate Lull’s De novi logica: De correllativia, necnon de ascensu et descensu intellectus (1512), study begins with the material world, on the level of the stone, rising to the level of fire, to plants (a tree), sensitive animals (a lion), and arriving at the level of the intellectual animal, man. And beyond are pure unbodily intellects, angels. The scholar holds up a zodiac, signifying that the order of nature points beyond to the height of the divine orderer.

Alchemical literature, particularly of the seventeenth century, is full of visual representations of steps needed to ascend to the level of wisdom, symbolized by the philosopher’s stone. We may read “gold” literally, as the precious metal, or symbolically, as wisdom. It is difficult to think of physical, chemical, and biological processes such as “calcination, sublimation, . . . and putrefaction” leading to anything on the level of intellect or moral judgment unless we think of an inward ascent. In Robert Fludd’s version of Jacob’s Ladder, the rungs are of inward levels, senses, imagination, reason, intellect, intelligence, word. This is not merely what we call “faculty psychology.” Fludd is awakening to the presence within himself of “immortal spirit” joined to his “vile body.” Because of spirit man “can participate in eternal beatitude. What joy there is in this world comes alone from the presence of the spirit.” Hence the bursting star of light beyond the ladder (Godwin).

Of course not all scholars were mystics who found joy in acquiring wisdom for its own sake. Scholars were also climbing a ladder of success. There are enemies of a happy life, and these are symbolized allegorically as poverty, sickness, lust, and early death. These four hold back the young man, tugging at ropes attached to his belt.

There is no end to the ingenious ways in which the ladder can be used symbolically. In discussing the stalled rise of an important public official, a journalist wrote: “It is as though in mounting the career ladder he had put his foot on a rubber rung.” The beauty of the wit of an apt metaphor, as of a good pictograph, is that they need no explanation.

Ascent to Heaven and Descent to Hell

Both Judaism and Christianity have examples of prophets who are carried into heaven. The earliest example is Elijah, famous for destroying the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel after defeating them and demonstrating the power of the Lord God of Israel (I Kings 18:20–40). Mount Carmel became the symbol of mystical ascent and the fulfillment of the complete devotion to God, as in the most famous of Carmelite mystics, St. Teresa of Avila and St. John of the Cross. Both were poets, and St. John was an artist as well, who made a visual diagram of his most famous work, The Ascent of Mount Carmel. St. John sketched a pair of ladders with stages of achievement named, but discounted also if the aspiring person should dare assume any merit of his own. The liturgy of the Carmelites, on the feast day of Our Lady of Carmel, is built around the stages of climbing Mount Carmel. The climax of St. Elias’s story (as Elijah is called when absorbed into Christian sainthood) was his transportation into heaven by a chariot of fire drawn by horses of fire (II Kings 2:1–14). The image is familiar to those who have heard the hymn “Jerusalem” by William Blake:

Bring me my Bow of burning gold:
Bring me my Arrows of desire:
Bring me my Spear: O Clouds unfold!
Bring me my Chariot of fire!
(From “Preface” to Milton)

The disciples of Jesus, according to the Gospels (Matthew 17:1–13, Mark 9:2–10, Luke 9:29–36), witness Jesus transfigured on the mountain with Moses and Elijah and after his Resurrection ascended into heaven (Acts 1:9). This becomes crucial among the events professed in the Apostles’ Creed, “descended into hell, ascended into heaven.” The former is often depicted as a Christ, after Crucifixion and Resurrection, carrying a banner of victory over Satan. From hell he liberated some imprisoned there. Christ ascending into heaven is a familiar symbol, developed through centuries of Christian art (see Réau for chief examples of mosaic and painting, and Kirschbaum for analysis of the changes in iconography). Christ is drawn upward by divine miracle and does not need the specific mode of Elijah's vehicle. This is true also of Mary's assumption into heaven. The mother of Jesus is adored particularly among the Eastern Orthodox as "Mother of God" (Theotokos). A noted Western example is Titian's altar painting in the Franciscan church of Venice, Santa Maria Gloriosa dei Frari.

The boy Jesus at 12 comes to the temple, where he had been presented as a circumcised baby (Luke 2:21-50). There he engaged the scribes of the temple in discourse (Luke 2:41-50). A parallel event seems to have happened in Mary's life. The girl Mary entering into the precinct of the women was painted by Titian for the religious confraternity of Carità and is now at the Academia Museum of Fine Arts in Venice. Titian visualizes a young lady on the landing between two flights of stairs, the lower darker, the higher brighter, a fitting symbol for one becoming the most perfect of women.

The symbolic meaning of the ascension of Jesus may be retained even in the modern world, where being drawn up may connote magic and the deceptive appearance of a body floating unsupported, or "levitation," a kind of occult manifestation that sounds like something from the pages of psychical research. Salvador Dalí's Crucifixion and Last Supper both evince this occult treatment of Christ. An altarpiece in Chichester Cathedral, the Anglican center for interrelating art and religion, shows Christ mounting a set of plain stairs. What helps to set apart Christ from ordinary literal mounting from one floor to another is the woman (Mary Magdalene) in the garden who would touch the risen Savior. The story is familiar in the history of art as "Noli me tangere," "Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father" (John 20:17).

The Psalmist asks a question: "What is man . . . ?" The question may be asked in other contexts; in this theistic context the question should include the phrase "that thou art mindful of him?" "For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor" (Psalms 8:4-5). Religious art of Jews, Christians, and Muslims have celebrated prophets who ascend to the level of angels. Last Judgments are painted with saints around the throne of the divine judge, just as in the giving of the Law the Lord is surrounded by angels.

The most fully elaborated painting of ascent to heaven and a visit to those damned for their sins, comparable to Dante's Divine Comedy, is inspired by the dramatic Sura XVII of the Koran, "The Night Journey." A mystical poet elaborated the account in Arabic, which was translated into Vighur (Eastern Turkish) during the reign of Shah Rokh between 1404 and 1447. The story is illuminated by 61 scenes of Muhammad, who had been carried from Mecca to the mosque at Jerusalem. According to tradition the rock, where once Solomon's temple stood, bears the footprint of the mare that carried Muhammad to heaven. Whereas the reception by God of Enoch (Genesis 4:17) and Moses (Deuteronomy 34) are like Elijah's flight in the chariot, at the end of their earthly days Muslims have the advantage of a revelation from a prophet who visited the throne of Allah and based his revelation on firsthand witnessing of the delights of the righteous and the torments of the damned. Among the former are the prophets Adam, Noah, Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, David, Solomon, and Moses. John the Baptist, Zacharias, and Jesus welcome Muhammad as the prophet who fulfills their messages. Muhammad is therefore the prophets' prophet.

The hierarchical cosmic setting of seven levels of the infernal dwelling of the devils, the seven levels of Earth, and the seven levels of heaven is the scope from bottom to top in which Muhammad is the prophet whose message is most complete. "The symbolic ladder, establishing a connection between cosmic regions, is found in traditional Muslim accounts of the Mirāj which often shows Mahomet climbing the steps of a luminous ladder rising up from the Temple of Jerusalem . . . to Heaven."

The 61 illuminations with golden flames against a blue of lapis lazuli reinforce the Muslim's faith that personal virtues will gain eternal bliss. It is the angel Gabriel who, with glittering wings, leads the prophet riding the human-faced Buraq to a garden dominated by a golden tree. The beautiful houris—maidens who live with the blessed in paradise—wear feathers in their hair and are ever young and pure. These are the holy women of Islam, the noble women who embraced the faith and became "companions of the prophet."

In hell is another tree, with thorns as spears and a fruit bitter as poison. The fruit, in the form of demon's heads, is eaten by the damned. The devils are blue with red eyes and torment the evildoers. One level of hell, Gehenna, is for bad Muslims, but six levels are for infidels. The evil-speakers are one kind of infidel, and 13 others include the greedy, the sowers of discord, the hypocrites, those who rob orphans, and those who drink wine. It is the adulterous women who are singled out for punishment. They hang by hooks that go through their breasts while a devil stirs the coals to burn their legs. Among other punishments is for those who drink fermented liquors. The red demons squirt bitter poison into their mouths.

There is no other series of paintings that uses all the common symbols of ascent. The ascent begins from Mount Zion; the archangel Gabriel descends from Mount Arafat, filling all space from east to west, and with feet on Earth his head touches heaven. Muhammad is not an angel with wings, but he rides a mare who knows all the levels of hell, Earth, and heaven. In this particular series the prophet does not mount a ladder of light, but when he comes into the presence of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful sits on a throne far above seven steep steps. Just slightly above him flies the archangel, and just below Abraham's level is the prophet. Flames rise and connect bottom to top. Similarly, the good tree of paradise and the bad tree of inferno link bottom to top.

Conclusion

Is there one archetype essential to all symbols of ascent and descent (mountains, towers, trees, and ladders) or is there a family of symbols with various moral meanings? Comparative iconography now has led—largely on the basis of the study of such symbols of climbing as mountain, tower, tree, and ladder—to a theory of one universal essential symbol. Jung and his followers claim one archetype, and Mircea Eliade and followers claim this is the Axis Mundi, or "hub" of the universe, a central cosmic pillar. This vertical dimension of human existence, a world-pillar, connects three realms: the underworld, the human, and that of the gods. It may take the form of a bridge by which the spirit can ascend to the transcendent. It underlies the Christian use of the cross and gives mortals access to the supreme being (Sullivan; Moon).

If this theory is true, then one universal iconography can provide the whole of wisdom, whereas particular iconographic traditions—Jewish, Muslim, Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, etc.—only partially reveal the specific aspects. The best modern surveys and bibliographies of 13 special iconographies are in the Encyclopedia of Religion (vol. 7, pp. 3–67), and 27 classifications are in Biedermann (pp. 509–530), which unfortunately are omitted from the English translation.

The remarkable fact to which such a universalistic iconography calls attention is that the visual symbols easily migrate from one culture to another and are intelligible in spite of the irreconcilable differences between theologies and ideologies. A universal language of visual symbols then succeeds, while such inventions as Esperanto fail to debabelize the human species. Also cited are examples such as the upside-down tree, which has no known connection or influence but points to some underlying predisposition to symbolize visually as well as to grasp grammatical structures.

Does such universalistic theory overlook differences? The monotheistic religions have a holy mountain such as Sinai, and Japanese Buddhism has Mount Fuji. But a Moses does not climb Fuji to bring back tablets of Yahweh's commandments, and a Buddhist would not find Sinai representing 10 stages of contemplation on the ascent to Nirvana. Both Christ and the Buddha are associated with trees. But what is there but contrast between the cross and Crucifixion and the bo tree and enlightenment?

Rather than essential identity between the various symbols of ascent and descent, is it not then more accurate to claim only what the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein could see between what are called "games," that is only a "family resemblance"?

The universalist thesis, even if not true, at least induces us to observe that images of verticality are used to reinforce one another. Bernard McGinn, a student of medieval spirituality, observed that metaphors are used "in tandem," that is, that the writer refers to both "chain of being" and "Jacob's Ladder," to one tree limb above another in steps, etc. It is also so with visual images. In the background of a tower a mountain rises. The cross on which Christ hangs has a ladder by which he ascended and by which his body will be brought down. In Tintoretto's Crucifixion, Christ is apparently hanging onto the ladder. Some medieval painters have Christ's arms nailed to the arms of a tree. In a medieval Jewish painting, beside a Jacob's Ladder is the pillar described as a sacred symbol at Bethel (Sed-Rajna, p. 60). One of the most elegant carvings of Jesus ascending a mountain, after his burial and Resurrection, has a tree growing out of the tomb (Moon, p. 458). There are countless examples of replications of images in paintings, as there are of "metaphors in tandem" (Sullivan, p. 21).

Many symbols of climbing have a distinctly moral meaning. The ascent of Mount Sinai is to bring back the "Thou shalt" and "Thou shalt not" of the covenant. Even for those who find no meaning in the supernatural origin, and who scoff at the notion of laws written on stone by the finger of God, the notion of Exodus from slavery under the pharaoh to live under written moral law remains a most significant model of the good life. Similarly, even if the choice between the one and only Yahweh and the copulating deities of Mesopotamia is made in favor of the latter, the condemnation of building a tower to unlimited height and a city without bounds still may be a wise message of warning against overweening pride and unlimited growth.

The Gospel stories of temptation in the wilderness, on the pinnacle of the temple, on an exceeding high place may seem incredible in the visual image of the tempter Satan but meaningful as an example of refusing to be bribed by power into violating a principled commitment. Even more explicit are ladders of virtue and trees of virtues and trees of vices. The emblem tradition is full of allegorical representations of all aspects of good and evil (Droulers). The most famous collection in English has an allegorical title page. It is an invitation to leave the pit of hell behind, even the pleasures of Vanity Fair, and to strive upward. There are twin peaks, to strive to serve God through church or through state. The latter way, symbolized by the sword, is more steep and dangerous (Wither).

Aspiration and despair are among the most powerful human emotions and are expressed not only in word and image, but also in song. A favorite American folk song, a so-called Negro spiritual, contains the lines "We are climbing Jacob's ladder . . . Every rung goes higher, higher." But many do not rise, remaining at the foot of the ladder. There may be the illusion of climbing and gaining ground, as pictured by M. C. Escher, yet after climbing on three or four sides of a structure we find that we are lower than when we began. Is this no different than the paradox of earning more and more money, but finding through taxes and inflation that it buys less and less? In "Sixteen Tons" Tennessee Ernie Ford sang of the plight of the coal miner: "Another day's labor and deeper in debt . . . I owe my soul to the company store."

In contrast to a society in which there are no fixed classes, or at least in which there is no structure based on inherited position, there is the world of Upstairs, Downstairs, a television series that describes the world of the aristocracy, represented by Lord and Lady Bellamy, and the servants, over whom Mr. Hudson, the butler, reigns. The old standards were based on noblesse oblige of the master and obedience on the part of the servant. The old way that was being challenged, increasingly after World War I and with the Great Depression, with which the chronicle ends, is the premise that all are happier when each knows his or her place, whatever the level. The television series effectively shows the decay of the old theological assumption that there should be harmony because the good Lord has placed the rich man in his castle and also the poor man at the gate. What hierarchical principle is to replace it? It is to be replaced by the assumption of meritocracy, that all offices are open to those with talent, those who can rise to occupy the position for which he or she is best suited. From this perspective of encouraging people to strive to improve themselves and their circumstances, the old commandments "Know your place" and "Don't be uppity" block the individual and counter social progress.

Perhaps the most successful pictogram showing the human's place in the hierarchical cosmos is from a humanist text, Liber de Intellectu, by Charles de Bouelles (1510). On the left are steps up from what is the mineral level, symbolized by a stone, to what lives, symbolized by a tree, to what is sensible, the horse, to the top level, what is rational, man. On the right side are steps down. The top level is the scholar studying, the level of virtue. But descending to the level of sensual indulgence (luxuria) is a man admiring himself in a mirror. Beneath, on the vegetative level, is a portly man at his table, eating and drinking. On the bottom level is a man so drunk he is beyond caring for anything (acedia, the lowest level of vice).

Symbols of the vertical dimension are ways of picturing degrees from the best to the worst.

See also Fortune/Misfortune; Order/Chaos; Upside Down

Selected Works of Art

Mountains

Moses Receiving the Law, fresco, third century A.D.,

Damascus, Syria, from the Synagogue, Dura Europus, Damascus, Museum

Moses on Mount Sinai, mosaic, sixth century, Ravenna, Italy, San Vitale

Master Hugo, Moses Expounding the Law, frontispiece of the Bury Bible, illuminated manuscript, early twelfth century, Cambridge, England, Corpus Christi College

von Ems, Rudolf, Moses Sees the Backside of God's Head; Moses' Shining Face; the Ark of the Covenant, from Weltchronik, illuminated manuscript, copy, 1400–1410, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum (Ms 33, fol.89)

Grünewald, Matthias, Virgin and Child with Angels, middle panel of the Isenheim Altarpiece, 1510–1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden

Poussin, Nicolas, The Adoration of the Golden Calf, oil on canvas, 1626, San Francisco, California, M. H. de Young Memorial Museum

Meyring, Heinrich, Altar Piece, sculpture, 1634, Venice, Church of San Moise

Rembrandt van Rijn, Moses with the Tablets of the Law, oil on canvas, 1659, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

Pratt, Henry Cheeves, Moses on the Mount, oil on canvas, 1828–1829, Shelburne, Vermont, Shelburne Museum

Cézanne, Paul, Mount Sainte-Victoire Seen from Bibemus Quarry, oil on canvas, 1898–1900, Baltimore, Maryland, Baltimore Museum of Art

Steinberg, Saul, Portfolio, drawing, 1994, The New Yorker, March, 14, 1994

Varo, Remedios, Ascension to Mount Analogue, oil on canvas, 1960, private collection

Towers

The Building of the Tower of Babel, fresco on nave vault, early twelfth century, Saint-Savin-sur-Gartempe, France, Church

Mosaic, thirteenth century, Venice, Italy, Basilica of St. Mark

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Little Tower of Babel, oil on canvas, 1563, Vienna, Austria, Historical Museum

Tabula Militiae, woodcut, 1578, Strassburg Academy

Bruegel, Jan the Elder, Tower of Babel, oil on canvas, before 1625, Sienna Museum

Wither, George, title page of Emblemes, Ancient and Modern, engraving, 1635

Tablet of Cebes, engraving, from Vaeinius, 1672

Doré, Gustave, Tower of Babel, nineteenth century

Burne-Jones, Edward, Danaë and the Brazen Tower, oil on panel, 1872, Oxford, England, Ashmolean University

Ernst, Max, Towers, oil on canvas, 1914, Kingston Hill, Surrey, collection of Gabriele Keiller

Trees

The Tree of Enlightenment, pillar relief, first century B.C., Bharnut, India, Stupa

Sarcophagus with Reliefs of the Type of the Passion Sarcophagi, circa 360, Rome, Vatican, Museo Pio Cristiano

The Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, circa A.D. 400, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek

di Bonaguida, Pacino, Lignum Vitae, panel, 1303–1320, Florence, Italy, Accademia Nazionale Di San Luca

The Tree of the Estates of Man, illustration for the Book of Devotions of Wilhelm Werner Graf von Simmern, fifteenth century

Dürer, Albrecht, Adam and Eve, oil on canvas, sixteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Adam and Eve, wood, 1526, London, Courtauld Institute of Art

Cranach, Lucas the Younger, Illustration of Protestant Dogma, 1543, Bible of Elector John Frederick of Saxony, Wittenberg, Germany

Tree of Life, bronze, Indian, 1550–1700, Kansas City, Kansas, Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art

Sephirotic Tree, engraving, 1626, from Robert Fludd's Philosophia Sacra

Valentinus, Basilius, Tree of the Planets with two Alchemists, engraving, 1659, from Azoth

La Instruccion Es un Arbol de Vida, 1917–1918, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Judaica Collection (MS 729)

Crucifixion, New York, Morgan Library

Tree of Being, emblem used by the Philosophy Department of Syracuse University

Ashurnasirpal and the Sacred Tree, London, British Museum

Winchester Psalter: Tree of Jesse, British Library

Tree of Knowledge and Life Combined, missal of Archbishop Bernhard von Rohr of Salzburg, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek (Clm 15710)

Ladders

The Ladder of Thirty Virtues, copied in 1081 in The Heavenly Ladder of John Climacus of Sinai, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University, Garrett Collection of Medieval and Renaissance Manuscripts

The Ladder of Virtue, twelfth century, from Abbess Herrad of Landsberg's Hortus Deliciarum
de Dequileville, Guillaume, Pèlerinage de la Vie Humaine, fourteenth century, Brussels, Belgium, Bibliothèque Royale (MS 10174)

Orcagnesque Master of 1365, Scenes from the Life of Saint Romuald, Florence, Italy, Accademia Nazionale Di San Luca

Dürer, Albrecht, illustration to The Revelations of Saint Bridget, woodcut, circa 1500

Baldung, Hans, Adam's Ascent and Christ's Descent, woodcut, 1505, Nuremberg, Germany, Maria

Florentino, Rosso, The Descent from the Cross, oil on canvas, 1521, Volterra, Italy, Pinacoteca

The Vision of Saint Johannes Climacos, mid–sixteenth century, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Veronese, Paolo, Scala Jacob, oil on canvas, circa 1555–1556, Venice, Italy, Church of St. Sebastian Sacrate

Tintoretto, Crucifixion, oil on canvas, 1576–1581, Venice, Italy, La Scuola Grande di San Rocco

Ribera, Jusepe de, Jacob's Dream, oil on canvas, 1639, Madrid, Prado

Murillo, Bartolomé Estebán, The Dream of Jacob, oil on canvas, 1665–1670, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Blake, William, Jacob's Dream, pen and watercolor, circa 1805, London, British Museum

Turner, J. M. W., The Vision of Jacob's Ladder, oil on canvas, circa 1830, London, Tate Gallery

Doré, Gustave, The Vision of Jacob's Ladder, engraving, 1868

Beckmann, Max, The Descent from the Cross, oil on canvas, 1917, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Beckmann, Max, The Dream, 1921, St. Louis, Missouri, collection of Morton D. May

Miró, Joan, Dog Barking at the Moon, oil on canvas, 1926, Philadelphia, Philadelphia Art Museum

Chagall, Marc, Jacob's Dream, oil on canvas, 1954–1967, Nice, France, Musée National Message Biblique Marc Chagall

Ladder of Salvation, mural, twentieth century, Surrey, England, Chaldon Church

Moses and the Tablets of the Law, 1990

Miscellaneous

Masaccio, The Expulsion from Paradise, fresco, circa 1427, Florence, Italy, Santa Mariadel Carmine, Brancacci Chapel

Michelangelo, The Expulsion from the Garden of Eden, fresco, 1508–1512, Rome, The Vatican, Sistine Chapel, Ceiling

Titian, Assumption of the Virgin, altarpiece at Franciscan Church, oil on canvas, 1518, Venice, Italy, Santa Maria Gloriosa dei Frari

The Ascension of the Mohammed, 1539–1543, from a Persian manuscript, London, British Library

Titian, Sisyphus, from the Four Condemned series, paintings, 1548, Madrid, Prado

Giordano, Luca, Sisyphus, painting, before 1705, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis

Burne-Jones, Edward, The Golden Stairs, oil on canvas, 1880, London, Tate Gallery

Burne-Jones, Edward, The Wheel of Fortune, oil on canvas, 1883, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Stuck, Franz von, Sisyphus, painting, 1899, New York, private collection

Dalí, Salvador, Crucifixion, oil on canvas, 1954, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Dalí, Salvador, The Sacrament of the Last Supper, oil on canvas, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Sutherland, Graham, Noli Me Tangere, 1959, altarpiece at Chichester Cathedral

Escher, M. C., Ascending and Descending, lithograph, 1960

Kokoschka, Oskar, Tantalus and Sisyphus, from The Odyssey: Forty-four Lithographs, 1965

Further Reading

Biedermann, Hans, Knaurs Lexikon der Symbole, New York: P. Lang, 1987

Bool, F. H., J. R. Kist, J. L. Locher, and F. Wierda, M. C. Escher: His Life and Complete Graphic Work, New York: Abrams, 1982

Cames, Gerard, Allegories et Symboles dans l'Hortus deliciarum, Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1971

Cook, Arthur Bernard, "The Pillar of Light and the Soul-Ladder," in Zeus: A Study in Ancient Religion, New York: Biblo and Tannen, 1965

Cook, Roger, The Tree of Life: Symbol of the Centre, London: Thames and Hudson, 1974

Doré, Gustave, The Doré Bible Illustrations, New York: Dover, 1974; London: Constable, 1974

———, The Doré Illustrations for Dante's Divine Comedy, New York: Dover, 1976; London: Constable, 1976

Droulers, Eugène, Dictionnaire des Attributs, Allegories, Emblèmes et Symboles, Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols, 1948

Fraenger, Wilhelm, Hieronymus Bosch, New York: Putnam, 1983; London: Bracken, 1989

Freedman, Joseph S., "Philosophy Instruction During the Reformation," in History of Universities, volume 5, 1985

Gerard, Max, ed., Dalí, New York: Abrams, 1986

Godwin, Joscelyn, Robert Fludd: Hermetic Philosopher and Surveyor of Two Worlds, Boulder, Colorado: Shambala, 1979; London: Thames and Hudson, 1979

Goodenough, Erwin Ramsdell, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, New York: Pantheon, 1953; Oxford: Princeton University Press, 1953

Hagen, Oskar Frank Leonard, Hans Baldungs Rosenkranz, Seelengärtlein, Zehn Gebote, Zwölf Apostel, Munich, Germany: Piper, 1928

Hardwick, Mollie, The World of Upstairs, Downstairs, New York: Holt, Rinehart, Winston, 1976

Heninger, S. K. Jr., The Cosmographical Glass: Renaissance Diagrams of the Universe, San Marino, California: Huntington Library, 1977

- Janson, H. W., History of Art, London: Thames and Hudson, 1962; Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, third edition, 1986
- Keynes, Geoffrey, ed., William Blake's Illustrations to the Bible: A Catalog, London and New York: Trianon, 1957
- Kirschbaum, Engelbert, S. J., Lexikon der Cristlichen Ikonographie, Rome: Herder, 1968–1972
- Kuntz, Marion Leathers, and Paul Grimley Kuntz, Jacob's Ladder and the Tree of Life: Concepts of Hierarchy and the Great Chain of Being, New York: Peter Lang, 1987
- Kuntz, Paul Grimley, ed., "Hierarchy Today," Contemporary Philosophy XIII:VII (March/April 1991)
- Lackner, Stephan, Max Beckmann, New York: Abrams, 1991; London: Thames and Hudson, 1991
- Ladner, Gerhardt B., "Medieval and Modern Understanding of Symbolism: A Comparison," Speculum LIV:II (April 1979)
- von Landsberg, Harrard, Abbess of Hohenburg, Hortus Deliciarum, London: Warburg Institute, 1979
- Martin, John Rupert, Illustration of the Heavenly Ladder of John Climacus, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1954
- Maslow, Abraham Harold, Religions, Values, and Peak-Experiences, Columbus: Ohio State University, 1964; Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1976
- Mayer, August L., Murillo, Des Meisters Gemälde, Stuttgart, Germany: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1923
- Merton, Thomas, The Seven Storey Mountain, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1948; London: Sheldon Press, 1975
- Moon, Beverly, An Encyclopedia of Archetypal Symbolism, Boston: Shambala, 1991
- Nicolson, Marjorie Hope, Mountain Gloom and Mountain Glory: The Development of the Aesthetics of the Infinite, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1959
- Orgel, Stephen, Cebes in England: English Translations of the Tablet of Cebes, from Three Centuries with Related Materials, New York: Garland, 1980
- Patrides, C. A., "Hierarchy and Order," in Dictionary of the History of Ideas: Studies of Selected Pivotal Ideas, Phillip P. Wiener, ed., New York: Scribner, 1973
- Pope-Hennessy, John Wyndham, Paradiso: The Illuminations to Dante's Divine Comedy by Giovanni di Paolo, New York: Random House, 1993; London: Thames and Hudson, 1993
- Réau, Louis, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1955
- Reeves, Marjorie and Beatrice Hirsch-Reich, The Figurae of Joachim of Fiore, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1972
- Samek-Ludovici, Sergio, and Nino Ravenna, Dante's Divine Comedy: Fifteenth-Century Manuscript, New York: Cresent, 1979
- Schiller, Gertrud, Iconography of Christian Art, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1971; London: Lund Humphries, 1971
- Sed-Rajna, Gabrielle, The Hebrew Bible in Medieval Illuminated Manuscripts, New York: Rizzoli, 1987
- Sullivan, Lawrence E., "Axis Mundi," in Encyclopedia of Religion, Mircea Eliade, ed., New York: Macmillan, 1986; London: Collier, 1993
- The Vatican Collections: The Papacy and Art*, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1982
- Wither, George, Emblemes: A Collection of Emblems, Ancient and Modern, London: Robert Allott, 1635; Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1975

AUTOMATA

Karen Pinkus

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Automata:

CLASSICAL
SIXTEENTH, SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

NINETEENTH AND
TWENTIETH CENTURIES

Jacques de Vaucanson, Le mécanisme du fluteur automate, 1738, frontispiece, Houghton Library, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts. (Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts)

The general concept of an artificial being or machine imitating natural (human) actions has emerged as a persistently significant topos throughout an extremely wide variety of historical and cultural moments. The automaton, however, ought to be distinguished from other analogous forms. As opposed to the robot, for example, the automaton is often specifically defined as any artificial device that (apparently) moves without human muscular intervention. The mechanical automaton saw its halcyon days as a pre-Industrial Revolution curiosity, and its spring-loaded action could be considered an important precursor to later productive machinery. Beginning much earlier, in the ancient world, automata were driven by water, steam, or pendulums. Even watches, clocks, musical instruments, locomotive engines, and steamships—none of which, clearly, bears any resemblance to a humanoid form—have been linked with the automaton. As an iconic motif, the one common denominator underlying all automata could be the semblance of self-propulsion or the explicit absence of a controlling human figure in some representation of a machine. Having stated this, however, the very notion of a representation of automatism is itself problematized by the definition. Because the automaton is normally a kinetic, three-dimensional form, on the one hand it may be impossible to distinguish it from other sculptural forms such as a mobile or fountain. On the other hand, the automaton is by its very nature differentiated from the (traditionally elevated) aesthetic category of painting, in relation to which it can necessarily only exist as a secondary representation. In short, automata are moving, sculptural works (which does not, of course, preclude their representation in two-dimensional form or in literary and philosophical discourse). In general, automata raise a series of issues concerning the significance of human action and volition.

Some of these issues are exemplified by the mask, one of the notable automatic figures of antiquity or cultures in general. The mask is traditionally three-dimensional, and although attached to a human form during ritual performances, it often appears to “speak” by itself, as in Greco-Roman theater. The mask raises cultural anxieties about the binary concepts of nature/culture, life/death, human/machine that are also potentially raised in discussions of automation. And like the robot of modernity, the ancient mask often bears some physiognomic relation to human characteristics. Speaking masks belong to the world of the uncanny, and they may even be confused with a similar form of early automation. Many early societies created sculpted, hollow bodies, statues that might emit “voices” (really the wind passing through specially designed holes). Some variations of the legend of Orpheus include an anecdote suggesting that after the poet had been decapitated, his head floated to the Isle of Lesbos, where it was said to emit prophecies. Another example of the hollow-bodied type of automata is the mythical speaking Colossus of Thebes. In ancient Egypt the statue of Amunoph III was supposed to utter sentences, understood only by certain initiates, when it was hit by the sun’s rays. In his Spiritualia Hero of Alexandria described many such machines either imported from Egypt or manufactured during his own time, and he himself became associated with their making through a form of cultural conflation or synecdoche.

The Trojan Horse, which “spoke” to the city guards in order to gain entrance to Troy, could thus be included in this category of speaking hollow bodies. In Greece such machines were linked in legend with Daedalus, the creator of the Cretan labyrinth and the creator par excellence of antiquity (later, moving and speaking statues were known as dédaliques). In the Iliad the temple of Hephaestus contains self-moving tripods capable of forging animate beings from boiling metal, and in the Meno Plato writes of statues (dédaliques) formed from metal in Crete that are so active they have to be chained to keep them from escaping. Scholars have also found the term dédaliques in a wide variety of scientific treatises of antiquity, referring, for example, to self-generating tripods that would change scenery during a dramatic presentation. In fact, the Minotaur could itself be considered an automaton, as could the hybrid bull with which Pasiphaë coupled to produce the Minotaur. The fact that Daedalus constructed the labyrinth confirms a broader cultural link between the monstrous hybrid and the architectural space it inhabits. The Minotaur is the beastly offspring of a transgressive coupling, just as the labyrinth represents the labor of a human endowed with god-like powers of construction.

Like these legends, the Pygmalion story raises questions of the propriety of relations between artificial and human forms and also of the automatism of sexuality itself, a concern that will surface later in the appearance of copulating automata from various historical periods and cultural sites. In the De Syria Dea, Lucian describes ithyphallic statues whose self-moving members would “rise” for special occasions or Bacchic festivals. The erotic automaton will emerge again in a more moralized version during the eighteenth century.

The narrative topos of the human-made demiurge reverses the natural order of the universe and appears to problematize creation itself. Fabricated statues appear in the Bible as idols, like the Golden Calf (Exodus 32:1–35; Psalms 106:19–23; Hosea 8:5–6; Acts 7:41). The myth of the golem is referred to in Psalms 139:15–16 and elsewhere in the Bible, where the term merely means a chaotic, divine substance and does not yet refer to a human-made monster as in the case of Dr. Frankenstein’s construction. In fact, the biblical Adam himself was originally a golem, a kind of inanimate figure given life in the Promethean tradition. And the sorts of cultural fears played out in such representations or narratives can also be found in numerous forms of art from African, Inuit, Hopi, and Pueblo cultures, for example. Masks and hollow-bodied forms with movable or self-speaking parts also populate mythology and theatrical traditions from China, Indonesia, and other regions of the Far East.

Automatic devices such as the water clock, first produced in antiquity, were revived during the reign of Charlemagne as courtly toys. Clocks with mechanical figures—precursors to the cuckoo clock—were known throughout the Middle Ages in elite circles. In a way they functioned as ritualistic objects inasmuch as they served to bind together a group of spectators who would marvel at their ingenuity. On the other hand, the mechanical homunculus aroused a certain degree of anxiety during the Middle Ages, partially because of its cultural link with pagan idols and with sexually explicit motion. Albertus Magnus is said to have constructed a talking clay automaton, following a narrative based on Promethean roots. Legend suggests that Thomas Aquinas smashed this “satanic” idol. Other similar stories have arisen, attesting to the tense relation between science and the Church.

Talking statues were commissioned in the Middle Ages and Renaissance and were also found in Baroque gardens as curiosities or courtly games. The sixteenth-century garden of Bomarzo, in Italy, included monstrous, mechanical figures that spouted water unexpectedly or made odd sounds as courtiers strolled through this artificial space.

During the early years of mercantilism, and especially after the invention of movable type, machines were represented in painting as part of a topos of social progress. But again, mere representations of technology do not necessarily fall within the automaton topos inasmuch as human intervention may not be concealed in a given instance. In Cesare Ripa’s Iconologia (1758–1760), Mechanica is figured as a woman who balances weights and pulleys on a scale. Behind her, in a framed scene, we see a representation of the historical-mythological Daedalus exhibiting one of his mechanical statues before a group of men in ancient Greek dress. Behind this scene is a harbor where packages are being loaded onto ships by a series of pulleys and cranes. The link between the foregrounded emblematic figure (who resembles Albrecht Dürer’s Melancholia), the middle-ground locus classicus of mechanical invention, and the background scene depicting the applications of Daedalus’s science is crucial; the automaton has become conflated with a more general topos of mechanization and is thus linked with industrial progress.

The automaton reached the peak of its popularity in the eighteenth century under the hands of masters such as Jacques de Vaucanson. His famous flute-playing faun traveled to the courts and was exhibited as a highly ornate amusement for the aristocracy. He also produced a duck that would “ingest” and then “digest” a grain of corn, excreting “feces” (which was probably only ground corn stored in another part of the duck until a mechanism triggered its expulsion). The scatological nature of this nonsensical toy is quite suggestive of the cultural position held by the automaton at this time; an amusing curiosity, it was also charged with anxiety, as exemplified by the excrement produced by the Vaucanson duck. Such famous automata as John Nevil Maskelyne’s psycho, which was able to play cards and make calculations, were based on the same principles of spring-driven action as the animals. Other devices, such as an automatic writer or chess player created by the Jaquet-Droz family, may have provoked more serious philosophical discussion about the potential threat posed to human supremacy by the machine.

Various self-playing or self-propelling mechanical instruments have been associated with automata. During the early seventeenth century a mechanical theater with spring-driven figures and music, produced in Salzburg, Austria, was immensely popular. During the eighteenth century Johann Wehrle and others in the Black Forest region of Germany produced marvelous musical clocks. Often these included human or animal figures that would turn around on a circular plate, disappear inside a house, and reemerge, signaling the change of the hour. Similar clocks included bells hit by hammers.

Over time, these spring-driven automata evolved into mass-produced toys that do not necessarily give rise to philosophical or existential anxieties. Nevertheless, it is extremely important to realize that the unique pieces manufactured during the eighteenth century are themselves works of art rather than mere iconic motifs to be reproduced or translated into paintings, for example, and this is confirmed by their current status as museum objects. Whatever their cultural or iconographic context, spring-driven toys require some human intervention (winding), and no matter how sophisticated, they are only following set mechanical patterns that have, in some sense, been designed into them; but it is precisely this primary human intervention that is masked or dissembled by the automaton.

This distinction from an ordinary machine—the level of dissimulation involved—led philosophers to construe the automaton as problematic related to questions of the soul. Seventeenth-century Dutch philosopher Baruch Spinoza defined human beings as spiritual automata, and this definition was taken up by German philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz in his concept of the monad. Various thinkers have remarked on the ambiguous status of the automata in relation to cognition. During the eighteenth century, it was viewed as a duplicitous character occupying a charged space between the rational and irrational. The automaton represented human folly as much as human achievement for preindustrial revolutionary thought. Toys such as the defecating duck were often construed as useless and wasteful by moralists, even though some makers of amusements later turned their abilities to the construction of more useful products, such as prosthetic devices.

The eighteenth century also ushered in a vogue for erotic automata, exquisitely constructed timepieces whose ticking motion was not only a metaphor for, but was literally figured in, copulating figures. The mechanical precedents for these figures are those clocks that include movable parts such as animals striking bells on the hour. The erotic pieces were primarily made in Neuchâtel, Switzerland, and were extremely expensive. In addition to watches, the Swiss craftsmen also made erotic automata on snuff boxes and signet rings. Like the defecating duck, these erotic automata not only amaze by the precision of their repetitions or actions, they also include reference to the philosophical discourse about the potential mechanization of all human actions. French caricaturist J. I. Grandville’s satirical Un autre monde (1844) takes this topos further. His engravings focus on the animation of inanimate objects that personify all the peccadilloes and behavior of the bourgeoisie.

The debate about the social threat posed by the machine places automation at the center of a much broader cultural polemic. Poet Rainer Maria Rilke’s essay on dolls reflects the anxiety posed by theoretically inanimate objects that manage to threaten a definition of what is human. Like Sigmund Freud's reading of E. T. A. Hoffmann's automatic doll Olympia (from the short story "The Sandman") in his essay "Das Unheimlich" (The Uncanny), Rilke's dolls come to life after they have outgrown the child; they represent the unveiling of "that which should have remained hidden." But dolls are also unresponsive in spite of their humanoid form and the human investment that children make in them, so they become abject as "the horrible foreign body on which we had wasted our purest ardour." Since they do not return emotion, they are figures of desire, always unattainable. Following Henri Bergson's influential essay on laughter, an artisan fashioned a rieur, a mechanical laughter whose uncanny stiffness mirrored the programmed nature of human reactions to what are ultimately cultural constructions of the humorous.

The term automaton thus became conflated with (imaginary) constructions of artificial intelligence, regardless of their anthropomorphism or the satisfaction of criteria such as the semblance of self-propulsion. Dada art made use of the image of the cyborg, a term coined in the 1920s from the combination of cybernetic and organism. Cyborgs are defined as a combination of human and nonhuman forms, normally a portrait of a human face with some form of machinery superimposed on it. They provide a link between the aesthetic category of the collage and the larger cultural problem of mechanization. During World War I, Giorgio De Chirico and Carlo Carrà were responsible for a style known as metaphysical painting that relied heavily on faceless mannequins. Posed in a variety of different ways, these humanoid figures were rendered in highly artificial colors. The mannequin becomes a central figure as it displays commodity goods in the store window and imitates human actions with lifelike poses. Eugène Atget's photograph of mannequins adorned with price tags has influenced a variety of theories of the commodity fetish in visual culture. But unlike older forms of automata, these modern mannequins do not move; in fact, it is their very immobility that fascinates a viewer.

Similarly, for André Breton, surrealism was conceived as a kind of automatism in which language intersects the human psyche but is not created specifically or consciously by the writing subject, a kind of psychic automatism corresponding roughly to the state of the dream. Breton's "automatic text" calls into question the status of language, desire, and the self, and this is seen as a positive development. Many works of canonical modernism are constructed around themes of mechanicity. In his "Manifesto of Surrealism" (1924) Breton described the phantasmagoric position of the surrealist subject with the automatist image of a "man cut in two by a window." The window in question is not the window pane of Albertian perspective painting (the frame to an objective outside world), but pure fantasy (interior). The surrealist subject finds himself both inside and outside a scene, and this is a connection to a primal fantasy or trauma that we might say comes from both within and without the subject. In relation to this, De Chirico wrote in an essay called "Mystery and Creation": "I remember one vivid winter's day at Versailles. . . . Everything gazed at me with mysterious, questioning eyes. And then I realized that every corner of the place, every column, every window possessed a spirit, an impenetrable soul." The exterior space is related to the castrating gaze of objects in many of his early paintings, and refers to the gaze of Hoffmann's "The Sandman."

Marcel Duchamp's painting Nude Descending a Staircase, as well as his sculpture The Bride Stripped Bare by Her Bachelors Even, both created in the early 1920s, could be said to express automatism in formal terms. Like the photographic experiments of Eadweard Muybridge and Étienne-Jules Marey, Duchamp's painting, with its multiple planes, decomposes the movement of a figure into a series of automatic gestures, but unlike the classical automata, this work does not presume to dupe the viewer into mistaking a handmade object for reality or self-propulsion.

Because of a perceived relationship with the mechanization of industry, the automaton became associated with the robot (often in relatively negative terms). In the 1920s, robot was coined in the title of Karel Capek's R.U.R., from a Czech word meaning a laborer. Machine labor and the subservience of human labor are thus radically linked in the robot. The robot has evolved into a central icon of mass and elite culture to the point that it has taken on all possible human values, from physical to ethical and even reproductive, making it virtually indistinguishable from its natural models. One of the best-known examples of the robot from mass culture is Robotrix from Fritz Lang's film Metropolis (1926), characterized by a metallic finish, machine body parts, and a humanoid shape. Played by actress Brigitte Helm, the robot does an extraneous seductive dance within the course of an otherwise serious political narrative. In part, this dance suggests that the robot functions in the film as a seductive spectacle, a marvel, in much the same way as the mechanical automata of eighteenth-century Europe amazed audiences purely by their lifelike motions. In general, the visual qualities and art direction that went into the creation of Lang's robot have been widely praised, while critics find the social content she embodied rather simplistic and sentimental. Lang conceived of this film while viewing the New York skyline from the deck of an ocean liner, so the robot definitely inhabits the most thoroughly modern urban space. The young hero Freder leads a revolt against the aristocracy from which he is himself descended. His father tries to block him by creating a robot to spread dissatisfaction among the workers, leading to mob violence as the robot is killed. In the film the robot is played by the same actress who plays the heroine, Maria, and is able to convey human qualities in the robot. Lang's robot has often been compared to the automata depicted in R.U.R., the Russian silent film Aelita (1924), and to figures from H. G. Wells's novels The Sleeper Wakes and The Time Machine.

Along with this anthropomorphic strain in art and narrative, the automaton based on a notion of seeming self-propulsion has shed its representational value and now exists as pure, productive machine. Many modern machines in use function according to the classical principles of the automaton, including devices such as the tide predictor and the electronic eye. In his cultural critique Symbolic Exchange and Death, postmodern theorist Jean Baudrillard makes a significant distinction between automata and robots. The former is termed a theatrical, mechanical counterfeit of human action, in homage to the eighteenth-century tradition of the curiosity. The latter is dominated by its very technical nature and by its status as a laborer. The former is associated with metaphysical questions about the nature of man, as in the philosophical tradition of the soci-ological, theatrical character type. The latter is much less optimistic and may be figured in totalitarian images of the mechanical body or various pessimistic science fictions that continue to dominate the visual landscape of postmodernity. This distinction should be upheld, since the automaton traverses a wide spectrum of cultures possessing a variety of technological means, whereas the robot-worker is a unique product of postindustrial society. In essence, then, we find a cultural shift beginning around the nineteenth century from the automaton as moving sculpture (animation of the inanimate) to the lifeless humanoid (inanimation of the animate). This clearly has to do with the impact of the machine age and the realization of new technological possibilities for commercial ends that displace human-artisanal intervention. Daedalus is thus transformed in the cultural imagination from a human force behind the animation of machines to the maker of machines that threaten to displace workers and, finally, to the self-generating machine in a scene eerily devoid of human figuration.

See also Dreams/Visions; Labor/Trades/Occupations; Labyrinth/Maze; Masks/Personae

Selected Works of Art

Classical

- Trojan Horse*, on wheels with figures inside, detail of a relief amphora, late seventh century B.C., Mykonos Museum
Medallion, with "automated" mask from ancient comedy, Roman, Rome, Villa Albani
Dioskourides, mosaic of scene from The Girl Possessed, performed with "automated" masks, from Pompeii, Naples, Museo Nazionale

Sixteenth, Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

- Hell Mouth*, from the Garden of Bomarzo, Italy, late sixteenth century, Bomarzo, Italy
 Swanenburgh, Isaac van, Cloth Manufacturing, painting, late sixteenth century, present location unknown
 Vaucanson, Jacques de, frontispiece from Le mécanisme du fluteur automate, 1738
Print, "actor" and "automated" mask engaged in a dialogue, from De Larvis scenicis et figuris comicis antiquorum romanorum, by Francesco Ficoroni, 1754
 Ripa, Cesare, Mechanica, from Iconologia, Hertel edition, 1758–1760
Tippoo's Tiger, Mechanical Organ, painted wood, from Mysore, circa 1795, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

- Muybridge, Eadweard, Automated Bodies, from The Human Figure in Motion, 1880s
 Chirico, Giorgio di, The Disquieting Muses, oil painting, 1916–1918, Milan, private collection, many replicas and variants, 1945–1972, in private collections
 Hausmann, Raoul, ABCD, circa 1923, fragments of photographs, typography, currency, tickets, maps, and ink on paper, Paris, Musée National d'Art Moderne

- Ray, Man, André Breton in front of Giorgio di Chirico's "The Enigma of the Day," photograph, circa 1925
 Atget, Eugène, Store Window, Avenue des Gobelins, photograph, 1925
 Berliner Ensemble performing Bertolt Brecht's The Caucasian Chalk Circle, with "automated" masks, 1956, East Berlin, Theater am Schiffbauerdamm
 Howard, Michael, Albert and the Lion, automation, wooden with electrical mechanism, 1983, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Further Reading

- Adcock, Craig, "Dada Cyborgs and the Imagery of Science Fiction," Arts Magazine 58 (October, 1983)
 Benhamou, Reed, "From Curiosity to Utilite: The Automaton in Eighteenth-Century France," Studies in Eighteenth Century Culture 17 (1987)
 Bierman, James, "Automated Theatre: Theatrical Futures from the Recent Past," Journal of Popular Culture 18 (Fall, 1984)
 Devauz, Pierre, Automates et automatisme, Paris, 1941
 Foster, Hal, "Conclusive Identity," October 57 (Summer 1991)
 Gross, Kenneth, The Dream of the Moving Statue, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1992
 Grosser, Hermann, "The Culture of the Automata and its Reflection in the Giorno," Giornale storico della letteratura italiana 160 (1983)
 Jüttemann, Herbert, Mechanische Musikinstrumente: Einführung in Technik und Geschichte, Frankfurt, Germany: Bochinsky, 1987
 Leo, Jean, Jouets, jeux, livres d'enfante, Brussels, Belgium: Le Grenier du Collectionneur, 1974
 Losano, Mario G., Storie di automi, Turin: G. Einaudi, 1990
 Maurice, Klaus, and Otto Mayr, eds., The Clockwork Universe: German Clocks and Automata, 1550–1650, Washington, D. C., 1980
 Mazlish, Bruce, The Fourth Discontinuity: The Co-Evolution of Humans and Machines, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1993
 Olms, Siegfried, "Power and Sound: Resounding Automata as Reality and Fiction in the Ancient and Medieval World," Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 118 (1989)
 Rilke, Rainer Marie, "Some Reflections on Dolls," in Selected Works, translated by G. Craig Houston, New York: Laughlin, 1967
 Segel, Harold, Pinocchio's Progeny: Puppets, Marionettes, Automata, and Robots in Modernist and Avant-Garde Drama, Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1995
 Sheringham, Michael, "Breton and the Language of Automatism: Alterity, Allegory, Desire," Forum for Modern Language Studies 18:2 (April 1982)
 Vaucanson, Jacques de, Le mécanisme du fluteur automate, Paris: Jacques Guerin, 1738; London: T. Parker, 1742

AVARICE

Priscilla Baumann

The following iconographic narratives are included in the discussion of the theme Avarice:

KING MIDAS

BATTLE OF THE VIRTUES AND VICES: THE PSYCHOMACHI-
AN TRADITION

PARABLE OF DIVES AND LAZARUS

MAN WITH PURSE HANGING FROM NECK

OTHER VARIATIONS
VICTORIAN GENRES

Usurer Capital, twelfth century, sculpture, Ennezat (Puy-de-Dôme), France, photo by Roger-Henri Baumann.
(Courtesy of Roger-Henri Baumann)

The vice of avarice, also known as cupidity, covetousness, or greed, consists of an inordinate desire to accumulate material wealth. More broadly, in some contexts, avarice can be understood as the excessive desire for anything; power and prestige, for example, are also commonly sought. In antiquity, philosophers, poets, and playwrights recognized the dangers of avarice. Plato considered it a moral hindrance to the good of society (Republic I:347; III:390; VI:485; VIII:548; Laws IX:870); Virgil decried the accursed love of gold (Aeneid 3:57); and Plautus wrote a comedy about miserliness (The Pot of Gold). The myth of King Midas likewise served to warn against the dangers of the love of gold.

During the Middle Ages the theme inspired artists throughout Latin Christendom. Considered one of the capital or “deadly” sins by Christian theologians, avarice reappears as a subject in many media, particularly manuscript illumination, wall painting, and, most frequently, in stone sculpture of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. This theme has continued to be a source of creative imagery for artists and writers from the Middle Ages to contemporary time. Depictions of avarice reflect the shifting preoccupations of society and manifest a rich and varied iconographic vocabulary.

Early patristic writers like Tertullian, St. Augustine, and St. Ambrose warned repeatedly against the dangers of avarice, basing their arguments on biblical texts, especially Paul’s statement that “cupidity is the root of all evil things” (I Timothy 6:10). Pope Gregory I referred to avarice as the queen of all vices. The Carolingian scholar Hincmar considered avarice, along with pride, the gravest of sins. Following the exhortations of religious reformers like Peter Damian and Ivo of Chartres, the emphasis shifted during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and the love of money came to be viewed as a particularly despicable sin, since it contributed directly to the wretched conditions of the poor. Throughout the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, theological tracts, confessors’ handbooks, and sermons reiterated the dangerous pitfalls resulting from this vice. Bernard of Clairvaux, for example, equated avarice with idolatry. Depictions of avarice proliferated, particularly in sculpture, and the subject rapidly became one of the most popular for artists throughout Western Europe, reflecting the ethical concerns of a society moving from an agrarian-feudal system to a money-based, profit economy.

During the Middle Ages three major iconographic traditions evolved to identify the theme of avarice. The earliest of these portrays the combat between the virtues and vices (for example, charity versus avarice), based on the Psychomachia of Prudentius, an allegorical poem describing the moral conflicts of the soul. Sixteen extant manuscripts dating from the ninth century to 1298 attest to the poem’s renown and pervasive influence. During the twelfth century the psychomachian treatment was especially popular with sculptors in southwestern France. Depictions of the virtues protected by their shields and stamping on the heads of vices, often arranged circumferentially on the archivolts of church portals, abound in Saintonge and Poitou.

Another iconographic variant derives from the biblical parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31). The story warns that selfish accumulation of riches in earthly life will result in punishment in the next. Dives, the rich man, is often shown feasting at a table; outside his gate the poor man Lazarus begs for food scraps as dogs lick his sores. One sculptural example is found on the wall of the south porch at Moissac, France, but the story also appears in other media, as, for example, in the stained-glass roundels at the Cathedral of Bourges, in France.

The most common iconographic motif, however, portrays a miser with a thick purse hanging from his neck. Demons usually surround him, ready to drag their victim to hell. Numerous examples of this vivid scene can be found on capitals and church portals, often strategically positioned to best attract the attention of the crowds of pilgrims and passers-by.

Two manifestations of avarice were of pivotal concern to moral theoreticians in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries: the vice of simony and the practice of usury. Simony referred to the buying or selling of ecclesiastical office and was one of the prime targets of church reformers. Named after the sorcerer Simon Magus, who offered money to St. Peter for spiritual power, the subject appears infrequently in art. A dramatic exception is found on a capital at Autun, France, where Simon Magus is depicted hurtling to the Earth after having paid for the power to fly. Usury, the practice of lending money at interest, was considered a particularly reprehensible crime, as evidenced by the countless tracts, sermons, and papal bulls forbidding the activity. John of Salisbury considered no vice more insidious, and it was generally understood that the usurer’s soul was damned for eternity. Although any iconographic reference to avarice could, in theory, include usury, in the province of Auvergne, in central France, specific warnings are carved on the banderoles of capitals decrying the practice of usury as the work of the devil. On a capital at Ennezat, France, two winged demons grip a naked man with a thick purse tied around his neck. A detailed inscription, carved on a large scroll spanning all three faces of the block, reads: “Since you have practiced usury, you have done my work.” There is no doubt that usury was the moral plague of the twelfth century, and these sculptural vestiges offer a dramatic witness to the ethical concerns of the period.

With the rise of a powerful merchant class during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, merchants and bankers, whose aim was to make a profit, were less rigorously stigmatized. Avarice became less a “deadly sin” than a serious social vice. But the flagrant dissipation and exaggerated consumption of the wealthiest in this new moneyed class caused general hatred of the rich, and invectives against avarice continued.

Dante condemns cupidity and identifies the covetous sinners in hell with the common medieval attribute, a purse around the neck (Inferno, XVII:55). Mirroring the popular sermons of the time, the avaricious soul in hell is depicted in some manuscripts with demons forcing coins into the sinner’s mouth. Reflecting a more materialistic and worldly society, an illuminated manuscript of the popular fourteenth-century satirical poem the Roman de Fauvel shows Avarice as a temptingly attractive creature, in elegant courtly attire, gracefully holding a purse on her lap.

Medieval preoccupation with the sin of avarice persisted with Flemish painters, who developed the theme in meticulous detail. Hieronymus Bosch’s Death and the Miser, for example, emphasizes the necessity of spiritual reform and reflects contemporary concern with the deliberate accumulation of temporal possessions.

In 1556 Pieter Bruegel the Elder completed a series of drawings entitled The Vices. Unlike earlier artists, Bruegel did not intend to warn against individual vices as sins to be avoided; rather, for him the vices were natural human passions, the motivating force behind this earthly realm of folly. In his drawing Avaritia, a multitude of activities based on the lore of popular proverbs depict the perennial and insidious attractions of money. The figure of Avarice appears as a blind princess who caresses the coins poured into her coffer by a bestial creature dressed as a monk.

References to avarice appear frequently in the seventeenth century. The French dramatist Molière’s comedy L’Avare (The Miser) treats the subject as a despicable, but human, and laughable, defect of character. The subject is seen often in paintings of the period, as, for example, in Luca Giordano’s Parable of Dives and Lazarus. It is in Holland, however, during the prosperous Golden Age of the seventeenth century, that the vice of avarice is depicted in many media, reflecting Calvinist preaching against the diabolical greed of financial speculation, the “despotism of Queen Money.” Hendrik Pot’s painting The Miser provides a chilling vision of an avaricious woman surrounded by costly possessions, her gaunt cheeks a negative reflection of stuffed moneybags hanging on the wall. The stifling, airless interior, so full of lifeless objects, contrasts vividly with a view of the clear sky and delicate branches of a tree seen through the window.

The theme of avarice is found most frequently in art and literature during times of radical social upheaval. The twelfth century was one of these periods, when anxiety about the ethics of a profit economy was reflected in a proliferation of theological tracts and sculptural images concerning the dangers of avarice. The Industrial Revolution of the nineteenth century incited a similar reconsideration of the subject. William Powell Frith, for example, painted a moral tale in five parts about the life of a corrupt financier.

Artists and writers concerned with social reform contrasted the abysmal poverty of the urban working class with the insatiable greed of capitalistic schemers. Charles Dickens described selfishness and greed with anatomical detail in novels like Martin Chuzzlewit and Our Mutual Friend; his usurer in Bleak House and Scrooge in A Christmas Carol epitomize the meanness of the avaricious character and portray the resulting misery inflicted on the victims of such men. In the novels of Honoré de Balzac, the insidious danger of cupidity is personified in such manipulative characters as Rastignac, Vautrin, and the avaricious father of Eugénie Grandet.

Artists like Honoré Daumier and Charles Meryon emphasized the pervasive poverty of city life, and during the nineteenth century the vice of avarice is often indirectly personified in the guise of an arrogant banker or corpulent diner. Alphonse Chigot’s 1857 lithograph The Stock Exchange depicts Capital as a rapacious demon, with the poverty and disaster resulting from its power evidenced in the swarming masses surrounding the stock exchange building.

The theme reappears in twentieth-century art and literature as well. Notable literary examples include François Mauriac’s novel Le Noeud de Vipères (Nest of Vipers) and Ezra Pound’s visceral condemnation of usury (Cantos XLV). Paul Klee’s 1929 etching the Miser, a sophisticated reduction of all the despicable characteristics of a miser, provides yet another example of the fascination of the subject.

Throughout the centuries, depictions of the theme of avarice reflect society’s ambivalence toward the use and misuse of wealth. Whenever too glaring a disparity exists between rich and poor, the grim despotism of Queen Money, so aptly named by the seventeenth-century Dutch, is mirrored in the art of the time. The perennial temptation of avarice remains a recurrent theme in the art and literature of Western civilization.

See also Envy; Money; Sin/Sinning; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

King Midas

Poussin, Nicolas, Midas Bathing in the River Pactolus, painting, circa 1629, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Francken, Frans the Younger, King Midas at the Table, painting, circa 1642, Braunschweig, Germany, Herzog Anton Ulrich Museum

Battle of the Virtues and Vices: The Psychomachian Tradition

Manuscript, eleventh century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (MS 2077, fol. 170v)

Sculpture, circa 1130, south transept window, and archivolt of central portal, west entrance, Aulnay, France, St. Pierre

Sculpture, circa 1280, porch, Strasbourg, Saskatchewan, Canada, Cathedral

Parable of Dives and Lazarus

Sculpture, twelfth century, west wall of porch, Moissac, France, St. Pierre

Stained Glass, north wall of ambulatory, thirteenth century, Bourges, France, Bourges Cathedral

Giordano, Luca, The Parable of Dives and Lazarus, late seventeenth century, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
Sculpture, doorway plaque, Gouda, The Netherlands, St. Janskerk

Man with Purse Hanging from Neck
Sculpture, circa 1140–1150, originally from south-central France or Limousin, present location, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
Sculpture, capitals of Auvergne: Chanteuges, Ennezat, Lavaudieu, Saignes, twelfth century
Wall Painting, thirteenth century, west wall, Chaldon Church, Surrey, St. Peter and St. Paul

Other Variations

Manuscript, fourteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (MS Fr 146, fol. 12v)
 Bosch, Hieronymus, Death and the Miser, circa 1490, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Samuel H. Kress Collection
 Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Avaritia, drawing, 1556, London, British Museum
 Pot, Hendrick, The Miser, painting, before 1657, Bonn, Germany, Rheinisches Landesmuseum
 Chigot, Alphonse, The Stock Exchange, lithograph, 1857, Paris, Musée Carnavalet

Klee, Paul, The Miser, etching, 1929, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Busch-Reisinger Museum

Victorian Genres

Frith, William Powell, The Race for Wealth: 1. The Spider and the Flies; 2. The Spider at Home; 3. Victims; 4. Judgment; 5. Retribution, series of five paintings, 1880, Baroda, India, Baroda Museum and Picture Gallery

Further Reading

Baumann, Priscilla, “The Deadliest Sin: Warnings Against Avarice and Usury on Romanesque Capitals in Auvergne,” Church History 59 (1990)
 Katzenellenbogen, Adolf, Allegories of the Virtues and Vices in Medieval Art from Early Christian Times to the Thirteenth Century, London: Warburg Institute, 1939; New York: Norton, 1964
 LeGoff, Jacques, Your Money or Your Life, Zone, 1988
 Little, Lester K., “Pride Goes Before Avarice: Social Change and the Vices in Latin Christendom,” American Historical Review 76 (1971)
 Schama, Simon, The Embarrassment of Riches: An Interpretation of Dutch Culture in the Golden Age, New York: Knopf, 1987; London: Collins, 1987

BACCHANALIA/ORGY

Sarah S. Gibson

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Bacchanalia/Orgy:

ANCIENT AND CLASSICAL

EARLY CHRISTIAN AND
MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Joachim Wtewael, The Wedding of Peleus and Thetis, 1612, oil on copper, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute. (Courtesy of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute, Williamstown, Massachusetts)

Bacchanalia is the Latin word for what were originally Greek religious rites celebrated in honor of the god Dionysus (Bacchus). By extension it has come to mean drunken revelry, but some reference to the god and his gift of wine should be present. Thus the “merry company” and gaming scenes beloved of seventeenth-century artists are not bacchanalia and can be traced to different origins. Orgy is derived from the Greek word orgia, denoting the secret rites performed for various deities, including Dionysus. Frenzied dancing, singing, drinking, and sexual activity characterized these rituals. Dionysiac (Bacchic) themes illustrating the many myths connected with the god were popular in both classical and post-classical visual art. Preeminent among these themes is the bacchanal depicting a banquet scene of more or less riotous behavior. Bacchanal does not carry quite the pejorative connotation of orgy. The latter usually refers to revelry of unrestrained indulgence, debauchery, and dissolution, although this is far from its original meaning.

Artistic representations of bacchanalia, and individuals participating in them, were widespread throughout antiquity. Renaissance and Baroque artists leaned heavily upon the classical heritage, reinterpreting the myths according to their own and their patrons’ desires. Bacchic themes were popular in the eighteenth century, but with a decided emphasis on their erotic qualities. Nineteenth-century artists tended either to perceive Bacchic subjects as orgies that could serve moralizing purposes or to re-create a lost golden age. Early twentieth-century artists, especially Pablo Picasso, turned again to classical Bacchic motifs, but the nonfigurative art of the later twentieth century did not provide much opportunity for mythic representations.

In contrast to public Greek and Roman religious observances, Bacchic mysteries were secret forms of worship available only to the initiate. Livy describes them in his history of Rome (circa 29 B.C.) where he notes they were so notorious for drunkenness, wild dancing, and dismemberment of animals, that the Roman Senate banned their celebration in 186 B.C.

The maenads (bacchantes) who conducted the ancient Dionysiac rituals were ordinary mortal women possessed by the spirit of the god. Their frenzied activity was acceptable in conjunction with the celebration of rites apparently designed to induce a sense of freedom and well-being. Additionally, promises about rebirth seem to have been a part of the mysteries.

But there was a dark side to this exhilaration. Bacchantes under the god’s inspiration were reported to perform extraordinary feats of strength, uprooting trees and tearing apart wild animals to eat raw flesh. The aim of the frenzy and eating of flesh was to become one with the god and his power.

Traditional attributes of the maenads include exotic animal skins and garlands. They usually carry the thyrsus, a pole wreathed in ivy, a plant sacred to the god, and topped by a pine cone. Satyrs and Sileni often accompanied maenads in their revels.

Satyrs were creatures of the woods with a partly human form, but possessing some bestial trait such as a horsetail, the ears of an ass, or the legs of the goat. The Romans identified them with fauni (fauns), although these creatures are usually regarded as being more gentle than satyrs.

Silenus, in Greek myth, was a creature half man, half animal who embodied the spirit of wildlife. Later portrayals showed a fat, bald old man addicted to Dionysus’s gift of wine and possessing pointed ears as a vestige of his animal self. Silenus is sometimes represented as the tutor of Dionysus (Bacchus), and groups of sileni—creatures similar in form—are often present in the train of the god. Satyrs and sileni pursue the pleasures of wine and women that mortals are constrained to pursue only in fantasy. These free spirits engage in music making, dancing, and drinking, seemingly in a constant state of sexual excitement. But they are seldom cruel and in the course of time came to resemble ordinary human beings.

Bacchic revels were among the most popular subjects on Greek vases. One example is an Attic black-figure oenochoe with Dancing Maenads and a Panther (circa 525–500 B.C.), now in Harvard University’s Fogg Art Museum in Cambridge, Massachusetts. These kinds of scenes appealed equally to the Romans as evidenced by wall paintings from the Villa of the Mysteries (circa 50 B.C.) in Pompeii and marble sarcophagi found throughout the Roman world. The longevity of portrayals of these revels can be seen in the fourth-century A.D. Mildenhall Plate in the British Museum in London, in which loose-haired maenads carrying thyrsi and animal-skin-clad satyrs dance with abandon to the music of cymbals, flute, and tambourine. A fifth- or sixth-century silver ewer from Syria, now in the Cleveland Museum of Art in Ohio, shows a more restrained Bacchic thiasos (a group gathered to worship a deity).

In Greek mythology, Dionysus was an important god, although rather different from the other Olympian deities. He was the god of wine and ecstasy, giving joy and assuaging cares, who was experienced through the surrender of self-identity. Reflecting this characteristic was his association with theater and masks. His simplest image consists of a mask on a column draped with a cloth.

Dionysus was twice born, first from the womb of his mother and then from the thigh of his father. He was the son of Zeus, the king of the gods, and Semele, daughter of Cadmus, king of Thebes. Zeus’s wife, Hera, jealous as usual, contrived to have Semele disposed of, but Zeus rescued his unborn child, who was then placed in his father’s thigh to be born in due course. The myths tell many of Dionysus’s adventures and vicissitudes. Among these was his rescue of Ariadne after Theseus had abandoned her. The subsequent wedding feast celebrating the marriage of Dionysus and Ariadne is thus the prototypical bacchanal.

Dionysus's divinity was not universally recognized, so that he was forced to travel, even to India, to gain converts, ultimately triumphing over all his persecutors. Scenes of triumphs are also important visual themes that recount the Dionysian (Bacchic) myths. Even his mother's sister, Agave, did not recognize Dionysus, and Agave's son Pentheus, king of Thebes, was in turn hostile to his worship. The means whereby Dionysus proved his power formed the basis of Euripides' tragedy The Bacchae (first performed at Athens in 405 B.C.). At the climax of this play, Agave, in a Dionysian-induced frenzy, bears her son's head back to the city after he has been torn to pieces by the women of Thebes. Upon recovering her senses, she realizes that she has killed her own son. This dark side of the god's power is in striking contrast to his general affability as the giver of wine and honey who understands and accepts human nature, tolerating excesses in his followers.

Dionysus (Bacchus) was originally portrayed as a rather dignified deity, as in the Berlin Painter's Attic red-figured lekythos (circa 480 B.C.), now in the Fogg Art Museum, where he is shown as a fully clothed, mature, bearded man wearing a crown of ivy leaves. A change occurred in his appearance in the second half of the fifth century B.C. when he became more like the youthful Apollo, as on a hydria (circa 400 B.C.), also in the Fogg Art Museum, painted in the manner of the Meidias Painter. On this vase the god is shown as a seminude young man. In Roman guise he was represented as a handsome youth bearing grapes or a wine cup, and his Roman maenads were more interested in erotic pursuits than their Greek predecessors had been.

In late antiquity Dionysus (Bacchus) continued to enjoy popularity as the god of ecstatic release through wine and revelry; the hedonistic aspects of his cult were emphasized, as was his connection with the harvest festival. The early Christians easily assimilated Roman forms of Dionysian (Bacchic) images, no doubt because of his reputation as a saving god and because of the parallels that could be drawn between his life and that of Jesus Christ. Both were sons of a god and a mortal mother; they dwelt among mortals but descended to the underworld, Dionysus (Bacchus) to rescue his mother, Semele, from the realm of the dead. Both gave their followers promise of rebirth after death. Wine formed an important element in the rituals associated with both figures, and the devouring of raw flesh suggested that the Dionysian (Bacchic) myth may have found an echo in the Eucharistic host. The god's attributes of grapevine and grape clusters were also borrowed by the early Christians to symbolize the wine of the Eucharist and the blood of Christ. A mosaic of the mid-fourth century A.D. in the ambulatory of Santa Costanza in Rome incorporates a scene of putti engaged in harvesting grapes that related to Dionysian (Bacchic) precursors. Another example, among many, of Christian assimilation of the Dionysian motifs is found in a late-fourth-century sarcophagus from the Catacomb of Praetextatus in Rome. It combines the image of the Good Shepherd with putti harvesting grapes and trampling them in a wine press.

Bacchanalia and other Bacchic manifestations seemed to have captivated Renaissance and Baroque artists and patrons. Elaborate scenes of the gods' banqueting, woodland revels with satyrs, fauns, nymphs, and maenads, had widespread appeal. Certainly an erotic element underlies many of these images, but they are also pervaded by a joyous hedonism. Such scenes had clear antique prototypes in the Bacchic processions carved on sarcophagi, many of which were well known to Renaissance artists. Additional inspiration was to be found in numerous literary sources.

Solitary images of Bacchus were also popular, such as Michelangelo's sculpture of the young god (1496–1497) who holds a wine cup aloft in a gracefully drunken contraposto. Jacopo Sansovino adopted the composition for a Bacchus of his own (1511). While these figures certainly suggest high-spirited, tipsy revelry, they do not, by themselves, constitute a full-blown bacchanalia. In 1514 Giovanni Bellini painted for Alfonso d'Este's Camerino d'Alabastro a scene derived from a somewhat ribald passage from Ovid's Fasti about the sacrifice of an ass to Priapus. Now known as The Feast of the Gods, located in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., it is most often called a bacchanal and indeed depicts the Olympian deities fully enjoying the gift of ivy-berried Bacchus, shown as a child drawing the wine from a keg. Titian (and possibly also Dosso Dossi) later reworked the picture but did not disguise the fact that Bellini portrayed the gods less as idealized beings than as everyday people. A certain lightheartedness pervades the painting; if not entirely decorous—some of the gods seem to have suffered from the effects of the wine—they are certainly not indulging in riotous behavior.

Somewhat later, in 1520–1522, Titian supplied two more Bacchic pictures for Alfonso. One, the Bacchus and Ariadne in the National Gallery in London, shows the moment when Bacchus discovers Ariadne and, leaping from his chariot, claims her as his bride. Strictly speaking it cannot be called a bacchanal as there is no feasting or drinking; it falls into the category of Bacchus's triumphs or processions in which the god is accompanied by his boisterous train of followers—bacchantes, satyrs (even a baby satyr), and a fat, drunken Silenus precariously seated on an ass. In the other picture, The Bacchanal of the Andrians (1523–1525), in the Prado in Madrid, deities and mortals mingle to share the river of wine that the god had bestowed upon the inhabitants of Andros. Titian captures the exuberant hedonism of this supposed golden age as imagined by the men and women of the Renaissance. The text of the music that can be discerned in the foreground sets the tone: "Who drinks and does not drink again knows not what drinking is." A certain voluptuousness and sensuality underlie the scene, characteristics that will be often repeated and made more overt by succeeding generations of artists.

Dating from almost a century later, Joachim Wtewael's Wedding of Peleus and Thetis (formerly entitled Bacchanal, 1612), in the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, Massachusetts, is a good example of the trend toward eroticism. The painting is still decorous enough, with little suggestion of dissoluteness, to have been appropriate as a celebration piece for a marriage—as other wedding scenes, such as that of Bacchus and Ariadne often were—but it also appears to be an excuse for a display of virtuosity in the depiction of nude figures and the lush richness of the setting. The main sources for the story of the wedding of Peleus and Thetis are to be found in Ovid and in Catullus's Carmina. It was this feast that set in train the events leading to the Trojan War.

All the gods except Eris, goddess of discord, had been invited to the wedding festivities. Eris, enraged, dropped a golden apple inscribed "To the Fairest" into the midst of the banqueters. Hera (Juno), Athena (Minerva), and Aphrodite (Venus) each claimed the apple and asked Paris, a prince of Troy, to select from among them. Each promised him a reward, and he chose Aphrodite's bribe of the most beautiful woman in the world. Thus Paris came to steal Helen from King Menelaus of Sparta and took her home to Troy. Menelaus, rallying his Greek comrades, pursued the pair to the gates of Troy, which then endured a 10-year siege ending in its destruction and the return of Helen to her original husband.

The wedding of Peleus and Thetis was one of Wtewael's favorite subjects. In the Clark version, Discord can be seen flying above the revelers, about to hurl her golden apple of contention. Among the gods pictured are Poseidon (Neptune) with his trident at the lower left; Aphrodite and Ares (Mars) embracing in the center; Zeus (Jupiter), wearing a crown at right center; beside him Artemis (Diana) wearing a crescent moon diadem; and of course, grapevine-clad Dionysus (Bacchus) on the right, pouring a jug of wine, a satyr at his feet. The story of the judgment of Paris can be seen in the distant background, just to the right of center.

Art historian Anne Lowenthal observes that a didactic vein underlay much of seventeenth-century Dutch art, and that a picture such as this one would have appealed to the Dutch penchant for deciphering works with multivalent symbolism. Although the moral point (discord takes over when moderation is forgotten) may be clear, the pleasure of the sensuous life is also clear. Because of this disjunction, we may ask if the moralizing is meant quite so seriously (Lowenthal, pp. 56–57).

In Peter Paul Rubens's interpretation of Titian's Andrians, painted in the mid-1630s, now in the National Museum in Stockholm, Sweden, no moralizing tone is present. His painting is an exuberant bacchanal, but with an emphasis on earthly passions and expressions. Titian's beautiful sleeping nymph snores with her mouth open, obviously a little the worse for wine.

A different, cooler spirit prevails in the bacchanals of Nicolas Poussin, such as his Bacchanal Before a Term of Pan (early to mid-1630s), in the National Gallery in London. Poussin's maenads have a sharpness and clarity reminiscent of ancient bas-reliefs, but they have a carefree rhythm that evokes a poetic, poignantly nostalgic view of the vanished golden age.

Somewhat earlier, Rubens had selected a different episode from the Bacchic myths for a group of works dating from 1617 to 1626. These depict the drunken Silenus, whose tale is taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses. Silenus, the foster father and tutor of Bacchus, was found wandering in a drunken stupor by some Phrygian peasants, who crowned him with vine leaves and carried him to King Midas. Recognizing him, Midas entertained him, then led him back to Dionysus, who rewarded Midas by granting his wish for the golden touch.

In Rubens's first Silenic procession (circa 1617–1618), in the Alte Pinacothek in Munich, Germany, Silenus is flanked at the left by an old peasant woman and a faun, while he is supported on the right by a black man and a maenad. Several other peasants, baby fauns, a goat, and a vomiting maenad complete the scene. The inviting gaze of the bacchante as she supports Silenus imparts a sense of eroticism to the picture. This painting was evidently the source for Anthony Van Dyck's Drunken Silenus (circa 1620), in the Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister der Staatlichen Kunstsammlungen in Dresden, Germany.

Rather different in tone is Diego Velázquez's Bacchus (1629), in the Prado. Here the youthful god appears in the company of a group of Spanish peasants, all male. One kneels to receive a crown of vine leaves while two others invite the viewer into the scene with tipsy smiles. A sense of very earthy well-being pervades the painting, but Bacchus's slightly sly, sideways glance and the leering quality of the smiles of two of the peasants suggest that more may be going on than is actually pictured.

Eroticism becomes the dominant strain in bacchanals of the eighteenth century. Seldom do the works feature feasts of the Olympian deities. Prevalent are woodland revels with overt sexual implications, such as Charles-Joseph Natoire's Maenads Surrounded by Satyrs and Infants, in the Fogg Art Museum, where two old satyrs leeringly lift the drapery from a sleeping maenad. There are of course marked exceptions to this tendency—almost voyeurism—as in a pair of Wedgwood vases with bacchanalian dancers (circa 1789), based on a frieze from the Borghese krater.

These two opposing tendencies, eroticism combined with the orgiastic aspects of the bacchanal and a classicizing historicism, combine in the nineteenth century. Two examples are Thomas Couture's The Romans of the Decadence (1847), in the Louvre in Paris, and Lawrence Alma-Tadema's The Women of Amphisia (1887), in the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute. Both are imaginary reconstructions of a classical past, incorporating historically accurate details of architecture and dress.

Alma-Tadema's picture shows, not a bacchanal, but the aftermath of the ecstatic, frenzied rites of Bacchus's female devotees. The exhausted bacchantes are fed and guarded (from potentially harmful men) by the women of Amphisia. Essentially a genre scene, there is no real suggestion of an orgiastic event that may have preceded the morning-after that we now see. The Romans of the Decadence is quite different, openly condemning moral depravity; eroticism is kept to a minimum but is nonetheless present. The painting addresses a primarily male audience; the women are shown either waiting on the men or in various stages of dishabille in order to titillate them. Art historian Albert Boime states that an obsession with orgies and the courtesan permeated the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, as evidenced by a large number of prints showing voyeuristic views of couples or groups engaged in orgiastic activities. Such scenes appeared also in the theater, in novels, and in musical dramas. Couture's painting came to embody a variety of meanings. It was seen either as a satire on contemporary French society, as an attack on the regime of Louis-Philippe, or as the decadence of the French on the eve of the Revolution. Whatever Couture may have intended (and there is evidence that he was reacting formally to the prevalent academicism), the painting appealed to its contemporaries as a form of social criticism (Boime, pp. 131–188 passim).

Certain subthemes relating to Bacchic revels should be mentioned. Extracted from a bacchanal, such as those engraved by Andrea Mantegna (circa 1494), the drunken Silenus often became a separate subject. Rubens portrayed a tottering Silenus with a train of Bacchus's followers in a painting of circa 1618, now in the Alte Pinacothek in Munich. Images of Bacchus alone appear, as typified by Michelangelo's Bacchus (1496–1497), in the Bargello in Florence, Italy, carved in a shakily classic contraposto. Caravaggio's Bacchus (circa 1596), in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, is another example. Individual bacchantes, dancing, sometimes accompanied by satyrs, or simply enjoying a sylvan picnic, are also offspring of the full-fledged bacchanal. So, too, were various portraits disguised as mythological figures, such as the unknown woman portrayed by Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun as a Bacchante (1785), in the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute.

The vitality of the bacchanal over time is evident. Images have changed in response to contemporary ideas, but the basic human aspects of joy, ecstasy, delight in wine, and sensuality that the bacchanal so vividly expresses are still with us.

See also Abandonment; Drunkenness/Intoxication; Ecstasy

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Classical

- Amasis Painter, Dionysus with Dancing Youths and Girls, Attic black-figure amphora, circa 540 B.C., Basel, Switzerland, Antikenmuseum, Kappeli Collection
- Dancing Maenads and a Painter*, the Keyside Class, Attic black-figure oinochoe, circa 525–500 B.C., Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- Euthymides Revelers*, red-figured amphora, Vulci, circa 510–500 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek
- Brygos Painter, Revelers, red-figured kylix, Vulci, circa 490 B.C., Würzburg, Germany, Martin V. Wagner Museen der Universität
- Makron, Satyrs and Maenads, Attic red-figured kylix, circa 490–480 B.C., Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- Berlin Painter, Dionysus, Attic red-figured Lekythos, circa 480 B.C., Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- Manner of the Meidias Painter, Dionysus Surrounded by Members of his Entourage, circa 400 B.C., Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- Villa of the Mysteries*, wall painting, circa 50 B.C., Pompeii, Italy
- Childhood Sarcophagus*, marble, second half of second century, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
- Sarcophagus with Bacchic Thiasos*, marble, circa A.D. 160, Rome, Museo Nazionale
- Sarcophagus with Dionysus and Ariadne*, marble, circa A.D. 200–205, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery

- Good Shepherd Sarcophagus*, marble, late fourth century A.D., Rome, Vatican, Lateran Museum
- Bacchanal*, Roman relief, marble, A.D. 400, London, British Museum

Early Christian and Medieval

- Mildenhall Plate*, silver, fourth century A.D., London, British Museum
- Grape Vine*, mosaic, mid-fourth century A.D., Rome, Santa Costanza
- Good Shepherd Sarcophagus*, marble, late fourth century A.D., Rome, Vatican Museum, Lateran Museum
- Ewer with Bacchic Thiasos*, silver, originally from Syria, fifth or sixth century A.D., Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art

Renaissance

- Mantegna, Andrea, Bacchanal with a Wine Vat, engraving, circa 1494
- Mantegna, Andrea, Bacchanal with Silenus, engraving, circa 1494
- Dürer, Albrecht, A Bacchanal with Silenus, drawing, copy after Andrea Mantegna, 1494, Vienna, Graphische Sammlung Albertina
- Michelangelo, Bacchus, marble, 1496–1497, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale del Bargello
- Cosimo, Piero di, The Misfortunes of Silenus, painting, circa 1505–1510, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- Cosimo, Piero di, The Discovery of Honey, oil on panel, circa 1505–1510, Worcester, Massachusetts, Worcester Art Museum
- Sansovino, Jacopo, Bacchus, marble sculpture, 1511, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale del Bargello
- Dossi, Dosso, Bacchanal, oil on canvas, 1512–1516, London, National Gallery
- Bellini, Giovanni, The Feast of the Gods, painting, 1514, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Widener Collection
- Dossi, Dosso, Bacchanal, painting, circa 1515, Rome, Castle Sant' Angelo
- Titian, Bacchus and Ariadne, oil on canvas, 1520–1522, London, National Gallery
- Titian, The Bacchanal of the Andrians, painting, 1523–1525, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Zuccari, Taddeo, Bacchanal, fresco, 1551, Caprarola, Italy, Palazzo Farnese
- Primaticcio, Francesco, Bacchanal, fresco for Chateau de Fontainebleau, executed by Niccolò dell'Abbate, 1551–1556, repainted nineteenth century
- Carracci, Annibale, Venus, Satyr, and Two Amorini (Bacchantes), painting, circa 1588, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Caravaggio, Youth with a Wreath of Ivy and a Bunch of Grapes, painting, 1593?, Rome, Borghese Gallery
- Caravaggio, Bacchus, painting, circa 1596, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Carracci, Annibale, Triumph of Bacchus and Ariadne, painting, 1597–1604, Rome, Farnese Gallery

Seventeenth Century

- Wtewael, Joachim, The Wedding of Peleus and Thetis (formerly titled Bacchanal), painting, 1612, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute
- Haarlem, Cornelis Cornelisz van, Bacchanal, painting, 1614, Budapest, Hungary, Szepmuveszeti Muzeum
- Jordaens, Jacob, Bacchanalian Scene, painting, circa 1616, Ghent, Belgium, Museum voor Schone Kunsten
- Rubens, Peter Paul, Drunken Silenus, painting, circa 1617–1618, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
- Van Dyck, Anthony, Drunken Silenus, painting, circa 1620, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister der Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
- Poussin, Nicolas, Bacchus and Ariadne, painting, 1625–1626, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Poussin, Nicolas, Bacchanal with a Guitarist (The Andrians), painting, 1627–1628, Paris, Louvre
- Velázquez, Diego, Bacchus, painting, 1629, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Rubens, Peter Paul (after Titian), The Andrians, circa 1630, Stockholm, Sweden, National Museum
- Poussin, Nicolas, Bacchanal Before a Term of Pan, oil on canvas, early–mid-1630s, London, National Gallery
- Stanzione, Massimo, Bacchanal, painting, circa 1630, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Poussin, Nicolas, The Triumph of Bacchus, painting, 1635, Kansas City, Missouri, Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art
- Jordaens, Jacob, The Train of Bacchus, painting, 1635–1640, Kassel, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen Schloss Wilhelmshöhe

Eighteenth Century

- Ricci, Sebastiano, Bacchanal, painting, circa 1710?, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
- Fragonard, Jean-Honoré, Bacchanal, cycle of four etchings, circa 1763
- Clodion, Claude-Michel, Satyr with Two Bacchantes, terra-cotta statue, 1766, New York, Frick Collection
- Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Bacchante, painting, 1785, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute
- Romney, George, Lady Hamilton as a Bacchante, painting, circa 1786, London, Tate Gallery

Nineteenth Century

- Gleyre, Charles, The Dance of the Bacchantes, painting, 1846–1848, Lausanne, Switzerland, Musée Cantonal des Beaux-Arts
- Couture, Thomas, The Romans of the Decadence, painting, 1847, Paris, Louvre
- Daumier, Honoré, Two Nymphs Pursued by Satyrs, painting, 1850, Montreal, Quebec, Museum of Fine Arts
- Gérôme, Jean-Léon, The Bacchante, painting, 1853, Nantes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

- Bouguereau, William, Faun and Bacchante, painting, 1860, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Rodin, Auguste, Head of a Bacchante, plaster, 1865–1870, Meudon, France, Musée Rodin
- Alma-Tadema, Lawrence, The Women of Amphissa (awakening after a night of revels), painting, 1887, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute
- Leighton, Frederic, Bacchante, painting, circa 1892, Forbes Magazine Collection, United States
- MacMonnies, Frederick William, Bacchante and Infant Faun, bronze, 1893, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, and other locations

Twentieth Century

- Derain, André, Bacchic Dance, watercolor, 1906, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Hofmann, Hans, Bacchanale, oil on cardboard, 1946, collection of the artist
- Clarke, John Clem, Small Bacchanal, 1970, New York, O. K. Harris Gallery
- Picasso, Pablo, Bacchanal After Poussin, painting after Poussin's Bacchanal: The Triumph of Pan, 1973

Further Reading

- Age of Spirituality: Late Antique and Early Christian Art, Third to Seventh Century*, ed. Kurt Weitzmann, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1979
- Bacchanals by Titian and Rubens: Papers Given at a Symposium in Nationalmuseum, Stockholm*, ed. Gorel Cavalli-Bjorkman, Stockholm, Sweden: Nationalmuseum, 1987
- Blunt, Anthony, Nicolas Poussin: The A. W. Mellon Lectures in the Fine Arts, Washington, D.C., New York: Bollingen Foundation, 1964
- Boime, Albert, Thomas Couture and the Eclectic Vision, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1980
- Bull, David, and Joyce Plesters, The Feast of the Gods: Conservation, Examination, and Interpretation, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England
- Fehl, Philipp, "The Worship of Bacchus and Venus in Bellini's and Titian's Bacchanals for Alfonso d'Este," Studies in the History of Art (1974)
- Florman, Lisa, "Gustav Klimt and the Precedent of Ancient Greece," The Art Bulletin 72 (June, 1990)
- Hamdorf, Friedrich Wilhelm, Dionysus-Bacchus: Kult und Wandlungen des Weingottes, Munich, Germany: Callwey, 1986
- Hope, Charles, "The Camerino d'Alabastro of Alfonso Este," Burlington Magazine 113 (November, 1971)
- Houser, Caroline, Dionysos and His Circle: Ancient Through Modern, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University, 1979
- Kilinski, Karl, "Classical Klimtomania: Gustav Klimt and Archaic Greek Art," Arts Magazine (April 1979)

- Lehmann-Hartleben, Karl, and Erling Charles Olsen, Dionysiac Sarcophagi in Baltimore, New York: The Institute of Fine Arts, New York University; Baltimore:
 Trustees of the Walters Art Gallery, 1942
- Lowenthal, Anne W., *Joachim Wtewael and Dutch
 Mannerism*, Doornspijk, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1986
- Posèq, Avigdor, "Bacchic Themes in Caravaggio's Juvenile Works," Gazette des Beaux-Arts 115 (March 1990)
- Walker, John, Bellini and Titian at Ferrara: A Study of Styles and Taste, London: Phaidon, 1956; New York: Garden City Books, 1956
- Wethey, Harold Edwin, Titian: The Mythological and Historical Paintings, London: Phaidon, 1975
- Wind, E., *Bellini's Feast of the Gods: A Study in Venetian
 Humanism*, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1948

BAPTISM

Don Denny

The following subjects are included in the discussion of the theme Baptism:

EGYPTIAN

BAPTISM OF CHRIST

OTHER CHRISTIAN BAPTISMS

SYMBOLIC REFERENCES TO
BAPTISM

BAPTISM IN NON-CHRISTIAN CULTURES

Piero della Francesca, The Baptism of Christ, circa 1450, painting on panel, London, National Gallery. (Courtesy of the National Gallery, London)

Baptism may be defined broadly as the application of water or other liquids in a ritual of religious initiation. Baptism of one kind or another was known to most ancient cultures, but many such cultures left little or no iconographic record of the practice.

In early antiquity the most extensive representation of baptismal activity is found in Egyptian funerary art, where the subject alludes to rites of purification of the deceased, thought necessary for a beneficial admission of the spirit into the afterlife. The typical graphic formula shows a priest or other officiant holding a vase from which rises a jet of water arching over the erect figure of the dead person, shown either as a mummy or in a semblance of life. The Theban tomb of Sennofer, a mayor of Thebes in the fifteenth century B.C., includes a painting of a priest, clad in a leopard skin, extending a vase from which a single stream of blue water branches into two arcs, partially to frame, respectively, the figure of Sennofer and of his wife, Merit, both shown in living guise (Lange and Hirmer, pl. XXIV). The fourteenth-century tomb of the vizier Ramose, also at Thebes, has a very fine bas-relief carving of Ramose, in living form, flanked by two diminutive attendants, each of whom holds a vase from which a thin stream of water is ejected; the streams cross and fall to complete a perfect arch around the body of Ramose (Lange and Hirmer, fig. 172). In a more mythic vein, a relief at Abydos represents Osiris, who has been slain by his brother Set, being brought back to life by his son Horus. The falcon-headed Horus holds in his left hand three small aligned matching vases; from the outer two vases rise fine jets of water, from the central vase rises a similar line formed by a series of ankhs, symbols of life, the three closely grouped trajectories forming an arch over the erect, rigid figure of Osiris (Budge, vol. I, p. 83).

By far the most commonly repeated baptismal image has been that of the baptism of Jesus Christ. Based on descriptions of the event in the Gospels (Matthew 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–11; Luke 3:21–22), the subject owes its importance in the long history of Christian art to the fact that it marks one of the major points in the life of Christ and to its obvious relation to the continuing significance of the Christian baptismal rite, one of the chief sacraments of both Eastern and Western Christianity. Certain iconographic features are standard among the vast number of variations of the theme: Christ, nude or clad in a short loincloth, stands in the Jordan River; St. John the Baptist, usually wearing a hair shirt, approaches from the side and raises an arm to place his hand on Christ's head or, later, in Renaissance art, to pour a few drops of water on his head; a dove signifying the Holy Spirit hovers over Christ. More often than not, one or several angels are present, often holding cloths with which to dry Christ's body.

Fairly typical of innumerable medieval representations of the subject is an eleventh-century mosaic in the Byzantine church of Hosios Lukas, near Delphi, Greece. Christ stands nude in a mass of water that rises like a mound to the height of his shoulders. Within the water is a small figure personifying the River Jordan in the antique manner, as a bearded man holding a water jug. St. John stands on the riverbank at the right and places a hand on Christ's head; two angels stand opposite holding brightly decorated cloths; above is the hand of God, from which issues a stream of light and the dove of the Holy Spirit. Medieval instances of the subject contain a great many variations of such details. The baptism on the Klosterneuburg altarpiece, a metal-and-enamel masterwork by Nicholas of Verdun (1181) in the Klosterneuburg Abbey near Vienna, Austria, is somewhat minimal, including only one angel, placed behind St. John, and excluding the hand of God and the personification of the Jordan. A stone-carved tympanum (1221), at S. Marie delle Pieve in Arezzo, Italy, is closer to the Byzantine type, with the river god shown under the water; here there are four cloth-bearing angels, two on either side of the design.

The end of the Middle Ages saw some significant changes in the iconography of Christ's baptism. John pours water over Christ's head from a small dish or shell. This change—an early example is the bronze relief on the south door of the Florence, Italy, baptistery, created by Andrea Pisano in the 1330s—reflects a change in actual practice from baptism by immersion, with the entire body submerged, as was common in the Middle Ages, to baptism by infusion, in which only a small amount of water is sprinkled on the head. Correspondingly, Christ is no longer shown nude, his body covered up to the shoulders or the waist by an oddly unnatural mound of water, but wearing a loincloth and with the water rising only to his ankles. A handsome example is Piero della Francesca's painting (circa 1470) in the National Gallery in London: Christ is posed with his hands in an attitude of prayer, the symmetry of his frontal position echoed by the white dove hovering overhead; John strides gently forward to drop a trickle of water from a dish; three angels stand at the left, gracefully holding hands; in the background a man removes his clothing in preparation for baptism; beyond is a hilly Italian landscape. From the following century, a more dynamic version by Tintoretto, in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, has Christ in a bending, submissive posture, hands crossed on his chest, and John, also partially nude, standing above him on the riverbank and leaning forward to pour water on his head; water gushes from a rock spring beside John; the dove is far up in the sky; no angels are present.

Baptismal fonts, large vessels of stone or metal often decorated with relief sculpture, have been a common type of church furnishing over the centuries and, considered as an entire class of objects, involve a varied wealth of baptismal imagery. One of the most famous fonts is the bronze example created by Renier of Huy for St. Barthélemy in Liège, Belgium, in the early twelfth century, presenting around its cylindrical surface a series of five sculptural reliefs: 1) John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness, his audience signified by a group of four men; 2) John baptizing two men as they stand nude in the River Jordan; 3) the baptism of Christ, with Christ waist-deep in the river, his right hand raised in a gesture of benediction, John at the left, two angels at the right, over Christ the hand of God from which descends the dove; 4) St. Peter baptizing the centurion Cornelius (Acts 10), who stands nude in a small font, blessed by the saint, the hand of God appearing above; 5) the apocryphal motif of St. John the Evangelist baptizing the philosopher Crato, arranged much like the previous scene. Thus the complete sequence implies a chronological development and an outline of the creation of the Christian sacrament of baptism, with the baptism of Christ as the hieratically composed, central device, the crucial moment in that history. Supporting the font is a ring of what was originally 12 and is now 10 small bronze oxen, a reference to the "molten sea . . . on twelve oxen" cast in bronze for the Temple of Solomon (I Kings 7:23–25), understood as an Old Testament antetype of Christian baptismal fonts.

The baptisms of many significant individuals of history and legend have had a place in Christian art. On the large tympanum of one of the northern transept portals of Reims Cathedral in northeastern France, among many sculpted scenes produced in the thirteenth century, figuring prominently is the baptism of Clovis, king of the Franks, by St. Rémi, bishop of Reims, a momentous event in 496 that marked the monarch's conversion to Christianity and, in effect, the beginnings of France as a Christian nation. Clovis stands nude in a baptismal font, with members of his court behind him as he faces St. Rémi, in bishop's vestments, likewise attended by a sizable retinue; a dove descends to deliver to the saint an ampulla of divine chrism with which to sprinkle the baptismal water. The subject has special meaning to Reims Cathedral, the traditional site of the consecration of the French kings.

For the shrine of St. Ursula (1489) in the Hospital of St. John in Bruges, Belgium, Hans Memling painted a series of charming small scenes recounting the travels of the British princess and her many companions, including a picture of their arrival in Rome to be greeted at the entry to a church by Pope Cyriacus. At one side of the composition, the church wall is omitted to reveal the baptism by two priests of a few of the saint's followers—who, according to the Golden Legend, "had not yet received baptism." Another legendary baptism, that of St. Lucilla of Rome, is richly celebrated in a painting by Jacopo Bassano (1570) in the Museo Civico in Bassano, Italy. Surrounded by stately architecture and picturesque subsidiary figures, effects typical of Venetian Renaissance art, Lucilla, dressed in white satin, kneels before St. Valentine in sumptuous vestments as he drops water on her head from a silver bowl; her father, St. Nemesius, stands near her; in the sky, against a burst of light, two angels display a palm branch, alluding to the martyrdom that awaits both Lucilla and Nemesius.

Baptism has continued to provide a theme, although rarely, for art of more recent times, when the subject is apt to appear in a secular framework. A series of eight paintings, commissioned during the early and mid-nineteenth century for the rotunda of the Capitol in Washington, D.C., includes John G. Chapman's Baptism of Pocahontas, a romantic vision of that event, which took place at Jamestown, Virginia, in 1613.

Within a large dark church, the maiden kneels before a stone baptismal font; standing over her is the minister Alexander Whiteaker, one hand on the font, the other raised in an oratorical gesture; prominent nearby are Sir Thomas Dale, governor of Virginia, and John Rolfe, whom Pocahontas is to marry upon her conversion to Christianity; also present are many other Virginia colonists and members of Pocahontas's tribe (Compilation of Works, p. 117).

Baptism provides a theme for regionalist genre in John Steuart Curry's 1928 painting Baptism in Kansas in the Whitney Museum of American Art in New York. A large water tank in the midst of a farmyard on a vast prairie offers a place for the ritual; a white-clad young woman is held by a black-clad minister as they both stand knee-deep in the water; about to be immersed, the woman clasps her hands in rapt prayer; country folk in their best clothes, singing from hymnals, surround the central couple; at the top of the painting, beams of sunlight break through the clouds (Czestochowski, p. 18). A modernist interpretation of the rite is given in Romare Bearden's collage The Prevalence of Ritual: Baptism (1964) in the Williams College Art Museum in Williamstown, Massachusetts. African American figures, ambiguously represented by fragments of cut-and-pasted photographs, are closely grouped together, perhaps as if standing in water; at some points their faces become African masks, suggesting a fusion of American fundamentalist baptismal practice and African tribal ritual (Washington, pl. 7).

In addition to images that explicitly illustrate baptismal activity, many works allude to baptism in a symbolic or analogical way. On the Klosterneuburg altarpiece, the baptism of Christ is shown next to two Old Testament antetypes: Solomon's "molten sea . . . on twelve oxen," which, as mentioned above, had earlier been represented on Renier of Huy's baptismal font, and Moses Leading His People Through the Red Sea, a picture of a passage through water as a means of salvation. In the late Middle Ages, Biblia Pauperum manuscripts presented elaborate typological programs as part of which Christ's baptism was joined to the crossing of the Red Sea (Exodus 14), and, in a more subtle analogy, the return of Moses' spies from Canaan with a huge bunch of grapes (Numbers 13), signifying, with Eucharistic symbolism, that a land of promise and salvation lay beyond the River Jordan, the stream where Christ would be baptized. The event is depicted in a manuscript (circa 1320) in Vienna in the National Library (Cornell, pl. 5).

During the Renaissance a strong interest in ancient classical mythology created new analogs of baptism. A well-known instance is Sandro Botticelli's painting The Birth of Venus (circa 1480) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, the composition of which—with Venus standing nude in the water of the sea, an attendant approaching from one side with a hand raised toward Venus' head, and, on the opposite side, winged personifications of the winds, looking much like angels—is clearly patterned after the traditional representation of Christ's baptism. The graphic similarity was no doubt intended to imply a conceptual similarity, supplied by the sophisticated exegesis of the Florentine Neoplatonic academy of Botticelli's day, according to which the birth from water of Venus, the pagan love goddess here understood as a manifestation of divine love, was likened to the new birth of Christ, or any Christian believer, from baptismal water.

One of the most widely repeated of indirect allusions to baptism is the motif of the bathing of the Christ Child, frequently included in Nativity scenes. In many of these images, as the baby is gently placed in a water basin by a midwife, the motif may, to be sure, be intended as no more than a naturalistic detail; but in many other images, where the basin has the recognizable form of a baptismal font and the Christ Child stands upright in the water in a manner impossible for a newborn infant, the reference to his baptism—or, more generally, to the entire tradition of Christian baptism—is quite clear. An important example of the latter type is in the relief of the Nativity of Christ on Nicola Pisano's marble pulpit (circa 1260) in the baptistery at Pisa, Italy.

A subject in Asian art somewhat comparable to the bathing of the Christ Child is the bathing of the infant Buddha, although it must be recognized that no rite exists in Buddhism that could properly be designated as baptism, and the deeper meanings of the Buddhist bathing narrative are not easily interpreted. There are several versions of the story. In one of the most common tellings, the newborn infant is placed on a lotus stand and two water spirits (naga) pour water on him in two streams, one warm and one cold. A stone relief of the Kushan period from Gandhara, Pakistan, in the Peshawar Museum shows the nude infant standing on a small platform, supported on both sides by young attendants; the symmetry of that group is continued above in the two naga, standing figures in handsome human guise, who pour water from round jugs onto the head of the child. Essentially the same scheme appears with a very different character in an eighteenth-century Japanese colored woodblock print in Harvard University's Fogg Art Museum in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Here the infant Buddha stands on a lotus blossom without attendant support, the two naga have become fierce dragons from whose mouths the two streams of water gush forth liberally over the child's body; his richly dressed parents are seated nearby; at the bottom of the composition, and at another level of reality, kneeling devotees surround a ceremonial basin as they prepare the purification ceremony performed annually to celebrate the birth of Buddha. Those ceremonies have given rise to a special art type, small Japanese bronze sculptures of the infant Buddha standing erect in the center of a broad basin; in the ritual called Kambutsu, apparently known only in Japanese tradition, water or tea is poured over the sculpted figure. An eighth-century example of the type, at about 20 inches high thought to be the largest extant, is in the Todai-ji at Nara (Mino, pp. 77–78).

See also Bath/Bathing; Communion

Selected Works of Art

Egyptian

Funerary Baptism of the Vizier Ramose, eighteenth dynasty, circa 1500–1300 B.C., Thebes, Egypt, tomb of Ramose

Baptism of Christ

Mosaic, tenth century, Church of Hosios Lukas, near Delphi, Greece

Renier of Huy, Baptismal Font, bronze, 1107–1118, Liège, Belgium, St. Barthélemy

Pisano, Andrea, Baptism of Christ, bronze, 1330s, Florence, Italy, Baptistery, South door

Ghiberti, Lorenzo, Baptism, bronze, 1403–1424, Florence, Italy, Baptistery, North doors

Masolino, Baptism of Christ, fresco, 1435, Castiglione Olona, Italy

Piero della Francesca, Baptism of Christ, circa 1450, London, National Gallery

Verrocchio, Andrea del, and Leonardo da Vinci, Baptism of Christ, panel, circa 1470, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Juan de Flandes, Baptism of Christ, oil on panel, circa 1510, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Bordone, Paris, Baptism of Christ, oil on canvas, circa 1535–1540, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Tintoretto, Baptism of Christ, circa 1580, Madrid, Prado

Crespi, Daniele, Baptism of Christ, circa 1624(?), Milan, Pinacoteca di Brera

Sirani, Elizabeth, The Baptism of Christ, 1658, Bologna, Italy, Certosi

West, Benjamin, The Baptism, oil on canvas, 1794, Greenville, South Carolina, Bob Jones University

Other Christian Baptisms

Baptism of Clovis, thirteenth century, Calixtus Portal, Reims Cathedral

Mantegna, Andrea, Baptism of Hermogenes, fresco, 1454–1457, Padua, Italy, Eremitani Church, Ovetari Chapel

Master of St. Giles, Baptism of Clovis, oil on panel, circa 1500, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Bassano, Jacopo, Baptism of Saint Lucilla, circa 1575, Bassano, Italy, Museo Civico

Bibiena, Francesco da, Saint Peter Baptizing, before 1739, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery

Camassei, Andrea, Baptism of the Centurion, mid-seventeenth century, Rome, Vatican

Rosa, Salvatore, Saint Philip the Deacon Baptizes the Ethiopian Eunuch of Queen Candace, before 1673, Norfolk, Virginia, Chrysler Museum

Ellenrieder, Marie, The Baptism of Lydia, oil on canvas, 1861, Zurich, Switzerland, Fred and Meg Licht Collection

Curry, John Steuart, Baptism in Kansas, 1928, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art

Bearden, Romare, The Prevalence of Ritual: Baptism, 1964, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Williams College of Art Museum

Symbolic References to Baptism

Pisano, Nicola, Nativity (Bathing of the Christ Child), circa 1260, Pisa, Italy, Baptistery

Botticelli, Birth of Venus, 1477–1478, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Baptism in Non-Christian Cultures

Bathing of the Infant Buddha, relief from Gandhara, Kushan period, Peshawar, Pakistan

Bathing of Buddha, colored wood-block print, eighteenth century, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Further Reading

- Bedard, Walter Maurice, The Symbolism of the Baptismal Font in Early Christian Thought, Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1951
- Budge, E. A. Wallis, Osiris and the Egyptian Resurrection, London: Medici Society, 1911; New York: Putnam, 1911
- Compilation of Works of Art and Other Objects in the United States Capital*, Washington, D.C., U.S. Government Printing Office, 1965
- Cornell, Henrik, Biblia Pauprum, Stockholm, Sweden: Thule-tryck, 1925
- Czestochowski, J. S., John Steuart Curry and Grant Wood: A Portrait of Rural America, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1981
- Fausone, Alfonso M., Die Taufe in der frühchristlichen Sptulkralkunst: Eisen archölogisch-ikonologische Studie zu den Ursprüngen des Bildthemas, Città dei Vaticano, Pontificio Institute do archeologia cristiana, 1982
- Hinkle, W. M., The Portal of the Saints of Reims Cathedral: A Study in Medieval Iconography, New York: The College Art Association, 1965
- Hoffmann, Konrad, Taufsymbolik im mittelalterlichen Herrscherbild, Düsseldorf, Germany: Rheinland-Verlag, 1968
- Kirschbaum, E., ed., Lexikon des christlichen Ikonographie, Rome, Herder, 1968–1976
- Lange, Kurt, and Max Hirmer, Egypt, New York: Phaidon, 1956; London: Phaidon, 1957
- Lavin, Marilyn Aronberg, Piero della Francesca's Baptism of Christ, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1981
- Mino, Yutaka, The Great Eastern Temple: Treasures of Japanese Buddhist Art from Todai-ji, Chicago: Art Institute of Chicago in association with Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN, 1986
- Pal, Pratapaditya, ed., Light of Asia: Buddha Sakyamuni in Asian Art, exhibition catalogue, Los Angeles: Los Angeles County Museum of Art, 1984
- Reudenbach, Bruno, Das Taufbecken des Reiner von Huy in Lüttich, Wisbaden, Germany: Reichert Verlag, 1984
- Ristow, Günter, The Baptism of Christ, Recklinghausen, Germany: Aurel Bongers, 1967
- Schiller, Gertrud, Iconography of Christian Art, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1971
- Teuchert, Wolfgang, Taufen in Schleswig-Holstein: Taufen in Stein, Bronze und Holz vom Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart, Heide in Holstein, Germany: Westholsteinische Verlagsanstalt Boyens, 1986
- Washington, Bunch M. The Art of Romare Bearden: The Prevelance of Ritual, New York: Abrams, 1973

BATH/BATHING

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following motifs and iconographic narratives are included in the discussion of the theme Bath/Bathing:

MYTHOLOGICAL THEMES

SUSANNA

BATHSHEBA

BATHING THE NEWBORN CHILD

WASHING OF FEET

HISTORICAL THEMES

WOMEN BATHING

MEN BATHING

AMERICAN REALISM

Mary Cassatt, The Bath, 1891, drypoint and aquatint, gift of William Emerson and from the Charles Henry Hayden Fund, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts. (Courtesy of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts)

Although the theme of the bath and bathing has been a popular subject in art and has had a number of meanings attached to it, the most common usage of the term refers to ablution, cleanliness, and the act of washing in water. This essay will first discuss depictions of the theme of bathing as cleansing, then turn to the association of the bath with death, with voyeurism, with fertility, with renewal and purification, with rainfall, with healing, with birth, with tears, and with resorts and architecture.

In Greek and Roman sculpture the theme of Aphrodite (Venus) at her bath appears to have originated in the fourth century b.c. with Praxiteles; the female figure had been shown clothed until that time. Roman copies of the Aphrodite of Knidos (sculpted before 350 b.c.), a standing figure coming from her bath, exist in the Vatican Museum and in the Louvre in Paris, among others. Another version of the bathing goddess depicts Venus crouching, such as the Roman copy of a Hellenistic bronze statue (Doidalsas type) in the British Museum in London. This representation of Venus bathing was disseminated during the Renaissance by a Marcantonio Raimondi engraving of the figure (Barsch, XIV, no. 313). Another type of Venus at her bath, The Mazarin Venus, a Roman copy of a late Hellenistic variant of the fourth-century Greek type, is in the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles, California.

Bathing women in medieval, Renaissance, and Baroque painting were usually depicted in the guise of mythological and biblical personages—the prominent themes will be discussed below. In eighteenth- and nineteenth-century art, however, the theme of bathers, especially female ones, was used as a strategy to show the nude in a naturalistic rather than an academic or mythological setting. Exotic settings for Eugène Delacroix in the Turkish Women Bathing (1854), now in Hartford, Connecticut, and Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres in The Turkish Bath (1864), in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris, were the mark of the Romantic interest in oriental scenes. Later nineteenth-century artists such as Gustave Courbet in The Bathers (1853), in the Musée Fabre in Montpellier, France, and Pierre-Auguste Renoir in his innumerable nudes as bathers, such as The Great Bathers (1884–1887) in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, tried to create a plausible setting in which to show nude figures out of doors, as part of a natural mode of bathing or swimming. Paul Cézanne in his numerous studies of bathers, culminating in Les Grandes Baigneuses (1898–1906), in Philadelphia, and Georges Seurat in Bathers at Asnières (1883–1884), in the Tate Gallery in London, as well as many other artists, followed this same course. As art historian Linda Nochlin has pointed out, however, the nude bather out of doors was as much a construct as the harem bath, because nineteenth-century women and men did not bathe nude in country streams. Honoré Daumier, in his Les Baigneurs series of lithographs in Le Charivari (1841–1842), depicted bathing in a more realistic setting. The reality of nineteenth-century bathing in Paris was more likely to be men and women with less than perfect physiognomies, not to mention bodies. The women especially were far from the nude bathers depicted in paintings, wearing garments that covered them from neck to ankle, in comic rather than graceful fashion.

Daumier also tackled the subject of bathing in classical mythology in his “Histoire Ancienne” series in Le Charivari of August 28, 1842. In The Baptism of Achilles he showed the nymph Thetis dipping her baby Achilles in the River Styx to make him immortal. Unfortunately she held him by the heel, which was not immersed, and thus rendered him vulnerable in this spot; hence, an “Achilles heel” became a term for a vulnerable area in a person’s makeup. The following verse was published with the lithograph:

As a weapon of war is quenched,
Thetis, of her brat wishing to make a hero,
Dipped him in the Styx as soon as he was born;
Which proves that a bath is good for everything.
(Vigier, On the Influence of Baths)

The simple act of bathing is illustrated in Mary Cassatt’s The Bath (or The Tub, 1891), a color print with drypoint and soft ground, in its eleventh and final state in the collection of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. Here we see an everyday scene of a mother or nurse washing a slightly reluctant child. The Bath is one of a series of color prints Cassatt made in 1891 after seeing the 1890 Great Japanese Exhibition at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris, which included a number of color woodcut prints. She was especially interested in the color woodcuts of eighteenth-century artist Kitagawa Utamaro, among them Woman Bathing a Baby in a Tub, and owned a number of Japanese woodcut prints herself. Cassatt also created a color print of a Woman Bathing (circa 1891), a subject that appeared in Japanese woodcut prints by Utamaro, Kiyonaga, Toyokuni Utagawa, and a number of other artists. Cassatt’s print of The Bath is also related to an oil painting The Bath (1891) at the Art Institute of Chicago, which shows a woman giving a sponge bath to a slightly older girl. These very natural views of mother or nurse and child are typical of the unsentimental representations of women and children by Cassatt, forming a matter-of-fact record of bathing a child who has probably gotten dirty during a normal day’s activities.

Cassatt’s contemporary, Edgar Degas, was also interested in the theme of bathing as cleansing. Rather than the bathing of a child, he wanted to show a naturalistic unposed picture of women taking baths, unconscious of the viewer, as if seen “through a keyhole” as he put it. He, too, was a great devotee of Japanese prints, and their influence is obvious in such works as two pastels entitled The Tub (circa 1885–1886), at the Musée d'Orsay in Paris and at the Hillstead Museum in Farmington, Connecticut, and the lithograph Standing Nude at her Toilette (circa 1890–1892).

Male bathers as well as female are subjects in art, the most famous being Michelangelo's bathers in the Battle of Cascina (1505). The original fresco was destroyed, but studies of Michelangelo's figures exist in drawings, such as those in the British Museum in London. Artists such as Aristotle da Sangallo copied the central bather figures; his drawing of 1542 is now in the collection of the Earl of Leicester at Holkham Hall in England. The bathers scramble out of the Arno, struggling to clothe and arm themselves, in answer to the sudden call to battle. Marcantonio Raimondi also engraved three of these figures in 1510. Masculine bathers also appear in Albrecht Dürer's woodcut The Men's Bath House (circa 1498), in Cézanne's groups of male bathers, and in Edvard Munch's The Bathers (1907), now in the Museum of Art in Oslo, Norway.

In the twentieth century the Fauves and German Expressionists favored themes of nude female bathers as well as men and women bathing. In these themes they saw liberation between the sexes and union with nature in a return to the primitive. Such views occur in the Fauve paintings of Henri Matisse, as in the Three Bathers, Collioure (1907) at the Minneapolis Institute of Art in Minnesota; in the works of Maurice de Vlaminck; and in André Derain's Bathers (1908). The theme of bathing also occurs in paintings and color woodcuts of bathers in outdoor settings by Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Erich Heckel, and Otto Müller, among others.

Although the female nude in a natural setting was a frequent theme for Paul Cézanne throughout his career, some of his paintings of the 1870s and 1880s were of men bathing, as a group and singly. These paintings may recall Cézanne's boyhood days in Aix-en-Provence, when he and his friends Baptistin Baille and Émile Zola bathed in the Arc River on hot summer days. His later paintings, particularly the several versions of the monumental Bathers (Les Grandes Baigneuses), at the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania, the National Gallery in London, and the Philadelphia Museum of Art, were of groups of women. His desire to show nudes in a plein air setting created particular problems for Cézanne; he could not pose groups of nude women by the Arc River, as Aix-en-Provence was an extremely conservative community and would not have countenanced such scandalous exposure. In his first Les Grandes Baigneuses, now in Philadelphia, on which he was probably still working at the time of his death in 1906, it appears he used a variety of sources for his figures: life sketches from models, sketches of sculpture in the Louvre, and photographs of sculptures from Armand Sylvestre's Le Nu au Louvre (1891), including for the figure on the right in front of a bending tree, Venus de Milo with added arms.

In the twentieth century the theme of bathing occurs in several paintings by Henri Matisse, notably Bathers with a Turtle (1908) and the monumental Bathers by a River (1909–1916). Both works refer to Cézanne's Three Bathers (circa 1879–1882), which Matisse bought from art dealer Ambroise Vollard in 1899. Bathers by a River, one of Matisse's largest paintings, shows simplified forms of four bathers separated into four different zones by black and gray panels against lush green foliage. Where Cézanne unified his bathers by a structure of overarching tree forms in Les Grandes Baigneuses, the composition of Matisse's Bathers by a River divides the figures into individual entities, almost sculptural in their poses—a concept he would explore in the four versions of the relief Le Dos (The Back).

Pablo Picasso also experimented with bathers, both nude and in gaily striped bathing suits, on beaches at such resorts as Juan-les-Pins and Biarritz. These experiments start in 1918 and continue until 1971 or so, two years before his death. He also did a wood sculpture group, Bathers, cast in bronze in 1956.

In American art of the twentieth century, the main trend has been to put the nude bathing figure into a nonidealized, realistic setting, as in John Sloan's South Beach Bathers (1907–1908), George Bellows's Forty-two Kids, depicting boys bathing in a river, and William Glackens's bathing figures, very much in the Ashcan school tradition. In the 1930s and 1940s, artists such as Paul Cadmus, Reginald Marsh, and George Tooker, coming out of a social realism tradition, put their bathers in the populist setting of the beach at Coney Island, crammed with humanity in all its vulgarity and vitality.

English artist David Hockney put male figures bathing in the shower. In the 1960s his series of nude males, either separate or in pairs in showers, introduced a strong element of homoeroticism into bathing scenes.

Some ancient representations of bathing interpret the theme not merely as a cleansing activity but also as something more ominous. One of the earliest is The Death of Agamemnon by the Dokimasia Painter on an Attic red-figured krater (circa 460 B.C.), in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, which shows Clytemnestra and her lover, Aegisthus, killing Clytemnestra's husband, Agamemnon, in a bath on his return from the Trojan War. The opposite side of the vase shows Orestes, Agamemnon's son, killing Aegisthus in revenge. The story of Agamemnon's death is told in Homer's Odyssey (book XI), when Odysseus visits the House of the Dead and encounters his comrade at arms. Although this account does not mention that Agamemnon's murder occurred in his bath, act 1 of Aeschylus's Agamemnon names the setting.

The morbid association of death with bathing emerges in Jacques-Louis David's Death of Marat (1793), in the Musées Royaux in Brussels, Belgium, which shows the journalist dead in his bath, having been stabbed by Charlotte Corday. A bath-connected death recurs with the nineteenth-century murderer William Crippen, who killed a succession of brides in their baths.

In classical mythology, as recorded in Ovid's Metamorphoses, voyeurism accompanies death and bathing. When the hunter Actaeon sees Diana (Artemis) bathing, she transforms him into a stag, which is then eaten by his own dogs. The story of Diana's revenge on Actaeon is depicted as early as about 460 B.C., by the Pan Painter on an Attic red-figured vase, in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, and also by Titian in his Death of Actaeon (1570–1575), in the National Gallery in London. Paintings showing Diana at her bath with only the viewer of the painting as a voyeur are more common. Examples of such paintings include those by Jan Vermeer, François Boucher, Pierre-Auguste Renoir, and many others; an example of sculpture includes the relief Bath of Diana by François Girardon at Versailles. Nineteenth-century artists also represented the bathing habits of goddesses and mythic figures, as in Frederic Leighton's The Bath of Psyche (1890), in the Tate Gallery in London, and in William Blake Richmond's The Bath of Venus (1891), in the Aberdeen

Art Gallery in Scotland. One suspects that surrounding her with classical trappings offered a respectable and acceptable way of showing a female nude.

The biblical story of Susanna and the elders in the Apocrypha also joins bathing and voyeurism. Two elders see Susanna bathing in her garden and proposition her. She refuses them, and they accuse her in the religious court of improper solicitation. She is about to be stoned to death when the prophet Daniel shows discrepancies in their story, and they, instead of she, are stoned to death.

This biblical story (even if apocryphal) gave artists an excellent opportunity to show a nude female bathing, as in Heinrich Aldegrever's sixteenth-century engraving Story of Susanna; Tintoretto's painting Susanna and the Elders (1555–1556), in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria; Artemisia Gentileschi's Susanna and the Elders (1610), in the collection of Dr. Karl Graf von Schonborn of Pommersfelden, Germany; Anthony van Dyck's painting of 1622–1623 in Munich, Germany; Peter Paul Rubens's Susanna and the Elders (1636–1640), also in Munich, at the Alte Pinakothek, and Rembrandt's Susanna and the Elders in Berlin. Here the theme of a bathing woman exposes the charge of voyeurism within the painting (and possibly outside it) and also the ultimate punishment of lust and the vindication of the woman. The distress of the woman propositioned is made clear only in the painting by the woman artist, Artemisia Gentileschi, in which Susanna is visibly resisting the elders' suggestions.

Even more spectacular in biblical presentations is the story of Bathsheba (II Samuel 11). King David saw from the roof a woman bathing, Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite. He sent her a note (really a command from the king) to come and see him, and he made love to her. She became pregnant, and David tried to get her husband to justify the pregnancy. But Uriah did not fall in with the plot, so David arranged to have him killed in battle. After Uriah's death David married Bathsheba. Their first child died, but the second became King Solomon, David's successor. Here again bathing inspires desire in the viewer, with unfortunate consequences. This story, too, was popular with artists, as evidenced by such examples as Peter Paul Rubens's painting of 1636, in Dresden, Germany; Artemisia Gentileschi's David and Bathsheba (circa 1640–1645), in Columbus, Ohio; and Rembrandt's Bathsheba (1654) in the Louvre. The Rembrandt painting had Hendrickje Stoeffels, the artist's common-law wife, as its model and shows Bathsheba with a note, presumably from David, pondering the consequences of the king's command. We never learn whether she loved her husband and mourned his death, or whether she wanted to go to David at all. Rembrandt's version suggests the tragedy of the situation, not the titillating circumstance of a nude woman bathing.

In ancient Greek lore, according to Sir James George Frazer's Golden Bough, bathing was connected with fertility, with maidens bathing in rivers to lose their virginity, and with brides and grooms taking baths before the marriage to have their union blessed by the fecundity of water nymphs. This meaning may be connected with the river bathing of images of earth goddesses, such as Cybele, as part of a fertility rite at the beginning of spring, possibly to ensure rain for growing crops.

Another attribute of bathing is regeneration or renewal. Hera and Venus, who renewed their virginity by bathing, may also be connected with purification. The bathing of goddesses is also associated with ceremonial purification of the bride. The theme of purification relates to the bath of initiation, including the Sun King's lustral bath before his sacrifice, or the ceremonial bath at a coronation. Such an interpretation of Agamemnon's death in a bath, his wife holding the double-ax, symbol of the Great Mother Goddess, identifies Agamemnon as a sacrificial victim, his term of reign over, supplanted by a new lover chosen by the reigning queen.

The theme of purification by bathing is also present in Japanese literature in a story in the Nihongi in which Izanaga, after returning from Yomi, the land of gloom, purifies himself by bathing in water. The same idea of purification by bathing is present in the rites of Attis, where a bath in bull's blood at the time of the vernal equinox washed away sins. Attis's killing of the bull represents his higher nature triumphing over bestiality and animal passions.

Again according to Frazer, bathing was practiced in Russia to produce rain, possibly in an analogy of sympathetic magic. Sometimes women bathed on the day of St. John the Baptist to encourage a good rainfall. In another water-inducing rite, North African holy men were thrown into a spring to end a drought.

Another Old Testament reference to bathing is the story of Naaman the Leper (II Kings 5). In it, a messenger of the prophet Elisha tells Naaman, a famous warrior, to wash in the garden seven times. At first Naaman refuses, as it seems too easy, but he is persuaded, and after bathing in the River Jordan seven times he is cured of leprosy. The story stresses curative powers of bathing as well as the power of the prophet. Not as popular a subject as Bathsheba or Susanna, only one painting by Esias van de Velde, in a private collection, shows Naaman actually bathing in the Jordan. The healing power of bathing also occurs in the New Testament in the Gospel according to St. John (5:1–17) in the story of the Pool of Bethesda, which cured the first sick person to enter it after an angel stirred up the waters.

From the New Testament also comes a bathing scene in the Nativity of the Christ Child. The scene was not described in the Gospels, but it is a customary natal event for babies. The bathing of the Christ Child appears in several pulpit relief panels of the Nativity by Nicola Pisano and his son Giovanni in the cathedral and baptistery in Pisa, Italy, and in paintings by Lorenzo Lotto in the Academy in Siena, Italy, and Antonio Veneziano in the Courtauld Institute in London, as well as many Italian School paintings of the medieval and Renaissance periods. The bathing of a newborn baby also occurs in scenes from the life of the Virgin Mary, most notably in a fresco by Ghirlandaio in the Church of S. Maria Novella in Florence.

Occasionally bathing is associated with tears, as in the expression "bathed in tears." A biblical story recounts the story of a woman who bathed Jesus' feet in tears and dried them with her hair while he was dining in the house of a Pharisee; she was forgiven her sins (Luke 7:36–50). This scene is depicted in paintings by Francesco Bassano the Younger, Carlo Dolci, Giulio Romano, and Bernardo Strozzi, among others, and in a fresco by Santi di Tito in the Church of SS. Annunziata in Florence. Dirck Bouts's Christ in the House of Simon the Pharisee, in Berlin, shows the woman wiping Christ's feet with her hair. In "The Pool of Tears," from Alice's Adventures in Wonderland by Lewis Carroll, Alice's tears become a bath or pool in which a much shrunken Alice swims.

Jesus' act of bathing the feet of the apostles before the Last Supper in order to show his service to humanity is depicted in many paintings, including Tintoretto's Christ Washing His Disciples' Feet (1566), in the National Gallery in London; Aurelio Lomi's Christ Washing Saint Peter's Feet (early 1590s), in Harvard University's Fogg Art Museum, in Cambridge, Massachusetts; Ford Madox Brown's Jesus Washing Peter's Feet (1851–1852), in the Tate Gallery in London; and Stanley Spencer's Washing Peter's Feet (1922), in the Carlisle Museum and Art Gallery.

Another meaning of bath is a resort or spa, most notably that of Bath, England, which was famous for its mineral baths in Roman times and became a popular Regency resort. Jane Austen lived there at one time, and scenes from her novels Persuasion and Northanger Abbey take place in Bath.

Bath is also associated with a building or rooms for bathing. In this connection the Roman baths or thermae built by various emperors are significant. These elaborate vaulted structures had rooms for each kind of bath: hot (calidarium), warm (tepidarium), and cold (frigidarium). Most famous are the Baths of Caracalla (A.D. 211–217), the ruins of which still stand in Rome. The earlier baths of Agrippa and Trajan have all but vanished. In the sixteenth century, Michelangelo converted the tepidarium of the Baths of Diocletian, built in Rome in A.D. 302, into the Church of S. Maria degli Angeli. The public bathhouse appears in Albrecht Dürer's The Men's Bath House woodcut print (1498) and survives in so-called Turkish bath establishments.

The meanings attached to the bath and bathing are manifold, from simple ablution and hygiene to purification rites, fertility and rain, sympathetic magic, healing power, union with nature and natural impulses, voyeurism both within and without the episode shown or described, and to public bathing and the spa. Recent feminist scholarship has examined closely the scene of the female nude bathing in nature and concluded that it, too, is a product of a male-dominated discourse objectifying and commodifying women who are subject to the male gaze and its power. It is only in more natural subjects like a mother bathing her child that the subject is returned to its most human meanings and associations.

See also Baptism; Humors; Voyeurism

Selected Works of Art

Mythological Themes

Dokimasia Painter, Death of Agamemnon, Attic red-figured krater, circa 460 B.C., Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Pan Painter, Artemis Shooting Actaeon, Attic red-figured krater, circa 470 B.C., Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Aphrodite of Knidos, Roman copy of sculpture by Praxiteles, fourth century B.C., Paris, Louvre

Torso of the Aphrodite of Knidos, Roman copy of sculpture by Praxiteles, fourth century B.C., Paris, Louvre

Venus at Her Bath (The Mazarin Venus), statue, Roman copy of late Hellenistic variant of fourth century B.C., Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum

Venus Crouching, Roman copy of Hellenistic bronze (Doidalsas type), London, British Museum, on loan from the British Royal Collection

Raimondi, Marcantonio, Venus Crouching, engraving, early sixteenth century

Titian, The Death of Actaeon, oil on canvas, mid-1560s, London, National Gallery

Boucher, François, The Bath of Diana, oil, 1742, Paris, Louvre

Alma-Tadema, Lawrence, An Apodyterium, oil on panel, 1886, Toronto, Ontario, Canada, private collection

Susanna

Tintoretto, Susanna Bathing, oil, 1556, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Altdorfer, Albrecht, Susanna Bathing, 1536, Munich, Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen Pinakothek

Rubens, Peter Paul, Susanna Bathing, 1636, Munich, Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen Pinakothek
Gentileschi, Artemisia, Susanna and the Elders, oil, 1647, Berlin-Dahlem, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin Gemäldegalerie

Rembrandt van Rijn, Susanna and the Elders, oil, 1647, Berlin-Dahlem, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin Gemäldegalerie

Troy, Jean-François de, Susanna at the Bath, early eighteenth century, St. Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum

Ernst, Max, Susanna Bathing, oil on canvas, 1950, Darmstadt, Germany, Collection of Karl Ströher

Bathsheba

Gentileschi, Artemisia, David and Bathsheba, oil, 1640–1645, Columbus, Ohio, Museum of Art

Rubens, Peter Paul, Bathsheba, oil, 1647, Berlin-Dahlem, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin Gemäldegalerie

Rembrandt van Rijn, Bathsheba, oil, 1654, Paris, Louvre

Bathing the Newborn Child

Pisano, Nicola, Birth of Christ, pulpit detail, circa 1259–1260, Pisa, Italy, Baptistery

Ghirlandaio, Domenico, Birth of the Virgin, fresco, 1485–1490, Florence, Italy, Museo di Santa Maria Novella, Cappella Maggiore

Lotto, Lorenzo, Bathing of the Christ Child, oil, Siena, Italy, Accademia

Washing of Feet

Bouts, Dierc, Christ in the House of Simon the Pharisee, before 1475, Berlin, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin

Romanino, Girolamo, Washing of the Feet (Supper in the House of Simon the Pharisee), fresco, sixteenth century, Brescia, Italy, Pinacoteca

Tintoretto, Christ Washing His Disciples' Feet, oil on canvas, 1566, London, National Gallery

Lomi, Aurelio, Christ Washing Saint Peter's Feet, oil on canvas, early 1590, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Brown, Ford Madox, Jesus Washing Peter's Feet, oil on canvas, 1851–1852, later retouched, London, Tate Gallery
 Spencer, Stanley, Washing Peter's Feet, 1922, Carlisle Museum and Art Gallery

Historical Themes

Michelangelo, study for a figure from The Battle of Cascina, pen and brush with white, circa 1504, London, British Museum
 Bastiano da Sangallo, The Battle of Cascina, copy after lost Michelangelo cartoon, circa 1542, Holkham Hall, Norfolk, England
 David, Jacques-Louis, Death of Marat, oil, 1793, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique

Women Bathing

Women Grooming, Attic crater, circa 440 B.C., Bologna, Italy, Museo Civico Archeologico
 Utamaro, Kitagawa, Woman Bathing Baby in a Tub, wood-block print, eighteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Daumier, Honoré, Bathers Series, lithograph, 1841–1842, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France
 Courbet, Gustave, The Bathers, 1853, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
 Delacroix, Eugène, Turkish Women Bathing, oil, 1854, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
 Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique, The Turkish Bath, oil, 1864, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Seurat, Georges, Bathers at Asnières, 1883–1884, London, Tate Gallery
 Renoir, Pierre-Auguste, The Great Bathers, 1884–1887, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
 Degas, Edgar, The Tub, pastel, 1885–1886, Farmington, Connecticut, Hillstead Museum
 Degas, Edgar, The Morning Bath, pastel on paper, 1890, Chicago, Art Institute
 Degas, Edgar, Standing Nude at Her Toilette, lithograph, circa 1890–1892
 Cassatt, Mary, The Bath, color aquatint, 1891, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
 Cassatt, Mary, Women Bathing, color print, circa 1891
 Cassatt, Mary, The Bath, oil, 1891, Chicago, Art Institute
 Cézanne, Paul, Bathers (Les Grandes Baigneuses), oil, 1907, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
 Matisse, Henri, Three Bathers, Collioure, oil, 1907, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Arts
 Matisse, Henri, Bathers with a Turtle, oil, 1908, St. Louis, Missouri, Art Museum
 Derain, André, Bathers, oil, 1908, Prague, Czech Republic, Národní Muzeum
 Kirchner, Ludwig Ernst, Four Bathers, oil, circa 1909, Wuppertal, Germany, Van der Heydt Museum
 Heckel, Erich, Bathers in the Lake, oil, 1912, St. Louis, Missouri, Collection of Mr. and Mrs. Norton D. May Renoir, Pierre-Auguste, Bather Drying Her Arm, oil, 1912, São Paulo, Brazil, Museu do Arte de São Paulo
 Heckel, Erich, Grassy Day, oil, 1913, Munich, Germany, Museum of Modern Art

Matisse, Henri, Bathers by a River, oil, 1916, Chicago, Art Institute Picasso, Pablo, Bathers, oil on canvas, 1918, Paris, Musée Picasso
 Picasso, Pablo, Three Bathers, oil on panel, 1920, New York, Stephen Hahn Collection
 Picasso, Pablo, Seated Bather, oil on canvas, 1930, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Picasso, Pablo, Bather with Book, oil, pastel, and charcoal, 1937, Paris, Musée Picasso
 Picasso, Pablo, Bathers with a Toy Boat, oil, charcoal, and chalk, 1937, Venice, Italy, Peggy Guggenheim Collection
 Bonnard, Pierre, Nude in the Bath, oil, 1941–1946, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Carnegie Institute, Museum of Art
 Matisse, Henri, The Swimming Pool, collage, 1952–1953, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Picasso, Pablo, The Bathers, wood sculpture, 1956, Paris, Marina Picasso Foundation
 Ipoustéguy, Jean-Robert, Woman Bathing, bronze sculpture, 1966, Paris, Galerie Claude Bernard Picasso, Pablo, Young Bather with Sand Shovel, oil, 1971, Washington, D.C., Collection Bernard Picasso

Men Bathing

Dürer, Albrecht, The Men's Bath House, woodcut, circa 1498
 Munch, Edvard, The Bathers, oil, 1907, Oslo, Norway, Museum of Art, Oslo Kommunes Kunstsamlinger
 Bazille, Jean-Frédéric, Men Bathing, 1860, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
 Hockney, David, Two Men in a Shower, oil, 1963, London, Rory McEwan Collection
 Hockney, David, Domestic Scene, Los Angeles, oil on canvas, 1963, London, Kasman Gallery
 Hockney, David, Boy About to Take a Shower, oil, 1964, private collection
 Hockney, David, Beverly Hills Showers, oil, 1964, Atlanta, Georgia, Collection James Graham
 Hockney, David, Man Taking Shower, oil, 1965, New York, William Dorr Collection

American Realism

Bellows, George, River Rats, oil on canvas, 1906, Washington, D.C., private collection
 Bellows, George, 42 Kids, oil on canvas, 1907, Washington, D.C., Corcoran Gallery
 Sloan, John, South Beach Bathers, oil, 1907–1908, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Arts
 Glackens, William, Bathing at Bellport, oil, 1911, Brooklyn Museum
 Cadmus, Paul, Coney Island, oil, 1935, Los Angeles, California, Los Angeles County Museum of Art
 Marsh, Reginald, Coney Island, tempera on panel, 1938, Syracuse, New York, Syracuse University Art Collection
 Tooker, George, Coney Island, egg tempura on gesso panel, 1948, private collection
 Hopper, Edward, Sea Watchers, oil, 1952, Kansas City, Missouri, Collection of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph L. Ritter

Further Reading

- Adler, Kathleen, "Cézanne's Bodies," Art in America 78:4 (April 1990)
- Breeskin, Adelyn Dohme, Mary Cassatt: A Catalogue Raisonné of the Graphic Work, Washington, D.C., Smithsonian Institution Press, 1979
- Elderfield, John, Henri Matisse: A Retrospective, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1993
- Faxon, Alicia, "Cézanne's Sources for his Grandes Baigneuses," Art Bulletin LXV:II (June 1983)
- Frazer, Sir James George, The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1966; London: Macmillan, 1966
- Hockney, David, David Hockney by David Hockney, New York: Abrams, 1976; London: Thames and Hudson, 1976
- House, John, "Renoir's Baigneuses of 1887 and the Politics of Escapism," Burlington Magazine 134:1074 (September 1992)
- Illustrated Handbook, Museum of Fine Arts*, Boston: Museum of Fine Arts, 1976
- Ives, Colta Feller, The Great Wave: The Influence of Japanese Woodcuts on French Prints, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1974
- Krumrine, Marie Louise, Paul Cézanne: The Bathers, London: Thames and Hudson, 1989
- _____, "Cézanne's 'Restricted Power': Further Reflections on the Bathers," Burlington Magazine 134:1074 (September 1992)
- Lipton, Eunice, Looking Into Degas, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1986
- Marshall, David R., "The Roman Baths Theme from Viviano Codazzi to G. P. Panini: Transmissions and Transformations," Artibus et historiae 12:23 (1991)
- The Odyssey of Homer*, Book XI, lines 380–465, translated by E. V. Rieu, Baltimore: Penguin, 1970
- Piggott, Juliet, Japanese Mythology, London and Feltham, New York: Hamlyn, 1969
- Riopelle, Christopher, "Renoir: The Great Bathers," Bulletin of the Philadelphia Museum of Art, 86:367–368 (Fall 1990)
- Rubin, William, ed., Pablo Picasso: A Retrospective, New York and London: Museum of Modern Art, 1980
- Stewart, Alison, "Sebald Beham's Fountain of Youth—Bath House Woodcut: Popular Entertainment and Large Prints by the Masters," Register of the Spencer Museum of Art 6:6 (1989)
- Yegül, Fikret, Baths and Bathing in Classical Antiquity, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1992
- _____, "The Thermo-Mineral Complex at Baiae and De Balneis Puteolanis," Art Bulletin 78:1 (March 1996)

BEHEADING/DECAPITATION

Diane Apostolos-Cappadona

The following motifs are included in the discussion of the theme Beheading/Decapitation:

MALE DECAPITATOR WITH FEMALE HEAD

MALE DECAPITATOR WITH MALE HEAD

MALE DECAPITATOR WITH ANIMAL HEAD

FEMALE DECAPITATOR WITH MALE HEAD

SEVERED HEADS

ORACULAR HEADS

ACHEIROPAIEC HEADS

Benvenuto Cellini, Perseus with the Head of Medusa, 1545, bronze sculpture, Florence, Italy, Loggia dei Lanzi. (Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

More than a simple and expedient form of execution, the symbolic and ritual connotations of beheading/decapitation distinguish it from other forms of corporal punishment. A story of the beheading of an enemy (human, animal, or symbolic) is found in all world mythologies. The fundamental symbolism of beheading/decapitation involves both the symbolism of the head and the presence of the decapitator. Both mythic and visual images of beheading/decapitation are dependent upon classical models. The primary Western model is the story of Perseus beheading Medusa.

As the illegitimate, and thereby impoverished, son of the human Danaë and the god Zeus, Perseus is unable to participate in the traditional ritual initiation into manhood. In an attempt to gain recognition as an adult male, he attempts to pass the “impossible” test King Polydektes foists upon him: Perseus must bring the head of the monstrous Gorgon Medusa back to the king and his court. Once a beautiful young woman, Medusa was transformed into the death-giving monster as her punishment for defiling the Temple of Athena. In his quest, Perseus receives aid from the goddess Athena, who counsels him to hold a mirror before Medusa because her gaze is so powerful that human beings are immediately turned to stone before her. As Perseus holds the mirror before Medusa, she gazes upon her own reflection and is turned into stone, and he is able to sever the offending, powerful head and carefully place it in a bag. He returns to the court of King Polydektes, opens the bag, and offers the head of Medusa to the king and his court, who are all turned to stone when they look upon the head. In return for her counsel and aide in his initiation into manhood, Perseus gives the head of Medusa to Athena who has it inscribed for all eternity upon her shield (thereby making Athena’s city of Athens impenetrable to its enemies).

The basic and necessary elements of all mythic and artistic depictions of beheading are present in the story of Perseus and Medusa: the decapitated body, the severed head, the decapitator, and the instrument of decapitation. First and foremost, there is the enemy who must be destroyed and for whom destruction must involve decapitation, not any other form of execution. The symbolism of the head is critical to the rationale for beheading/decapitation. In most classical societies, Eastern and Western, the head was understood to be the seat of the life force and the soul. As that part of the human body through which one saw, spoke, listened, thought, and ate, the head was interpreted as a source of life. Since many of these same classical cultures practiced either ritual sacrifice or war, they were familiar with the visual similarities between the brains and semen, and they believed that the male ejaculate was a fluid from the brain. This significant connection between the head and the male sexual organ suggests both the psychological relationship between decapitation and castration and the source of interpreting the head as the seat of the life force. Further, it was believed among many classical Western cultures that the head was also the site of the soul and the human emotions. Since hair—a universal symbol for energy and power—was a part of the head, the symbolic significance of the head becomes more apparent. Therefore, to decapitate one’s enemy was more than simply killing him or her; rather, this act allowed the decapitator, like Perseus, to have control over the severed head, which signified the power, vitality, generative force, soul, vision, and speech of the now-headless individual.

The decapitator is usually a youthful individual (male or female) on the threshold of a real or symbolic new stage of life. More often than not the action of locating, decapitating, and displaying the severed head of the enemy is a part of the decapitator’s initiation into this new life stage (e.g., manhood or marriage). In the case of Perseus, his quest for Medusa became a metaphor for his initiation into manhood. Here again the importance of the head as a source of the life force and the soul is significant, especially when the decapitator is a woman and the decapitated a man. Normally, the decapitator is represented as beheading the enemy by holding the instrument of death, usually a sword or lance, with the right hand and the newly severed head by its hair with the left hand. The right hand signified power, justice, reason, the sun, and, thereby, the male, and the left hand signified passivity, emotion, irrationality, the moon, and the female. Furthermore, in many cultures the right hand was used for eating and the left hand for cleansing the body, especially after urination or defecation. Thus, there are multiple implications for the hand by which the decapitator holds the instrument of death and the severed head.

The severed head—a source of energy, power, and wisdom for the now-defunct victim—may itself become a powerful symbol for the decapitator or his or her people. For example, in the case of Medusa, the severed head was incised onto the shield of Athena, thereby proclaiming Athena’s support for Perseus, the ritual purification of her defiled temple, and that the death-giving power of Medusa had been transformed to protect the people of Athens. In a similar fashion the severed heads of Goliath and Holofernes routed the enemies of Israel. On the other hand, the oracular head of Orpheus initiated a new category of severed heads, as he was not an enemy killed by a hero/heroine but a victim of unjust punishment. His severed head was magically placed by Apollo in a cave at Antissa (on the island of Lesbos) and became a source of prophecy and wisdom; so, too, with the heads of many of the Christian cephalophoric saints such as St. Denis. This variation on the severed head as a source of prophecy and wisdom is a significant element to the symbolism of the skull in later Christian art as a signifier of meditation, penance, and the transitory quality of human life.

Depictions in written or visual sources on beheading/decapitation stories emphasize one of three moments: the young hero/heroine with the severed head, the action of the decapitation, or the moments before the decapitation. The most common representation is that of the young hero/heroine with the severed head because this scene can be both a model of proper action (without the elements of obscenity) and a source of contemplation upon the meaning of this event. Similarly, the artistic and mythic variations of the theme of beheading/decapitation may be identified through one of four motifs of gender identity of the decapitator and of the victim: a male decapitator with a male victim, a male decapitator with a female victim, a male decapitator with an animal victim, or a female decapitator with a male victim. Few if any visual or literary examples of a female decapitator with either a female or animal victim exist. An overview of these motifs suggests cultural variations and transformations of the symbolism of beheading/decapitation in Western iconography.

As the primary (generic) model of beheading/decapitation for Western iconography, the myth and image of Perseus with the head of Medusa also represent the motif of a male decapitator with a female victim in the classical (Mediterranean) tradition. The biblical story of Jephthah and his daughter (Judges 11:4–39) was misinterpreted as a transformation of the motif of beheading and decapitation from that of hero/heroine with enemy to that of parent and child. A pious Jew, Jephthah must fulfill his vow to God to destroy the first person he saw upon returning home if his army was victorious. Unfortunately for Jephthah, the first person he saw was his beloved daughter. Unlike Abraham who was spared from sacrificing his son Isaac to God, Jephthah offered his daughter as a sacrifice to God after allowing her two months to withdraw and to mourn her virginity. Although the scriptural text indicates that Jephthah's daughter was sacrificed, the actual method of her death is disputed. Nonetheless, medieval artisans represented Jephthah beheading his daughter (perhaps as metaphor for the loss of her life instead of the loss of her virginity). In the history of the early and medieval Christian tradition, many young female virgin saints were martyred like Jephthah's daughter, in an inversion of the Perseus-Medusa theme. These Christian martyrs usually underwent lengthy and bizarre physical tortures such as St. Agatha's having her breasts pinched off or St. Barbara's being boiled in oil, neither action resulting in their physical deaths. The only form of execution that "worked" was decapitation—again suggesting the critical symbolism of the head (especially in terms of the virgin martyrs and the Western Christian emphasis on relics and cults). The medieval tale of the Mandagora continues this mythic and visual tradition.

In the Renaissance, a renewed interest in classical art and mythology evoked new interpretations of the Perseus-Medusa story that inspired later artistic depictions, such as that of Benvenuto Cellini. In this image of male decapitator with female victim, the artist has indicated the victor by his dynamic and powerful stance, which is highlighted by the triumphant gesture of the raised left hand displaying the severed head of Medusa as the right hand calmly retreats with the instrument of destruction. The youthful decapitator's strength is emphasized by the representation of the classical nude male body, which stands both regal and aloof from the decapitated head and the implied onlookers.

The motif of a male decapitator with a male victim in Western iconography has its classical model in the death of Troilus during the Trojan War. According to legend and tradition, in revenge for the death of Patroclus, Achilles decapitates Troilus, whose death (prior to his twentieth birthday) is also an oracular requirement for the victory of the Greek forces. The scriptural story of David and Goliath is the most popular model of the male versus male decapitation motif in Western iconography. Premised upon the story of Troilus and Achilles, and a parallel to the apocryphal story of Judith and Holofernes, the topic of David and Goliath is found regularly throughout the history of Western Christian art. The youthful and victorious David is most often represented standing (in a classical pose of victory) over the decapitated body of his enemy, signifying his initiation into manhood. The young victor holds the head by the hair with his left hand and the sword with his right. Donatello's depiction of a nude David exacerbates the viewer's recognition of inherent homoeroticism in what is usually interpreted as an elder male versus younger male struggle. Michelangelo's David is an iconographic innovation as Goliath's presence is only implied and David is depicted before the battle or decapitation occurs. Gian Lorenzo Bernini's Baroque interpretation of this theme initiates the iconography of David in the act of hurling the slingshot as opposed to the meditative "before" of Michelangelo and the victorious "after" of Donatello. As in the depictions of the Perseus-Medusa story, the majority of visualizations of David and Goliath focus upon the "after"—that is, the victorious youth holding the severed head of his enemy.

The inversion of this male versus male decapitation motif is the many male Christian saints and martyrs who were beheaded, the most prominent of whom was St. Paul, who sets the iconographic standard. As a Roman citizen, he was allowed the "privilege" of decapitation as opposed to other more painful and less dignified modes of execution. Representations of the decollation or death of St. Paul abound, in which the Roman (read "pagan") male executioner stands large and swarthy over the emaciated body of the Christian saint, whose humility is signified by the loss of his head (with all the inherent symbolism thereto attached). Later, male Christian saints and martyrs, most notably St. Denis, are depicted either having just been beheaded or as a revived headless body holding the severed head as an emblem of martyrdom. The medieval legend of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight revives this motif of male versus male decapitation in both text and image.

A third motif of beheading found in Western iconography is that of a male decapitator with an animal victim. The primary classical model is that of Hercules and the Hydra. Again a variant on the theme of initiation into manhood, Hercules is required to meet the test of twelve labors in order to prove himself worthy of kingship. One of these labors includes the Hydra—a nine-headed mythological serpent that regenerates each head as quickly as Hercules can sever it. Finally, Hercules recognizes that one of the heads is in fact the immortal head, which, once identified and cut off, terminates the regeneration process. He tricks the Hydra by having Iolaus sear the stem of each neck as the head is severed, thus successfully destroying the immortal head. In Christian art and legend, there are several heroic or warrior saints who are tested with the challenge of an animal monster that must be destroyed to save either a village, a church, or a maiden in distress. As with Hercules and the Hydra, or the early Christian martyrs, physical death is only possible through decapitation, not by a simple sword thrust or a boiling in oil. The most famous and popular of these heroic or warrior saints was St. George, as in the classical depiction by Raphael, in which the youthful saint rescues the prayerful maiden from the monster/dragon. The saint's physical strength and invincibility are signaled by his armored body, and his rapidity of movement by his flowing cape. He sits astride his powerful white charger in a position of action and authority. With a sense of careful control, St. George handles the horse with the reins in his left hand while with his right hand dramatically thrusts a lance into the dragon. The medieval legend of Tristan slaying the dragon is a transformation of this earlier Christian model of the male saint beheading an animal (monster).

The fourth motif is that of a female decapitator with a male victim. The classical model is the historical but little-known story of Cyrus and Tomyris. This motif of female versus male is best represented in the apocryphal story and ensuing visual tradition of Judith and Holofernes. As with other variations on the theme of beheading/decapitation, there are elements of initiatory trials and sexuality indicated through the heroine's conquest of the enemy general. The implicit male fear of castration during sexual intercourse and the explicit mythic (psychic) analogy of decapitation as castration abound from the earliest representations of Judith in Hebrew and Christian art. The pious but beautiful widow Judith exchanges her widow's weeds for more feminine adornments in an attempt to defend God's people from total (read sexual) destruction by the Assyrian general Holofernes and his army. Although the apocryphal story carefully avoids mention of Judith's total seduction of Holofernes, and just as carefully offers symbolic allusions that sexual consummation was never achieved, the story of Judith and Holofernes becomes a classical mode of depicting female lust, and Judith becomes by the mid-nineteenth century one of Western art's leading femmes fatales. As with the Perseus-Medusa and David-Goliath stories, the majority of representations of Judith-Holofernes emphasize the image of the victorious Judith displaying the severed head of Holofernes held with her left hand and his sword—the instrument of his death—with her right. In an effort to defend Judith's sexual purity, her maid-servant enters the scene in Renaissance art, and most often stands between Judith and the decapitated body of Holofernes, as in Andrea Mantegna's classically inspired representation of Judith and Holofernes. Mantegna's Judith is clearly depicted in the pose, garments, and posture of a Greek goddess, ostensibly Athena (the goddess of wisdom and war), and also takes on the aura of a Hellenistic sculpture. The ghastly deed of decapitation is referred to only symbolically by the background presence of the decapitated body, the severed head, and the grimace on the face of the maidservant.

As every symbol has both a positive and a negative side, it should be noted that the inclusion of the maid may also be read and in fact is used in later Western art as a sign of the lasciviousness of Judith, who comes to Holofernes' tent with her own procuress. The inversion of this motif of virtuous female decapitator versus dishonorable male victim is found in the biblical story of Salome and John the Baptist. In this scriptural account of martyrdom, the beautiful young daughter of Herodias dances to please the king at his birthday banquet and is rewarded with whatever she wishes up to half of his kingdom. At her mother's request, the daughter asks for the head of the saintly Baptist on a platter. Again the fundamental relationship of these varied stories of beheadings/decapitations as premised upon primal understandings of the headhunt as a rite of passage into adulthood or marriage, and of the symbolism of the head as the site of generative powers, wisdom, and the soul, becomes apparent as the young daughter dances (another symbolic rite for sexual initiation) and receives the head of a man on a platter, as in the panel representing the beheading of St. John the Baptist from Rogier van der Weyden's St. John the Baptist Altarpiece. In this variant, however, the young woman is not the actual executioner, but the vehicle by which the decapitation occurs. In Christian art, Salome becomes symbolic of both uncontrollable female lust and of woman's evil nature, which seeks to destroy man. The symbolic inversion of the Judith-Holofernes story into that of Salome and John the Baptist leads to a conflation of these two female decapitators into one model for the femme fatale in Western iconography, as in Gustav Klimt's Judith II/Salome.

The motif of the severed head develops into a series of important variants of the theme of beheading/decapitation in Western art. The first variant is the use of the enemy's severed head as trophy. The primary example of this variant is the severed head of Medusa, which is employed initially by Perseus and later by Athena as both a trophy of victory and as a deterrent to attack. The severed heads of Goliath and Holofernes are similarly used by the Hebrews to ward off further attack (invasion). The inversion of this variant that is the display of the severed head of a good and just person is suggested by the acheiropaic images of Jesus Christ, especially the Veil of Veronica and the Mandyion of Edessa, which are displayed both as trophies of his victory over death and as healing/curative images. The Mandyion of Edessa continues the initial motif as it was reputedly employed by the citizens of Edessa, Greece, and later Constantinople to ward off invaders.

The second variant of the motif of the severed head is that originated with the oracular head of Orpheus, which became a source of prophecy and wisdom once it was situated in a cave at Antissa. In a similar manner, images of the severed heads of Christian saints, most prominently St. John the Baptist and St. Denis, become symbols of wisdom and prophecy and also are reputed to heal illnesses, hopeless diseases, and injuries. The third variant of this motif is the iconography of Adam's skull in depictions of the Crucifixion of Jesus Christ as a sign of the transitory nature of human existence (and by implication, of the human body). This variant eventually becomes commonly recognized as a sign of penance, meditation, and the transitory nature of life in Renaissance and Baroque art and literature.

See also Death; Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale; Hanging; Martyrdom

Selected Works of Art

Male Decapitator with Female Head

- Perseus Beheading Medusa*, Boetian terra-cotta amphora, early seventh century B.C., Paris, Louvre
- Headless Mandragora*, manuscript illustration, from Commentary on the Song of Songs, by Honorius of Autun, 1301, Sankt Florian, Germany, Augustiner-Chorherrenstift St. Florian Monastery (Ms. Codex XI.80)
- Sacrifice of Jephthah's Daughter*, manuscript illumination, from Speculum Humanae Salvationis, late fourteenth or early fifteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France (Ms.lat. 512, fol. 7r)
- Peruzzi, Baldassare, Perseus and Medusa, ceiling fresco, circa 1511, Rome, Villa Farnesina, Sala di Galatea
- Cellini, Benvenuto, Perseus, bronze sculpture, 1545, Florence, Italy, Loggia dei Lanzi
- Canova, Antonio, Perseus Carrying the Head of Medusa, Carrara marble, 1804–1808, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Delaroche, Paul, The Execution of the Lady Jane Grey, oil on canvas, 1834, London, National Gallery
- Herdman, Robert, The Execution of Mary Queen of Scots, 1867, Glasgow, Scotland, Glasgow City Art Gallery and Museum
- Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Escape of Perseus, from Perseus series, 1876–1888, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie

Male Decapitator with Male Head

- Hector and Achilles Fighting Over the Body of Troilus*, Attic terra-cotta amphora, circa 570–560 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek
- Kleitias Painter and Ergotimos Potter, Achilles' Ambush of Troilus, terra-cotta volute krater, circa 560 B.C., Florence, Italy, Museo Archeologico
- Gawain and the Green Knight*, manuscript illumination, circa 1390–1400, London, British Museum (Cotton Nero A.X. fol. 94v)
- Donatello, David, marble, 1408–1409, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale, Bargello
- Donatello, David, bronze, circa 1430, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale, Bargello
- Verrocchio, Andrea del, David, bronze, 1476, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale Bargello
- Michelangelo, David, marble, 1501–1504, Florence, Italy, Accademia
- Caravaggio, David with the Head of Goliath, oil on canvas, circa 1603–1604, Madrid, Prado
- Caravaggio, David with the Head of Goliath, oil on wood, early seventeenth century, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

- Caravaggio, David with the Head of Goliath, oil on canvas, circa 1605–1606, Rome, Borghese Gallery
- Caravaggio, David with the Head of Goliath, early seventeenth century, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Reni, Guido, David with the Head of Goliath, oil on canvas, circa 1605–1606, Paris, Louvre
- Gentileschi, Orazio, David in Contemplation After the Defeat of Goliath, oil on canvas, circa 1607–1608, Rome, Galleria Spada
- Bernini, Gianlorenzo, David, marble, 1623, Rome, Borghese Gallery
- Delaroche, Paul, Cromwell Gazing at the Body of Charles I, 1931, Nîmes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Male Decapitator with Animal Head

- Herakles Slaying the Lernean Hydra*, middle Corinthian terra-cotta skyphos, circa 580 B.C., Paris, Louvre
- Saint Michael and His Angels Defeat the Seven-Headed Dragon*, illuminated manuscript, from Apocalypse, circa 1250, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- Tristan Severing the Head of the Dragon*, illuminated manuscript, from Tristan, by Gottfried von Strassburg, circa 1300, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek (fol. 67)
- Raphael, Saint George and the Dragon, oil on wood, circa 1506, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, The Wedding of Saint George and the Princess Sabra, watercolor, 1857, London, Tate Gallery

Female Decapitator with Male Head

- Judith Slaying Holofernes*, manuscript illumination from Bible of Charles the Bald, circa 870, Rome, San Paolo Fuori le Mura
- Dance of Salome*, mosaic, 1342–1554, Venice, Baptistry, Basilica of St. Mark
- Judith and Holofernes*, manuscript illumination from Speculum Humanae Salvationis, late fourteenth or early fifteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France (lat. 512, fol. 31v)
- Weyden, Rogier van der, Beheading of Saint John the Baptist, oil on panel, from Saint John Altarpiece, fifteenth century, Berlin, Gemäldegalerie
- Donatello, Feast of Herod, gilded bronze panel on Baptismal font, circa 1425, Siena, Italy, Cathedral
- Donatello, Judith and Holofernes, bronze, circa 1455–1460, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio
- Botticelli, Judith's Return to Bethulia, oil on wood, circa 1470, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Mantegna, Judith and Holofernes, oil on wood, circa 1495, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Giorgione, Judith, oil on canvas, circa 1500–1504, St. Petersburg, Russia, State Hermitage Museum
- Master of the Mansi Magdalen, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, fresco, circa 1509–1511, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
- Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Salome, oil on panel, 1509–1510, Lisbon, Portugal, Museu Nacional de Arte Antiga

Michelangelo, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, fresco, 1509–1511, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Salome, oil on wood, 1510–1512, Munich, Germany, Bayerisches Nationalmuseum

Grien, Hans Baldung, Judith and Holofernes, 1525, Nuremberg, Germany, Germanisches Nationalmuseum

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Judith, oil on wood, circa 1530, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, The Feast of Herod, oil on panel, 1531, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum

Strozzi, Bernardo, Salome, 1530s, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, The Death of Holofernes, oil on panel, 1531, Gotha, Germany, Schlossmuseum

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Judith, oil on panel, after 1537, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Titian, David and Goliath, canvas, 1542, Venice, Italy, Santa Maria della Salute, Sacristy

Veronese, Paolo, Judith and Holofernes, oil on canvas, 1570s, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Bloemaert, Abraham, Judith, oil on canvas, 1593, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Galizia, Fede, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, oil on canvas, 1596, Sarasota, Ringling Museum

Caravaggio, Judith Beheading Holofernes, oil on canvas, 1598–1599, Rome, Galleria Nazionale di Roma

Caravaggio, Judith Beheading Saint John the Baptist, 1609, Malta, Latvia, La Valetta

Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith and Holofernes, oil on canvas, circa 1612–1613, Naples, Italy, Museo Capodimonte

Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith and Holofernes, oil on canvas, 1613–1614, Florence, Galleria d'Arte Moderna di Palazzo Pitti

Allori, Cristofano, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, 1616–1620, Florence, Galleria d'Arte Moderna di Palazzo Pitti

Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith Slaying Holofernes, circa 1620, Florence, Uffizi Gallery

Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith and Maidservant with the Head of Holofernes, oil on canvas, circa 1625, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Art

Rubens, Peter Paul, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, early 1630s, Brunswick, Germany, Herzog Anton Ulrich-Museum

Rubens, Peter Paul, Feast of Herod, before 1640, Edinburgh, Scotland, United Kingdom, National Gallery of Scotland

Reni, Guido, Salome with the Head of John the Baptist, seventeenth century, Rome, Galleria Corsini

Reni, Guido, Salome with the Head of John the Baptist, oil on canvas, 1638, Chicago, Art Institute

Fabritius, Carel, Beheading of John the Baptist, oil on canvas, circa 1640, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Sirani, Elisabetta, Judith, seventeenth century, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery

Preti, Mattia, The Feast of Herod, oil on canvas, circa 1656, Toledo, Spain, Toledo Museum

Solimena, Francesco, Judith Displaying the Head of Holofernes, early eighteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Goya, Francisco, Judith and Holofernes, 1819–1823, Madrid, Prado

Regnault, Henri, Salome, oil on canvas, 1870, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Corinth, Lovis, Salome, oil on wood, 1900, Leipzig, Germany, Stadtgeschichtliches Museum Leipzig

Klinger, Max, Salome, marble, 1893, location unknown

Klimt, Gustav, Judith I, 1901, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie

Klimt, Gustav, Judith II/Salome, oil on canvas, 1909, Venice, Italy, Galleria d'Arte Moderna

Stuck, Franz van, Judith, early twentieth century, Schwein, Germany, Staatliches Museum

Severed Heads

Caravaggio, The Head of Medusa, oil on wood, circa 1590–1595, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Toorop, Charley, Medusa Takes to the Sea, oil on panel, 1939–1941, Otterloo, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Kröller-Müller

Oracular Heads

Painter of Ruvo, Oracular Head of Orpheus, terra-cotta stemless kylix, circa 410–400 B.C., Cambridge, Cambridge University, Corpus Christi College

Moreau, Gustave, Young Thracian Woman with the Head of Orpheus, 1867, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Delville, Jean, Orpheus, oil on canvas, 1893, Brussels, Belgium, private collection

Acheiropaieic Heads

The Holy Face of Laon, early thirteenth century, Laon, France, Musée de la Cathédrale

Master of St. Veronica, Saint Veronica with the Sudarium, oil on wood, early fifteenth century, London, National Gallery

Weyden, Rogier van der, Saint Veronica, wing of Crucifixion, fifteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Memling, Hans, Saint Veronica, oil on wood, circa 1470–1479, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Fetti, Domenico, The Veil of Veronica, oil on wood, circa 1615, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Zubarán, Francisco de, Veronica's Sweatcloth, oil on canvas, seventeenth century, Stockholm, Nationalmuseum

Further Reading

Apostolos-Cappadona, Diane, “Martha Graham and the Quest for the Feminine in Eve, Lilith, and Judith,” in Dance as Religious Studies, eds., Doug Adams and Diane Apostolos-Cappadona, New York: Crossroad, 1990

- _____, "The Lord has Struck Him Down by the Hand of a Woman!... Images of Judith," in Art as Religious Studies, eds., Doug Adams and Diane Apostolos-Cappadona, New York: Crossroad, 1987
- _____, "Scriptural Women Who Danced," in Dance as Religious Studies, eds., Doug Adams and Diane Apostolos-Cappadona, New York: Crossroad, 1990
- Kuryluk, Ewa, Salome and Judas in the Cave of Sex. The Grotesque: Origins, Iconography, Techniques, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1987
- _____, Veronica and Her Cloth: History, Symbolism, and Structure of a "True" Image, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1991

- Meslin, Michael, "Head: Symbolism and Ritual Use," in Encyclopedia of Religion, ed., Mircea Eliade, New York: McGraw Hill, 1987
- Moon, Beverly, An Encyclopedia of Archetypal Symbolism, Boston and London: Shambhala, 1991
- Neumann, Erich, The Great Mother, New York: Pantheon, 1965; London: Routledge and Paul, 1965
- Onians, Richard Broxton, The Origins of European Thought, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1951
- Schnedier, Laurie, "Donatello and Caravaggio: The Iconography of Decapitation," The American Image 33:1 (1976)

BETRAYAL

Gina Strumwasser

The following iconographic narratives are included in the discussion of the theme Betrayal:

ADAM AND EVE

LOT AND HIS DAUGHTERS

STORY OF JACOB

JUDAH AND TAMAR

JOSEPH AND THE WIFE OF POTIPHAR

JAEL

SAMSON AND DELILAH

BATHSHEBA

SUSANNA

JUDITH

PACT OF JUDAS

LAST SUPPER

DENIAL OF ST. PETER

KISS OF JUDAS

ST. BARBARA

ST. LUCY

SCHOOLMASTER OF FALERII

PHOCION

LUCRETIA

DIDO

MEDEA

VENUS AND CUPID

THE DOCTOR'S VISIT

Peter Paul Rubens, Samson and Delilah, 1609–1610, painting, London, National Gallery.
(Courtesy of the National Gallery, London)

Commonly considered synonymous with infidelity, betrayal is related to dishonesty and deceit and is consequently connected to secular love and loyalty to one's country. Some acts of betrayal are accomplished with evil intent, and others, even though the results are as disastrous, occur through the good intent of the betrayer. When understood as a source of revenge for wrongdoing, betrayal is perceived as a stimulus for further activity and sometimes tragic action injuring or mortally wounding the parties involved. Betrayal is linked to passion and sexuality and is as relevant today in popular novels and in motion pictures as it was in early history. For example, contemporary film has revitalized the Old Testament image of the deceitful female by routinely focusing on women's seductive power over men.

In art, the iconographic term betrayal is most commonly associated with the New Testament personage Judas, the betrayer of Jesus Christ. Painterly accounts of other biblical betrayals are conveyed as moral illustration that dictates human behavior, and for this reason the betrayer receives an appropriate reward or punishment. In addition to sacred writing, the theme of betrayal is woven into stories from classical literature and ancient history. Unlike scriptural text, mythological tales of love occasionally introduce the theme of betrayal in a humorous manner.

The primary betrayal of the New Testament is often presented in a narrative series that includes three consequential events: an introduction or Pact of Judas, in which the apostle Judas receives 30 pieces of silver in return for the promise to identify Jesus for the soldiers; the proclamation at the Last Supper, in which Jesus announces his knowledge that he will be betrayed; and the conclusion or Arrest of Christ, also known as the Kiss of Judas, in which Judas identifies Christ for the soldiers with his kiss. These themes of betrayal are portrayed in art from the Middle Ages, particularly in fresco cycles and altarpieces, to the modern time.

The Pact of Judas generally introduces the betrayal of Christ. This is true in fresco programs as well as in panel painting. Giotto proposes the Pact of Judas as a prelude to the Last Supper in the Scrovegni Chapel (Arena Chapel) frescoes in Padua, Italy. On the back of the Maestà Altarpiece, preceding the Betrayal of Christ, Duccio di Buoninsegna presents this episode in an arched building where Judas receives the 30 silver coins. Following Duccio's interpretation, Barna da Siena paints the Pact of Judas as a precursor to the Betrayal in San Gimignano. The tranquillity depicted in the Pact explodes in the consequent scene in the Betrayal. With the soldiers encircling, Judas identifies Christ with a kiss and just below him, advancing on the left, St. Peter cuts off the ear of Malchus, the servant of the high priest. This secondary incident often accompanies the betrayal.

According to the Bible, Christ was betrayed by his disciple Judas Iscariot. The communication of betrayal is popularly expressed by Christ's announcement at the Last Supper, "Verily, one of you will betray me" (Mark 14:18), and conveyed in slightly different accounts in all four gospels (Matthew 26:21-26; Mark 14:18-21; Luke 22:21-23; and John 13:21-30).

Fourteenth-century representations of the Last Supper subtly explain Christ's acknowledgment of betrayal. Giotto painted the scene with the apostles grouped in a circular arrangement around a large rectangular table. Although it is not easily apprehended, Giotto located Christ on the compositional left with St. John reclining on his bosom. One apostle, presumably Judas, dips his hand into the same dish as Christ (Matthew 26:23; Mark 14:20). Affirming the ritual, Judas's role as betrayer is also emphasized. In contrast to the Florentine Giotto, the Sienese painter Duccio rendered Christ as readily identifiable in the center of the table facing the viewer. Characteristically, Duccio concentrated on the signifying details of the eventual sacrifice that includes the paschal lamb and the bread and wine, rather than the historical narrative of the betrayal. Pietro Lorenzetti's fresco in Assisi, Italy, also relies on the mundane elements of the service rather than the biblical assertion of Judas's betrayal. Taddeo Gaddi was unique in sitting Judas on the opposite side of the table from Christ and the remaining apostles. Emphasizing his treacherous role in the history of Christianity, Judas's lone figure would become a model for most fifteenth-century depictions of the Last Supper.

In the early Renaissance, the announcement of betrayal is reinforced by the positioning of Judas. Christ's emphatic declaration of betrayal dominates the Jewish celebration of Passover in Andrea del Castagno's pictured treatment of the Last Supper. Although a quiet and calm occurrence, the isolated image of Judas is rendered alone on the contrary side of the elongated table, signifying his crucial role in bringing Christ's earthly demise to fruition. The dynamic marble patterns of the room reinforce the turbulent nature of Judas's forthcoming betrayal. In anticipation, he seems to contemplate both his reward in silver as well as the dramatic consequence of the insidious transaction. Similar in his composition, Domenico Ghirlandaio places Judas to Christ's left, on the contrasting side of the ceremonial table. In opposition to the benevolent and passive St. John, Judas seems to acquire a more menacing and active role. In fact, Christ speaks directly to Judas, clearly recognizing his earthly betrayer. The temporal beauty of the fruit and fowl behind the disciples appears as a stark contrast to the contemptuous betrayer.

The proclamation of the betrayal of Christ is forever etched in history through Leonardo da Vinci's painterly announcement. As a freethinker, Leonardo was perhaps better able to render the Last Supper objectively, and as a result he produced an image that has become a visual documentation of the occasion rather than a mere artistic representation. For Leonardo, the announcement comes to pass in a large hall because, as required by the Bible, Christ requested a suitable location for the ritual Seder. In the fresco, emphasis is placed on the betrayer, whom Leonardo interprets as the only figure that neglects to react to the words of Christ. Judas is neither surprised nor agitated but sits quietly in the shadow of the apostles Peter and John. He grasps a bag that presumably contains the pieces of silver, an easily recognizable attribute of his betrayal. Although traditionally Judas is presented in profile with an exaggerated Jewish nose, Leonardo chose not to make this distinction and created a universal exemplar rather than a specific man. Observing Western custom, he portrayed each apostle with a unique personality and individual physiognomy, as he depicted the response of the aggravated disciples. Toward the end of the Middle Ages, Judas becomes the paradigm of betrayer and the model of the malevolent Jew.

There are two circumstances of betrayal that are established at the Last Supper. Although St. Peter pledges his loyalty to Christ at the conclusion of the Last Supper, Jesus says: "I tell you this: today, this very night, before the cock crows twice, you yourself will disown me three times" (Mark 14:30–31). By denying Christ, St. Peter also betrays him, but unlike Judas, St. Peter asks to be forgiven. While this second acknowledgment of betrayal is an integral part of Christ's message on the eve of his arrest, it is not as often rendered in art.

Particularly in Italy, the Last Supper is depicted as a historical event with emphasis on the betrayal of Christ. For the northerners, especially in Flanders, it is revealed rather as a solemn ceremony and the foundation for the sacrifice of the Mass. In the Altarpiece of the Blessed Sacrament by Dirck Bouts, in Sint Pieters Kerk in Louvain, Belgium, Judas seems to have a less important role than in the narrative rendering. This is equally true of the Holy Communion of the Apostles by Joos van Ghent in the Galleria Nazionale delle Marche in Urbino, Italy, in which Christ is presented as the high priest distributing the consecrated host to his devout disciples.

The betrayal of Christ by Judas to the Romans for 30 silver coins occurs after the Agony in the Garden and moments before the Arrest of Christ, who is identified by the Kiss of Judas. The subject is especially popular in the fourteenth century and can be found in fresco and panel painting as well as in illuminated manuscripts. By the fifteenth century and into the High Renaissance, the theme of the betrayal diminishes in depiction. Two of the most important and dramatic scenes were painted by the Gothic innovators Duccio and Giotto, geographically separated and chronologically distanced by less than a decade. Duccio's Betrayal is emotionally designed in a friezelike composition on the back of the Maestà Altarpiece. Depicted directly below the large Crucifixion, the Betrayal was planned in three stages that include St. Peter on the left, the Kiss of Judas in the center, and the departure of the apostles on the right. Capturing a moment in time, all events occur simultaneously. The apostles abandon Christ and appear to flee the scene, leaving him isolated and alone with the soldiers of Rome and Judas, his betrayer. Paralleling Christ's pose, St. Peter takes an active stance rather than echoing Christ's more submissive response to Judas's betrayal. Action is the paramount motif of Duccio's interpretation, which subordinates psychological activity to physical action.

In Giotto's fresco of the Kiss of Judas in the Scrovegni Chapel (Arena Chapel), Judas is presented as the focal point of the painting, draped in yellow, with his arms encircling Christ. Associated with medieval depictions of Old Testament personalities, yellow is the color of deceit and treason. During World War II, European Jews were considered betrayers by the Nazis and were forced to wear the identifying yellow Star of David. In addition to color, Giotto employs dramatic gestures, expressions, and narrative details to convey a sense of urgency in the prospective arrest. Central to the account, Christ confronts his accuser, looking directly at Judas as if anticipating the kiss of revelation. This psychological link between Christ and Judas creates an intimacy that reassures the viewer of Christ's foreknowledge of the betrayal, as prescribed at the Last Supper. Giotto's unique frankness and Christ's pervasive calm complement the painterly interpretation, making the scene a precisely human performance, mirroring this most negative of earthly enterprises. A group of men holding triumphant lances heighten the impassioned instant by creating a natural enclosure for the two protagonists. Just behind Christ and to the left of the composition, an angry St. Peter cuts off Malchus's ear.

Dependent upon the iconographic precedent of Duccio, French illuminator Jean Pucelle borrowed dramatic symbols of despair from the Italians. Meant to be closely scrutinized in a much smaller format, the Kiss of Judas is accomplished against an ambiguous background. The betrayal is represented as a dominant image on the upper half of a four-inch page from the Book of Hours of Jeanne d'Evreux. Similar to the earlier paintings by Giotto and Duccio, Christ stands in the physical and psychological center of the composition. Judas identifies Christ by a kiss while another man grabs his clothing. To the right of Christ, Malchus, whose ear is sliced by St. Peter, is reduced to a childlike form seated on the ground. St. Peter's posture imitates Christ as they stand in a traditional Gothic sculptural sway. Roman soldiers emerge on Christ's left, the sinister side, to emphasize their negative role in this drama. The theme of betrayal was a popular addition to the books of hours because it signified the matins, or morning prayer. For this reason, it was included in the hours of the Passion as the first scene followed by other events leading up to the death of Christ.

While Christ's announcement of the betrayal at the Last Supper is more persistently depicted than the Kiss of Judas, perhaps because of the prototypical association with the Mass, the theme is seldom executed by a substantial artist subsequent to Leonardo da Vinci. One notable example was painted by Emil Nolde during the first decade of the twentieth century. In contrast to Leonardo's quiet and solemn occasion, Nolde's Last Supper is enticing in approach to color and intense in condensed emotion. The masklike disciples are crowded into the foreground and respond vividly to the words of Christ. A directness and intimacy is established with the viewer, who is forced to become, like Christ, a respondent betrayed. Other twentieth-century versions of the Betrayal and the Last Supper by Stanley Spencer emphasize different aspects of the narrative. In the first version of the Betrayal, Spencer tries to incorporate all aspects of the narrative: on the right, soldiers roughly grasp Jesus by the arm and the foot; on the left, Peter, brandishing a large knife, pulls at Malchus's ear; in the background, the apostles flee behind a wall, looking backward in fear and guilt; while running through the center of the composition, the naked figure dropping his garment completes the diffuse scene. The naked figure is a usually neglected part of Mark's narrative, "And there followed him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body: and the young men laid hold on him; and he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked" (Mark 15:51–52). Spencer's second version (1923) pays more attention to pattern, detail, and rhythm but loses dramatic intensity. Peter and Malchus become the center and the focus of the composition, while the setting, the back gardens of Spencer's native Cookham, England, overwhelms the action of the narrative.

Betrothed virgin saints were also betrayed by their beloveds once their faith was publicly revealed. Such was the case of St. Lucy who, according to the Golden Legend, converted her mother to Christianity by proving her curative powers and persuaded her to donate the family riches to the poor. Learning of this deed, her fiancé became furious and betrayed her as a Christian to the consul Paschasius, saying that she refused to obey the law. In an attempt to punish her, Paschasius tried various tortures, but she could be neither lifted by a thousand men nor burned with pitch, resin, or boiling oil. St. Lucy was at last slain by a sword thrust into her throat. In Domenico Veneziano's Madonna Enthroned with Saints, St. Lucy is presented with her eyes on a plate in the company of the Virgin Mary and the Christ Child. It was said that she pulled out her own eyes upon learning that a suitor found them alluring. They were miraculously restored by the Virgin Mary.

Other sacred devotees had similar experiences to St. Lucy that convinced them that a good heavenly life was reward enough for their earthly betrayal and suffering. Upon discovering St. Barbara's conversion to Christianity, her father, Dioscorus, betrayed her to the Romans. He was miraculously hit by lightning after volunteering to decapitate his daughter. In an unusual work by Jan van Eyck, St. Barbara is represented on a single panel without color that is meticulously detailed. The saint is seated before her attribute, a monumental Gothic tower that is displayed in the process of construction. The activities of medieval cathedral fabrication are historically documented and provide an appropriate setting for the young woman. The tower was built by St. Barbara's father to ensure her isolation from male admirers and preclude her falling in love. Although St. Barbara is easy to distinguish in Jan van Eyck's painting, it is difficult to determine whether the panel was meant to be applied with pigment or completed as a finished drawing. The intent of the artist remains somewhat of a mystery.

Often, holy women representing a patron's namesake accompanied biblical scenes on commissioned Flemish altarpieces. In Italy, feminine martyrs were more commonly venerated in fresco cycles illustrating their lives. While these women were esteemed for their piety, they were also understood as models for secular women. Encouraged by masculine taste and desire, saintly attributes of chastity, obedience, and silence were considered essential for members of the female gender.

Events from the life of Adam and Eve, especially the temptation, illustrate the popularity of the theme of betrayal and its consequences. The serpent betrayed Eve, and Eve betrayed Adam. Adam and Eve betrayed God by eating the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. Retribution for their infidelity resulted in serious punishment for all involved. The serpent was meant to go upon its belly, Eve to bear children in pain, Adam to work the land, and all to face death. Adam and Eve experienced banishment from paradise. Their transgression signifies the reason for Christ's incarnation and eventual Passion. Hugo van der Goes makes this point explicit in the Vienna Diptych, which treats the temptation and lamentation on two separate panels side by side. In the temptation, Adam and Eve are represented in the middle of a manicured garden of paradise. Eve is generally given greater responsibility for the fall, and her central position in the composition reinforces her role as betrayer. Adam is portrayed to her right, and the upright serpent, in the form of a salamander, is depicted on her left. The Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil behind them creates an umbrellalike frame for the wrongdoers. According to Jewish legend, the serpent who betrayed Eve was punished by the removal of his limbs, and his cries were heard throughout the heavens (Ginzberg, vol. I, p. 78). On the opposite side, Adam stands inertly with his left arm extended, about to receive the fruit that Eve has just plucked from the forbidden tree. Unable to move from a robotlike stance, he is clearly pictured as a victim of Eve's sinfulness. Empowered by her deceptive feminine charm, Eve is understood as an inherently negative ancestor to all women.

Expressed through lofty ideals associated with family or country, but illustrated by mundane or commonplace tales, stories of love in the Old Testament provided the artists with the opportunity to treat themes of betrayal. For example, after the disaster of Sodom and Gomorrah, the daughters of Lot betrayed their father with intent to create offspring and to preserve the human race. Believing that they were the only women left on Earth, they plied their father with wine, seduced him, and eventually produced heirs. In early examples of the theme, such as Lucas van Leyden's Lot and His Daughters, in the Louvre, the burning cities of Sodom and Gomorrah are emphasized in the background as a symbol of hell. Although the moral of the story conveys the dangers of incest, the tale was manipulated by masculine artist and patron to accommodate only the daughters' blatant sexuality and deceit. This is true in the titillating Lot and His Daughters by Frans Floris, in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia, in which the narrative is reduced to nothing more than the seduction of an old man by a young woman.

Similar in plot to Lot and his daughters, the Old Testament patriarch Judah betrayed Tamar, his daughter-in-law, and was likewise deceived by her. Their progeny became the direct ancestors of Christ. After two childless marriages to Judah's elder sons, Tamar was promised the youngest when he achieved adulthood. According to the Hebrew tradition and in observation of the Levirate law, the widow could produce an offspring of her dead husband through union with his brother. Since Judah did not live up to his original agreement, Tamar disguised herself as a prostitute and seduced her husband's father. She required a pledge, which Judah presented to her in the form of a staff, ring, and bracelet. In due time, Tamar gave birth to twin sons. The complicated story, like Lot and his daughters, is transformed into a scene of simple deception. Maerten van Heemskerck's Judah and Tamar (now destroyed) demonstrates this idea. In the painting, Judah is rendered with his left hand upon the exposed breast of Tamar, while Tamar's leg is draped over his. Despite the voluptuous gestures, Tamar seems emotionally removed from the scene. Rembrandt's drawing (also attributed to Willem Drost) of Judah and Tamar takes exception to the more traditional depiction. With a certain implicit tenderness but without explicit sexuality, Rembrandt depends upon illustrative ambiguity to separate his art from other representations. Introduced during the period of the Reformation, Luther employed the theme of Judah and Tamar to remind the worshiper that even Christ had a sinful heritage. But unlike the daughters of Lot, Tamar is remembered by name.

Another lesson of betrayal in the Bible is conveyed through an account of Joseph and the wife of Potiphar. After deceiving their father, Jacob, with their sibling's bloodied coat, Joseph's brothers betrayed him by selling him into slavery for 20 pieces of silver. Sold again in Egypt, Joseph eventually found work in the house of Potiphar, an officer in the pharaoh's army and captain of the guard. Joseph proved to be a loyal servant and trusted member of the household, but the situation changed when he attempted to avoid the lascivious invitation of the wife of Potiphar. It is this narrative passage that is most frequently treated in art. In the painting of Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar by Orazio Gentileschi, the theme is displayed in a simple but sumptuous environment. Potiphar's wife is portrayed in a most uncomfortable position, precariously balanced on the bed. As Joseph escapes from the scene of the alleged crime, Potiphar's wife grabs his cloak that she will present to her husband as evidence of the presumed illicit act. Pulling the drapery of the enclosure, Joseph looks backward for a moment before he retreats, seemingly cognizant of her intent. The serious interpretation of the painting and the formal treatment of the story by Orazio contrast with the comedic rendering by Rembrandt van Rijn. In the etching of Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar (1634), Rembrandt hinders the viewer from perceiving the more serious concept of betrayal. His unabashedly sexual interpretation of the narrative does, however, emphasize Joseph's virtue and naïveté. Despite the punishment of imprisonment, Joseph eventually succeeds financially and is reunited in Egypt with his father and brothers. Because he resisted temptation, Joseph is considered an image of chastity, and like the Old Testament heroine Susanna, he also symbolizes the innocent victim falsely accused of a crime he did not commit.

Even some of the matriarchs of the Bible were adept at deceiving or betraying their husbands and children. Rebecca preferred that her younger son, Jacob, inherit the spiritual blessing normally reserved for the eldest, Esau. According to the narrative, Rebecca betrays her spouse as well as Esau, robbing him of his birthright. Lorenzo Ghiberti rendered the Story of Jacob and Esau in bronze on the east doors of the cathedral baptistery in Florence, Italy. In the upper right corner of Ghiberti's panel, Rebecca confronts the angel, who suggests that she commit a sacred transgression. In order to trick her husband, she dresses Jacob in animal skins, imitating the hirsute Esau. Her betrayal unfolds in the foreground, where the blessing is bestowed, unknowingly, by Jacob's father, Isaac.

Later in life, Jacob's future father-in-law, Laban, betrays him on his wedding night. Thinking he had received Rachel's hand in marriage, Jacob found Leah, her older sister, in the nuptial bed. He was forced to work another seven years for the privilege of marrying Rachel.

Not such a happy ending for the husband of Bathsheba. Uriah the Hittite was sent into the heat of the battle and slain when King David learned that his adulterous lover, Bathsheba, was with child. Because marriage is a relationship that is dependent upon trust, adultery may be understood as a trust betrayed. Without the foundation of trust, betrayal cannot occur. While the theme of Bathsheba at her bath is a popular one and in fact anticipates her betrayal, it is only Rembrandt's Bathsheba, in the Louvre, that emphasizes the difficulty of the decision for the married woman. In the painting, Bathsheba is depicted with her head bent downward, giving the impression of substantial thought. While her intent was to follow the king's summons, she harmed her husband in the process. With or without conscious choice, Bathsheba betrayed her spouse for the king.

One of the most famous treatments of betrayal in the Old Testament is the account of Samson and Delilah. One of the many women of the Old Testament presented as an incarnation of the Eve who caused the fall of man, Delilah was encouraged by the Philistines to find the source of Samson's strength. Unlike Bathsheba, whose intent was not to injure her husband, Delilah betrayed her lover for money. The event is generally represented in art as an excuse to render an erotic, partially clothed or nude image of Delilah. Rarely is the character of Delilah displayed with intellectual or emotional depth. In pictorial depictions, Delilah appears synonymous with a femme fatale, a vacuous image not capable of serious contemplation, but of great seductive power. Peter Paul Rubens interpreted the event in his Samson and Delilah as the aftermath of the scene of seduction, with Samson lying on the lap of Delilah and the soldiers waiting at the door to capture their prisoner. Delilah's exposed breasts and Samson's spent body remind the viewer of the event of physical love that preceded the painterly illustration. With the exception of an earlier engraving of Samson and Delilah by Lucas van Leyden, the theme is rarely depicted demurely.

The act of betrayal can also be recognized in a more positive light. For example, in order to save her nation, the biblical heroine from the apocryphal Book of Judith betrays the enemy of her people, the Assyrian general Holofernes. Disguising her true intentions, Judith meets Holofernes at the Assyrian encampment and proclaims herself to be a spy who could lead him to victory at the cost of only one life. Holofernes, much enamored with the young widow, trusted her, and believed her tale. The general requested Judith's presence at an intimate feast in his quarters, and when he lay asleep, dead drunk, she took his sword and beheaded him. Because of the sensuous potential of the narrative, Judith is commonly treated as less of a national heroine than a betrayer of men. In most painterly examples, Judith is pictured at the bloody moment of decapitation looking seductive in demeanor and reluctantly incapable of slaying Holofernes. Artemisia Gentileschi, however, painted one of the most powerful depictions of the story. As a young artist she was personally betrayed and raped by her father's trusted friend and teacher, Agostino Tassi. After spending several months in jail, Tassi was acquitted. By painting the Judith theme, Artemisia Gentileschi may have taken artistic revenge for the unpunished crime. In her Judith Slaying Holofernes, in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, the heroine struggles in an attempt to slice through the neck of her adversary. Judith places her right leg on the heavy torso of Holofernes and seems physically and emotionally proficient to achieve her goal. Although the presence of a servant is not mentioned in the apocryphal account, Artemisia exercises pictorial license by including a maidservant assisting Judith with her deadly chore. In an earlier fresco of Judith on the Sistine Chapel ceiling, Michelangelo employed the head of Holofernes as a vehicle for self-portrait, and subsequent artists reinforced the tradition. Cristofano Allori used his own facial features for the severed head of Holofernes in Judith with the Head of Holofernes, in the Pitti Palace in Florence. Perhaps Artemisia painted a self-portrait as Judith and depicted Holofernes as Agostino Tassi. Since the personification of Justice was traditionally depicted as a woman with a sword, the allegory was commonly associated with the image of Judith. The Old Testament heroine may have served as a personal symbol for Artemisia who secured justice for the crime of rape, a vicious betrayal, by painting an acceptable reprisal.

Judith was also represented in the medieval Speculum humanae salvationis (as a prototype for the Virgin Mary, who crushed the head of the serpent) with Tomyris, whose soldiers murdered King Cyrus, and Jael, who portrayed herself as a friend of another enemy of the Israelites, Sisera, and then killed him by pounding a nail through his skull. In addition, Jael and Judith are included in prints displaying the power of women. Hans Burgkmair, for example, included Judith, Jael, Esther, three Christian saints (Helen, Bridget, and Elizabeth), and celebrated women from antiquity (Lucretia, Veturia, and Virginia) in the 1519 woodcut series of Eighteen Worthies. Accompanied by such distinguished women, Judith's act of betrayal is elevated to a status comparable to that of these other notable heroines. Honored for her courage, Judith is paired as well with David at Hanukkah, when the duo often appear on ritual menorahs.

In ancient history, betrayal was associated with national pride as well as treason. For example, the devout Lucretia was betrayed by Tarquinius, a friend of her husband's who found her celebrated virtue alluring. According to Livy in the Early History of Rome, Lucretia refused the advances of this lustful admirer, and, despite her desperate appeal, Tarquinius raped her. In a plight analogous to those of Joseph and Susanna, Lucretia defended her honor but then felt compelled to take her own life. In painterly translations of the literature, Lucretia is usually rendered about to put a knife to her chest. Generally in art, when the story of the rape is illustrated, it is made "heroic" (Wolfthal, p. 39). Lucretia is depicted, particularly in prints, as a femme fatale rather than a woman honored for her marital fidelity. In a print of Tarquin and Lucretia by Heinrich Aldegrever, Lucretia attempts to stop the rape by throwing up one of her arms but in the effort turns toward the viewer. The result is a most lascivious view of her opened body. Pictorial freedom allowed the artist to transform Lucretia, the chaste victim, into the seducer ultimately responsible for the rape. In a similar manner, as inheritor of Eve, Lucretia was to ancient history what Judith was to the Bible. The German painter and engraver Lucas Cranach painted the two heroines as companion pieces.

Another model of treason can be found in the story of Antenor, a Trojan prince who betrayed his country. As a man of peace, Antenor graciously welcomed Menelaus and Odysseus despite their demand for the surrender of Helen. This was regarded as an act of treason by Antenor. Other tales about Antenor convey his kindness to the enemy for sparing his wife, Theano (a sibling of Hecuba and a priestess of Athena), as well as his family and his home.

Nicolas Poussin painted several themes from classical history that depend upon the idea of betrayal and are understood in conjunction with the virtue of national pride. For example, Camillus and the Schoolmaster of Falerii represents the story of a teacher who presented his students of noble birth as hostages to the town's enemy, Camillus, general of the Roman forces. Camillus rejects the schoolmaster's offer, and the teacher is finally punished for his immoral deed. In Poussin's painting, Camillus is depicted seated upon a throne. After having ascertained his judgment, he dramatically points to the guilty man. Camillus refuses the schoolmaster, who is seen attacked with dirt thrown by the children and led away by the Roman soldiers. Poussin also illustrated scenes from the end of the life of Phocion, an ancient Greek hero who was executed as a traitor. Because of the presumed treason, his burial was not permitted inside the city of Athens. In one of the most moving paintings, Poussin portrays the widow of Phocion collecting her husband's ashes. She is rendered in the foreground against an idealized pastoral landscape inspired by the work of Annibale Carracci and perhaps Domenichino. The theme of national betrayal appears insignificant in comparison to the personal anguish experienced by the loyal wife who gathers the earthly remains of her husband.

Sometimes the stories of betrayal from classical mythology are more humorously told. Although the actions of the gods and goddesses were meant to echo elevated human behavior, little was done to manifest propriety. Psyche betrayed Cupid when she could wait no longer to identify her lover. Vulcan was betrayed by his spouse, Venus, the goddess of love. Although she is the only goddess who was given any sexual freedom in ancient literature, Venus was shamed by her husband when he caught her making love with Mars. The exploits of Jupiter, the king of the gods, continued to anger his betrayed queen, Juno. Poor Juno was forever punishing the mortal women with whom her husband became involved (frequently to the point of rape), instead of the culprit himself. Later writers such as Ovid softened the impact of rape by condoning it in terms of "love." This disguise or deception must also be considered a component of the term betrayal. In other stories, betrayal proved to have correspondingly tragic consequences. Saddened by the sudden and unexpected departure of Aeneas, Dido sacrificed her life for a love betrayed that she could not live without.

Unlike Dido, Medea sought revenge for Jason's betrayal, and their story elucidates the concept of disloyalty. According to the myth, Jason meets Medea, the daughter of the king of Colchis, during his attempt to procure the Golden Fleece. In a plot to ensure Jason's success, Cupid sends an arrow that penetrates the heart of Medea, and she falls in love with the leader of the Argonauts. Medea, known for her sorcery, assists Jason in his pursuit by lulling the guardian serpent that protects the Golden Fleece. Jason promises to marry her, and eventually the two return safely to Greece. After sons are born to them, Jason chooses to wed the daughter of the king of Corinth. Medea is exiled from Greece but not before she plans to revenge Jason's ingratitude by killing their two sons and his new wife. The story of Jason and Medea is commonly illustrated in ancient Greek painting. For example, representing the tragic account of the legend by Euripides, the conclusive moment of the narrative is depicted on a fourth-century hydria. Jason is portrayed with sword in hand, attempting to protect his sons from their mother, but Medea has already slain her children and departs the violent scene in a serpent-driven chariot. Jason blames Medea for his personal tragedy, never acknowledging his own role in the treachery.

Seventeenth-century Dutch images of lovesick maidens appear to be riddled with deceit. The women in the paintings suffer from pregnancy or lovesickness (although it has been suggested more recently that they suffer instead from being "love starved," Dixon, p. 32), a disease that afflicts only the feminine gender. In the painting by Jan Steen entitled The Doctor's Visit, the charlatan physician takes the pulse of an obviously young and unhappy woman while an older and perhaps wiser one witnesses the examination. Apparently engaged in mischievous activity, a little boy in the foreground plays with arrows. A painting of Venus and Adonis exhibited on the wall reinforces an explicit connection between the child and Cupid. Furthermore, the medieval attribute of lust, a dog, is quietly depicted lying on a pillow near the young woman's chair. Invested in the painting humorously, these symbols are imbued with the idea of love. Conspicuously and consistently missing, however, is a masculine lover or husband. Have these women, "sick in love," been betrayed by a man?

With the exception of the Last Supper and the Kiss of Judas, the painterly rendering of betrayal is repeatedly manifested in Old Testament narrative. The earthiness of these stories portray life and death, love and hate, youth and old age. For Jacob, betrayal resulted in an undeserved punishment. Lot's daughters and Tamar engaged in the act of betrayal in order to ensure the survival of their race. Judith saved her nation by betraying the enemy of her people. The married mother of King Solomon, Bathsheba, was convinced by a king to betray her husband. Delilah betrayed Samson, her paramour, for money. Today, the popular image of betrayal is demonstrated in the ubiquitous soap opera. Appearing as a form of regression from Old Testament tales of love and lust but without the biblically required moral lessons, modern-day television drama reinforces the survival of this iconographic theme.

The concept of betrayal also provided the artist with the opportunity to experiment with exaggerated emotion. Because the act of betrayal is commonly dependent upon passion in the form of power, money, or love, it requires a dramatic response. This is especially true in pictorial depiction in which spent passion is illustrated as a prelude to deceptive love. Often maximized by the artist, perhaps at the request of the male patron, these themes appealed to their masculine taste. In fact, the favored stories painted in the guise of betrayal can be explained by the attraction of sexually explicit scenes. Worthy women from the Bible, mythology, and history are characterized as prototypes of the femme fatale, capable of undoing even the strongest men with a charm uniquely feminine.

In the most extreme circumstance, betrayal resulted in death. The virgin saints, for example, who were betrayed by loving family or trusted friends, died for their faith in God. Virtuous heroines sacrificed their own lives for a love betrayed. Others unjustly accused of disloyalty accepted death courageously as a symbol of individual honor or national pride. Ultimately, personal betrayal by a treasonous disciple of Christ changed the course of history and art.

See also Adultery; Calumny; Penitence/Repentance; Temptation

Selected Works of Art

Adam and Eve

Original Sin, sculpture, thirteenth century, Reims, France, Cathedral

Annunciation with the Fall of Eve and Gideon's Fleece, woodcut from Biblia Pauperum

Goes, Hugo van der, Vienna Diptych (Temptation and Lamentation), 1467–1468, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Uccello, Paolo, Adam and Eve, early 1430s, Florence, Italy, Santa Maria Novella, Chiostro Verde

Gossaert, Jan, Adam and Eve, drawing, circa 1500, Providence, Rhode Island School of Design

Baldung, Hans, Adam and Eve, woodcut

Hering, Loy, Adam and Eve, sculpture, early sixteenth century, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Klinger, Max, Eve and the Future: The Serpent, circa 1880, New York, Carus Gallery

Beckmann, Max, Adam and Eve, 1917, private collection

Chagall, Marc, Adam and Eve in Paradise, 1930–1935, Nice, France, Musée National Message Biblique Marc Chagall

Lot and His Daughters

Leyden, Lucas van, Lot and His Daughters, circa 1509, Paris, Louvre

Floris, Frans, Lot and His Daughters, 1550s, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Floris, Frans, Lot and His Daughters, 1550s, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Lot and His Daughters, 1640s, Toledo, Ohio, Museum of Art
 Chagall, Marc, Daughters of Lot, 1930–1935, Nice, France, Musée National Message Biblique Marc Chagall

Story of Jacob

Ghiberti, Lorenzo, Jacob and Esau Panel, sculpture, circa 1435, Florence, Italy, Baptistry, East doors
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Jacob Being Shown Joseph's Coat, drawing, circa 1560s, Berlin-Dahlem, Kupfestichkabinett, Staatliche Museen
 Flinck, Govaert, Isaac Blessing Jacob, drawing, 1650s, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans-Van Beunigen
 Velázquez, Diego, Jacob Being Shown Joseph's Coat, before 1660, Sierra Guadarrama, Spain, El Escorial, Nuevos Museos
 Strozzi, Bernardo, Isaac Blessing Jacob, seventeenth century, Pisa, Italy, Museo Nazionale di San Matteo
 Backer, Jacob, Jacob, Rachel and Leah, drawing, early seventeenth century, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museums Boymans-Van Beunigen
 Chagall, Marc, Jacob Crying Over Joseph's Coat, 1630–1635, Nice, France
 Ferrari, Giovanni Andrea, Joseph's Brothers Bring His Bloody Coat to Jacob, before 1669, El Paso, Texas, Art Museum
 Overbeck, Johann Friedrich, Sale of Joseph to the Ishmaelites, fresco, 1816, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Judah and Tamar

Heemskerck, Maerten van, Judah and Tamar, before 1574, destroyed
 Muller, Herman Jansz., Judah and Tamar, engraving
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Judah and Tamar, drawing, 1640s, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans-Van Beunigen

Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, illuminated manuscript, Queen Mary's Psalter, 1310–1320, London, British Library (MS Royal 2.B, VII, fol. 16)
 Rossi, Properzia de', Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar, sculpture, early sixteenth century, Bologna, Italy, St. Petronio
 Gentileschi, Orazio, Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar, circa 1625, East Molesey, Surrey, Hampton Court Palace
 Lanfranco, Giovanni, Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar, seventeenth century, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar, etching, 1634
 Chagall, Marc, Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar, 1930–1935, Nice, France, Musée National Message Biblique Marc Chagall

Jael

Burgkmair, Hans, Judith, Jael and Esther, woodcut series, Eighteen Worthies, before 1531
 Grammatica, Antiveduto, Jael, before 1626, Rome, Pallavicini Collection

Samson and Delilah

The Story of Samson, illuminated manuscript, The Old Testament Picture Book, thirteenth century, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (MS 638, fol. 15)
 Leyden, Lucas van, Samson and Delilah, woodcut, before 1533
 Peter Paul Rubens, Samson and Delilah, 1609–1610, painting, London, National Gallery
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Samson and Delilah, 1628, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Bathsheba

Memling, Hans, Bathsheba, circa 1485, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie Stuttgart
 Burgkmair, Hans the Elder, Bathsheba at Her Bath, woodcut, before 1531
 Massys, Jan, Bathsheba Bathing, before 1575, Paris, Louvre
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, David and Bathsheba, early 1640s, Columbus, Ohio, Museum of Art
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Bathsheba, 1654, Paris, Louvre

Susanna

Massys, Jan, Susanna and the Elders, before 1575, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Susanna and the Elders, 1610, Pommersfelden, Germany, Schloss Weissenstein
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Susanna and the Elders, 1647, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Judith

Donatello, Judith Slaying Holofernes, sculpture, 1455–1457, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio
 Michelangelo, Judith, 1503–1508, Rome, Sistine Chapel
 Meit, Conrad, Judith, sculpture, 1515, Munich, Germany, Bayerisches Nationalmuseum
 Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, 1530s, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Massys, Jan, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, before 1575, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk voor Schone Kunsten
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith Slaying Holofernes, 1620, Florence, Uffizi Gallery
 Allori, Cristofano, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, 1630s, Florence, Italy, Galleria de' Arte Moderna di Palazzo Pitti
 Klimt, Gustav, Judith and Holofernes I, 1901, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie

Pact of Judas

Barna da Siena, Pact of Judas, fresco, 1350s, San Gimignano, Collegiate Church

Last Supper

- Lorenzetti, Pietro, Last Supper, fresco, circa 1320s–1330s, Assisi, Italy, Lower Church of San Francesco
- Siena, Barna da, Betrayal, fresco, 1350s, San Gimignano, Collegiate Church
- Gaddi, Taddeo, Last Supper, fresco, The Tree of Life, circa 1355–1360, Florence, Italy, Santa Croce, Refectory
- Last Supper*, woodcut, Speculum Humanae Salvationis
- Castagno, Andrea del, Last Supper, fresco, 1447, Florence, Italy, Sant' Appollonia, Cenacolo
- Ghirlandaio, Domenico del, Last Supper, fresco, 1480, Florence, Italy, Ognissanti, Refectory
- Leonardo da Vinci, The Last Supper, 1495–1497, Milan, Italy, Santa Maria delle Grazie
- Coecke van Aelst, Pieter, Last Supper, 1531, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts
- Schidone, Bartolomeo, Last Supper, Parma, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
- Nolde, Emil, Last Supper, 1909, Copenhagen, Denmark, Statens Museum for Kunst
- Spencer, Stanley, The Last Supper, 1920, Cookham, England, Stanley Spencer Gallery

Denial of St. Peter

- Saraceni, Pensionante del, The Denial of Saint Peter, early seventeenth century, Douai, France, Musée de la Chartreuse
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Denial of Saint Peter, 1660, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Kiss of Judas

- Pucelle, Jean, Kiss of Judas, manuscript, circa 1325–1328, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, Cloisters Collection
- Giotto, Kiss of Judas, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
- Duccio, di Buoninsegna, Betrayal, panel, Maestà Altarpiece, circa 1308–1311, Siena, Italy, Museo dell' Opera del Duomo
- Rembrandt, School of, Kiss of Judas, drawing, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans-Van Beunigen
- Spencer, Stanley, The Betrayal (first version), oil on canvas, 1914, private collection
- Spencer, Stanley, The Betrayal (second version), oil on canvas, 1923, Belfast, Northern Ireland, Ulster Museum

St. Barbara

- Saint Barbara*, illuminated manuscript, A Book of Hours, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery (MS 170, fol. 172v)
- Christus, Petrus, Madonna with a Carthusian Monk and Saint Barbara, mid-fifteenth century, Berlin, Gemäldegalerie
- Van Eyck, Jan, Saint Barbara, before 1441, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum Voor Schone Kunsten
- Schongauer, Martin, Saint Barbara, engraving, before 1491

Master of the Barbara Legend, The Baptism of Barbara by John the Baptist, before 1500, Brussels, Belgium, Koninklijke Museum Voor Schone Kunsten

St. Lucy

- Lorenzetti, Pietro, Saint Lucy, circa 1332, Florence, Italy, Santa Lucia Frole Rovinante
- Veneziano, Domenico, Saint Lucy Altarpiece, circa 1445, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Caravaggio, Burial of Saint Lucy, circa 1608, Syracuse, Italy, Santa Lucia
- Zurburán, Francisco, Saint Lucy, 1636, Chartres, France, Musée
- Cossa, Francesco del, St. Lucy, before 1777, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Schoolmaster of Falerii

- Poussin, Nicolas, Camillus and the Schoolmaster of Falerii, 1637, Paris, Louvre
- Poussin, Nicolas, Camillus and the Schoolmaster of Falerii, drawing, 1640s, London, British Museum
- Poussin, Nicolas, Camillus and the Schoolmaster of Falerii, 1640s, Paris, private collection

Phocion

- Poussin, Nicolas, Landscape with the Funeral of Phocion, 1648, Oakly Park, Shropshire, England, collection of the Earl of Plymouth
- Poussin, Nicolas, Landscape with the Funeral of Phocion, Paris, Louvre
- Poussin, Nicolas, Landscape with the Ashes of Phocion Collected by His Widow, 1648, Lancashire, England, Knowsley Hall, collection of the Earl of Derby

Lucretia

- Botticelli, The Tragedy of Lucretia, before 1510, Boston, Massachusetts, Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum
- Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Lucretia, 1533, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
- Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Lucretia and Judith, before 1553, destroyed
- Aldegrever, Heinrich, Tarquin and Lucretia, engraving, before 1560, Munich, Germany, Staatliche Graphische Sammlung
- Meit, Conrad, Lucretia, sculpture, early 1500s, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Reni, Guido, Lucretia, before 1642, Potsdam, Germany, Neues Palais
- Scorel, Jan van, Lucretia, version of Portrait of a Man, before 1562, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
- Titian, Tarquin and Lucretia, circa 1571, Cambridge, England, Fitzwilliam Museum

Dido

- Raimondi, Marcantonio, Dido, engraving, before 1534

Medea

- Medea, Apulian volute krater, vase painting, mid-fourth century B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek
 Policoro Painter, Medea, vase painting, fourth century B.C., Policoro, Italy, Museo Nazionale della Siritide

Venus and Cupid

- Reverdy, Georges, Mars and Venus Surprised by Vulcan, engraving, before 1570
 LeLorrain, Claude, Landscape with Psyche Outside the Palace of Cupid, oil on canvas, 1664, London, National Gallery
 Fragonard, Jean-Honoré, Psyche Showing Her Sisters Her Gifts from Cupid, oil on canvas, 1753, London, National Gallery

The Doctor's Visit

- Mieris, Frans van, the Elder, The Doctor's Visit, 1657, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Dou, Gerrit, The Doctor's Visit, 1663, Paris, Louvre
 Steen, Jan, The Doctor's Visit, 1665, London, Wellington Museum
 Metsu, Gabriel, The Doctor's Visit, before 1667, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Hoogstraten, Samuel van, The Doctor's Visit (The Sick Lady), before 1678, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Further Reading

- Bal, Mieke, Lethal Love: Feminist Literary Readings of Biblical Love Stories, Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1987
 ———, Reading Rembrandt, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991
 Blum, Shirley Neilsen, Early Netherlandish Triptychs, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1969
 Blunt, Anthony, Nicolas Poussin, New York: Pantheon, 1967
 Boccaccio, Giovanni, Concerning Famous Women, translated by Guido A. Guarino, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1963; London: G. Allen, 1963
 Brown, Christopher, Images of a Golden Past, New York, Abbeville Press, 1984
 Dixon, Lauinda S., "Some Penetrating Insights: The Imagery of Enemas in Art," Art Journal 52 (1993)
 Donaldson, Ian, The Rapes of Lucretia: A Myth and its Transformation, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982
 Dresen-Coenders, ed., Saints and She-Devils: Images of Women in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries, London: Rubicon Press, 1987
 Friedlaender, Walter, Poussin, New York: Abrams, 1966; London: Thames and Hudson, 1966
 Garrard, Mary D., Artemisia Gentileschi, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989
 Giltaij, Jeroen, The Drawings by Rembrandt and his School in the Museum Boymans-van Beunigen, Rotterdam, The Netherlands: The Museum, 1988; London: Thames and Hudson, 1966
 Ginzberg, Louis, Legends of the Bible, Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America, 1968
 Haak, Bob, Rembrandt, New York: Abrams, 1984; London: Thames and Hudson, 1984
 Harris, Ann Sutherland and Linda Nochlin, Women Artists: 1550–1950, New York: Knopf, 1976
 Hartt, Frederick, Italian Renaissance Art, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall; London: Thames and Hudson, 1970
 Henle, Jane, Greek Myths: A Vase Painter's Notebook, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1973
 Heydenreich, Ludwig H., Leonardo: The Last Supper, London: Allen Lane, 1974; New York: Viking, 1974
 Huth, Hans, "A Mannerist Judith for the Art Institute," Art Institute of Chicago Quarterly LI (1957)
 Jed, Stephanie H., Chaste Thinking: The Rape of Lucretia and the Birth of Humanism, Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1989
 Kahr, Madlyn Millner, "Delilah," The Art Bulletin 54 (1972)
 ———, Dutch Painting in the Seventeenth Century, New York: Harper, 1978
 Lane, Barbara, The Altar and the Altarpiece: Sacramental Themes in Early Netherlandish Painting, New York: Harper, 1984
 Kunoth-Leifels, Elisabeth, Über die Darstellungen der 'Bathseba im Bade', Essen, Germany: 1962
 Lowenthal, Ann, "Lot and His Daughters as a Moral Dilemma," in The Age of Rembrandt, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press
 Lutz, J. and P. Perdrizet, eds., Speculum Humanae Salvationis, Leipzig, Germany: Hiersemann, 1907
 Miles, Margaret Ruth, Carnal Knowing, Boston: Beacon Press, 1989
 Moir, Alfred, The Italian Followers of Caravaggio, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1967
 Moore, Carey, ed., Judith, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1985
 Pagels, Elaine, Adam, Eve, and the Serpent, New York: Random House, 1988; London: Nicolson, 1988
 Pedretti, Carlo, Leonardo: A Study in Chronology and Style, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1973; London: Thames and Hudson, 1973
 Phillips, John A., Eve, San Francisco, California: Harper, 1984
 Rosenberg, Jakob, Rembrandt, London and New York: Phaidon, 1964
 Russell, Helen Diane, Eva/Ave, New York: Feminist Press at the City University of New York, 1990
 Schama, Simon, The Embarrassment of Riches, New York: Knopf, 1987; London: Fontana, 1987
 Shearman, John, "Cristofano Allori's Judith," Burlington Magazine 121 (January 1990)

Simpson, Michael, ed., Gods and Heroes of the Greeks: The Library of Apollodorus, Amherst: University of Massachusetts, 1976

Steinberg, Leo, "Michelangelo's Florentine Pieta," Art Bulletin L (1968)

Strumwasser, Gina, "Beauty and the Beast: Seductions from the Old Testament in Sixteenth-Century Netherlandish Painting," San Jose Studies VII (1981)

de Voragine, Jacobus, The Golden Legend, translated by Granger Ryan and Helmut Rippergen, New York: Arno Press, 1969

Wolfthal, Diane, "A Hue and a Cry: Medieval Rape Imagery and its Transformation," Art Bulletin LXXV (1993)

Wright, Christopher, The Dutch Painters, Woodbury, New York: Barron's, 1984; London: Orbis, 1984

BIRTH/CHILDBIRTH

Beth S. Gersh-Nešić

The following motifs and iconographic narratives are included in the discussion of the theme Birth/Childbirth:

BIRTHS OF GODS AND GODDESSES

MORTAL BIRTHS

POSTPARTUM SCENES

MULTIPLE BIRTHS

BIRTH OF CHRIST

BIRTH OF THE VIRGIN MARY

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST

BUDDHA

CESAREAN BIRTHS

BIRTH IN LEGENDS

TWENTIETH-CENTURY
INTERPRETATIONS OF BIRTH

The Crowning: Needlepoint 5, from The Birth Project, 1984, needlepoint over painted canvas, needlework by Lo Biondo family. (Copyright, Judy Chicago; photograph by Michele Maier; courtesy of Judy Chicago)

Depictions of birth and childbirth may symbolize fertility or herald a new beginning. They may also be illustrations of contemporary birthing techniques, postpartum rituals, or unusual circumstances surrounding a particular birth. In this essay the subject of childbirth in art is divided into the following categories: birth among gods and goddesses, mortal births, postpartum scenes, multiple births, sacred births, cesarean births, births in legends, and contemporary interpretations of birth.

Birth Among Gods and Goddesses

One of the earliest known depictions of childbirth comes from the Dordogne region of France. It is a Paleolithic stone relief (circa 32,000–15,000 B.C.) found in Laussel. In this picture of a birth in progress, the mother squats as the child's head emerges. Holding the child's torso to help it out of the birth canal, the mother's arms form a circle around her body, the head of the child symmetrically opposite the mother's. This illustration of childbirth seems to represent birth, fertility, or a cosmological narrative. Another possibility may be that, as in the case of the hunt, the depiction of an event cast magical powers that would ensure a successful outcome.

In a later work, from the Neolithic period, an eight-inch sculpture (7000–5000 B.C.) from Çatal Hüyük, Turkey, shows a woman sitting on angular stones awaiting the birth of a child. Here, the lone, laboring female depicted in the statuette may relate to the older tradition of pregnant fertility goddesses, such as the Paleolithic Venus of Willendorf. The stones upon which the woman sits represent an early kind of birth stool, as we know from this passage in Genesis: "When ye do the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women, ye shall look upon the obnayim . . ." Obnayim means stones and birth stools (Speert, p. 265). Harold Speert explains in his book on the history of obstetrics and gynecology that "to sit on stones" was synonymous in Egyptian hieroglyphics with "to give birth" (Ibid.). Another Egyptian hieroglyphic that signifies "to give birth" is an illustration of the birth of Ra, the sun god. In a drawing of a lost relief, the goddess Ritho kneels left of center, supported by three midwives behind her, while three midwives in front receive the god-child. A similar composition in reverse was carved on a wall of the first-century B.C. Temple of Esna to illustrate Cleopatra's labor. A Ptolemaic relief (circa A.D. 323–330) from Dendera shows Queen Ahmes giving birth to the sun god, attended on both sides by the goddess Hathor, successor of the king.

In a birth scene carved on the head of a silver brooch found in Luristan, Iran, and dating from the first millennium B.C., a woman gives birth to her child as animals and rosettes flank the event. The symmetry of the mother's and child's heads is reminiscent of the symmetry of the Laussel wall carving, suggesting that this scene may also be that of a fertility goddess or a cosmological event. The pin may be an amulet to ensure fertility or protect the mother giving birth.

The goddess of childbirth in Aztec culture was Tlazoltéotl, mother of the gods, redeemer of sins, "eater of dirt." She was able to take on the sins of humankind and absolve them, and the priest of her cult could forgive the sins of those who confessed and repented. In an eight-inch statuette, sprinkled with garnets, Tlazoltéotl gives birth to her son Centéotl, the god of maize. In order to give birth anew to Centéotl, a priest put on the skin of a female victim who personified Tlazoltéotl and then acted out the birth process. A statuette illustrates the scene (Disselhoff and Linne, pp. 80–81).

In a painting from Australia, an ancient Aboriginal Earth Mother squats to give birth to a myriad of baby spirits. A mirror image that is symmetrical and flat, the painting illustrates the notion that children come from preexisting spirits or souls. In a detail on a sculpture from Uitsa, Niger, a woman kneels while giving birth to her child. She also supports (with other figures) a large statue of a god. Perhaps the woman functions as a fertility goddess or as a sign for fertility that emanates from the male deity. A wooden sculpture from Bali, Indonesia, shows a seated woman giving birth while her husband, an older child (tweaking her breast), and a leyek (a demon who waits to devour the newborn) look on. Here, the work is meant to protect the unborn child.

Common to the aforementioned works was the artists' decisions to illustrate divine births in a manner that imitates human birth. In the Greco-Roman world of gods and mythology, some divine births occur in extraordinary ways to denote the difference between deities and mortals. The birth of Athena, the virgin goddess of wisdom and Zeus's favorite child, took place after Zeus swallowed his pregnant paramour, Metis, fearing that her next child would overthrow him, as prophesied. When Metis's pregnancy was at full term, Zeus gave birth to their daughter, Athena, through his head, which in some versions is chopped open by the god Hephaestus (Carpenter, p. 71). The birth scene has been painted on many vases. Typical of this group are two similar black-figure amphorae (both mid-sixth century B.C.) from the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, Massachusetts, and the art collection at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut. On each vase, Zeus sits in profile on a throne or birth stool holding a scepter while a miniature, fully clothed adult Athena hops from his head, corresponding to the description found in Homeric hymns. On the Boston vase, the newborn Athena wears her armor and carries her shield and spear, but on the Yale vase, she appears to be unarmed. On both vases, Athena is greeted by the birth goddess, Eileithyia (standing in front of Zeus), Apollo (playing his kithara), Poseidon, and Ares. More extensive in its audience of gods and goddesses, the birth of Athena that was on the east pediment of the Parthenon in Athens (circa 438–432 B.C.), and now in fragments in the British Museum in London, included the tiny Athena popping out of her father's head, greeted by Helios, Hercules, Hestia, Dione, Aphrodite, Demeter, Kore, and Artemis, among others.

Aphrodite, whose name means “risen from foam,” was the goddess of beauty, sexual vigor, marriage, and prosperity. In Homer's Iliad, she was the daughter of Zeus and Dione, but later poems describe how she arose from the Aegean, born from the sperm/foam of Uranus whose castrated genitals had been cast upon the sea by his mutilator and son, Cronus (Saturn). Venus came from Cythera to Cyprus, two islands that are sacred to her (thus she is also known as Cytherea, or the Cyprian). In a sixth-century Greek red-figure pelike, she appears in a mandorla of radiant foam, and on the Greek Ludovisi throne (circa 470–460 B.C.), she clasps the arms of two women who pull her from the depths. It is believed that Venus rising from the sea and wringing her hair derives from a lost painting by Apelles (Hall, p. 320). Titian painted a colossal Venus Anadyomene (Venus rising from the sea and wringing her wet hair, circa 1525). A tiny scallop shell floats at her side. In a dreamlike image from 1912, Odilon Redon renders the birth of Venus as an apparition, with the goddess encircled by a mandorla of pastel colors, a more mystical interpretation of the blessed event.

Art historian Ronald Lightbown (pp. 85–90) writes that Sandro Botticelli's celebrated painting Birth of Venus (circa 1480) is not about the birth of the goddess but her arrival at Paphos in Cyprus. The standing nude goddess floats on a scallop shell as a winged spring zephyr blows her to shore. Chloris (Flora) wraps around the wind's body, her mouth parted in awe as she looks at the goddess. The Hour of Spring, clothed in white embroidered with spring flowers, stands on the shore, ready to enfold Venus in a cape embroidered with cornflowers and daisies. The myrtle arranged around Spring's neck and the rose upon her girdle are sacred to Venus, the goddess of love and beauty. Gazing ahead, Venus modestly covers her breast and pubis (Venus pudica) with her long golden hair, windswept and caught up in a white ribbon. Her face is that of a contemporary patrician lady, her pose is reminiscent of the Aphrodite in the Capitoline Museum in Rome (circa 320–280 B.C.). Botticelli may have based his Venus on an antique bas-relief in the Borghese Gallery in Rome and/or the poem Stanze per la giostra by Politian (Lightbown, p. 88). Art historian Frederick Hartt interprets the painting as “an allegory of the birth of beauty in the mind of man through the fertilization of matter by divinity” (p. 291).

Dionysus, the god of wine, was the only god conceived by one mortal parent, his mother, Semele, daughter of the Theban king Cadmus, and a god. His father was Zeus, who promised to grant Semele any wish. Her wish was to see Zeus in his full divine glory, which then killed her. At her death, Zeus rescued their unborn child and sewed him into his thigh to hide him from his jealous wife, Hera. After the birth, Hermes took the newborn to the nymphs of Nysa, the loveliest place on Earth. Brought forth from fire and nursed with water, Dionysus's birth and upbringing resembled the grapes that produce his wine. Several vases show the birth of Dionysus from Zeus's thigh with many gods and goddesses in attendance. One such vase is a fifth-century pelike in the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, Russia.

Pollux and Helen were the offspring of Leda, wife of Tyndareus, and Zeus, who came to Leda as a swan. In a copy of Leonardo da Vinci's lost painting Leda and the Swan (1506), Leda stands enfolded in the wings of the swan Zeus, modestly casting her eyes down upon two eggs that have hatched the twins Castor and Pollux (the Dioscuri) and the twins Helen and Clytemnestra (the Deianeira). It is noteworthy that Leonardo characterizes Leda as a demure mother, corresponding to the notion that she could be seen as “the female aspect of creation . . . a fertility goddess, Diana of Ephesus . . .” (Clark, p. 186) or the universal mother (Knight, p. 451).

Erichthonius was born from the union of Gaia and Hephaestus, who in an attempt to rape Athena, spilled his semen all over the ground. On a red-figure stamnos from about 500 B.C., Gaia is shown rising from the earth and handing the infant Erichthonius to Athena, as a bearded Hephaestus leans on his staff observing the event. Athena then entrusted the child to the three daughters of Cecrops, presenting him in a basket or coffer that she forbids them to open. Curiosity drove them to open the container, however, and inside they found either a boy with a snake's tail in place of legs or a boy and a snake. In either case, the revelation drove them mad, causing them to jump off the Acropolis to their deaths. Erichthonius became king of Athens.

Mortal Births

In the human world, Greek women needed devices to aide their labor, and the birth stool, in existence since prehistoric time, remained a popular aid for the laboring woman. This information is borne out on a late fifth-century B.C. Greek bas-relief that shows a frontal composition where the mother squats over a stool or chair supported on both sides by two midwives. Below the mother two other midwives respond to the crowning of the child's head by placing a basin on the ground below the gaping vagina.

From first-century B.C. Pompeii, an ivory carving depicts a scene similar to the earlier Greek depiction, with the mother sitting on the stool and the midwife in front of the mother, leaning forward to receive the child's head. The functions of these Greek and Roman reliefs are not known. The birthing chair continued to be a common device in medieval times, evidenced in manuscripts and incunabula on life, medicine, or related subject matter from that period. Two such instances, Jacob Rueff's De conceptu et generatione hominis (1580) and Guillaume Alexis's Passe-temps de tout homme (1505), show woodcut images of midwives surrounding the woman who labors on the chair next to the conjugal bed. And in Eucharius Rösslin's Rosengarten (1513), the mother, supported by one midwife behind, sits daintily upon her chair, barely lifting her gown as another midwife gropes for the child emerging beneath the mother's clothing.

In a seventeenth-century etching by Abraham Brosse (1633), a noblewoman gives birth atop a table placed in front of a warm, glowing fire. Propped up in a semireclining position, the mother pushes forth her child amid an audience of midwives, women friends, ladies-in-waiting, and her husband. Two centuries later in Japan, a similar position appears in Yoshihiro Mizuhara's atlas Sanka zushiki (1837). In this example, a male physician is in the process of delivering the child by discreetly maneuvering his hands under the garments of the mother. By the nineteenth century, male obstetricians were replacing midwives in the urban centers of Western countries. French artist George Lacombe reflects this prevalent situation in La Naissance de l'Homme (1892), a panel from a carved wooden bed exhibiting other phases of life (mating, aspiring, and death). Here we see a recumbent mother delivering her child into the hands of a bearded male, while a woman in a nun's habit prays beside the doctor. The style of the work resembles Paul Gauguin's Tahitian period, creating a primitive effect that emphasizes the reference to raw nature.

Postpartum Scenes

Medieval, Renaissance, and Baroque depictions of a mother in her bed indicate that the postpartum period has already begun, since the delivery would have occurred on the birth stool. Examples of the postpartum period in secular contexts include a medieval Danish chalk drawing from Ondløse on the island of Zealand (where a devil exchanges the newborn with another, while the mother sleeps in the foreground), a woodcut from Johannes Lichtenberger's Prognasticatio in Latino (1488), and a Swabian wood carving by an unknown artist from about 1510. In the Swabian work the midwives prepare a bath for the child, while the mother looks at her astrologer, who sits at the foot of her bed. Three other women stand at the side of her bed presenting food or gifts. This scene resembles contemporary compositions for the birth of the Virgin or the birth of St. John the Baptist and may reflect the influence of such works.

Postpartum scenes were also appropriate for recording royal births. In The Birth of Henry IV; The Birth of the Dauphin Louis XIV of France at Saint German, September 5, 1638; The Confinement of the Dauphiness, Anne-Marie-Victoire of Bavaria, at the Birth of the Duke of Bourgogne, Grandson of Louis XIV, August 6, 1682; and The Birth of the "King of Rome," Francis Joseph Charles, Son of Napoleon I, March 20, 1811, relatives and guests greet the mother who convalesces in her luxurious apartment. However, for the births of Marie de' Medici and her son, Louis XIII, Peter Paul Rubens envisions the postpartum period taking place among the gods in a pastoral setting (Marie de' Medici Cycle, 1622–1623).

One exceptional postpartum scene was sculpted by Andrea del Verrocchio as part of a tomb monument for the wife of Francesco Tornabuoni. Dated at about 1477, this bas-relief includes more than 18 figures surrounding the dying mother propped up in bed by two midwives, the newborn twins held by two other midwives.

Multiple Births

Verrocchio's memorial sculpture also brings up the matter of multiple births, especially those in mythology and legend, such as Romulus and Remus and Leda's two sets of twins, Helen and Clytemnestra and Castor and Pollux, and the twins in the Bible, Jacob and Esau. Perhaps the extraordinary nature of multiple births seems to presage extraordinary accomplishments or events.

For the birth of twins Jacob and Esau, the thirteenth-century Sarajevo Haggadah illustrates an unlikely birth, with Rebecca sitting on a birth stool as a midwife supports the two heads of Jacob and Esau emerging at the same time. Fifteenth-century artist Benozzo Gozzoli chose a later moment, after the birth, when the midwives and Rebecca sit before a basin, drying the twins and preparing the swaddling clothes.

A painting by a Huichol artist (from what is now Mexico) describes the birth of triplets and the birth rituals of Huichol culture. As the mother delivers her children, she squats and holds a rope tied to the testicles of the father, who sits above in the ceiling rafters. As she experiences each contraction, she pulls on the rope, forcing her husband to participate in her pain. Meanwhile, the two midwives stand ready with arms outstretched toward triplets as they emerge one at a time. Perhaps this unusual event prompted this recording, or the painting depicts an episode from a Huichol myth.

The birth of septets from a medieval Spanish legend about Salas (or Lara) appears in Antonio Tempesta's engraving from 1612. In this work seven newborns frolic upon a draped cloth held by the midwives or nursemaids, while a wet nurse with four breasts looks on. The main plot in the legend concerns a family feud that ultimately causes the sons' ambush and death together.

Sacred Births

An extraordinary birth often begins an extraordinary life, but in Christian iconography the birth scenes of Jesus Christ, Mary, and St. John the Baptist and other saints usually mirror contemporary rituals during the postpartum period. That the artists usually confine their depictions to postpartum scenes rather than the moment of birth, unlike the Sarajevo Haggadah's miniature of Jacob and Esau issuing forth from Rebecca, may reflect the reverence and awe accorded these extraordinary personages from the New Testament. Another consideration is textual evidence, which often offers more description about the reception of the child than labor and delivery.

In the case of Christ's birth, the Evangelist St. Luke wrote that Joseph and Mary had traveled from Galilee to Bethlehem to return to Joseph's home in time to pay taxes. While in Bethlehem Mary "brought forth her first born son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn" (Luke 2:6–7). Matthew, however, does not describe the circumstances of the birth, but only the search for the child by the wise men (on behalf of Herod). After following a star, "and when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down, and worshipped him" (Matthew 2:11).

Early works depicting the Nativity showed the manger, with Mary and Joseph outside. A fifth-century ivory book cover from northern Italy depicts Mary and Joseph sitting on opposite sides of the manger (like repoussoir characters), while an ox and donkey stand over the swaddled infant. The separation of the mother from her child—that is, no holding or touching—becomes standard, and often Mary and the child are represented on different planes (he above, she below), for example, in the Nativities on the throne of Maximian (circa 547), in the mosaic on the northeastern squinch of the Church of the Dormition in Daphni, Greece (circa 1080–1100), on Nicola Pisano's 1260 font in Pisa, Italy, and in Duccio di Buoninsegna's predella of the Maestà Altarpiece (1308–1311), where Mary lies below in an L-shape that frames one side of the cradle.

Gentile da Fabriano departs from the composition (circa 1423) on the predella of the Strozzi altarpiece. In the piece, Fabriano places the Christ Child on the ground and the Virgin at his side, kneeling with hands clasped in prayer, while Joseph sleeps by a tree on the other side of the infant, and the animals look on in the background.

The location of the Virgin's postpartum scenes vary. Early Christian Nativities take place in or near a stable (such as in the fifth-century ivory book cover), inspired by the Gospel according to Luke (2:7). However, the first-century apocryphal Protevangelium Book of James (written in the East) and the apocryphal Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew (a Latin translation of the apocryphal Book of James and Gospel According to Thomas, from around the eighth or ninth centuries) describe a cave:

[Joseph] found a cave there and brought [Mary] into it. . . . And behold a bright cloud overshadowing the cave. . . . The cloud withdrew itself out of the cave and a great light appeared in the cave so that our eyes could not endure it. And by little and little that light withdrew itself until the young child appeared: and it went and took the breast of its mother Mary. (Book of James, cited in Hall, p. 219)

And when the blessed Mary entered, the cave lit up with a resplendent glow as of the sixth hour of the day. This divine light did not diminish in splendor all day and night during Mary's sojourn there, and there she brought into the world a male child, who was surrounded from birth by adoring angels who said: "Glory to God on high and peace on earth to men of good will." (Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, cited in Speert, p. 108)

Some early Christian and Byzantine Nativities that drew upon these sources appear in the Church of Dormition in Daphni (mosaic, circa 1080–1100); the Church of the Martyrs in Palermo, Italy (mosaic, twelfth century); Cappella Palatina in Palermo (mid-twelfth century); Kahrie Cami, Church of the Redeemer at the Chora Monastery in Istanbul, Turkey (1310–1320); and Peripleptos Church in Mistra, Greece (fresco, fourteenth century).

Mary was declared a perpetual virgin at the Second Council of Constantinople in 381 and the Council of Chalcedon in 451, where she received the title aeiparthenos (ever virgin). In 649, the Lateran Council proclaimed the belief in her perpetual virginity as dogma. How, then, could Mary give birth to Jesus Christ as a virgin? The gospel writers do not say.

In her late fourteenth-century Revelations, St. Bridget of Sweden described a vision of the virgin birth of Christ:

When her time came she took off her shoes and her white cloak and undid her veil, letting her golden hair fall on her shoulders. Then she made ready the swaddling clothes which she put down beside her. When all was ready she bent her knees and began to pray. While she was thus praying with hands raised the child was suddenly born, surrounded by a light so bright that it completely eclipsed Joseph's feeble candle. (Hall, p. 220)

Pseudo-Bonaventura (Giovanni de Caulibus), also from the fourteenth century, wrote:

The Virgin arose in the night and leaned against a pillar. Joseph brought into the stable a bundle of hay which he threw down and the Son of God, issuing from his mother's belly without causing her pain, was projected instantly on to the hay at the Virgin's feet. (Hall, p. 220)

Both authors describe a sudden and painless delivery. These sources inspired such Nativities as Lorenzo Monaco's on the predella of the Coronation of the Virgin (1414), where the Child lies naked on the bare ground, and da Fabriano's on the Strozzi altarpiece, similar to Monaco's, although it takes place outside a cave, whereas Monaco's takes place outside a stable. During the later part of the fifteenth century, Piero della Francesca and Botticelli continue the St. Bridget description of Mary praying in a stable before her son.

In fifteenth-century Flemish Nativities, Robert Campin and Hugo van der Goes (among others) offered interpretations of St. Bridget's text that were not unlike those of their Italian contemporaries. Campin's Dijon altarpiece from the first quarter of the century shows the Christ Child on the ground, the Virgin praying, Joseph sleeping, the shepherds looking on, and Salome, the midwife, extending her hand, withered after examining Mary because she doubted her virginity. Van der Goes's Portinari Altarpiece (1474–1475) depicts both the Virgin and Joseph praying to the Christ Child, who lies naked and glowing on a bed of hay while several angels and shepherds join in prayer. In a slightly different interpretation, Master Francke's Nativity on the exterior of the St. Thomas à Becket Altar (1424) intimates that the Child descends in a beam of light from God the Father on high, while the Virgin kneels and prays, in keeping with contemporary versions of this episode (Cornell, pp. 8–12).

It is important to note that before St. Bridget's influence, Nativities such as that by Taddeo Gaddi in the early fourteenth century portrayed a more human contact between mother and son—in Gaddi's version the Virgin holds the Christ Child on her lap while she sits on her bed of straw in the stable. St. Bridget's text seems to have introduced a sense of transcendent holiness that should occasion an extraordinary birth and mother-child relationship.

The birth of the Virgin and the birth of St. John the Baptist take place in domestic interiors, providing a glimpse of typical rituals performed during contemporary postpartum periods. The birth of the Virgin is described in the Golden Legend and the apocryphal Book of James, which relates the interchange between Anna and her midwife, who announced that the child is a female, to which Anna responds, "My soul is magnified this day," and lies down (Apocryphal New Testament, p. 41). Thus, in most depictions of the Virgin's birth, St. Anne lies recumbent upon her bed after the birth, with some midwives offering her the postpartum meal while other midwives prepare a bath for the infant Mary. Although the birth of the Virgin is rarely portrayed before the fourteenth century, we find an eleventh-century mosaic in the Monastery of Daphni in Attica; a mosaic by Pietro Cavallini (1291) in S. Maria in Trastevere in Rome; a painting by Pietro Lorenzetti (1342) now in the Museo dell'Opera del Duomo in Siena, Italy; a relief by Andrea Orcagna (1350s) on the tabernacle in Or San Michele in Florence, Italy; a fresco by Giovanni da Milano (circa 1360) in the Renuccini Chapel, Church of Santa Croce in Florence; and a painting by Tintoretto (before 1595) in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg. We also find Masaccio's interpretation on a desco da parto (birth salver) depicting a Birth Scene (circa 1427–1428). Although the desco da parto was often a platter or bowl made of ceramic and laden with food for the postpartum meal, Masaccio's circular enframed wooden panel seems to imitate the appearance of a birth platter, inspiring subsequent desco da parto panels, such as Domenico Veneziano's Adoration of the Magi (circa 1435). In Tintoretto's Birth of the Virgin and in Andrea del Sarto's Birth of the Virgin (1514) in SS. Annunziata in Florence, the interior of the birth chamber is especially sumptuous, as it is in Domenico del Ghirlandaio's Birth of the Virgin (1485–1490) in the Cappella Maggiore at Sta. Maria Novella in Florence, expressing the idea that Joachim, the Virgin's father, was very wealthy. In the north, the interaction of mother, midwives, and child remains the same, as in Bartholomäus Zeitblom's late fifteenth-century woodcut set in a modest bed chamber and in an anonymous Antwerp master's painting (circa 1525), set in quite the opposite atmosphere, with minute details of architectural extravagance. Albrecht Altdorfer, however, in the early sixteenth century, placed the birth in a cathedral, beneath a canopy where angels fly above, encircling the piers. Here the artist alludes to the identification of the Virgin with the Church.

The birth of St. John the Baptist is also described in the Golden Legend. Like the birth of the Virgin, artists depict Elizabeth in her bed attended by midwives while Mary holds St. John, in accordance with the Golden Legend explanation: "she lifted it from the earth with her holy hands, kindly acting as a nursemaid would" (Jacobus de Voragine, p. 330). Paintings by Lorenzo and Giacomo Salimbeni da San Severino in 1416, Jean Fouquet in the mid-fifteenth century, and an unknown late fifteenth-century artist from the Upper Rhine suggest an unpretentious interior. In the latter two versions, the mute Zacharias records the child's name (Elizabeth's choice) to confirm his agreement, and his speech is restored.

In the Buddhist tradition we witness another virgin birth, but in a completely different manner. Maya, the mother of Buddha, delivered her child from her right flank. Therefore, images of the birth of Buddha are more explicit. According to the legend, Maya (the beautiful virgin wife of Suddhodano, a rich, powerful, and wise prince), conceived in a dream, through a large white elephant who pierced her right side. She then delivered the child, Siddhartha, in 544 B.C. through the right flank while standing beneath a flowering tree. A gilded bronze sculpture from Nepal portrays Maya, her body in an S-curve and her face serene, standing beneath the tree while a tiny infant emerges from her side. In an Indian relief from the Gandhara period (second century B.C.–fifth century A.D.), Maya stands beneath a tree with a number of people, perhaps midwives or goddesses. One woman to Maya's immediate right holds the newborn in her arms. In a bronze statue from the Asuka period in Japan, Queen Maya stands alone, without the flowering tree, her right arm raised to accommodate the emergence of the baby Siddhartha from the sleeve of her kimono.

Amina, a daughter of the noble Zuhra family, gave birth to the prophet Muhammad on April 20, 571. Although the conception and birth of Muhammad were not extraordinary, it is believed that many miraculous events occurred on the day of his birth. In a 1594 Turkish copy of the 1368 Turkish manuscript Siyer-un-Nebi (Progress of a Prophet), a miniature of the postpartum period depicts the veiled Amina seated on the floor to the left of her child, who is enveloped in a mandorla of flames. To the child's right, three angels approach and kneel. The flames relate to an identification of sacred power with heat, burning, or fire (Eliade, p. 147).

Cesarean Birth

The birth of Buddha may also be classified as a cesarean birth, since the child emerges from the torso of the mother, rather than from the vagina. According to the historian of medicine Leo Oppenheim, cesarean sections date back to the second millennium in Mesopotamia. We also know that the ancient Greeks described them in their myths. Asclepius, for example, was extracted from the belly of his dead mother by his father, Apollo, illustrated in a 1549 edition of Alessandro Benedetti's De re medica and a 1534 majolica plate from Gubbio, Italy.

Another myth from Persia describes a cesarean section for the arrival of the hero Rustand. Illustrated in Firdawsi's (Abul Kasim's) book King of Kings (1010), a physician extracts the child from Queen Rudabe's abdomen. In a sixteenth-century manuscript a midwife receives the baby as it falls headfirst from the incision.

The origin of the term cesarean section is not certain. Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski in her book on the subject states that the possible sources are many—perhaps from the days of King Numa Pompilius (circa 715 B.C.), when a law was enacted declaring it illegal to bury a dead pregnant woman without attempting to cut out the child. The law became known as the lex caesarea. Or the term may come from the Latin word caedere (to cut), as mentioned in Pliny the Elder's Natural History in the first century A.D.

In the antique and medieval periods, it was believed that the child who survived a cesarean birth (performed only when the mother had died) was indeed a fortunate person and extraordinary from the start. Julius Caesar was considered such an extraordinary person, and illustrations of his cesarean birth appear in medieval manuscripts on the history of Rome, most often in copies of Les Faits des Romains from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. This story is false, because we know that Caesar wrote to his mother during his foreign wars and the possibility that she survived a cesarean section at that time is unlikely.

Cesarean sections performed on unknown mothers are also illustrated in a fourteenth-century French manuscript entitled Histoire ancienne, a sixteenth-century Japanese woodcut, and a 1879 book on life in Kahura, Uganda, written by R. W. Felkin. In an Ethiopian manuscript, a cesarean section is performed on a deceased mother by the angels Gabriel and Michael, while a priest blesses the birth to ensure that the dying mother receives the last rites and the newborn is baptized before it too might die.

Beginning in the second half of the fifteenth century in Augsburg, Nuremberg, and Strasbourg, woodcuts depicting the birth of the Antichrist by cesarean section came into vogue. The mother usually appears in a swoon with devils as midwives or a combination of devils and mortal woman in attendance, such as in the woodcut Entkrüst, from the Munich Staatsbibliothek in Germany. Two mortal midwives assist in the birth of the Antichrist in Seelwurzgarten, in the Pierpont Morgan Library in New York. The Antichrist is supposed to be a Jew, heretic, or Muslim, whose life is modeled after the life of Christ. The iconography of the birth of the Antichrist comes from many sources, including illustrations in the Apocalypse and such texts as Adso of Montier-en-Der's Libellus de ortu et de tempore Antichristi (circa 950), which was absorbed into the spiritual encyclopedia Elucidarium, written by Honorius Augustodensis in the early twelfth century (with a German translation written at the end of the twelfth century). A description of the birth of the Antichrist is also in Scrivias (1142–1152), written by the German visionary Hildegard von Bingen (Blumenthal-Kosinski, pp. 125–142).

Births in Legends

The birth of Adonis, a mortal beloved by Aphrodite, has been illustrated in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century works of art. According to the story, Adonis's mother, Myrrha, was seduced by her father, Cinyras, who then claimed that she was dishonored and had to die. Aphrodite took pity on Myrrha and turned her into a tree from which Adonis was born. In an engraving by an unknown artist published in the seventeenth-century Ovidius Hersheppinghe, by Joost van den Vondel, and in a painting by an unknown artist from the same period, the child emerges from the woman-tree attended by several midwives who wear contemporary dress. In an eighteenth-century aquatint signed by Marcantonio Franceschini, putti, wood nymphs, and fauns celebrate the birth.

Perhaps the most infamous birth in art can be found in the illustrations of the legend of Pope Joan, who apparently delivered a child during a papal procession. The story of Pope Joan was invented by a French Dominican monk named Étienne de Bourdon in the mid-thirteenth century. According to his tale, Joan was born in Ingelheim or Mainz, Germany, of English parents. She fell in love with a Benedictine monk and disguised herself as a man to be with him. They fled to Athens, studied together, and Joan became a scholar. After her lover's death, Joan went to Rome, became a cardinal, and then Pope John VIII in 855, between Popes Leo IV and Benedict III. John/Joan died in childbirth, and according to Boccaccio in his book De Claris Mulieribus (1355–1359), the papal procession continued after the child arrived, but the retinue turned away from the shocking sight where the pope had collapsed. The birth is illustrated in a fifteenth-century French manuscript, a woodcut from Joannes Wolf's Lectionam memorabilium et reconditurum Centenarii XVI (1600), and on a plate in the French translation Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne fidèlement tirée de la dissertation latine de M. de Spanheim (1736). The legend of Pope Joan was refuted in 1863 with the publication of Joann Dollinger's Papstfabeln des Mittelalters.

Contemporary Interpretations of Birth

Frida Kahlo's surreal painting My Birth (1932), in which the artist shows a dual portrait of herself as the mother (lying dead with a piece of cloth over her face) and the newborn child (with the face of an adult Frida), demonstrates the modernist shift from mirroring the real world to reflecting the world within the psyche. Here, childbirth symbolizes a personal experience: a sense of change, renewal, or rebirth. The artist gives birth to herself. Kahlo biographer Hayden Herrera stated that the source for this painting is most likely the Aztec goddess of childbirth Tlazoltéotl (see "Birth Among Gods and Goddesses" above). The reference to Tlazoltéotl confirms Kahlo's Mexican identity.

Paul Klee's L'Accouchement (1944) also reaches back to older art forms, in this case to prehistoric or primitive statuary. In its flatness and symmetry, this work echoes the birth scenes from Laussel and Luristan, as well as the naïveté of children's drawings, evoking a sense of quiet joy and ritual.

With the advent of feminism in the 1960s and 1970s, women artists created female iconography based on female subject matter to experience a sense of empowerment. Nouveau réaliste Niki de Saint Phalle's L'Accouchement blanc (1963) combines a female experience with popular culture's detritus. Made of numerous toys applied to a sculpted female torso giving birth to a doll, this work may be seen as part of Saint Phalle's Nana series, the bloated, pinhead fertility goddesses made of papier-mâché and decorated in flashy colors. L'Accouchement blanc is an early monochrome version.

Monica Sjöö also invokes primeval goddess images in her painting God Giving Birth (1968). Here, Sjöö demonstrates her interpretation of creation in terms of a matriarchal mythology in order to provide the feminist movement with a historic and spiritual base.

Judy Chicago's series The Birth Project (1980–1985) contributes to feminist iconography through its focus on a quintessentially female experience. Inspired by her place setting for Mary Wollstonecraft in a previous work, The Dinner Party (1979), in which she dramatized Wollstonecraft's death in childbirth on an embroidered and appliquéd runner, The Birth Project incorporates the many phases and emotions brought about by pregnancy, labor, and delivery, such as Smocked Figure (a silhouette of a pregnant woman), The Crowning (the first sight of the child's head), Birth Tear (the moment of delivery), and Birth Trinity (the mother aided by midwives in the spirit of ancient imagery). The Birth Project calls attention to creation imagery and creation mythology and, like Sjöo's work, contributes to a matriarchal orientation.

American artist Mary Kelly created a multimedia 165-piece work in six sections entitled Post-Partum Document over a six-year period (1973–1979), following the birth of her son in London. It is a diary composed of various baby items (such as a succession of diapers with different stains, bits of a blanket), children's scribbles, mementos (a plaster cast of a hand)—all evidence of the postpartum process shared by mother and child. But Kelly's purpose reaches far beyond the musing of a woman tracing her baby's process. Inspired by Jacques Lacan's theories linking language and sexuality and Michel Foucault's writing on sexuality as a social construct, Kelly described the psychosexual development of the child in society. Her recordings bear witness to the experience of her son's transition from identification with the mother to independence. As her child is male, she perceived that he identified with and assumed his "privileged" status in a patriarchal society. Whereas she, the mother, without a phallus, remained outside of this experience that comes about in a phallogocentric society. She, therefore, as woman, is other.

Kelly's artwork also brings to mind the death of specific maternal functions at various stages in the child's life (weaning, carrying, etc.). Postpartum experiences include several kinds of death, even the death of a woman's identity as she assumes a new role. Birth and death are often invoked as part of each other. Here, we have focused on images of the birth and its aftermath, with an emphasis on different kinds of descriptions—all pointing to the mystery and miraculousness of the process.

Images of birth come from the earliest period of human existence and continue to be part of contemporary culture. They bear witness to an ever-present sense of awe and superstition in the face of this everyday miracle and a need to set down in a permanent form the significance of this ephemeral event.

See also Annunciation; Pregnancy; Virgin/Virginity

Selected Works of Art

Births of Gods and Goddesses

Fertility Goddess, Paleolithic bas-relief, circa 32,000–15,000 B.C., Laussel, Dordogne, France

Fertility Goddess, Neolithic sculpture, circa 7000–5000 B.C., Catal Hüyük, Anatolia, Turkey

Woman Giving Birth with Animals and Rosettes, silver brooch, Luristan, circa 1000 B.C., London, Thames and Hudson Archive

Birth hieroglyph, drawing of lost relief, Egyptian (Speert, p. 97)

Cleopatra Giving Birth, bas-relief, Egyptian, first-century B.C. Temple of Esna, Egypt

Queen Ahmes Giving Birth, bas-relief, Egyptian, circa 323–330, Cairo, Egyptian Museum

Tlazoléotl, sculpture, Aztec, Washington, D.C., Dumbarton Oaks Research Library

Djang 'Kawa Story, painting, Australian Aborigine, Art Gallery of New South Wales, New Zealand

God Supported by Other Figures, African sculpture, Uitsa, Niger

Mother Giving Birth with Father, Child and Leyek, sculpture, Balinese, Berlin, Museum für Völkerkunde

Birth of Athena, Greek, black-figure amphora, mid-sixth century B.C., Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Birth of Athena, Greek, black-figure amphora, mid-sixth century B.C., New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery

Birth of Aphrodite, red-figure pelike, Greek, late sixth century B.C., Archaeological Museum of Thessaloníki, Greece

Birth of Erichthonius, red-figure stamnos, circa 500 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliches Antikensammlung

Birth of Dionysus, red-figure pelike, Greek, fifth century B.C., St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Phidias, Birth of Athena, bas-relief, mid-fifth century B.C., originally on the Parthenon, Athens, now in London, British Museum

Birth of Aphrodite, bas-relief from the Ludovisi Throne, Greek, circa 470 B.C., Rome, Terme Museum

Botticelli, Birth of Venus, circa 1480, Florence, Uffizi Gallery
Sesto, Cesare da, copy of Leonardo da Vinci's Leda and the Swan, 1506, Wilton House, collection of the Earl of Pembroke

Titian, Venus Anadyomene, circa 1525, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland

Cabanel, Alexandre, Birth of Venus, 1863, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Redon, Odilon, Birth of Venus, 1912, Paris, Stephen Higgons Collection

Mortal Births

Birth Scene, bas-relief, Greek, fifth century B.C. (Speert, p. 83)

Birth Scene, Roman ivory carving, first century B.C., from Pompeii, now in Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale

Birth Scene, German, 1505, from Jacob Rueff's De Conceptu et Generatione Hominis, Frankfurt-Am-Main, Germany

Birth Scene, German, from Eucharius Rösslin's Rosegarten, 1513

Bosse, Abraham, Noblewoman Giving Birth, 1633, from Volker Lehmann's Die Geburt in der Kunst

Birth Scene, Japanese, 1837, from Yoshihiro Mizuhara's atlas Sanka Zushiki

Lacombe, Georges, La Naissance de l'Homme, wood carving on bed, 1892, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Postpartum Scenes

Birth Scene, Danish, medieval, chalk drawing from Ondlose, Zealand, now in Copenhagen, Denmark, Nationalmuseum

Death of Rachel, early Christian manuscript illumination, mid-sixth century, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Nationalbibliothek

Death of Rachel, German manuscript drawing, fifteenth century, Köthen, Germany, Schlossbibliothek

Verrocchio, Andrea del, Tomb Sculpture for Giovanni Francesco Tornabuoni's Wife, marble bas-relief, 1477, originally in the Church of Santa Maria Sopra Minerva, Rome, now in Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale Bargello

Birth Scene, French-German, 1488, woodcut from Johannes Lichtenberger's Prognosticatio in Latino, Strasbourg, France

Cignaroli, Giambettino, Death of Rachel, seventeenth century, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Granges, David des, The Family of Sir Richard Saltonstall, 1637 or 1639, London, Tate Gallery

The Birth of the Dauphin Louis XIV of France, at Saint-Germain, September 5, 1638, lithograph, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

Dury, G., The Confinement of the Dauphiness, Anne-Marie-Victoire of Bavaria, at the Birth of the Duke of Bourgogne, Grandson of Louis XIV, August 6, 1682, lithograph, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

Death of Rachel, tombstone for Doña Rachel Teicheira de Mattos, circa 1716, Amstel, The Netherlands

Devéria, Eugène, The Birth of Henry IV, 1553, 1827, Paris, Bibliothèque de France

Multiple Births

Haggadah, illuminated manuscript, thirteenth century (Speert, p. 390)

Birth of Jacob and Esau, Spanish illuminated manuscript from Sarajevo Haggadah, late thirteenth century, Sarajevo, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Zemaljsk: Muzej Bosne Hercegovina

Gozzoli, Benozzo, Birth of Jacob and Esau, mid-fifteenth century, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santo

Birth Scene, Huichol Indian painting, San Francisco, California, Fine Arts Museum of San Francisco

Birth of Christ

Nativity, northern Italian ivory book cover, late fifth century, Milan, Italy, Cathedral Treasure

Nativity, from the throne of Maximian, early Christian ivory, circa 547, Ravenna, Italy, Archepiscopal Museum

Nativity, Byzantine mosaic, circa 1080–1100, Daphni, Greece, Church of the Dormition

Nativity, Italian mosaic, twelfth century, Palermo, Italy, Church of the Martyrs

Nativity, Byzantine mosaic, mid-twelfth century, Palermo, Italy, Capella Palatina

Birth of Christ, Byzantine mosaic, 1210–1220, Istanbul, Turkey, Kahrie Cami, Church of the Redeemer, Chora Monastery

Pisano, Nicola, Birth of Christ, bas-relief, 1260, Pisa, Italy, Baptistry

Nativity, Italian fresco, fourteenth century, Mistra, Peripletos Church

Duccio, Nativity, predella of the Maestà Altarpiece, 1308–1311, Washington, D.C., Gallery of Art

Gaddi, Taddeo, Nativity, early fifteenth century, Dijon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Campin, Robert, Nativity, early fifteenth century, Dijon, France, Musée

Monaco, Lorenzo, Nativity, panel of Coronation of the Virgin, 1414, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Fabrizio, Gentile da, Nativity, predella of the Strozzi Altarpiece, finished 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Master Francke, Nativity, from the St. Thomas à Becket Altar, 1424, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Piero della Francesca, Nativity, late fifteenth century, London, National Gallery

Goes, Hugo van der, Nativity, from the Portinari Altarpiece, 1474–1475, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Botticelli, Mystical Nativity, 1500, London, National Gallery

Birth of the Virgin Mary

Cavallini, Pietro, Birth of the Virgin, mosaic, 1291, Rome, St. Maria in Trastevere

Lorenzetti, Pietro, Birth of the Virgin, 1342, Siena, Italy, Museo dell'opera del Duomo

Orcagna, Andrea di Cione, Birth of the Virgin, bas-relief on tabernacle, mid-fourteenth century

Giovanni da Milano, Birth of the Virgin, circa 1360, Florence, Italy, Church of Santa Croce, Renuccini Chapel

Masaccio, Birth Scene (Birth of the Virgin), painted panel, 1427–1428, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

Ghirlandaio, Domenico del, Birth of the Virgin, fresco, 1485–1490, Florence, Italy, Museo di Santa Maria Novella, Cappella Maggiore

Zeitblom, Bartholomäus, Birth of the Virgin, woodcut, early fifteenth century

Altdorfer, Albrecht, Birth of the Virgin, fresco, 1514, Florence, S.S. Annunziata

Sarto, Andrea del, Birth of the Virgin, fresco, 1514, Florence, Italy, SS. Annunziata

Tintoretto, Birth of the Virgin, late sixteenth century, St. Petersburg, State Hermitage Museum

St. John the Baptist

Upper Rhenish Master, Birth of Saint John the Baptist, undated, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden

Fouquet, Jean, The Birth of Saint John the Baptist, miniature, fifteenth century, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé

Salimbeni, Lorenzo and Giacomo, Birth of Saint John the Baptist, fresco, 1416, Urbino, Italy, Chapel of San Giovanni Battista

Buddha

Birth of Buddha, Nepalese sculpture, undated, Versailles, France, Musée Guimet

Birth of Buddha, Indian bas-relief, Gandara period, second–fifth century A.D., Berlin, Museum für Indische Kunst

Birth of Buddha, Japanese bronze sculpture, Asuka period, Tokyo, Kyoto Kokuritsu Hakubutsukan

Cesarean Births

Birth of Asclepius, Italian, in De re Medica, by Alessandro Benedetti, 1549

Birth of Asclepius, Italian majolica plate, from Plastik un Medizin, by E. Hollander, 1534

Birth of Rustand, Persian, in King of Kings, by Firdawsi, 1010, Naples, Italy, Biblioteca Nazionale

Birth of Rustand, Persian miniature, sixteenth century, reproduced in Iconographia Gyniatrica: A Pictorial History of Gynecology and Obstetrics, edited by Harold Speert

The Birth of Julius Caesar, copy of manuscript, Les Faits des Romains, fourteenth or fifteenth century, London, British Library (Royal MS 17 Fll, fol. 9v)

The Birth of Julius Caesar, copy of manuscript, Les Faits des Romains, fourteenth or fifteenth century, Venice, Italy, Biblioteca Nazionale Marciana (MS Cod. Marc. Fr.Z3, fol.2r)

The Birth of Julius Caesar, copy of manuscript, Les Faits des Romains, fourteenth or fifteenth century, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University Library (MS Garrett 128, fol. 144r)

Birth of Caesar, French miniature, fourteenth century, in Les Anciens Histoires des Romains, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

Caesarean Birth, Japanese woodcut, from a book on Kahura, Uganda

Caesarean Birth, 1879, in Notes on Labour in Central Africa, by R. W. Felkin, 1884

Caesarean Birth, Ethiopian, from Lives of Maba Senon, London, British Museum

The Birth of the Antichrist, German woodcut, from Entkrüst, late fifteenth century, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek (Xyl. I, fol.2r)

The Birth of the Antichrist, German woodcut, from Seelenwurzgarten, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (PML 199 ChL f490, fol.dd6v)

Birth in Legends

Birth of Adonis, Dutch engraving, seventeenth century, in Ovidius Hersheppinghe

Franceschini, Marcantonio, Birth of Adonis, aquatint, eighteenth century

The Parturition of Pope Joan, woodcut, from the German edition De Claris Mulieribus, by Boccaccio, Ulm, Germany

The Parturition of Pope Joan, miniature, fifteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de Paris

The Parturition of Pope Joan, German woodcut, 1600, from Lectionum Memorabilium et Reconditarum Centenarii XVI, by Joannes Wolf

The Parturition of Pope Joan, French illustration, 1736, from Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne Fidèlement Tirée de la Dissertation Latine de Mr. de Spanheim

Twentieth-Century Interpretations of Birth

Kahlo, Frida, My Birth, oil on sheet metal, 1932, private collection

Klee, Paul, L'Accouchement, oil on canvas, 1944, New York, Pierre Matisse Gallery

Niki de Saint Phalle, L'Accouchement Blanc, mixed media, 1963, collection of the artist

Sjöö, Monica, God Giving Birth, oil on hardboard, 1968, collection of the artist

Chicago, Judy, The Birth Project, mixed media, 1980–1985, collection of the artist

Chicago, Judy, Mary Wollstonecraft, The Dinner Party, mixed media, 1979, collection of the artist

Kelly, Mary, Post-Partum Document, mixed media, 1973–1979, London, Arts Council Collection

Further Reading

Ali, Maulana Muhammad, Muhammad the Prophet, Lahore, India: Ahmadiyya Anjuman-i-Isha'at-i-Islam, 1924; London: Cassell, 1950

The Apocryphal New Testament, translated by Montague Rhodes James, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1924; Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989

Berti, Luciano, Masaccio, University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 1967

Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate, Not of Woman Born: Representations of Caesarean Birth in Medieval and Renaissance Culture, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1990

Braff, Phyllis, "Nanas, Guns and Gardens," Art in America 80:12 (December 1992)

Bulfinch, Thomas, Mythology, New York: Avenel Books, 1978

Carpenter, Thomas H., Art and Myth in Ancient Greece: A Handbook, New York: Thames and Hudson, 1990; London: Thames and Hudson, 1991

Chicago, Judy, The Birth Project, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1985

Clark, Kenneth, Leonardo da Vinci, Harmondsworth, England and New York: Viking, 1988

Cornell, Hendrik, The Iconography of the Nativity of Christ, Uppsala, Sweden: A. B. Lundequistska Bokhandeln, 1924

de la Motte, Guillaume, A General Treatise of Midwifry, translated by Thomas Tomkyns, London: James Waugh, 1746

Disselhoff, Hans Dietrich, and Sigvald Linne, The Art of Ancient America: Civilizations of Central and South America, New York: Crown, 1961; London: Methuen, 1961

Dunham, Carroll V., Mamatoto: A Celebration of Birth, New York: Viking, 1992

- Eliade, Mircea, Myths, Dreams, and Mysteries: The Encounter Between Contemporary Faiths and Archaic Realities, New York: Harper, 1957; London: Harvill Press, 1960
- Gélis, Jacques, History of Childbirth: Fertility, Pregnancy, and Birth in Early Modern Europe, translated by Rosemary Morris, Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1991
- Hall, James, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art, New York: Harper, 1974; London: J. Murray, 1974
- Hamilton, Edith, Mythology, Boston: Little, Brown, 1942; London: New American Library, 1942
- Hartt, Frederick, History of Italian Renaissance Art, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1969
- Henle, Jane Elizabeth, Greek Myths: A Vase Painter's Notebook, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1973
- Hutter, Irmgard, Early Christian and Byzantine Art, New York: Universe, 1971; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1971
- Kinsley, David R., The Goddesses' Mirror: Visions of the Divine from East and West, Albany: State University of New York, 1989
- Knight, Richard Payne, The Symbolic Language of Ancient Art and Mythology: An Inquiry, London: A. J. Valpy, 1818; New York: J. W. Bouton, 1892
- Laget, Mireille, Naissances: L'accouchement avant l'âge de la clinique, Paris: Seuil, 1982
- Lehmann, Volker, Die Geburt in der Kunst: Geburtshilfliche Motive in der Darstellenden Kunst in Europa von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, Braunschweig, Germany: Braunschweiger Verlagsanstalt, 1978
- Lightbown, Ronald, Sandro Botticelli: Life and Work, London: Paul Elek, 1978; New York: Abbeville Press, 1989
- Metzger, Henri, Les Représentations dans la céramique attique du IV^e siècle, Paris: E. De Boccard, 1951
- Oppenheim, Leo A., "A Caesarian Section in the Second Millennium B.C.," Journal of the History of Medicine and Allied Sciences 15 (1960)
- Paine, Robert Treat, and Alexander Soper, The Art and Architecture of Japan, Hammondsworth, England and Baltimore: Penguin, 1974
- Pollitt, Jerome Jordan, Art and Experience in Classical Greece, Cambridge and London: Cambridge University Press, 1972
- Robinson, Hilary, ed., Visibly Female: Feminism and Art Today, An Anthology, New York: Universe, 1987; London: Camden, 1987
- Roth, Cecil, The Sarajevo Haggadah, New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1963; London: Allen, 1963
- Sjöö, Monica, and Barbara Mor, The Great Cosmic Mother: Rediscovering the Religion of the Earth, Wolf Creek, Oregon: Rainbow Press 1981
- Speert, Harold, Iconographia Gyniatrix: A Pictorial History of Gynecology and Obstetrics, Philadelphia: F. A. Davis, 1973
- Voragine, Jacobus de, The Golden Legend: Readings on the Saints, translated by William Granger Ryan, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1993
- Warner, Marina, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and Cult of the Virgin Mary, New York: Knopf, 1976; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1976

CALUMNY

Claire Lindgren

The following motifs are included in the discussion of the theme Calumny:

CALUMNY OF APELLES

SUSANNA AND THE ELDERS

JOSEPH AND POTIPHAR'S
WIFE

OTHER EXAMPLES OF CALUMNY

Botticelli, Calumny of Apelles 1485–1490, painting, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery.
(Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

Calumny, or deliberate malicious slander, is infrequently used as subject matter for major works of art; it is found most often in political flyers and editorial cartoons. This is not true of the past, when for a variety of reasons artists chose to depict slanderous events in what could be described as elaborate visual indictments. An excellent example of the depiction of a maliciously false tale is found in a work by Botticelli, who attempted to reconstruct an ancient Greek painting called The Calumny by Apelles, the most renowned of the ancient Greek painters, who was active in the late fourth century B.C. The work is described in the writing of the second century A.D. Greek rhetorician and satirist Lucian:

Apelles, mindful of the dangers which surrounded him, defended himself against the slander with a picture of the following sort. On the right is a man with huge ears, which are only just short of being like those of Midas, stretching out one hand from afar to "Calumny" who is still coming forward. Flanking him stand two women, who seem to me to be "Ignorance" and "Suspicion." On the other side "Calumny" comes forward, a small woman of extreme beauty, heated with passion and in a state of great excitement, the sort of woman who puts madness and rage on display; in her left hand she holds a lighted torch and in her right she drags along a certain youth by the hair who stretches out his hands to heaven and bears witness before the gods. A man who is sallow and ugly leads them, glancing around sharply and wearing that look which people get when they have been withered by a long disease. One could suppose that this was "Jealousy." There are two other female figures who accompany "Calumny" and are in the act of exhorting, protecting and adorning her. According to the guide who explained the features of the picture to me, one of these women was "Treachery" and the other was "Deception." Behind them comes another figure, represented as if in mourning, and dressed in black raiment which is torn in shreds; she I think, is said to be "Repentance." She turns around in tears and with a great sense of shame toward "Truth" who looks up to heaven as she approaches. Thus did Apelles reproduce his own danger in the painting. (Lucian, Calumniae Non Temere Credendum, p. 4)

According to the literature, the incident that caused Apelles to paint this allegorical work was the accusation by his rival, Antipholos, that he, Apelles, was an active participant in a plot to overthrow Ptolemy I. The work was painted to express the predicament in which Apelles had been placed by the calumny from which he was later exonerated.

This passage became the basis for Botticelli's Calumny of Apelles, painted for his own pleasure and later given to his friend Fabio Segni. Ostensibly, the work was done to follow a suggestion of Leon Battista Alberti given in De Pictura to recreate the ancient painting of Apelles from Lucian's description. Botticelli appears to have followed Alberti's advice: Ignorance and Suspicion whisper into the ears of the judge (man on right with hand outstretched); Hatred (Jealousy), Deceit (Deception), and Fraud (Treachery) surround Calumny, who drags her victim, an almost naked youth, toward the judge, while behind them Penitence (Repentance) stands looking at Truth, who points heavenward. Yet, Botticelli has made several changes; for example, he transformed one character from simply having "huge ears" to being an unjust judge with the ears of a donkey, and he clothed Penitence not just in tattered black, but in the torn habit of a Dominican. It has been suggested that Botticelli's work was his attempt to visually defend the memory of the late monk Savonarola, who had been excommunicated and executed. In this work Botticelli implied that the persons involved in Savonarola's judgment were as evil and weak as those in his painting. In view of the deviations from the ancient literary description, the architectural setting that is clearly reminiscent of Renaissance Florence, and what is known of Botticelli's moralistic fervor, this interpretation of the painting is quite likely. Both the Renaissance painting and its now-lost inspiration were deliberate attempts to depict and define visually the act of defamation of character, and both were apparently painted and titled with that purpose in mind.

Another example of an event aimed at damaging another's reputation is from the apocryphal story of the attempted seduction of Susanna, Joachim's wife, by two elders of the Babylonian Jewish community. One finds this subject popular in post-Renaissance times. It is the story of a calumny exposed and the perpetrators punished. Many well-known, and not so well-known, artists used this theme: Nicolaes Rosendael (Susanna before the Judges), Antoine Coypel (Susanna Accused of Adultery), Franz Anton Maulbertsch (Susanna and the Elders and Susanna Before the Judges), and the Master of the Apollo and Daphne Legend (six paintings on the story of Susanna). The prominent artists who chose this subject matter, including Peter Paul Rubens, Rembrandt van Rijn, and those of the Carracci circle, presented the work in such a manner as to nullify the ending of the tale as given in the ancient writings and continue the slander by depicting Susanna as a temptress. In actuality, according to the text, Susanna was trapped in the garden of her home while bathing. She refused to yield to the lecherous desires of the two elders, who had entered uninvited. Because of this refusal, the elders concocted a lie accusing Susanna of adultery with a young man. The elders were believed, and Susanna was condemned to death. On her way to execution, Daniel interceded, the lies of the elders were exposed, and they, instead of Susanna, were executed. This aspect of the tale has also been chosen as subject matter by Lucas van Leyden (Daniel as Judge) and Gerbrand van den Eeckhout (Daniel Proving the Innocence of Susanna).

It is interesting to contrast two renditions of the initial incident of the Susanna story, that of Jacopo Tintoretto and Artemisia Gentileschi. Tintoretto's work is similar in intent to that of other male artists, while Gentileschi's work expresses a totally different attitude. In the work by Tintoretto, Susanna is slandered by the subtle manipulation of the setting, her body position, and drapery. She appears to be provocative and anxious for sexual activity, while in the Gentileschi version she is frightened and awkward. Gentileschi accomplishes this visually by isolating the figure of Susanna and compressing it into the rigid geometry of the shallow space of a frieze on the garden wall far from the blooms and foliage, which were understood as metaphors for bounteous femininity, as well as by emphasizing the conspiratorial attitude of the elders. The artist depicts Susanna as a victim, and the slanderous implications about her implicit in other representations are missing; consequently the calumny is confined to the actions of the elders, as stated in the text.

The dichotomy between the two works presents an excellent example of how subject matter may be altered by the iconography of a particular artist, which in turn is a reflection of the attitude of the period or the artist, or both. For example, Artemisia Gentileschi's seduction and rape at the hands of Agostino Tassi, which probably had occurred about the time of her Susanna painting, contrasts with the general attitude toward women prevalent during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, as expressed in Tintoretto's work. Tintoretto's manipulation of the actual story by stylistic and iconographic means was successful because it reflected the mores of his time. His painting was, in itself, a calumny against women.

Another slanderous story used as a subject by post-Renaissance artists such as Tintoretto and Rembrandt is found in Genesis 39:7–20, the attempted seduction of Joseph by Potiphar's wife. According to the biblical story, in this instance the calumny resulted in Joseph's imprisonment. Potiphar's wife, who had failed in her seduction attempt, falsely accused Joseph of rape. She was believed, and he was imprisoned: an extreme example of the result of slander.

A nonvisual but telling example of an artist's jealousy of the success of another artist and the calumny that resulted was an act by Jacques-Louis David with respect to Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun. Before the French Revolution Vigée-Lebrun was highly favored by the French aristocracy and was a successful rival of David for commissioned portraits. As she explains in her Memoirs, David, probably out of jealousy and in an attempt to increase his own prestige, prominently displayed in his studio an open book that contained slanderous remarks about her.

In the time of the absolute monarchs, written slander about royalty could result in death, but Francisco Goya managed to insinuate his feelings concerning his king in his painting The Family of Charles IV, in which the costumes of the king and family members sparkle with the wealth and ostentation of their position, yet their faces betray a surprising lack of intelligence, making them seem, as was frequently remarked, as if they were peasants dressed for a holiday. It was a malicious group portrait, the intent of which appears to have been missed by those depicted because the painting was accepted by the court.

Perhaps the most famous suggestion of calumny in the arts is not an artwork itself but a courtroom allegation in the case of Whistler versus Ruskin. Art critic John Ruskin published an attack on one of James Abbott McNeill Whistler's works, Nocturne in Black and Gold: The Falling Rocket. In his attack, the critic accused the artist of "flinging a pot of paint in the public's face." Because Ruskin had earlier defended the free style of the later works of Joseph Mallord William Turner, Whistler chose to sue Ruskin for libel. Whistler won a token victory for this defense against calumny, but in no way was he compensated for the enormous court costs. Others learned a bitter lesson from Whistler's experience, and critics could, and did, slander with virtual immunity from prosecution.

The visual artists and the free world of the twentieth century accept, although not with any pleasure, slanderous remarks and depictions that would have been unthinkable earlier. Calumny occurs in works such as political cartoons that regularly attempt to injure reputations in order to advance a specific agenda. Calumny that formerly could have been labeled libel is now considered free expression. The truth and action suggested in Tacitus's expression "Neglected calumny soon expires" seems to have been adopted by the world. Calumny as subject matter and iconographic statement in major works seemingly has expired as well.

See also Bath/Bathing; Betrayal; Caricature/Cartoon

Selected Works of Art

Calumny of Apelles

Apelles of Kos, The Calumny, fourth century B.C., destroyed
Botticelli, Calumny of Apelles, 1485–1490, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Susanna and the Elders

Altdorfer, Albrecht, Susanna at Her Bath, 1526, Munich,
Germany, Alte Pinakothek
Tintoretto, Susanna and the Elders, before 1594, Munich,
Germany, Alte Pinakothek
Gentileschi, Artemisia, Susanna and the Elders, 1610,
Pommersfelden, Germany, Schloss Weissenstein
Carracci, Ludovico, Susanna and the Elders in the Garden of Joachim, oil on canvas, 1616, London, National Gallery
Rembrandt van Rijn, Susanna at Her Bath, 1637, The Hague,
The Netherlands, Royal Gallery
Rubens, Peter Paul, Susanna and the Elders, before 1640,
Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
Veronese, Paolo, Susanna and the Elders, circa 1648, Paris, Louvre

- Guercino, Susanna and the Elders, 1649–1650, Parma, Italy, Galleria Nazionale
- Rosendael, Nicolas, Susanna Before the Judges, 1673, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf Richartz-Museum
- Coytel, Antoine, Susanna Accused of Adultery, early eighteenth century, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Maulbertsch, Franz Anton, Susanna Before the Judges, circa 1750–1752, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie
- Mater of the Apollo and Daphne Legend, Susanna and the Elders: The Crime; Condemnation of Susanna; Susanna Led to Execution; The Judgment, before 1510, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
- Leyden, Lucas van, Daniel as Judge, before 1533, Bremen, Germany, Kunsthalle Bremen
- Eeckhout, Gerbrandt van den, Daniel Proving the Innocence of Susanna, before 1674, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife

- Tintoretto, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, 1555, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Joseph Accused by Potiphar's Wife, 1655, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Cignani, Carlo, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, late seventeenth century, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Other Examples of Calumny

- Goya, Francisco, Family of Charles IV, 1800, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Whistler, James Abbott McNeill, Nocturne in Black and Gold: The Falling Rocket, oil on panel, 1875, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Art Institute

Further Reading

- Cast, David, The Calumny of Apelles: A Study in the Humanist Tradition, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1981
- Ettlinger, Leopold David, and Helen S., Botticelli, London: Thames and Hudson, 1976; New York: Oxford University Press, 1977
- Garrard, Mary D., Artemisia Gentileschi: The Image of the Female Hero in Italian Baroque Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989
- , “Artemisia and Susanna” in Feminism and Art History: Questioning the Litany, eds., Norma Broude and Mary D. Garrard, New York: Harper, 1982
- Gassier, Pierre, and Juliet Wilson, Goya: His Life and Work, London: Thames and Hudson, 1971; New York: Reynal, 1971
- Lightbrown, Ronald W., Botticelli, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1978
- Massing, Jean Michel, Du texte à l'image: la Calomie d'Apelle et son iconographie, Strasbourg, France: Presses universitaires de Strasbourg, 1990
- Pearson, Hesketh, The Man Whistler, New York: Harper, 1952; London: Methuen, 1952
- Ridolfi, Carlo, The Life of Tintoretto and of His Children, Domenico and Marietta, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1984
- Sutton, Denys, Nocturne: The Art of James McNeill Whistler, London: Country Life, 1963; Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1964
- Vigée-LeBrun, Marie Louise Elisabeth, Memoirs of Madame Vigée-LeBrun, translated by Lionel Strechey, New York: G. Braziller, 1989

CARICATURE/CARTOON

Margaret A. Sullivan

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Caricature/Cartoon:

ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Honoré Daumier, The Legislative Belly, 1834, lithograph from L'Association Mensuelle, private collection. (Courtesy of Art Resource, New York)

Claude Monet recalled that as a bored 17-year-old student he passed his time filling “the margins of my notebooks . . . in the most irreverent way, distorting as much as possible the faces and profiles of my teachers.” Although Monet’s fame rests on his impressionist paintings, he began his artistic career as a caricaturist, and although caricature and the cartoon are often considered peripheral arts, outside the mainstream, they are psychologically powerful, with a long and venerable history, and both have played an important role in the development of modern art.

Definitions

Caricature can be described as an opinionated, often defamatory summation of those characteristics uniquely associated with an individual or group. It employs distortion and exaggeration to create an image that deviates from the norm, either as a departure from the “normal” features of an individual, as when Monet amused himself by caricaturing his teachers, or as a violation of the physiognomic norms considered admirable in a particular society. In England in the nineteenth century, the Irish were portrayed with simian features, a caricature that equated them with monkeys and implied that they were less than human and closer to the beasts. When a patron commissions a portrait, the results tend to reflect the values, wishes, and aspirations of the sitter. In caricature the personal bias of the artist dominates. The motivation is to amuse or attack, the artist’s strategies include wit, humor, and, not infrequently, obscenity and scurrility, and the effect may range from the ridiculous and irreverent to the ribald and scatological.

Cartoons are more complex. Although caricature is often an element in the cartoon, it is only one strategy among many. Cartoons usually have a language referent, thus combining the verbal and visual. The cartoonist relies on the viewer’s knowledge of proverbs, myths, and other shared cultural information to create a narrative and make a point. In Thomas Nast’s Jewels Among Swine (1874), the biblical proverb is given an ironic turn when applied to the police (portrayed as uniformed pigs) taking the “jewels” (beautiful young lady temperance workers) to jail. The story may be complete in one frame (as in Nast’s cartoon) or require a multiple sequence (as in the comic strip or picture stories that were developed in the nineteenth century by Roldophe Töpffer and Wilhelm Busch); the images may be animated or static; they may or may not include a caption or the use of “balloons” to enclose dialogue, sound effects, or exclamations; they may be amusing, satirical, or simply entertaining. In all, however, a narrative component is present in the cartoon.

The relationship between cartoon and caricature is illustrated by the concentrated and prolonged attack that Honoré Daumier launched against the deputies of the French Chamber. Daumier visited the Chamber to study the faces of the deputies and then sculpted in clay caricatures of their heads, distorting eyebrows and noses, exaggerating hair and its arrangement, and capturing characteristic expressions and postures. Using these three-dimensional busts as a guide, Daumier created 50 lithographic caricatures of individual deputies that were published as separate sheets. Finally, Daumier combined these caricatures in a cartoon format. The most famous, Legislative Belly (1834), is a compendium of all these caricatures of the legislators, organized to form a complex, visual story about the greed and inertia of a governmental body. The composition—a repetition of curves with one tier of deputies rising above another—echoes the fat paunch of Prunelle, leaning on the rail in the foreground, his dark shock of hair flopping over a broad forehead, and repeats visually the fat figures and well-fed faces of this assembly. Daumier has given the governmental “body” the characteristics of a grossly overfed human body, and the visual pun is underscored by the title—Le Vente législatif (The Legislative Belly).

Method in Caricature

When caricaturing an individual, the artist usually begins by exaggerating and distorting the permanent aspects of face and figure—the size of a nose, the distance between the eyes, the shape of the face and body and other relatively stable features. The most successful caricatures, however, capture the impermanent, the characteristic expression and posture of the subject and the costume and setting associated with them. In Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec’s caricature of Yvette Guilbert, he emphasizes the narrow lips and wide mouth of the music hall entertainer, a genetic feature the singer made prominent with cosmetics in order to set herself apart from her competitors who favored the tiny, bow-shaped mouth fashionable in the 1890s. Pose, costume, and setting are typical. The entertainer is on stage, wearing her trademark black gloves, extending well above her elbows, and she is taking a curtain call, one arm stretched above her head as she holds onto the edge of the scenery. The singer could hardly fault the caricature, since the artist emphasized and exaggerated features she herself chose to dramatize.

Caricatures can be innocuous, but usually they are witty at the expense of the subject, expressions of aggression rather than admiration, although Al Hirschfeld, best known for his clever caricatures of stage personalities, laments that “it is much more difficult nowadays to reach the nerve ends.” When Hirschfeld tried to insult producer David Merrick by depicting him as a tiptoeing “sniveling druid” dressed in a Santa Claus suit. Merrick used his caricature as a Christmas card, adding for good measure a burning Christmas tree in the background. In a publicity-minded age, an insult may be better than no attention, and notoriety more desirable than neglect. Less welcome, the caricatures of Thomas Nast and his campaign against corruption in government and the Tammany ring in the 1870s resulted in Boss Tweed’s conviction and a 12-year term in prison. Acknowledging the power of Nast’s caricatures, Tweed said, “I don’t care a straw for your newspaper articles, my constituents don’t know how to read, but they can’t help seeing them damn pictures.”

In attacking Boss Tweed and the Tammany ring, Nast used many of the strategies that are standard in the repertoire of the caricaturist. Nast exaggerates Tweed’s features so that he is immediately recognizable, but in A Group of Vultures Waiting for the Storm to “Blow Over”—“Let Us Prey,” he departs even more radically from Tweed’s normal appearance by placing his head on the body of a fat, rapacious vulture. The vultures, Tweed and his cronies, are perched high in a storm-swept aerie surrounded by the bones of the “New York City Treasury,” “Liberty,” “Law,” and “Justice” that they have picked clean. Using the same technique, James Gillray made the head of William Pitt recognizable in his An Excrescence: A Fungus: Alias a Toadstool upon a Dunghill (1791) but transformed his body into vegetation. Claude Monet satirized a competitor, artist Jules Didier, by placing his head on the body of a butterfly. Some of the most devastating of these dehumanized bodies are the creation of Francesco Goya. In his drawing There They Go, Plucked, Goya attacks gullible men and greedy women. Pathetic, naked little birds with the faces of men, their feathers plucked, are driven out the door by a group of ferocious, broom-wielding women.

Likening the face to another species—a bird, fish, or insect—is another device for dehumanizing the subject. This was particularly effective in the nineteenth century, when physiognomic theories were at the height of their popularity and judgments about character were formed on the basis of the resemblance between humans and animals. French artist Grandville (Jean-Ignace-Isidore Gérard) made these resemblances a specialty, carrying them to an extreme by substituting the entire head of an animal for the victim’s face—a proud man in a frock coat has the head of a peacock, while the man groveling before him is transformed into a frog in a suit and holding a top hat; bugs become dancers in tutus; and clerics are satirized in a ritual procession of beetles.

Dehumanization is even more extreme when the artist substitutes an inanimate object for the victim’s face. In a caricature entitled The Brains, Nast portrayed Boss Tweed with a huge paunch, elaborate tie clasp, and striped pants as symbols of Tweed’s ill-gotten wealth as the boss of Tammany Hall, but a bag of money serves as Tweed’s head, the huge dollar sign on the bag a substitute for his facial features. In this context, the inanimate money bag with all its negative associations replaces the animate, just as in Daumier’s Nightmare (1832) the pear sitting on the chest of the sleeper and causing his nightmares stands for King Louis-Philippe who had a pear-shaped head. In an equally extreme strategy, the face and head may be composed of images symbolizing the subject’s evil deeds, as when the head of Napoleon is made up of the naked bodies of his victims. This ingenious and damning device goes back to the images created by Giuseppe Arcimboldi in the sixteenth century and early caricatures, such as that of John Calvin (or perhaps, a lawyer) composed of a frog, a fish, and a chicken leg.

In caricaturing a type rather than an individual, the artist often relies on stereotype and the prejudices of his audience. In Germany in the 1930s, Nazi propagandists caricatured Jews with a standardized set of features—large nose, thick lips, heavy dark brows—that deliberately contrasted with the blond, blue-eyed Aryan type they promoted as the ideal. During the same period, George Grosz expressed an opposing point of view with his vitriolic caricatures of a socioeconomic type. Grosz’s paunchy German businessmen count their money bags, ruthlessly trample the vulnerable, or engage in sordid sexual encounters, and the German middle-class family is portrayed as smug and morally bankrupt. In Grosz’s cartoon A Little Child Shall Lead Them, a well-fed, cigar-smoking father reads the newspaper, his grim-mouthed wife is knitting, and in the foreground, the son of this bourgeois couple frowns in concentration as he sights down his toy machine gun—an action in ironic contrast to the biblical title. On occasion, an artist develops a type to encapsulate the social ills he wishes to attack. Among the most successful are Henry Bonaventure Monnier’s Joseph Prudhomme, the archetype of bourgeois pettiness; Daumier’s Ratapoi, with his rakish hat, self-assured swagger, handlebar mustache, and long cudgel—the devious villain who epitomizes the political bully and demagogue; and Robert Macaire, Daumier’s arch-swindler, promoter, and confidence man.

Early History

Used to identify art that exaggerates and distorts, the words cartoon and caricature are relatively recent inventions, although the art they describe is as old as the impulse to scratch graffiti on a wall or exaggerate and distort the image of an opponent. The desire to humiliate and wreak psychic destruction by violating the dignity of the victim is all too human and has a long history. Derogatory images animate Egyptian papyrus with human beings depicted as animals, as in the hieroglyph on a chest from the tomb of Tutankhamen, where a lion and a gazelle match wits over a game board. In the ancient theaters of Greece and Rome, distortion was used for comic and satiric effects, and the padded stomachs, grotesque masks, and over-size phalli of comedy—the exaggerations of mime—all helped to establish a visual vocabulary that was irreverent, deflationary, and charged with negative meanings. Gods and heroes are ugly and distorted on Attic vases, with images abbreviated, humorous, and often complete with a story line.

Christians are denigrated in the early Roman graffiti uncovered in a narrow street near the Forum in Rome. A figure on a cross is given an ass’s head, a man stands nearby, and underneath the legend is scrawled: “Alexamenos worshiping his God.” There are caricatures of defeated iconoclasts in the ninth-century Byzantine Khludov Psalter, such as the illumination showing the last iconoclastic patriarch, John the Grammarian, with a shock of white hair standing on end. In the medieval period, Isaac of Norwich and other Jews are caricatured on an exchequer roll of 1233. In fourteenth-century manuscripts, a king is an ape carried by two rabbits, and an ape doctor ministers to an owl. Attacks on heretics, satires aimed at the powerful (a wolf wearing a bishop's miter, for example), and a caustic view of the relation between the sexes are established themes in the marginal drawings that enliven Gothic manuscripts.

Sixteenth Century

By the sixteenth century the availability of paper, invention of the printing press, accessibility of large urban audiences, and the animosities generated by the Reformation conspired to unleash infamatrixes picturae (pictures of the infamous) as one of the most potent and popular weapons with which to attack the opposition. The Protestants satirized the Roman Catholics, as in Lucas Cranach the Younger's series in which the pope is portrayed as the Antichrist and the Devil defecates monks. The Roman Catholics responded with derogatory images, as in Erhard Schön's woodcut from around 1520 attacking Martin Luther as an instrument of the Devil. A grotesque devil blows into Luther's ear, and "plays" his nose as if Luther's head were a bagpipe. Even those favoring a moderate position in the Reformation controversy found caricature and the cartoon useful for attacking their enemies. In his painting Thin People Eating the Fat (circa 1566), Pieter Bruegel the Elder attacked the extremists on both sides and the greed and avarice that fueled many of their excesses. Two thin and ravenous hags take enormous bites from the cheek of a gluttonous, grossly obese man whose tiny eyes are almost lost in the vast expanse of his fat face. One of the most devastating caricatures of the period, the painting can be considered a forerunner of the modern cartoon as well, since there is a potential narrative in Bruegel's painting—the eternal and evil struggle between the haves and the have-nots.

Much of the derogatory imagery generated by the Reformation controversy is recognizable as caricature, and caricature has a place, albeit a minor one, in the work of many Renaissance artists. When Michelangelo drew a caricature of himself in the margin of one of his notebooks, he was clearly expressing his frustration at being forced by Pope Julius II to finish painting the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, but the so-called grotesques of Leonardo da Vinci cannot be so easily categorized. They illustrate a problem that often arises in a discussion of caricature—the ambiguous line between the exaggerated and the real, the "normal" and the distorted. Leonardo's drawings deviate from the type of physiognomy considered ideal in the Renaissance, but it is not known whether he was depicting real people, conducting physiognomic studies, creating derogatory satires, expressing his own psychic obsessions, or simply exploring a range of artistic possibilities and broadening his formal repertoire. The line between caricature and either the realistic portrait or the physiognomic study can be ambiguous, but whatever their original purpose,

Leonardo's drawings helped to make distortion and exaggeration a legitimate artistic enterprise.

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Before caricature came to be the preferred term for this kind of summary image, there was Cicero's depravata imitatio (imitations of depravity) and, in the Renaissance, Erasmus's infamatrixes picturae, but the word caricature itself is a semantic innovation from the early years of the seventeenth century, when it was first used to describe the abbreviated and distorted images of individuals drawn by the Carracci brothers, Annibale and Agostino. These caricatures, as in A Group of Priests (circa 1590), appear to have been casual and informal sketches created in the workshop as an amusing, recreational diversion in which the subject's physical features were exaggerated. The word itself is derived etymologically from the Italian carico (loaded) and caricare (to load, to charge), and when phrases such as ritrattino carico (little exaggerated portrait) begin to appear around 1646, they convey the idea that while the number of lines or strokes in a caricature may be minimal and the scale small, the results are loaded with meaning. The caricatures of Gian Lorenzo Bernini, the first that are well documented, follow the example of the Carracci. They are simplified, rapid sketches of individuals, as in his pen-and-ink drawing Caricature of a Gentleman (after 1632) and his caricature of the collector and student of the natural sciences Cassiano del Pozzo (circa 1640). This abbreviated style remained the norm in Rome to the end of the century and then was popularized by Pier Leone Ghezzi. Ghezzi, probably the first professional caricaturist, supported himself with his pen drawings of Romans and visitors to Rome, such as his caricatures of the Chevalier de Pacqueville (1725) and Cardinal Granacci (after 1740). The dissemination of these Italian models led to the popularity of the genre in France, with caricature becoming a significant political factor in the bitter controversies of the French Revolution, and they laid the foundation for the golden age of British caricature in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that saw the emergence of such important and prolific artists as William Hogarth, James Gillray, Thomas Rowlandson, and George Cruikshank.

In his most important contribution to the subject of caricature, the print Characters and Caricatura (1743), Hogarth addressed, with economy and wit, the issue Leonardo's drawings raised. At the bottom of the print, a row of heads illustrates two categories. The faces at the far left under "Characters" include an idealized image from a painting by Raphael and, at the far right, as an example of "Caricatura," Hogarth copied one of Leonardo's most deformed faces. Then Hogarth created a montage of dozens of profiles that fall somewhere between the extremes. Hogarth said he wanted to create "characters," that is, stay within the limits of the probable and the plausible. At the same time, however, the print is evidence of Hogarth's desire to extend the understanding of what constitutes "character" in real life. The point made in Hogarth's print is that in nature "normal" covers a wide range, a broad spectrum between the extremes of ideal beauty and the truly grotesque and deformed. The faces and figures are not idealized in Hogarth's series of prints Marriage à la Mode or The Rake's Progress, but neither are they violent distortions. The situation serves to establish the satire instead of the exaggerations normally associated with caricature, and a narrative that develops is more important than dehumanized bodies and faces.

Hogarth's print did not resolve the problem of character versus caricature, but its existence and the reception of his own engravings—his picture-stories such as The Rake's Progress, precursor of the comic strip—are signs that genres, traditionally peripheral, were moving up in the artistic hierarchy. Other English artists after Hogarth could make caricature central to their art. A gifted artist especially admired for his watercolors, Thomas Rowlandson was highly successful with his social satires such as Vauxhall Gardens (1784) and Box Lobby Loungers (1785). James Gillray was the first to make a career of political cartooning, creating etchings such as Plum Pudding in Danger (1805) with its caricature of Napoleon as "Little Boney." George Cruikshank, a full-time caricaturist lampooned the fashions of the time, as in his series of eight plates entitled Monstrosities (circa 1816).

It is also in England that the term cartoon took on a new meaning and became closely allied with caricature. In its original sense, a cartoon was a full-scale drawing on paper, a design to be followed for painting a mural or weaving a tapestry, but it was given a new application in the 1840s when Punch, an English humor magazine, made fun of a competition for designs, or "cartoons," for the proposed decoration of the new Houses of Parliament. The new usage was apt. It retains a sense of the provisional, unfinished quality of the original meaning; the modern cartoon tends to fall somewhere between the casual preparatory sketch and the polished and detailed work of art. Yet the context in which the new use of the word first appeared (a mock competition) signals an irreverent approach to a serious subject, a point of view congenial to most cartoonists.

Caricature and the Cartoon in the Modern Era

The history of caricature and the cartoon since the Renaissance has been determined, in large part, by technological innovations, shifts in marketing and audience composition, the impact of the political climate, and the relation between distorted imagery and the dominant aesthetic, or in more materialistic terms, the relation between caricature/cartoon and art that is more prestigious and commands the highest prices.

The impact of these factors is evident in the career and art of Honoré Daumier. Lithography, a new printing technique invented in 1798, allowed Daumier to express himself with immediacy, drawing directly on the stone rather than relying on an engraver as intermediary. The existence of publications devoted solely to caricature and the cartoon provided an outlet, and Daumier's gifted publisher, Charles Philipon, was instrumental in developing a large urban audience for caricature with his journal La Caricature. Philipon was himself a caricaturist and created the famous image of metamorphosis in which the portrait of the king is gradually transformed into a pear. As poire, the word for pear, is also French slang for fat-

head, both the publisher and his artists became the targets of hostile governmental action, with Daumier imprisoned in 1832 for satirizing Louis-Philippe as Gargantua, a giant figure defecating titles and honors. For 13 years after the censorship laws of 1835 were passed and the punishment for caricaturing the king became too severe, political caricature went underground. Philipon ordered La Caricature to be liquidated but continued with a new publication, Le Charivari, in which politics ostensibly played no part. In actuality, the new journal satirized by indirection, with the whole society under attack, if not Louis-Philippe himself.

The relation between caricature/cartoon and the dominant art style is evident in Daumier's lithograph Fight Between Schools: Idealism and Realism. In this cartoon confrontation, "Realism" is portrayed as a sturdy looking painter with a stubborn expression. He wears workman's clothes and plain wooden shoes and brandishes a large, utilitarian-looking paintbrush as his weapon. "Idealism," his lanky and bespectacled opponent, is naked like a Greek statue, wears a pseudoantique helmet on his head, and uses his maulstick as a spear and his palette as a shield. Caricature and the cartoon were at odds with the academic standards that dominated in the official Salon in France, and as a countermovement they played a significant role in breaking its hold on artists. Writing as a participant in this period, Guillaume Apollinaire said, "You will realize later that the spirit of caricature has played an important part in the development of modern art." And in 1882, Vincent van Gogh wrote to his brother Theo, "Daumier may be the father of us all."

The freedom to distort and exaggerate, to break with convention, were old options kept alive by the cartoonist and the caricaturist throughout the long period when the idealized art of the academy was dominant. Daumier's lithographs demonstrated the artistic and communicative power of distortion and exaggeration. Furthermore, the enthusiastic response of important writers such as Charles Beaudelaire and the historical perspective supplied by Jules Champfleury in his volumes on caricature, in which he demonstrated that these less prestigious arts have a history that goes back to antiquity and illustrious forebears such as Bruegel, all served to loosen the bonds of academic art and encouraged artists to move in new directions.

Many artists benefited from this liberating influence, and Claude Monet was not alone in creating caricatures at an early stage in his career. At age 23, Swiss artist Paul Klee also profited from the experience of using caricature to violate stylistic norms. Klee devoted the years 1903–1905 to executing a group of 15 prints that he referred to in his diary as "sour" or "severe." In these prints Klee used the standard weapons of caricature—exaggeration and distortion—to attack the bourgeois sensibility and puritanical smugness he found in his hometown, Bern, and to come to terms with the "great humiliation of the apprenticeship in Rome," his overwhelming and troubling exposure to classical art during 11 months in Italy. Commenting on his print Virgin in a Tree, with its naked woman, her emaciation and exaggerated angles echoed in the barren, twisted tree where she is perched, Klee wrote, "the lady wants to be something special through virginity, but doesn't cut an attractive figure—critique of bourgeois society.” Looking for “consolation” for his own inferior social position, Klee caricatured two men, naked except for mustache and mutton-chops, exchanging low and obsequious bows in a print entitled Two Men Meet, Each Presuming the Other to be of Higher Rank. Responding with distortion and exaggeration to his artistic humiliation in Italy, Klee caricatured classical figures, and as one of the most innovative artists of the twentieth century, a master at integrating the visual and verbal, Klee used the license of caricature to free himself from social and artistic conventions. Eventually he would write, “I am my own style.”

At the same time that Klee was creating his “sour” prints, Pablo Picasso portrayed himself as a naked, hairy monkey with a brush stuck behind one ear, a pen behind the other, writing below his self-caricature, “Picasso par lui meme, 1903.” In another example, one without text or title, the narrative of the cartoon is generated by the studio situation and the cast of characters. A buxom lady painter, palette in hand, her head thrown back and her brush held meditatively to her mouth, is joined by three male visitors who peer at the abstract painting on her easel, responding with a variety of postures and expressions to this unrecognizable version of the voluptuous nude model lying on the couch behind them. Art and reality, different styles and their reception, the smug artist and the pompous audience, are all targeted in Picasso’s cartoon.

Although the labels caricature and cartoon clearly apply to these two examples by Picasso, they become problematic terms when applied to his portrait Dora Marr Sitting (1939). The artist is expressing his personal point of view, and the face is clearly distorted and exaggerated—Dora’s portrait differs radically from her appearance in a 1936 photograph by Man Ray—but new artistic categories are available to describe the distorted and exaggerated, and in the twentieth century these characteristics are no longer the exclusive province of caricature and cartoon. In the modern era, deviation from perceptual norms has moved from the periphery to the mainstream. Cubism, Expressionism, and Dadaism invaded the traditional territory of the caricaturist and cartoonist early in the century, and in the years after 1963, pop art appropriated specific images, as in Roy Lichtenstein’s painting Whaam! (1963).

Traditionally, caricature and cartoon have served the valuable function of keeping artistic options open, preserving distortion and exaggeration as essential elements in the artistic vocabulary even when they are out of favor for “high” art, functioning as a countermovement to the dominant artistic style and keeping the words “in,” for example, when they were “out” during the dominance of abstract expressionism. Saul Steinberg did not simply integrate words and images in his cartoons, the word becomes the image in such witty examples as WE and THEY, with WE composed of thin, anemic letters and THEY solid and formidable in letters, big, dark, and bold. The art of social criticism is kept alive in caricature and cartoon when it is out of style artistically and under attack politically. The exaggerations and distortions of Mexican muralists José Clemente Orozco and Diego Rivera or an ironic painting such as Jack Levine’s Homecoming, with its caricatures of decadent, ribbon-encrusted generals and pinched socialites, were rarities at a time when social criticism was off-limits for the fine arts and left to the graphic artist, the newspaper, and the magazine.

Caricature and cartoon tend to be identified with the topical and transitory, quick to produce and reproduce, illustration anchored at the level of the particular, rather than a demanding art capable of communicating a universal and profound meaning. It is true that the need to compress and reduce ideas into readily grasped images makes it difficult to represent both sides of an issue or deal with complexities, but this challenge does not prevent caricature and the cartoon from communicating a philosophical position or commenting on profound human problems.

The history of caricature and the cartoon includes Bruegel’s Thin People Eating the Fat, a striking and enduring image of a universal relationship. Klee’s satire of two men bowing in response to social status is as acute an observation now as it was in 1903. Galileo returning to Earth and tiptoeing gingerly through the dozens of bayonets that break through the Earth’s crust is one of Daumier’s most striking inventions, and, like his Dream of the Inventor, with the ghoulish figure of the inventor of the needle gun grinning as he surveys with pride a field of dead stretching to the horizon, it has lost none of its power. The possibility of new wars and the invention of new weapons remains. In a cartoon by Saul Steinberg, a tiny knight in armor, lance at the ready and flag bravely waving, sits astride his galloping horse, flying down a steep slope (indicated with a single, well-placed and precipitous line). This gallant hero is on the verge of success, about to overtake and dispatch a miniature dragon, but behind and above him on the same steep slope, a huge dark ball created with an ominous maelstrom of criss-crossing black lines rolls relentlessly down upon him. Steinberg’s drawing uses the devices of the caricaturist and generates the narrative of cartoon, but the result is a profound and disquieting comment on the hubris of mortals and the precarious human condition.

See also Calumny; Comic; Fools/Folly; Laughter; Physiognomy

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Medieval

Hieroglyph of a Lion and a Gazelle Playing a Game, tomb of Tutankhamen, Eighteenth Dynasty, Cairo, Egyptian Museum

Alexamenos Worshipping His God, anti-Christian graffiti, Rome

John the Grammarian, the Last Patriarch, illuminated manuscript, Khudov Psalter, ninth century, Moscow, Russia, Historical Museum (Codex 129, fol. 51v)

King as an Ape Being Carried by Two Rabbits, manuscript illumination, circa 1302, London, British Museum (Yates Thompson MS 8, fol. 295v)

Ape Doctor Ministering to an Owl, manuscript illumination, early fourteenth century, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé (MS 62, fol. 36v)

Isaac of Norwich and Other Jews, Exchequer Roll, A.D. 1233, London, The Public Record Office

Renaissance

- Michelangelo, Self-Caricature Painting the Sistine Ceiling, pen and ink, 1510, Florence, Italy, Casa Buonarroti
- Schön, Erhard, Martin Luther as Bagpipe Being Played by the Devil, woodcut, 1521, London, British Museum
- Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Thin People Eating Fat, oil on wood, circa 1567, Copenhagen, Denmark, Nationalmuseum
- Carracci, Agostino, A Group of Priests, drawing, circa 1590, Windsor Castle, England

Seventeenth Century

- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Caricature of a Gentleman, pen and ink drawing, after 1632
- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Cassiano del Posso, pen and ink drawing, circa 1640, private collection
- Ghezzi, Pierleone, Chevalier de Bacqueville, pen and ink drawing, 1725, private collection
- Ghezzi, Pierleone, Cardinal Granacci, pen and ink drawing, after 1740, private collection

Eighteenth Century

- Hogarth, William, Characters and Caricature, engraving for subscription ticket for his print series Marriage à la Mode, 1743
- Rowlandson, Thomas, Vauxhall Gardens, pen and ink drawing with watercolor over pencil, 1784, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
- Rowlandson, Thomas, Box Lobby Loungers, pen and ink with watercolor over pencil, 1785, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- Gillray, James, An Excrescence; A Fungus; Alias a Toadstool Upon a Dunghill (Caricature of William Pitt), etching, 1791, London, British Museum
- Goya, Francisco, There They Go, Plucked; Of What Will He Die, 1799, from Los Caprichos, Madrid, Prado

Nineteenth Century

- Gillray, James, Plum Pudding In Danger, etching, 1805
- Cruikshank, George, Monstrosities, series of eight etchings, circa 1816
- Philippon, Charles, Louis Philippe as a Pear, from Le Charivari, pen and ink, 1831
- Daumier, Honoré, Louis Gargantua, from La Caricature, 1831, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France
- Daumier, Honoré, The Legislative Belly, from L'Association Mensuelle, lithograph, 1834
- Daumier, Honoré, Ratapoil, bronze statuette, 1850, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Gallery
- Monet, Claude, Cinq Personages, pencil and gouache, circa 1858, Paris, Musée Marmottan
- Monet, Claude, Caricature of Jules Didier, circa 1859, charcoal drawing, Chicago, Art Institute
- Nast, Thomas, A Group of Vultures Waiting for the Storm to "Blow Over"—"Let Us Prey", wood engraving for Harper's Weekly, September 23, 1871
- Nast, Thomas, The Brains of the Tweed Ring, wood engraving for Harper's Weekly, October 21, 1871

- Nast, Thomas, Jewels Among Swine, wood engraving for Harper's Weekly, June 13, 1874
- Toulouse-Lautrec, Henri, Yvette Guilbert, lithograph, 1894

Twentieth Century

- Picasso, Pablo, Self-Portrait as a Monkey, pen and ink drawing, 1903, Barcelona, Spain, Museo Picasso
- Klee, Paul, Two Men Meet, Each Presuming the Other to be of Higher Rank, etching, from Sour series, 1903
- Grosz, George, And a Little Child Shall Lead Them, pen and ink, 1934–1935
- Thurber, James, The Seal Barks, from The Thurber Carnival
- Levine, Jack, Homecoming, oil on canvas, 1946, Brooklyn, New York, Brooklyn Museum
- Picasso, Pablo, The Woman Painter, wash drawing, 1954, Paris, Galerie Louise Leiris
- Lichtenstein, Roy, Whaam!, magna on two canvas panels, 1963, London, Tate Gallery
- Hirschfeld, Al, David Merrick as Santa Claus, drawing for Unlikely Casting series, for Playbill, pen and ink, 1964

Further Reading

- Bryant, Mark and Simon Heneage, Dictionary of British Cartoonists and Caricaturists, 1730–1980, Hants, England: Scolar Press, 1994; Brookfield, Vermont: Ashgate, 1994
- Caricature and Its Role in Graphic Satire*, Exhibition Catalog, Providence, Rhode Island: Brown University and Museum of Art and Rhode Island School of Design, 1971
- Cébe, Jean Pierre, La Caricature et la Parodie dans le monde roman antique des origines à Juvenal, Paris: E. de Boccard, 1966
- Champfleury (Jules Fleury), Histoire de la caricature antique, Paris: E. Dentu, 1879
- _____, Histoire de la caricature au Moyen Age et sous la Renaissance, Paris: E. Dentu, 1875
- _____, Histoire de la caricature sous le reform et la ligue, Paris: E. Dentu, 1880
- _____, Le musée secret de la caricature, Paris: E. Dentu, 1888
- Comini, Alexandria, "All Roads Lead (Reluctantly) to Bern: Style and Source in Paul Klee's Early 'Sour' Prints," Arts Magazine (September 1977)
- Corrigan, Kathleen Anne, Visual Polemics in the Ninth-Century Byzantine Psalters, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Cuno, James, ed., French Caricature and the French Revolution, 1789–1799, Chicago and Los Angeles: University of Chicago Press, 1988
- Donald, Dina, The Age of Caricature: Satirical Prints in the Reign of George III, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1996
- Farwell, Beatrice, The Charged Image: French Lithographic Caricature, 1816–1846, Santa Barbara, California: Santa Barbara Museum of Art, 1989

- Feaver, William, Masters of Caricature from Hogarth and Gillray to Scarfe and Levine, New York: Knopf, 1981; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1981
- George, Mary Dorothea, English Political Caricature: A Study of Opinion and Propaganda, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1959
- Ghezzi, Pier Leone, Catalogue of Drawings by Pier Leone Ghezzi, Rome, 1674-1755, London: Sotheby Parke Bernet, 1979
- Gombrich, Ernst Hans, "The Experiment of Caricature," in Art and Illusion: A Study in the Psychology of Perception, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1972
- , "The Mask and the Face: The Perception of Physiognomic Likeness in Life and in Art," in Art, Perception and Reality, Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1972
- , "The Cartoonist's Armoury," in Meditations on a Hobby Horse, London and Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1963
- Grandville (Jean Ignace Isidore Gérard), Grandville's Animals: The World's Vaudeville, London: Thames and Hudson, 1981
- Grosz, George, Ecce Homo, New York: J. Brussel, 1966; London: Methuen, 1967
- Hannoosh, Michele, Beaudelaire and Caricature: From the Comic to Modernity, University Park: Pennsylvania University Press, 1992
- Hayes, John T., The Art of Thomas Rowlandson, Alexandria, Virginia: Exhibition and Publication of Arts Service International, 1990
- Hill, Draper, Mr. Gillray, the Caricaturist, London and Greenwich, Connecticut: Phaidon, 1965
- Hirschfeld, Al, The American Theatre as Seen by Hirschfeld, New York: G. Braziller, 1961
- Hofmann, Werner, Caricature from Leonardo to Picasso, New York: Crown, 1957
- Horn, Maurice, ed., World Encyclopedia of Cartoons, New York: Gale Research, 1980
- Kunzle, David, "Goethe and Caricature: From Hogarth to Topffer," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes XLVIII (1985)
- , History of the Comic Strip, circa 1450-1825, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973; Oxford: University of California Press, 1990
- Lucie-Smith, Edward, The Art of Caricature, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1981
- Lynch, Bohun, A History of Caricature, London: Faber and Gwyer, 1926; Boston: Little, Brown, 1927
- Nicoll, Allardyce, Masks, Mimes and Miracles: Studies in the Popular Theatre, London: G. C. Harrap, 1931
- Patten, Robert L., George Cruikshank's Life, Times and Art, Rutgers, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1995
- Paulson, Ronald, Hogarth's Graphic Works: First Complete Edition, 2 vols., New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1965
- Randall, Lilian M. C., Images in the Margins of Gothic Manuscripts, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966
- Rosenberg, Harold, ed., Saul Steinberg, New York: Knopf, 1978
- Shikes, Ralph E. and Steven Heller, The Art of Satire: Painters as Caricaturists and Cartoonists from Delacroix to Picasso, New York: Pratt Graphics Center and Horizon Press, 1984
- Wechsler, Judith, "The Issue of Caricature," Art Journal 43:4 (Winter, 1983)
- , A Human Comedy: Physiognomy and Caricature in Nineteenth-Century Paris, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982; London: Thames and Hudson, 1982
- Wark, Robert R., Drawings by Thomas Rowlandson in the Huntington Collection, San Marino, California: Huntington Library, 1975
- Wilkinson, Richard H., Reading Egyptian Art: A Hieroglyphic Guide to Ancient Egyptian Painting and Sculpture, London: Thames and Hudson, 1992
- Victoria and Albert Museum, English Caricature, 1620 to the Present: Caricaturists and Satirists, their Art, their Purpose and their Influence, Catalog of an exhibition, London: Victoria and Albert Museum, 1984

CHOICE/CHOOSING

Elizabeth Powers

The following iconographic narratives and subjects are included in the discussion of the theme Choice/Choosing:

ADAM AND EVE

SAINTS

JUDGMENT OF PARIS

LAST JUDGMENT

THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN

MISCELLANEOUS

THE CHOICE OF HERCULES

BETWEEN VICE AND

VIRTUE

Annibale Carracci, Hercules at the Crossroads (The Choice of Hercules), circa 1596, painting, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionali di Capodimonte. (Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

The necessity and the unforeseeable consequences of the choices humans make are manifest in two tales that have supplied the subject matter for countless works of art for more than 2,000 years. Among the first on this theme in the recorded history of art is the judgment of Paris. The handsomest of mortal men, Paris is asked to judge which goddess, Hera (Juno), Athena (Minerva), or Aphrodite (Venus), can claim the golden apple inscribed with the words "To the Fairest." Each goddess tries to bribe Paris, Hera with greatness, Athena with success in battle, and Aphrodite with the world's most beautiful woman for his wife. Recounted in the Cypria, a lost eighth-century b.c. poem in an epic cycle, the story is first depicted on a Spartan comb from the seventh century B.C. (although there is disagreement about whether Paris actually holds an apple in his extended left hand). His award of the apple to Aphrodite (Venus) is a choice for love, for beauty, and for all that is positively associated with them (as opposed to the onerous duties that accompany the prizes offered by Athena and Hera). But as Sigmund Freud has suggested in an analysis of stories that revolve around the choice of three objects, such choices can be interpreted as instances of reaction formation: in love we feel we overcome death. Yet the spontaneous free choice of Paris, the disguised shepherd, is actually a choice for necessity; in his case the destiny proclaimed for him, and that he cannot elude, is death, the one matter in which humans have no choice. In the ensuing Trojan War his entire race, aside from a few remnants, is destroyed.

Although the judgment of Paris is not among the famous subjects of painting the Roman author Pliny discusses, the scene is represented in Greek vases, on surviving Pompeian frescoes, in countless medieval illustrations, and in Renaissance and Baroque paintings and drawings. In these representations the goddesses usually form a group separate from Paris, as in Lucas Cranach's painting, with Mercury (messenger of the gods but also weigher of souls) standing in the center or separate from the other figures. This grouping of three females and Paris's choice of the third goddess suggest other classical themes and the interpenetration of notions concerning life and death: the three Graces, the Horae (representatives of the Earth's cycle of blooming and dying, varying three or four in number), and the Moirai (divinities of the duration of human life). Atropos, the third of the Moirai, as Freud has pointed out, represents the fate that cannot be avoided, that is, death.

The golden apple that Paris bestows disrupted the wedding feast of Thetis and Peleus when it was tossed into the gathering by Eris, the goddess of discord, in revenge for not being invited to the celebration. These motifs of the reward of an apple, discordant enmity, and the rupturing of nuptial harmony are also present in the biblical account of the serpent's temptation of Eve in the Garden of Eden. That the fruit, unspecified as to species in the Bible, came to be regarded as an apple is further evidence of a buried relationship between this subject and the judgment of Paris. Affected by the serpent's eloquence, Eve freely chooses to disobey God's injunction not to eat of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. This act is also a choice for death, but in an exceedingly profound sense, because this event serves to explain a change in the entire moral character of the human race. In a state of perfect innocence, the first sin was committed, an act that illuminates the nature of free will, a cornerstone of Christian (and for the most part Western) thinking: While humans are able to discern the good, their capacity for choice of action also means that frequently they will choose evil (regression to the original darkness). Although his choice affected his world, decimating an entire generation, Paris was an individual man, the son of a king masquerading as a shepherd. Adam and Eve, however, symbolize humans in general, and their choice is the initiating act within a framework of sin (millennia of wars and other evils of the human race) and redemption (in which a major role is played by Jesus, who is often represented and referred to as a shepherd, sent to Earth by his father, the king of heaven).

The earliest representation of the fall in art (a third-century catacomb), which becomes the most standard configuration and which also suggests parity in the matter of choosing to sin, depicts the figures of Adam and Eve standing on either side of the tree, covering their genitals. It also suggests their loss of innocence, one of the effects of which is the radical separation of male and female, strongly emphasized by the depiction of Adam and Eve in separate altar panels (for example, that by Hans Memling, 1490). In a variation, Adam and Eve stand at the left side of the tree with the serpent to the right (very occasionally this is reversed), which seems to represent an earlier moment in the biblical story in which the couple are still united. This schema has the effect of highlighting Eve's role: for instance, in Hugo van der Goes's panel (circa 1470), she has obviously eaten from the fruit she holds in her right hand while plucking another one toward which Adam extends his left hand. Paul Gauguin worked extensively on the theme of the fall, focusing on Eve, but an interpretation is problematic in that his works occur in the modern period.

The configuration in which Adam and Eve stand separated on either side of the tree also expresses in visual terms the state of isolation in which an individual exists as a result of the exercise of free will. The figure of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane, his human nature struggling with his divine nature, has become a profound expression of the terror humans undergo when faced with stark alternatives or in the face of death. Terrified by the excruciating vision of his Passion (Matthew 26:36-46; Mark 14:32-42; Luke 22:39-46), Christ seeks to be relieved of the burden of suffering. Painters of this scene concentrate on the frail, isolated figure of Christ, on his knees, in prayer to God (as depicted by Giovanni Bellini and Andrea Mantegna). The garden is starkly different from the paradisiacal garden, but, in a mirroring of Eve's choice of the tree, we know Christ will choose the cross. Christ's isolation is usually further emphasized by the figures of the three disciples placed at a distance.

The model of the suffering Christ is the source for the paintings of martyr saints that proliferated in the Middle Ages. Some depict a saint confronted with a choice, for example Bernardino Fungai's painting of Catherine of Siena (born in a later age, she could not be a martyr and was thus a stigmatic) in which Christ offers her the choice of the crown of thorns over a crown of gold; but most seem to ascribe avant la lettre to philosopher Gotthold Ephraim Lessing's view that visual artists must pick not the climactic moment but the one that gives the imagination of the viewer the freest rein. They show instead the outcome of having chosen to be a Christian and to mimic Christ's suffering (the many paintings of Catherine wearing the crown of thorns or scenes of saints starkly isolated from the crowd of their tormenters/executioners, as in Masaccio's or Michelangelo's Crucifixion of St. Peter). In addition to portraying individuals (depicted, for instance, by their specific attributes and characteristics) who have pursued their voluntary choice to its limit, they also present the most extreme vision of the belief that the choices one makes in the here and now have enormous consequences on the fate of one's soul in the hereafter.

The Jewish concept of election, by which the children of Israel were chosen by God for a particular destiny with Him, was transformed by the early Christians from a biological community into a community of the faithful, who were distinguished by their obedience to the call of Christ. Representations of the parable of the sheep and goats (Matthew 25:31–46) are found during the fourth to seventh century in the Christian West, while the format of scenes of the Last Judgment, at which Christ chooses those to join him in heaven, those who have made the right choices in life, arose in the eighth and ninth centuries. Depictions in the West, especially on church facades and in frescoes (for example, by Giotto, Michelangelo, Nicola Pisano), do not follow a strictly defined schema (as in Byzantine representations of the scene), but in all of them Christ reigns in individual splendor (rarely with Mary, although Francesco Traini's fresco in the Campo Santo in Pisa, Italy, is an exception). He judges the good and the bad at his feet, who are dispatched to their respective territories, the issue of choice having become moot. This large and central image of Christ the Judge is radically different from that of Paris the judge, for Christ is the ultimate arbiter over life and death. Being a judge is a godlike activity, and Paris's presumption to judge the merits of goddesses was rewarded in the way of most presumptions against divinities.

In between the initial choice of humankind's first parents and the final judgment of humankind lies a journey. Because it is a toilsome route, as God foretold it would be when He cast Adam and Eve from the garden (occasionally mirroring Christ's suffering), humans will continuously exercise their free will and make choices that are detrimental to their souls. This journey was quite literally depicted in the Middle Ages in illustrations accompanying literary accounts of Christian spiritual pilgrimages (as in the many manuscripts of Guillaume de Deguileville's Pèlerinage de la vie humaine and Pèlerinage de l'âme). Aside from the Christian symbolism of their essentially sinful natures, these portrayals are also expressive of what it is to be human in the world—to choose, to act, whether for good or bad, and most often to err. The essential humanity of the notion of choice is addressed in Renaissance depictions of the theme of Hercules at the crossroads, which transforms the Christian pilgrim beset at every turn by a new temptation, the least significant of which possesses relevance within the scheme of a divine plan, into an individual faced with the ethical-moral choice between the path of virtue and the path of vice.

The literary basis for the story is the fourth-century B.C. account by Xenophon of a dialogue between Socrates and Aristippus. To Aristippus's rejection of the active life because of the amount of sacrifice required of those who would be rulers, Socrates counters that the voluntary choice of self-abnegation brings rewards that outweigh the momentary satisfaction of personal desires. He offers as an example the case of Hercules who, while meditating as a youth at a crossroad concerning the path he should follow in life, was approached by two statuesque female figures. The rather importunate figure of Happiness, also called Vice, tries to seduce him with visions of a short and easy road, enjoying all the sweets of life while profiting from the toil of others. Soft-spoken Virtue represents to Hercules a life of labors and of deeds, of which the labors will train the body to become the servant of the mind, while the deeds will reap for him the esteem of gods and mortals. This moral tale found no representations among the many devoted to the labors of Hercules in antiquity and none in the Middle Ages (it was known from the account in Cicero's On Duties), despite its obvious didacticism. After all, Christians did not choose their directions in life.

The earliest depictions of Hercules at the crossroads (traced by art historian Erwin Panofsky to the mid-fifteenth century) show him standing between two female figures who grasp his arms as if to pull him in their direction. What Panofsky has termed the canonical version of the theme is represented by Annibale Carracci's painting (1595), the summation of several generations of works on this theme, which fuses the seated pose of the judgment of Paris with a standard symmetrical composition: a nude and muscular Hercules, facing forward, seated on a rock in an attitude of intense concentration (one can't help seeing echoes of this figure in Rodin's Thinker), is framed by two standing females dressed in flowing robes, urging on him their courses of action. The figure on the left points to the rocky and mountainous terrain that is standard to the path of virtue, which is offset by the poet laureate at her feet as well as Pegasus atop the rocky mount, both indications of the fame that awaits Hercules on that route. The figure on the right, her back to the viewer, is surrounded by symbols of Voluptas (Pleasure): masks, playing cards, musical instruments.

Panofsky has also pointed out the similarity between Carracci's composition and the Hesperides relief in the Villa Albani, which was still in fragments in the seventeenth century. This relief portrays three figures, two Hesperidean maidens in profile, one on either side of a seated Hercules. This placement of the two figures seems uncannily to foreshadow the later Christian compositions with Adam and Eve on either side of the tree; in addition, the relief depicts the dragon guardian of the Hesperidean garden as a snake winding around the tree that towers above Hercules. From this Attic relief to Joseph Mallord

William Turner's 1806 painting Goddess of Discord is a long jump; although there is no suggestion in the classical sources that the goddess of discord chose the apple of contention in the paradisiacal Hesperidean garden, Turner's painting linking the fall of Troy and the biblical fall underlines the persistence and relationship of these motifs. Indeed, the tree behind Carracci's seated Hercules, although without the snake, seems a ghostly echo of this relationship.

As the scale of themes appropriate to art was considerably widened in the course of the early modern period, so the hold of the Christian Church over the daily life and minds of humans lessened. If the notion of original sin posited that one's moral state was affected before one's own free choice, the figure of Hercules was a new paradigm. His choice did not involve a metaphysical struggle between good and evil (the narrow gate of life and the broad gate of destruction) but was that of a human who was innately virtuous and who could rationally distinguish between virtue and vice and act as the judge of his own fate. One can't help feeling, however, to return to Paris, that an element of wishful thinking was involved in this glorification of an image so strongly associated with earthly deeds, fame, and physical valor. Although Hercules is human, his twelve labors, an act of redemption for killing his children, also represent death struggles from which he emerges victorious (the Hesperidean apples, in any case, were regarded in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries as potions for attaining immortality), and after his death he is deified. Does this suggest the wish that, for the manly, heroic figure, the most human of acts—choosing—does not lead down the road to death? (The matter of Hercules is further complicated by the fact that he is also a man enslaved by a woman, the Lydian queen Omphale, not to mention that his death is caused by his earthly wife.)

The ethical-moral dimension of Hercules' choice is not always so strongly in evidence in works by other painters of the Renaissance and Baroque periods. The gorgeous textural realism of Veronese transforms the ethical opposites into a choice between alternate ways of life, while Nicolas Poussin's classical composition seems to free the subject from all moral associations. Sir Joshua Reynolds's 1762 portrait Garrick Between Tragedy and Comedy becomes a parody of the notion of choice. Although the number of artists in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries who resorted to such traditional subject matter is significant, it is clear that, with the transposition of the intelligible order of Christianity into moral terms in the early modern period, something significant has been lost. The figure of Christ, for instance, can be seen as a metaphor for suffering humanity (as depicted in works by Édouard Manet and Paul Gauguin) but no longer as a figure who will inspire us to reflect on our own essential darkness and to choose the path that will restore us to wholeness; Hercules has even shed his moral associations and has been reduced to a strongman.

One cannot state that such a basic human issue as choice has been lost to the visual arts, but it appears in a new way. The intellectual and literary current of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries illuminating this best is existentialism. The basic concerns of existentialist thought—the singular individual in the here and now, human freedom, human responsibility—are also those of the subjects examined so far in this article. Yet what separates Hercules or Adam and Eve from the isolated individuals in works from Fyodor Dostoyevsky to Max Frisch is the sense of anguish and abandonment of the latter. Distinguishing ourselves as humans means making committed choices, as demonstrated in Martin Heidegger's philosophy and in Albert Camus's novels; to choose means to recognize a value. A vast body of existentialist literature, starting with Søren Kierkegaard, reflects the frequent failure of rational and not so rational human beings to acknowledge such a value and to achieve a self-consistency that was once provided by a body of moral precepts. A modern exemplar of isolated, suffering humanity, say a figure standing on a bridge (the road of life again) in a painting by Edvard Munch, hears no response from God but stares dumbly and desperately at his own troubled reflection in the water below him, finding no certainty in that abyss. The paintings by Munch that show a group of girls clustered together on a bridge seem particularly apt in this connection in that the range of activity and, thus, the range of choice traditionally available to women have been circumscribed. The girls in this work seem literally caught at the crossroads, facing toward the home they have left behind. The choice of going forward seems clear. But the choice will not lead them to certain damnation or to certain salvation, only to an uncertain future signaled by the road that weaves so precariously out of the picture frame.

See also Journey/Flight; Path/Road/Crossroads; Temptation; Virtue/Virtues

Selected Works of Art

Adam and Eve

Adam and Eve, end of third century, Rome, Catacomb of SS. Marcellino e Pietro

Creation of Eve—Temptation and Fall, ivory plaque, late eleventh century, Salerno, Italy, Cathedral, Museo Del Duomo

Memling, Hans, Adam and Eve, outer wings of Johannes Altar, 1490

van der Goes, Hugo, Adam and Eve, left wing of diptych, circa 1470, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Dürer, Albrecht, The Fall of Man, engraving, B1 (108), 1504

Gauguin, Paul, Adam and Eve, 1902, Charlottenlund, Denmark, Ordstrupgaardsamlingen

Judgment of Paris

Judgment of Paris, ivory comb from Sparta, seventh century B.C., Athens, Greece, National Art Gallery and Alexander Soutzos Museum

Judgment of Paris, Roman wall painting from Pompeii, first century, Naples, Italy, National Museum

Lefevre, Raoul, Recueil des Histoires de Troie, illuminated manuscript, fifteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (MS.fv. 22552, fol. 214v)

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, The Judgment of Paris, tempera and oil on wood, circa 1528, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Rubens, Peter Paul, The Judgment of Paris, oil on canvas, 1639, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Pierre-August Renoir, The Judgment of Paris, oil on canvas, 1914, Hiroshima, Japan, Hiroshima Museum

Sargent, John Singer, Judgment of Paris, part of mural series, 1916–1921, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
 Nakian, Reuben, Judgment of Paris, plaster sculpture, four figures, 1963–1966, New York, Egan Gallery
 Seitz, Gustav, Judgment of Paris, bronze relief panel of Porta d'Amore doors, 1965, Hamburg, Germany, Museum für Kunst und Gewerbe

The Agony in the Garden

Bellini, Giovanni, Agony in the Garden, panel, circa 1460, London, National Gallery
 Mantegna, Andrea, Agony in the Garden, panel, circa 1460, London, National Gallery
 Gauguin, Paul, Christ in Garden of Olives, oil on canvas, 1889, West Palm Beach, Florida, Norton Gallery and School of Art

The Choice of Hercules Between Vice and Virtue

Robetta, Cristofano, The Choice of Hercules, etching, late fifteenth century, Vienna, Graphische Sammlung Albertina
 Carracci, Annibale, Hercules at the Crossroads (The Choice of Hercules), painting, circa 1596, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionali di Capodimonte
 Poussin, Nicolas, The Choice of Hercules, canvas, 1637, Stourhead House, Wiltshire, England, The National Trust
 Veronese (Paolo Caliari), Allegory of Virtue and Vice (The Choice of Hercules), circa 1580, New York, Frick Collection de Matteis, Paolo, Choice of Hercules, circa 1714, Leeds, Kent, City Art Gallery and Temple Newsam; engraving by Simon Gribelin II, used as illustration to Lord Shaftesbury's Characteristics of Men, 1714
 West, Benjamin, The Choice of Hercules, oil on canvas, 1764, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Saints

Fungai, Bernardino, Saint Catherine of Siena, predella panel, sixteenth century, Siena, Italy, San Domenico
 Senese, Ignato, Saint Catherine of Siena, seventeenth century, Siena, Italy, Oratorio di Santa Caterina della Notte di Giovane, Palma, Saint Catherine of Siena, seventeenth century, Bergamo, Italy, Accademia Carrara
 Michelangelo, Crucifixion of Saint Peter, fresco, 1545–1550, Vatican, Pauline Chapel
 Masaccio, Crucifixion of Saint Peter, panel, 1426, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

Last Judgment

Last Judgment, fresco, circa 800, Müstair, Switzerland, St. Johann Cathedral
Last Judgment, west portal, circa 1120, Autun, France, Cathedral St. Lazare
Last Judgment, tympanum of south portal, first quarter of thirteenth century, Chartres, France, Chartres Cathedral
 Pisano, Nicola, The Last Judgment, panels on marble pulpit, 1265–1268, Siena, Italy, Cathedral

Giotto, Last Judgment, fresco, after 1305, Padua, Arena Chapel

Traini, Francesco, Last Judgment, fresco, mid-fourteenth century, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santo

Michelangelo, Last Judgment, fresco, 1536–1541, Rome, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Miscellaneous

Hercules and the Hesperides, marble relief, Roman copy of fifth century B.C. Greek work, Rome, Villa Albani

Turner, J. M. W., The Goddess of Discord Choosing the Apple of Contention in the Garden of the Hesperides, canvas, 1806, London, Tate Gallery

Reynolds, Joshua, Garrick Between Tragedy and Comedy, 1760–1761, Rushbrooke, England, Lord Rothschild Collection

Guilhelmine Benoist, Marie, Innocence Between Virtue and Vice, oil on canvas, 1790, St. Benin d'Azy, S. A. S. La Princesse Leopold de Cröy Soire

Kauffmann, Angelica, The Artist Hesitating Between the Arts of Music and Painting, circa 1794, Nostell Priory, collection of Lord St. Oswald

Vedder, Elihu, The Soul Between Doubt and Faith, 1887, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Museum

Munch, Edvard, Girls on the Bridge, canvas, 1905, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf-Richartz-Museum

Further Reading

Chew, Samuel Claggett, The Pilgrimage of Life, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1962

Clairmont, Christopher, Das Parisurteil in der antiken Kunst, Zurich, Switzerland: Im Selbstverlag des verfassers, 1951

Cooper, Anthony Ashley, 3rd Earl of Shaftesbury, "A Notion of the Historical Draught, or Tablature of the Jugment of Hercules," in Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1714), Farnborough, England: G. Richards, 1968

Damisch, Hubert, Judgment of Paris, Chicago: University Chicago Press, 1996

Freud, Sigmund, "The Theme of the Three Caskets," in The Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, London: Hogarth Press, 1953

Kirschbaum, Engelbert and Wolfram Braufels, eds., Lexicon der Christlichen Ikonographie, Rome: Herder, 1968

New Catholic Encyclopedia, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1967

Panofsky, Erwin, Hercules am Scheidewege und andere antike Bildstoffe in der neueren Kunst, Leipzig, Germany: B. G. Teubner, 1930

Roscher, Wilhelm Heinrich, Ausführliches Lexikon der griechischen und römischen Mythologie, Leipzig, Germany: B. G. Teubner, 1897–1902

Scherer, Margaret R., The Legends of Troy in Art and Literature, New York: Phaidon, 1963

Xenophon, Memorabilia, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1968; London: Heinemann, 1968

COMIC

Barry Wind

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Comic:

ANTIQUE

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

BAROQUE

EIGHTEENTH–TWENTIETH CENTURY

Annibale Carracci, Butcher Shop, circa 1582, painting, Oxford, Christ Church.
(Courtesy of Villani & Figli, Bologna, Italy)

In his seminal study on the comic mode, Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious (1905), Sigmund Freud remarked on “comic pleasure” and its effect, laughter. Freud did not consider art in his exegesis on laughter, but the continual interest in rousing comic pleasure informs images from antiquity to the present. The terrain is vast, but the various manifestations of the comic in the visual arts share several common threads: caricature, distortion and the grotesque, parody, visual wit achieved through odd or playful combinations, and corollaries to comic literature. These various types are unified by a sense of incongruity. Parody, in which an image mocks something held in esteem, is clearly allied to this conceit. Similarly, visual wit achieved through unexpected combinations and visual puns, sometimes salacious, rely on the juxtaposition of incongruous elements. The interdependence of comic art and comic literature also has incongruity as its fulcrum. Comic literature and comic art resonate with themes that revolve around this paradigm: lustful old people, quack physicians, and hedonistic clerics.

Ancient Greek and Roman artists made forays into all aspects of this comic terrain. At Pompeii and on the Palatine in Rome, for example, comic portrait graffiti prefigure modern caricature. The frequent representations of dwarfs struggling with storks, crocodiles, and hippopotamuses in Pompeian paintings and mosaics emphasize the comic contrast between the frail and deformed humans and their outsize animal adversaries. A witty visual playfulness can also be seen in sculpture and mosaics. In the Hellenistic Hermaphrodite in the Borghese Gallery in Rome, for instance, the viewer is deceived by what appears to be a luscious female nude seen from the back. But approaching and walking around the figure, the viewer discovers—to horror or delight—the sexual ambiguity. The sculptor has played with our expectations and created a humorous jolt. Similarly, the mosaic The Unswept Floor, by Sosos of Pergamum of the third or second century B.C., which survives in a second-century A.D. copy by Heraclitus in the Lateran Museum in Rome, plays upon visual surprise. Here the detritus of a luxuriant banquet—shells, bones, stems—lies illusionistically on the floor. The urge to sweep the remnants away is compelling. The artist has even depicted a mouse attracted to the untidy remains.

The fragility of many antique paintings and the effects of the passage of time regrettably limit knowledge of the extent of comic depictions in this period, but literary sources suggest a lively tradition. Pliny (Natural History, XXXV, 114, 140) notes that Kalates painted “comic subjects,” Kratinos “comic actors,” and the Hellenistic artist Antiphilos depicted the theatrical clown Gryllos. Ktesilocho, a pupil of Apelles, painted a burlesque picture of Zeus, the king of the gods, giving birth to Dionysus, god of wine (Natural History, XXXV, 140). Pliny also characterizes the works of the Roman landscape painter Studius as filled with “infinite humor” (Natural History, XXXV, 116), particularly a scene with men staggering beneath the weight of women, whom they carry through the mud.

If the traces of these artists’ contributions to comic imagery are confined to literary descriptions, the tradition that they embody is more readily accessible in vase painting and the minor arts, where the comic theater provides a rich thematic source for Greek and Roman artists. The farce supplies a number of examples. In an early sixth-century B.C. Corinthian vase in the National Museum in Athens, for instance, Dionysus, Zeus, and Hephaestus (the god of fire) are mocked. They sport exaggerated comic features and wear comic theatrical costumes, visible phalli, and padded jerkins. The phylakes, vases of the fourth and third century B.C. produced in southern Italy, continue the theatrical mode of parody. Hercules, derived from the burlesques of the playwright Rhinthon, was among the favorite targets. In a vase now in St. Petersburg, Russia, the gluttonous Hercules snatches sacrificial food away from an impotent Zeus. On another vase, in Centuripe, Italy, the macho Hercules is startled by an unveiling woman. Phylakes vases also illustrated comic scenes that had their point of departure in daily life. A miser beset by thieves, a theme later used by Plautus in the Aulularia, is depicted on a vase by Asteas, now in Berlin. A duped farmer is depicted on a vase in St. Petersburg. The comic theater also provides the inspiration for the numerous small terra-cottas of actors produced by Greek and Roman artists. Sicilian comedy supplies depictions of the warrior and the cook (examples are found in Berlin and in Tarentum, Italy). And the parodies of heroes in Attic old comedy find their counterpart in burlesque statues of Hercules, Odysseus, and Cadmus (examples are in Berlin; the Louvre in Paris; and Munich, Germany). The Roman comic masks of the Atellan farce, with its grotesque types, the clownish yokel Maccus, and the priapic Pappus, may be a source for later caricature.

For all the delight that these comic pieces brought, however, comedy was viewed as a lesser form of expression. Accordingly, Aristotle distinguished comedy from tragedy by comparing tragedy to the works of the elevated painter Polygnotos and comedy to those of the more humble genre painter Pauson. Similarly, Pliny (Natural History, XXXV, 114) differentiated the painters of comic scenes, Kalates and Antiphilos, from other artists because they focused on “small pictures.”

The comic imagery of the Middle Ages is far less extensive. Some amusing misericords feature animals playing musical instruments (for example, a cat with a fiddle in the cathedral in Hereford, England), monkeys robbing a peddler (in the cathedral in Manchester, England), and the comic effects of overindulgence (at St. Mary in Fairford, England). Perhaps the depictions of performing animals continue conceits found in antique gems where animals also were given anthropomorphic qualities, whereas the other images probably have didactic implications. Indeed, the monkey and peddler motif survives into the Renaissance and is found, for example, in a satiric 1582 engraving by Pieter Bruegel the Elder. The print carries the admonitory inscription: "And so human finery creates fun for monkeys." Such didacticism would be appropriate for a church setting, but the inclusion of playfully amusing animals (the cat and the fiddle, a goat and a lute) in a sacred setting remains problematic. Perhaps the Aquinian conceit of all things sacred and profane ordered toward God provides some explanation. Miniatures in the margins of Gothic manuscripts also had a comic tenor. These include various representations of apes performing human tasks—a falconer, a sham physician in the late thirteenth-century Cambrai Breviary, and a schoolmaster in the Psalter of Jeffrey d'Aspremont of about 1802. Many other examples of apes in various human guises occur. Clerics also are not free from the humorous bite of the Gothic miniaturist. Dominicans are parodied as dogs in the East Anglian manuscript of Walter de Milemete (circa 1326–1327) and the Roman de la Rose of the mid-fourteenth century. These humorous vignettes, like many of the satiric marginalia, may find their counterparts in the late Gothic fabliaux, moralizing burlesques recited by jongleurs for a predominantly lay audience.

The Renaissance saw an efflorescence of comic depictions both north and south of the Alps. In the north, for example, Hieronymus Bosch was viewed as a new Antiphilos, and his satiric scenes, like the Garden of Delights (circa 1510, at the Prado in Madrid, Spain), were studded with memorable characters. In the Haywain (circa 1490, also in the Prado), Bosch again demonstrated a flair for visual wit, juxtaposing the sack-like shape of the indulgent monk and the sack of hay filled by the nun henchwomen.

Bruegel was viewed as Bosch's legitimate heir. As Bruegel's early seventeenth-century biographer Carel van Mander (Schilderboeck, 1604) writes: "He was often called Pier den Droll. Indeed, there are very few works from his hand that the beholder can look at seriously without laughing." Bruegel's satiric depictions of greed in the manner of Bosch—such as Mad Meg (1562, at the Museum Mayer Van der Bergh in Antwerp, Belgium), where a woman's rapaciousness leads her to the mouth of hell, or the more realistic depiction of the consequences of gluttony in the Land of Cockaigne (1567, in Munich)—confirm van Mander's view. In the Land of Cockaigne, Bruegel also makes use of a visual pun, allying the swollen bodies of the gluttons to the swollen hillside of Cockaigne.

Various types of wit are manifest in many other northern examples. The motif of parodying heroic types is continued by Lucas Cranach's burlesque of the impotence of Hercules in a series of depictions of Hercules and Omphale (from the 1530s, in Gotha, Berlin, Munich, and Brunswick, Germany; and in Lugano, Switzerland). The popular comic theatrical theme of geriatric lust is explored by Cranach in pictures now in Stockholm, Sweden (1532), and Prague, Czech Republic (circa 1530). This theme is also depicted by Quentin Massys (at the National Gallery in Washington, D.C.) and Jan Massys (Stockholm, Sweden) and in comic prints by Israhel van Meckenem (circa 1480) and Albrecht Dürer (1495). Dürer also showed a penchant for visual punning. In his woodcut the Bath House (circa 1496), for example, the artist piquantly camouflaged the body of a male bather with a pump sporting a cock as its spigot. Satiric broadsheets condemning women, tipplers, gamblers, and peasants were produced in abundance.

Italian Renaissance art affords a wide variety of comic imagery ranging from witty visual juxtapositions to parody of the antique gods. The seriousness of Giotto's Marriage at Cana (1305, in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy), for instance, is relieved by the swollen wine jug juxtaposed to the equally swollen wine steward. The sophisticated delight in visual wit and strange juxtapositions is elaborated in the odd constructs of the late sixteenth-century painter Giuseppe Arcimboldi. His depictions of landscapes that suggest human heads and fruit baskets with onion cheeks and a parsnip nose show a witty collision of images much admired by his contemporaries. Mocking images of the antique gods were doubtless attractive to the Italian Renaissance artist and patron. These images range from popular prints—such as Martino Rota's series of pagan deities of about 1580, which featured a misshapen Venus, a warty Narcissus, and a goitered Juno—to depictions by Botticelli, Rosso Fiorentino, and Giulio Romano. In Botticelli's Venus and Mars (Sleeping Mars) (circa 1475, at the National Gallery in London), the god lies soporifically inert beside the languid Venus. A mischievous satyr tries to awaken him, but his arm, lying flaccidly at his crotch, indicates his impotent state. Here we find the counterpart to the witty compromise of Hercules' masculinity in Cranach's representation of the Hercules and Omphale story. Rosso's amusing drawing of Mars and Venus (1530, at the Louvre) similarly presents the effects of emasculation, as Mars is dragged reluctantly before a voluptuous Venus. Giulio Romano's work at the Palazzo del Te in Mantua, Italy, also sportively plays with the image of the gods. In part of the ceiling decoration of the Sala di Psiche (1528), a grace pouring water is accompanied by a urinating putto, who sprinkles the viewer from above. In the Sala dei Giganti (1532–1534) giants tumble about in an echo-chamber environment that evokes the managed terror of an amusement park. But Giulio's wit also extends to the decorative arts, for example, his design for tongs with a duck bill (in the British Museum in London) and to the architecture of the Palazzo del Te (circa 1528) itself. In the garden facade, Giulio uses slipping triglyphs, compromising the solidity of architecture and paralleling the comic instability of the Sala dei Giganti. Because one of the important attributes of the ideal courtier, according to Baldassare Castiglione, was wit, it is not surprising to see a premium placed upon visual wit in scenes created for court patronage.

By the late sixteenth century, the comic in art was clearly defined in theoretical thought. Accordingly, Gabriele Paleotti (Trattato, 1582) described pitture ridicole (ridiculous paintings), pictures of gluttony and dissipation that moved the spectator to laughter. This conceit was elaborated in the seventeenth century by Francisco Pacheco (Arte de la Pintura, 1649) and, by the early eighteenth century, by Dutch theorists Arnold Houbraken and Gerard de Lairese. As in antiquity, however, the comic mode was seen as less elevated than pictures with noble themes (Paleotti; Pacheco; Giulio Mancini, Considerazioni Sulla Pitture, circa 1620). The types of comic painting showing gluttony and dissolution are abundant. Annibale Carracci's Bean Eater (circa 1582, in the Colonna Collection in Rome) and Diego Velázquez's Three Men at a Table (circa 1618, at the Hermitage in St. Petersburg) are two examples. A plethora of such pictures exists north of the Alps. Adriaen Brouwer's Innkeeper (circa 1630, at the Gemäldegalerie in Munich), dominated by a rotund slothful drinker and a companion pig, as well as Jacob Jordaens's various depictions of boisterous drinking parties in the King Drinks (in versions in Brussels, Belgium; Paris; Munich; and Vienna, Austria) epitomize the type.

The comic theater also served as a point of departure for Baroque low-life painters. Characters and plots of the commedia dell'arte were doubtless the source for Annibale Carracci's Butcher Shop (circa 1582, in Christ Church at Oxford University) and Caravaggio's versions of the fortune-teller theme (at the Capitoline Museum in Rome and at the Louvre). Georges de La Tour appropriated commedia dell'arte characters for his Old Man and Old Woman (1620, in San Francisco), and Hendrick Terbrugghen and Jan Steen illustrate the popular comic theme of lubricious old age. Rembrandt van Rijn depicts commedia dell'arte characters in several drawings, and Jacques Callot does a series of prints with commedia characters. The dentist theme, popular north and south of the Alps, also has its roots in the popular comedic theater satirizing quacks; the theme was depicted by Caravaggio, Honthorst, and Steen.

Visual playfulness remains an important substratum in comic representations. Perhaps in emulation of the antique, Annibale Carracci painted a now-lost illusionistic still life that fooled a maid and provoked the uproarious delight of his friends. The punning, salacious allusions in Jan Steen's work—a phallic onion to depict romping lovers and the squeezing of a spigot as a commentary on the marriage of Tobias and Sara—elaborate the conceits of humorous visual metaphor. Steen's comic treatment of this biblical theme demonstrates that the comic is not limited to genre. As in earlier periods, the antique gods are subject to ridicule. Consider, for instance, Velázquez's torpid, sleazy Mars (circa 1640, at the Prado) or Rembrandt's ridiculous Ganymede (1635, in Dresden, Germany), a stocky Dutch brat who urinates while being lifted heavenward. Annibale Carracci views the loves of the gods in a lighthearted and amusing way in his fresco, executed between 1597 and 1604, in the Farnese Gallery in Rome. Decorative ignudi (nude figures) and simulated fragmented antique statuary strain to look at the lovemaking gods. When Venus and Anchises begin their foreplay, a volcano in the background symbolically emits smoke. Portraiture also takes on a humorous cast. Velázquez's portraits of the dwarfs Acedo, Lezcano, and Morra (circa 1638–1644, at the Prado) emphasize their deformity, recalling the antique images of dwarfs and the delight in humorous distortion. Gian Lorenzo Bernini's portrait of Count Paolo Orsini (circa 1638, in a private collection) subverts the all'antica devices of aggrandizement—blank eyes and toga—with a vividly humorous portrayal of a man whose improbable mustache appears to take flight.

There was a lively continuation of the comic tradition in the eighteenth century. The satiric broadsheet as well as comic painting remained popular. English artist William Hogarth fused the two traditions, producing comic pictures and sets of prints derived from them that appealed to a wider audience. His series of progresses—a harlot, a rake, a marriage of convenience—have their immediate roots in eighteenth-century satiric literature, but the visual puns, contrasts of opposites, and often sleazy characters all relate to traditional comic modes. Plate VI of Hogarth's Harlot's Progress (1732) epitomizes these conceits. This image of the harlot's funeral depicts a lecherous churchman comforting a bereaved prostitute in a less-than-clerical way. His wine glass, strategically placed at his crotch, tips and disgorges its contents. Hogarth's use of such puns and humorous contrasts is multiplied easily. James Gillray, Isaac and George Cruikshank, and Thomas Rowlandson follow Hogarth's lead in England, producing witty salvos on the manners and mores of libidinous geriatrics, quack doctors, and estrous women.

On the continent, comic images in the manner of Hogarth were also produced. German artist Daniel Chodowiecki, for example, essayed a life of a rake (1774), a series satirizing the vices and follies of education, gambling, and quack healers. Francisco Goya's Los Caprichos, produced at the close of the eighteenth century, continue the satiric attacks on moral turpitude. His stated aim in the etchings is to depict "the multitude of follies and blunders common in every civil society." The images, related to a seventeenth-century literary text, Francisco de Quevedo's vitriolic Suenos, include such traditional comic themes as the donkey schoolmaster, the deceptive lubricity of women, and the greed and gluttony of churchmen. The last is exemplified by plate 139 of the series, It's Hot. Here, grotesque, almost simian, monks indulge their appetites.

In the nineteenth century, the comic tradition was extended in the print medium by such artists as Honoré Daumier and Johann Heinrich Ramberg. Ramberg's series on Strunk the Upstart (1822–1825) continues the mode of the Hogarthian progress, featuring the amoral, sexually promiscuous Strunk as its antihero. Old visual puns reappear in nineteenth-century guise. Accordingly, in plate V of the series, Ramberg underscores Strunk's sexual potency with a maid pulling on a spigot. Daumier's comic series often take on a political slant. A set of prints of the 1830s devoted to the adventures of Robert Macaire satirizes the greed of venture capitalists and implicitly indicts the government's laissez-faire attitude. In the 1850s, Daumier created Ratapail, a vicious, rodentlike creature who emblemized the supporters of Louis Napoleon. Daumier also did a series in the 1840s that mocked the heroes and heroines of mythology.

Daumier and Ramberg are commonly identified with comic depictions. But even high-minded, serious themes in the nineteenth century suffer the intrusion of comic elements. Consider, for example, Ford Madox Brown's The Last of England (1852, at the City Art Museum and Gallery in Birmingham, England). The forlorn immigrants in the foreground are contrasted to the boy in the lifeboat in the background, his head buried in a pile of vegetables transforming him into a nineteenth-century version of a Giuseppe Arcimboldi. Even a staid artist like Georges Seurat, who freezes his form to approximate the classical gravity of Piero della Francesca, allows visual wit to creep into his work. In La Chahut (1889–1890, at the Rijksmuseum Kröller-Müller in Otterloo, The Netherlands), a man ogling the high-stepping cancan dancers is accompanied by a strategically placed upright flute.

Major artists explore the comic mode in the twentieth century. Pablo Picasso continues the tradition of witty amalgamation in his 1943 Bull's Head (at Galerie Louise Leiria in Paris), a compilation of a bicycle's seat and handlebars that looks like a bull. Salvador Dalí's Lobster Telephone (at the Tate Gallery in London) juxtaposes the base of an actual phone with a lobster receiver, guaranteeing that any phone conversation will be painful. René Magritte's surreal combinatory forms—e.g., The Rape (1934, in the Menil Collection in Houston, Texas)—reminiscent of Arcimboldi, as well as his comic parody of old masters like the Madame Recamier is Dead (1867, at the Hanover Gallery in London), where the sitter of Jacques-Louis David's famous portrait is envisioned as a sarcophagus, demonstrate the persistence of comic motifs.

There are some twentieth-century artistic movements—Dada and pop art—that have the comic as its fulcrum. Dada, founded as an antiart movement in the crucible of World War I, took as its credo: "Dada is against everything, even Dada." The master of this movement, Marcel Duchamp, mocked the Mona Lisa in L.H.O.O.Q. (1918, in a private collection), defiling her with a mustache and suggesting an in-joke about Leonardo's ambiguous sexual orientation. In Bicycle Wheel (original of 1913), Duchamp combined a stool with a bicycle wheel, parodying the futurist concern for machine-age motion, but rendering both products of machine technology useless. The pop artists, elaborating on principles of Dada, borrowed motifs from the banal world of commercial advertising, which they subverted to create witty visual puns and comic juxtapositions. In Richard Hamilton's Just What Is It That Makes Today's Homes So Different, So Appealing (1956, at the Kunsthalle in Tübingen, Germany), a large Tootsie Pop-cum-phallus extends from a Charles Atlas-like bodybuilder. Claes Oldenburg creates giant lipsticks and outside ice cream cones, skewing visual perception of the mundane. Larry Rivers takes up the familiar theme of parodying the old masters in his Greatest Homosexual (1964, at the Hirshhorn Museum in Washington, D.C.), a co-opting of David's portrait of Napoleon. The idea of parody is also featured in Donald Duck Descending a Staircase (1979, at Fischer Fine Art in London). Here we have a new old master, twentieth-century artist Duchamp's Nude Descending a Staircase, transformed by Peter Saul into a multiplicity of Donald Ducks. The serious and the comic touch once again, as an early twentieth-century statement meant to challenge artistic assumptions is traduced, to the cackling amusement of a present-day audience.

Feminist photographer Cindy Sherman similarly presents richly parodic imagery ranging from popular culture to old master allegories. In Untitled Film Still No. 35 (1979), for example, she co-opts the motion picture Two Women, dressing up (or maybe down) as a Sophia Loren-esque peasant. In Untitled No. 131 (1983), she becomes Venus-cum-Bette Midler. Clothed in gold lamé, she covers her pudendum like an antique Venus. Flowers, reminiscent of the flowery shower in Botticelli's Birth of Venus, serve as a background for the figure. Sherman spoke directly to the comic content of these works when she noted: "And there is always me making fun."

See also Caricature/Cartoon; Fools/Folly

Selected Works of Art

Antique

Dionysos, Zeus, Hephaistos, Corinthian vase, early sixth century B.C., Athens, Greece, National Art Gallery and Alexander Soutzos Museum

Burlesque Odysseus, terra-cotta, fifth century B.C., Paris, Louvre

Hercules and Zeus, Phylakes vase, third century B.C., St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Asteas, Miser Beset by Thieves, Phylakes vase, third century B.C., Berlin, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin

Heraclitus, The Unswept Floor, mosaic, second century B.C., Rome, Museo Laterano

Medieval

Ape Physician, manuscript illumination from Cambrai

Breviary, late thirteenth century, Cambrai, France, Bibliothèque Municipale Renaissance Hermitage

Ape Schoolmaster, manuscript illumination from Psalter of Joffroy d'Aspremont, circa 1302, Oxford, Bodleian Library

Cat and a Fiddle, misericord, early fourteenth century, Hereford, England, Cathedral

Sleeping It Off, misericord, late fifteenth century, Fairford, Gloucestershire, England, St. Mary

Renaissance

Botticelli, Sleeping Mars (Venus and Mars), panel, circa 1475, London, National Gallery

Bosch, Hieronymus, Garden of Delights, circa 1510, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Ill-Assorted Lovers, circa 1530, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Fiorentino, Rosso, Mars and Venus, drawing, 1530, Paris, Louvre

Romano, Giulio, Sala dei Giganti, fresco, 1532–1534, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo de Te

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Mad Meg, 1562, Antwerp, Belgium, Museum Mayer van de Bergh

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Land of Cockaigne, 1567, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Arcimboldi, Giuseppe, Still Life, circa 1590, Cremona, Italy, Museo Civico

Baroque

- Caravaggio, Fortune Teller, circa 1585, Paris, Louvre
 Carracci, Annibale, Butcher Shop, circa 1582, Oxford, Christ Church
 Carracci, Annibale, Farnese Gallery, fresco, 1597–1604, Rome, Palazzo Farnese
 La Tour, Georges, Old Man, Old Woman, circa 1620, San Francisco, California, De Young Memorial Museum
 Velázquez, Diego, Mars, circa 1640, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Velázquez, Diego, Portrait of Don Diego de Acedo (El Primo), 1638, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Velázquez, Diego, Three Men at a Table, circa 1618, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Brouwer, Adriaen, Immkeeper, circa 1630, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Ganymede, 1635, Dresden, Germany, Pinakothek
 Steen, Jan, Romping Lovers, circa 1670, Leiden, The Netherlands, Stedelijk Museum 'de Lakenhal'

Eighteenth–Twentieth Century

- Hogarth, William, Harlot's Progress, engraving, 1732
 Chodowiecki, Daniel, Life of a Rake, etching, 1774
 Goya, Francisco, Los Caprichos, aquatint, 1788
 Ramberg, Johann Heinrich, Strunk the Upstart, drawing, 1822–1825, Hanover, Germany, Kestner-Museum
 Daumier, Honoré, Robert Macaire Series, lithographs, 1830s
 Duchamp, Marcel, L.H.O.O.Q., pencil on a reproduction, 1918, private collection
 Dalí, Salvador, Lobster Telephone, 1938, London, Tate Gallery
 Magritte, René, The Rape, 1934, Houston, Texas, Menil Collection
 Picasso, Pablo, Bull's Head, sculpture, 1943, Paris, Galerie Louise Leiris
 Hamilton, Richard, Just What Is It That Makes Today's Homes So Different, So Appealing, collage on paper, 1956, Tübingen, Germany, Kunsthalle
 Saul, Peter, Donald Duck Descending a Staircase, polymer on canvas, 1979, London, Fischer Fine Art
 Sherman, Cindy, Untitled Film Still, number 35, photograph, 1979
 Sherman, Cindy, Untitled, number 131, photograph, 1983

Further Reading

- Alpers, Svetlana, "Realism as a Comic Mode: Low Life Paintings Seen Through Bredero's Eyes," Simiolus 8 (1975)
 Barolsky, Paul, Infinite Jest: Wit and Humor in Italian Renaissance Art, Columbia and London: University of Missouri Press, 1978
 Bieber, Margaret, The History of the Greek and Roman Theater, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1938
 Blum, Andre, L'estampe satirique en France pendant les guerres de religion, Paris: M. Giard and E. Briaire, 1917
 Camille, Michael, Images on the Edge: The Margins of Medieval Art, London: Reaktion, 1992
 George, Dorothy, Hogarth to Cruickshank: Social Chance in Graphic Satire, London: Allen Lane, 1967
 Gudlaugsson, Sturla Jonasson, The Comedians in the Work of Jan Steen and His Contemporaries, Soest, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1975
 Juyneboll, William Rudolf, Het Komische Genre in de italiaansche Schilderkunst gedurende de 17, en de 18, eeuw, Leiden, The Netherlands: N. V. Leidsche uitgeversmadatschappij, 1934 von Lichtenberg, Reinhold, Aber den Humor bei den deutschen Kupferstechern und Holzschnittkünstlern des 16, Jahrhunderts, Strasbourg, France, 1897
 Maeterlinck, Louis, Le genre satirique dans la peinture flamande, Brussels, Belgium: G. van Oest, 1907
 Meijer, B. W., "From Leonardo to Bruegel: Comic Art in Sixteenth-Century Europe," in Word and Image 4 (1988)
 Oeri, Hans Georg, Der Typ der komischen Alten in der griechischen Komodie: Seine Nachwirkungen und seine Herkunft, Basel, Switzerland: B. Schwabe, 1948
 Randall, Lilian M. C., Images in the Margins of Gothic Manuscripts, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966
 Shikes, Ralph E., The Indignant Eye: The Artist as Social Critic in Prints and Drawings from the Fifteenth-Century to Picasso, Boston: Beacon Press, 1969
 Varnedoe, Kurt and Adam Gopnik, High and Low: Modern Art and Popular Culture, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1990
 Wind, Barry, "Pittura Ridicola: Some Late Cinquecento Comic Genre Paintings," Storia dell'Arte 20 (1874)
 Wright, Thomas, A History of Caricature and Grotesque in Literature and Art, London: Birtue Brothers, 1865; New York: G. Olms, 1976

COMMUNION

Valerie (Hutchinson) Pennanen

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Communion:

EARLY CHRISTIAN AND BYZANTINE

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

Chalice of Abbot Suger of Saint-Denis,
French school, circa 1140, sardonyx, gold,
silver gilt, gems, and pearls, Washington,
D.C., National Gallery of Art.
(Courtesy of the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.)

The Christian sacramental meal is known by three names, each of which reflects an important aspect of its origins or character. The term Lord's Supper recalls the fact that the meal was instituted by Jesus Christ himself, as attested to in the three Synoptic Gospels (Matthew 26:26–29, Mark 14:22–24, Luke 22:14–23) and by the apostle Paul (I Corinthians 11:23–26). The word Eucharist is from the Greek word eucharistia (gratefulness, thanksgiving), meaning the response with which Christians are called to receive the sacrament. But it is perhaps the word Communion that most truly sums up the essence of the sacred Christian meal. Communion (from the Latin word communio and the Greek word koinonia) means “sharing.” As such, it refers not only to the act of supping at the Lord’s table but to the act of eating and drinking together—a quintessentially human act that (as anthropologists know) has tremendous power to strengthen old ties and create new ones. It was, after all, in the context of a Passover meal that Jesus first blessed the bread and wine and made his startling pronouncement, “This is my body. . . . This is my blood.” Moreover, Jesus used this occasion not only to foretell his death and the new covenant in his blood, but also to remind his disciples of the kingdom of God in which he (and they) would feast on the new fruit of the vine. Paul and Luke add that Jesus enjoined his disciples to continue sharing bread and wine “in remembrance of me,” which, according to Paul, meant also “proclaiming the Lord’s [sacrificial] death until he comes.”

There is reason to believe that in earliest Christian times Communion was celebrated at the close of the evening agape, or love feast. It perhaps did not become separate from the agape until the mid-second century, when it attached instead to Sunday morning gatherings at which the Word was preached. Even then, the sharing aspect of Communion was not forgotten; the faithful continued for a long time to bring their own bread and wine. But this custom died out with the growth of large congregations in the fourth century, after the faith had been legalized and vigorously promoted by the Roman state. Throughout the early Middle Ages, the concept of Communion as koinonia continued to decline. Eventually it was completely overshadowed—at least in the Latin West—by preoccupation with Christ’s saving death and with the mystical qualities of the sacrament. The monk Paschasius Radbertus was the first to develop the theory of transubstantiation, which he set forth in The Book Concerning the Body and Blood of the Lord (A.D. 833). Although there were many who argued against his view, which held that the body and blood of Christ are literally dispensed in the Eucharist, this belief eventually won out and was made dogma in 1215. In the later Middle Ages, a direct connection began to be seen between human sin and Christ’s Passion and the sacrifice of the mass. . . .

[Thus the Church] acquired a position . . . as a purveyor of Salvation which it had not previously possessed. . . . The practice of elevating the consecrated Host at the mass [i.e., worship service] . . . came into existence. . . . When mass was not being celebrated, the host was displayed in a monstrance. The lay congregation henceforth received bread but no wine at communion. From the time when it was made compulsory to confess before receiving communion, the number of communicants dropped steeply, and it was in the nature of a substitute that the cult of the host and of the holy blood grew up outside the liturgy and was nourished by a belief in the redemptive effects of gazing at the host (ocular communion). (Schiller, pp. 9–11)

The Protestant Reformation brought renewed controversies over Holy Communion. The doctrine of transubstantiation was once again challenged, by Protestants seeing the Lord’s Supper as more of a commemorative feast for believers, hallowed by Christ’s spiritual—but not physical—presence. The reformers also sought to restore wine to its traditional place of importance in the Eucharist and to revive laity Communion; the latter proved such a difficult task that it was not completed until the early twentieth century. Thanks, however, to a series of fervent liturgical movements, both Protestant and Catholic, Communion gradually regained a central place in the life of the church.

Today, despite some lingering disagreement among Christians as to what Communion is, who may administer it, and who may partake of it, churches once again emphasize the sharing aspect of the sacrament and its power to bind people of all races and nations. Communion as universal sharing is the theme of many popular hymns written since the Enlightenment, and of many visual works as well. The annual observance of World Communion Sunday has helped to reaffirm the holiness of meal-fellowship as known to Jesus and his first disciples. All in all, the outlook of twentieth-century Christianity is coming to resemble that expressed in the early church: “As this broken bread was scattered over the mountains and when brought together became one, so let your Church be brought together from the ends of the earth into your kingdom” (Burkhardt, p. 93).

Early Christian and Byzantine Communion Themes

The earliest visual references to Communion are found in catacomb paintings and sarcophagi of the second and third centuries; these depict refrigeria (blessed meals), with an emphasis on mutual sharing and celebration. A particularly striking example is the Breaking of the Bread fresco in the Catacomb of Priscilla in Rome (late second century). Depicted are seven figures, of whom at least four, and possibly all, are female. The central figure—definitely a woman—appears to be breaking bread for the company. All seven persons are ranged behind a sigma (crescent-shaped table) that bears the bread plate, a second plate, and a small, two-handled jug or cup. Whether this work represents a generalized heavenly banquet or an actual Eucharist is uncertain, although the scene's intimate quality—with figures all reclining close together and reaching out to touch one another or the bread—suggests the latter. Another noteworthy portrayal of a blessed banquet with sacramental overtones is in a Christian sarcophagus relief of the late third century, now in the Museo delle Terme in Rome. This time the figures are apparently all male. Three recline close together at an outdoor sigma on which rest three loaves of bread; the banqueter on the right holds a cup. All three extend their right hands across the top of the table, so they almost touch one another. Their facial expressions are gentle and affectionate. At the far left of the scene is a fourth figure, reaching for more bread from a basket on the ground; while at the far right stands a shepherdlike person (the Good Shepherd?) next to an orant (a male or female figure with arms raised at shoulder height in pious supplication).

Curiously, Jesus's Last Supper cannot be recognized anywhere in art before the sixth century. Depictions of other biblical meals, sacrifices, and offerings that may be construed as symbolic references to the Last Supper begin to appear much earlier, however. Because some believe the multiplication of loaves and fishes (John 6) foreshadows the events of the Last Supper, the motif of juxtaposed bread and fish in certain catacomb paintings may well be Eucharistic. Similar meanings were attached to the Old Testament miracles of manna in the wilderness (Exodus 16:4–36; John 6:31–33, 49–51; I Corinthians 10:3) and water from the Rock of Horeb (Exodus 17:5–7; I Corinthians 10:4–5) and to Habakkuk's feeding of Daniel in the lions' den (Bel and the Dragon 33–39), the meal shared by Abraham and the three angels (Genesis 18), and the sacrifices of Abel (Genesis 4), Isaac (Genesis 22), and Melchizedek (Genesis 14:18–20; Psalm 110:4; Hebrews 7). All these events are specifically referred to in Eucharistic prayers of the early church and were portrayed in monumental art from at least the fourth century. Occasionally, the reference to Christ is quite explicit, as in the Melchizedek mosaic (432–440) in the nave of Sta. Maria Maggiore in Rome. Here, as art historian Michael Gough observes, “Melchizedek . . . advances to meet [Abraham] with a basket of loaves. . . . There is a goblet of wine at the high priest's feet and a bearded, Christ-like figure in the sky above.”

Although the chalice, or common cup of blessing, had been central to Eucharistic celebrations from the very start (I Corinthians 10:16, 21), it is not until the early fourth century that the use of elegant, costly Communion vessels is documented. When Roman emperor Diocletian's persecutions reached a Christian community in Cirta (later Constantine), Algeria, the faithful were forced to surrender a collection of silver and gold chalices and silver liturgical dishes (which presumably included patens, or bread plates). Far more impressive, no doubt, were the liturgical vessels housed in old St. Peter's in Rome. A literary source describes a great, jeweled “tower” (perhaps a tabernacle for consecrated bread), above which hovered a golden dove, symbol of the Holy Spirit. Perhaps also from the fourth century—certainly no earlier—is the Antioch Chalice, a large, silver-gilt cup adorned with relief images of Christ, the Gospel writers, and six apostles, all arranged within a dense and elaborate thicket of fruited patens, which—along with various other objects for storing, displaying, and serving the elements—would henceforth be a major specialty in Christian art.

The early Byzantine period saw the creation of two important new Eucharistic subjects in the visual arts. First to appear was the Last Supper, of which the earliest known portrayal is in an early sixth-century nave mosaic at S. Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna, Italy. Christ and his 12 disciples recline together on a single bench, which curves around a sigma. The sigma is draped with a white cloth (henceforth, a standard motif in Last Suppers) and set with half a dozen small loaves and an immense platter of fish; the cup, oddly enough, is missing. Christ, clad in royal purple, reclines at the far left end of the composition. The direction of his eyes and gesture of his raised right hand indicate that he is addressing the company. Directly opposite him reclines Judas, the traitor, his back to the other disciples so that, as iconographer Gertrud Schiller observes, “he has the appearance of a twisted counterpart to Christ.” The remaining 11 figures are tightly packed together behind the sigma; the four closest to Christ look solemnly at him, while the rest turn their accusing gaze toward Judas. A related but slightly more subtle treatment of the Last Supper occurs in a painted miniature in the Codex Purpureus Rossanensis (circa 550–575). In this version, Judas reclines among the faithful, but his eager gesture of reaching into the dish (a massive gold bowl) at the table's center identifies him; so, too, does Christ's arm, outstretched in his direction. The motif of Christ pointing out the traitor (Matthew 26:23) was to become immensely popular in Western art, as did the convention—seen here for the first time—of placing the beloved disciple John next to his Lord's side.

Whereas the Last Supper was destined to be shown quite commonly in both Eastern and Western church art, the second new Eucharistic scene to emerge in the sixth century was for a long time restricted to Byzantium alone. This was the Communion of the apostles, which forms the subject of another miniature in the Codex Purpureus Rossanensis. In the two-page composition, six apostles move to the left to receive bread from the risen Christ, while another six move to the right to receive wine from him (Christ's image is shown twice). Judas, of course, is absent from this scene, having been replaced by Paul. Christ feeds the apostles directly—there is no table or altar—and, although they bow deeply as they move toward him, they also smile as befits the great thanksgiving. Prophets appear below, and accompanying Old Testament texts (written on hanging scrolls) carry references to divinely given bread and wine.

A somewhat more formal treatment of the communing apostles theme can be viewed on the Stuma Paten and the Riha Paten (565–578), which, despite obvious differences in style, are iconographically quite close. In each composition, rendered in relief on a silver-gilt surface, two identical figures of Christ stand behind a draped central altar. They bend outward to dispense bread (on the right) and wine (on the left) to the clustered, bowing apostles. Peter and Paul are first to be served, with bread and wine, respectively. Peter's gesture of holding the bread in his right hand while cupping his left underneath, symbolizing Christ's throne as present in the sacrament, is well worth noting. The gesture was to have a very long liturgical (and iconographic) history in all Christendom.

Most middle and late Byzantine portrayals of the communing apostles theme are derived from the same iconographic source as the sixth-century patens. Minor variations included replacing the twin Christs with a single Christ or adding angels who act as deacons. The communing apostles occur not only in manuscript paintings, patens, and painted icons but also in mosaic—for instance, in the apse of the Church of Hagia Sophia in Kiev, Ukraine (circa 1051–1100)—and in the dalmatic of Charlemagne (early fifteenth century), a blue silk clerical vestment embroidered with threads of gold. The Kiev mosaicist has placed a large figure of the Virgin Mary directly above the communing apostles, so that viewers can recall the different ways in which Christ has become present on Earth. The maker of the vestment combined the imagery of apostolic Communion (shown on both shoulders) with the splendor of Christ Transfigured and the glory of Christ Enthroned on high among angels and saints.

Medieval Communion Themes

Whereas even the earliest Byzantine artists were inclined to stress the theme of human-divine interaction at the Eucharist, artists of the early medieval West were more apt to focus on the motifs of the blessed bread and wine. Indeed, the cup of salvation first appears in a Western illuminated codex in about 600—the Gospels of St. Augustine—together with the Host (the wafer of unleavened bread that replaced ordinary bread in the Western rite). The scene depicts the Last Supper, held at an old-fashioned sigma but with the figures now seated upright. The chalice rests upon the table directly before Jesus. He is holding the Host and blessing it. Additional Hosts are held by the two disciples to Jesus's left; and six larger disks, presumably loaves, rest on the tabletop. In the interest of space, only eight disciples are shown, three on Christ's left and five on his right; Judas is not identified and is possibly not present. In a miniature from the Sacramentary of Raganaldus, a Carolingian work painted some two and a half centuries later, an even stronger emphasis is placed on the consecrated bread and wine. This impressionistically rendered miniature has Jesus and the 12 disciples (all haloed) seated at a round table set with various dining implements and dishes, including a fish plate. Jesus, who is painted on a slightly bigger scale than the rest and has a cross superimposed on his halo, extends his arms generously to either side. His right hand holds a huge loaf, his left an immense cup. Lettered on the tabletop is the phrase CENAD(OMI)NI (Lord's Supper).

Evidence of deep respect for the Host and wine can be seen also in some splendid liturgical vessels dating from early medieval times. Two of the best known are the Ardagh Chalice, a silver cup with Celtic-style decoration in interlaced gold wire and gold foil, with colored enamel and glass insets (Irish, eighth century), and the Ciborium of King Arnulf of Bavaria, an elegant solid-gold architectural piece set with precious jewels, possibly based on the Hebrew Tabernacle (Exodus 36) and intended to house both paten and Host (Carolingian, circa 870). From the ninth century on, the image of the chalice sometimes occurs in scenes of the Crucifixion. As a revered symbol of salvation—although probably not yet of transubstantiation—the chalice served to remind faithful Christians of their Lord's triumph over death and of their new covenant with him, sealed once and for all in his blood.

The beginnings of a strong medieval interest in Judas can be traced back to art and writings of the Carolingian era. A notable early image of Judas's Communion appears in the Stuttgart Psalter (circa 820–830), originally from Saint-Germain-des-Près, France. Here a solemn figure of Christ with intense, dark eyes is contrasted with an agitated and clearly guilty Judas. Christ sits on an elaborate architectural throne (John is behind him). With his lowered left hand he supports a decorated chalice, while with the right, held directly above it, he feeds the Host to Judas. Swooping in toward Judas's open mouth is a black bird, symbol of the devil (John 13:27), and Judas's lower body is turned away from that of Jesus, his legs already poised for flight. The image was made to accompany the text of Psalm 41:9 (“Yea, mine own familiar friend . . . which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me”) but would also recall Paul's warning in I Corinthians 11:29 that “For he that eateth and drinketh [Communion] unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body.”

A growing fascination with Judas's sin can be seen in art of the Romanesque and Gothic periods, no doubt because as more and more Christians came to believe in transubstantiation, their horror at Judas's crime was bound to increase. The unholy disciple had not merely received bread and wine from the hands of the blameless Jesus, although that would have been bad enough, but he had dared to eat the very body and drink the very blood of God himself! An illumination in the Book of Pericopes, from St. Erentrud in Salzburg, Austria (circa 1140), clearly conveys the brazen awfulness of the crime. Jesus and the faithful 11, all haloed, sit (John is asleep on his master's breast) at the far side of a long, almost rectangular, table. (Rectangular tables were by now gradually replacing round ones in Last Supper scenes.) With his right hand, Jesus reaches across the table to insert bread into the mouth of Judas, a haloless figure seated at right foreground. Judas piously holds his right hand over his heart, but the viewer can see a small black devil about to slide off the sop into Judas's mouth. A slightly different version of the theme occurs in a painting in the Vysehrad Coronation Gospels (1085–1086); here Judas and Jesus are both dipping bread into the dish, using their right hands, while Judas also uses his left hand to cram a sop into his mouth, unaware that the ominous black bird is entering him. A version sculpted on the pulpit of Volterra Cathedral (twelfth century) shows Judas kneeling piously at Jesus's feet, holding up his hands in an improper manner (top left) to receive the Host. Lurking behind Judas is a sinister winged dragon, whose flashing teeth and fangs eagerly await his damnation. Still another rendering, by Nicholas of Verdun on the Klosterneuburg Altar (1181), has Jesus simultaneously feeding bread to Judas and wine to Peter, with an inscription that reads, “See, in two forms Christ holds himself in his hands.” Nicholas's Judas is distinguished not only by his lack of halo and isolated position but also by his deformed face (a motif later used by Giotto) and by the fact that his ill-omened left hand conceals a stolen fish.

So very holy was the Lord's body, as contained within the Host, that some late medieval attempts were made to deny that Judas had ever partaken of it. A painted paten in the cathedral treasury of Halberstadt, Germany (circa 1300), makes this argument directly. The paten shows Christ and Judas in the center, surrounded by a ring of busts of the 11 faithful disciples.

An inscription states that the bread Judas received at the Last Supper was unconsecrated and that it was only after Jesus pointed out the traitor that he instituted the sacrament.

Many more works of art from the second half of the Middle Ages can be linked, either probably or certainly, with belief in transubstantiation. The concept of the blessed wafers as the literal body of Christ is surely inherent in one of the most powerful and haunting images of all medieval art: the Crucifix of Archbishop Gero (969–976) in the Cologne Cathedral in Germany. This life-size oak image, carved virtually in the round to represent the dead Christ hanging heavily from his cross, forced viewers of the time to confront the physical realities of their Lord's Passion as never before. Christ's face is an anguished mask, his chin lies sunken upon his chest, the sinews of his limbs are stretched as if to the breaking point, the hands are limp, the legs bowed out, and the belly shockingly distended. In a compartment at the back of the head, Communion wafers were stored—as they still are—so that the wooden image of the Savior's body could be said to hold his actual body, as the dogma affirmed. More delicate and pleasing receptacles for the Host were created during the Gothic period, notably in France, where a series of gilt-bronze and enameled Eucharistic doves (each with a hinged opening in a wing or the back for insertion of the wafers) became popular. These doves were suspended over church and cathedral altars, sometimes in conjunction with little votive crowns. Also, monstrances, display cases for the Host, appeared in church art soon after the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) had endorsed the doctrine of transubstantiation. Late Gothic monstrances are generally made to look like miniature cathedrals, and so, as art historian Hans Hofstätter has observed, are [like] soaring images of the Heavenly City. . . . they are composed of a jointed pedestal and stem . . . above which a cylindrical vessel for the host rests on a platform. Above the vessel a baldachin is supported by two buttressed piers, and on it . . . [typically stands] a statuette of the Madonna which, in turn, is surmounted by another baldachin. Usually the spire is crowned by a cross. (Hofstätter, p. 101)

Meanwhile, the creation of splendid chalices, and depictions of the chalice in art, continued as well. The Chalice of Abbot Suger (circa 1140), made for use by Suger and his monks at the Abbey Church of Saint-Denis in France, is a justly famous work. Made from a reused Roman bowl of carved sardonyx, mounted in gold and finished with silver gilt, gemstones, glass insets, and pearls, this chalice was intended to rest upon the high altar when not in actual use. Here its glistening beauty, according to the abbot's design, would help to “call [the devout] away from external cares” and invite them to reflect “on the diversity of the sacred virtues” (Calkins, p. 123).

Renaissance, Reformation, and Modern Communion Themes

The fourteenth and fifteenth centuries saw a growing willingness to experiment with depictions of the Eucharist and Last Supper. The theme of the communing apostles receives its first Western treatment during this time. More significantly, portraits of contemporary persons begin to appear in Eucharistic scenes, as do an abundance of contemporary details and even whole settings, which bring the events vividly to life. For instance, in an altarpiece done for the brotherhood of the Corpus Domini at Urbino, Italy (1473–1474), the Flemish painter Joos van Gent portrays the four donors of the altar, the infant son of the duke of Urbino, and his nurse, all watching as Christ administers the Eucharist to his faithful disciples (a tense Judas watches, too). The scene is set in a church; the disciple John acts as deacon, while two angels hover in the upper fringes of the picture—perhaps awaiting their charge to carry the Eucharistic sacrifice to the throne of God. In the Last Supper altarpiece (1464–1467), by Dirck Bouts the Elder, four contemporary male figures look on as Christ institutes the sacrament. The disciples are ranged on all four sides of the table, with Judas in the left foreground, apparently not recognized as the traitor (despite his gesture of holding his left hand behind his back). The supper table is realistically set with ordinary cups, rolls, and a large platter bearing the Paschal Lamb; yet the composition itself is formal and geometrically precise, with excellent use of the new science of perspective to add dignity to the event. As art historian Frederick Hartt notes, “Christ's head arrives exactly at the intersection in the screen that closes off the fireplace when not in use to suggest a cross, and his face is exactly frontal” as he blesses the chalice and Host (Hartt, 1989, p. 588).

Leonardo da Vinci went still further with realism in his renowned Last Supper (1495–1497/8), painted for the refectory of Sta. Maria delle Grazie in Milan, Italy. Leonardo's chief concern with the events of the Last Supper was to make them psychologically true to life and convincing; to that end, he chose to focus on a hitherto neglected moment in the story. This was the moment when Jesus announced, “One of you shall betray me,” sending waves of incredulous shock, wonder, and fear through the 11 loyal disciples. It is known that Leonardo's treatment of the 11—who react in highly individual ways to Christ's appalling news—was based on exhaustive written notes and studies from live models. The guilt in Leonardo's Judas is revealed most plainly through his arrogant facial expression (rendered in shadow) and defiant pose. Although his money bag and traditional gesture of reaching out for food are included, they are scarcely needed (or noticeable) in the context of this vividly human drama.

Yet even Leonardo—Renaissance humanist though he was—has retained at least some traditional feeling for the sacredness of the Eucharist, and for the holiness of Christ himself. Scholars have observed that the arrangement of three windows in the back wall, with Christ's head framed by the middle window, probably suggests the Trinity. Moreover, again to quote Hartt, “Christ . . . appears at the center of both light and space, the vanishing point of the perspective,” so that the chief compositional lines may be said to radiate like an invisible halo from his head (Hartt, 1987, p. 452). Perhaps Leonardo's attitude toward the Eucharist as divine sacrifice was not altogether different from that of his great contemporary and rival, Michelangelo, although the latter was certainly more at home with mystical themes and symbols. In Michelangelo's Creation of Adam (1511–1512) on the Sistine Chapel ceiling in the Vatican, the large male child whom the Almighty touches represents Christ himself. Moreover, God here touches His son as the celebrant at Roman Catholic Mass is expected to touch the Host: with thumb and forefinger only. Michelangelo is known to have worked with great care to perfect this gesture of the Creator, so that the presence of Eucharistic symbolism can hardly be dismissed as accidental.

Throughout the painful religious upheavals that began in the sixteenth century and continued through the seventeenth, there was one theme of constant importance to reformers and traditionalists alike. That theme was the Eucharist, or as Protestants would soon prefer to call it, Holy Communion. A number of woodcuts, engravings, and painted altarpieces from the circle of Lucas Cranach the Elder and his son make clear the Protestant emphasis on regular Communion by the laity and the importance of linking Communion to its scriptural source while rejecting all nonscriptural dogma. In a typical Cranach woodcut, True and False Churches (circa 1540), for example, Luther is shown preaching from a pulpit with the scriptures open before him, while a congregation of faithful men and women partake of the bread and wine. The scene also includes a draped altar bearing an image of the Lamb of God, with cross and banner; a towering crucifix, with rays of light shooting from Christ's head; and—taking up the whole right field—a fiery hell's mouth, in which condemned representatives of the Roman Catholic Church, including the pope, are engulfed. Protestants also sought to stress the idea of themselves as Christ's new disciples, and so in one Altarpiece of the Reformers, completed by the younger Cranach in 1565, the original faithful followers of Jesus have been replaced by 13 contemporary figures. These include the donor of the piece, who kneels in the left foreground, and Cranach himself, who stands in the right foreground acting as cupbearer. The remaining 11 sit in various attitudes of prayer, contemplation, scholarly discourse, or, in the case of one figure immediately to Jesus's left (who presumably recalls John), affection for the Savior. Jesus leans across the table to feed a morsel of bread to Judas, who sits with his back to the viewer in an awkwardly slumped position, still clutching the money bag in his hidden left hand. The table is laid with everyday bread rolls, tumblers, and plates, along with the chalice and platter bearing the Paschal Lamb. The background is a deep, Renaissance-style room, and the sixteenth-century figures represent influential Protestants of the day.

Meanwhile, artists of the Counter-Reformation were inspired to glorify the body and blood of Christ as never before. Of particular interest to them was the theme of dying saints receiving their last Communion, and, as time went on, they portrayed this theme with great emotional realism. Examples include the Last Communion of St. Jerome as painted by Agostino Carracci (circa 1592) and Domenichino (1614), Francesco Vanni's Last Communion of St. Mary Magdalene (circa 1605), and Peter Paul Rubens's Last Communion of St. Francis of Assisi (1620). A related work, widely admired in its day, is Jusepe de Ribera's Communion of the Apostles (1651). Here a gracious Jesus administers the sacrament to his faithful followers, who variously stand, kneel, and bow, with facial expressions appropriate to the event (except John, who sleeps[!] at far right). Left of the scene is a curtain, pulled to reveal a backdrop of neoclassical architecture, distant hills, and blue sky. A throng of adoring cherubs hovers high on the upper right.

The Communion experience of a much more recent saint, Mary Magdalene de'Pazzi, was the subject of a bronze medallion created by Ciro Ferri and P. S. Silvani (mid-seventeenth century) to adorn her church in Florence, Italy. Mary Magdalene is portrayed kneeling in her nun's habit, a look of intense rapture on her face. She opens her lips to receive the Host from a seminude, muscular, youthful male figure. It is her heavenly bridegroom, Jesus Christ himself, whose body had been her chief source of nourishment during much of her earthly life. Two of Mary Magdalene's sister nuns quietly converse in the background—one points to the communing saint—while overhead, cherubic faces peer out from a cloud.

Artists of the Counter-Reformation also portrayed the Last Supper (a favorite subject of Tintoretto), as well as legendary miracles related to the Eucharist, and various allegorical still lifes centered on the chalice and Host. Many more subtle Eucharistic symbols can be recognized in the work of Baroque artists, such as Caravaggio (Supper at Emmaus, circa 1600), Diego Velázquez (The Watercarrier of Seville, 1619), and Louis Le Nain (The Peasants' Meal, 1642). It was during the two centuries following the Reformation that Roman Catholic piety created some of the largest, most stunning monstrances every seen. The famed Diamond Monstrance at Prague, Czech Republic (1699), is so called because more than 6,000 diamonds are encrusted on the silver-gilt flames that radiate like a mighty sunburst from its central display compartment. Another fine monstrance, created by Gregorius Vaith of Augsburg, Germany (1707), and made mostly of silver gilt, includes a relief of the faithful disciples seated at a table. Christ is not among them, but in his place a display compartment for the Host projects from the table's center. Above the compartment is a crown-shaped baldachin, from which falls a pair of heavy curtains; over this is a bust of God the Father, amid glories of clouds and flames; this in turn is surmounted by a smaller cloud-and-light display that contains the dove of the Holy Spirit. The complex iconography of this monstrance is completed by a pelican, symbol of Christ's self-sacrificing love for humanity (legend says pelicans feed their young with their own blood), and by a flaming heart impaled on a cross, which crowns the entire piece.

As the Counter-Reformation slowly gave way to the Age of Enlightenment, Protestants and Catholics alike found themselves facing new challenges—but also, new opportunities to answer God's call. On the one hand, life in the Western world was rapidly becoming secularized; on the other hand, a vast majority of Westerners still felt that need for religion (and a vast majority of governments still agreed on religion's importance). It was an age of multiplying doctrines, fervent personal convictions, and great global missions, an age that had its share of religious conflicts but that tended, on the whole, toward a new ecumenical outlook. The sacrament of Communion/Eucharist/Lord's Supper was increasingly viewed as a divine gift with the power to unite all Christians, regardless of their theological, cultural, or even ethnic differences. A remarkable Portuguese etching published in 1680 helps illustrate this new trend. Antonio Spinola, a Jesuit missionary to India, is portrayed standing on a high platform and holding the chalice and Host. The latter is marked with an image of the crucified Christ, and a crucifix also stands on the altar crowd of Indians and Europeans, who will all quite clearly be admitted to the sacrament. In the sky, angels hover, and a shining dove triumphantly parts the clouds.

The new global scope of Christianity led also to fresh interpretations of the Last Supper by different ethnic artists. These interpretations began appearing in the late seventeenth century and continued through the twentieth. A Chinese Christ with Chinese disciples, an African Christ with African disciples, a Peruvian Christ with Peruvian disciples—these, and more, have added greatly to the richness of Christian art while helping to spread the Gospel to “all nations” (Matthew 28:19).

Nor did Westerners cease to portray Eucharistic subjects, including the Last Supper, and use Communion-like imagery in their work. References to Communion can be found in at least two well-known nineteenth-century depictions of people dining: John Everett Millais’s Lorenzo and Isabella (1849), with the blameless hero of Keats’s poem proffering an orange to his ladylove; and Vincent van Gogh’s The Potato Eaters (1885), in which the meal of a Belgian peasant family is portrayed with all the solemn intensity of worship. In the twentieth century, compelling treatments of the Last Supper were done by Emil Nolde (1909) and Salvador Dalí (1955). Nolde’s brilliantly colored version—painted, as he himself tells us, amid many days and nights of prayer—depicts the faithful disciples clustered about their redeemer (Judas is not present). The disciples’ faces are sallow, angular, masklike, suggestive of the suffering to come; yet their expressive, if clumsy, gestures and their physical closeness seem to bind them to one another and to Christ. The Lord sits with his massive hands clasped round the stem of a chalice. His bright yellow face, set off by red hair and beard and with vivid features also in red, has been said to glow “like a star” (Haftmann, pl. 3). Dalí’s more lyrical, but equally dreamlike, treatment of the Last Supper includes a semitransparent Jesus who seems to be waist-deep in water (the Sea of Galilee?), a great dodecahedron (symbolic of the universe), with an ethereal form, suggestive of the Crucifixion, which floats high above Jesus’s head. An air of hushed wonder pervades the scene; all 12 disciples kneel in adoration around the table, while Jesus—who has already broken the bread and blessed the cup—points heavenward with his right hand and indicates his half-nude breast with his left.

Although to the average modern Westerner, Communion art and imagery are far less familiar than they used to be, much new and original church art is still devoted to Eucharistic themes. This art includes not only chalices, patens, monstrances (for Catholic churches), and trays for individual Communion cups (used frequently by Protestants), but also a wide array of colorful banners, posters, stained-glass windows, and decorated Communion tables. Ecumenical symbols are popular, especially in the art of congregations that have merged or are developing partnership. A carved wooden communion table at Lakeview United Church in Regina, Saskatchewan (1956), eloquently makes the point. This handsome table’s facade is marked off into 33 squares—corresponding to the number of years Christ lived on Earth—of which 16 contain crosses, while the rest are occupied by other semiabstract emblems, including the alpha-omega and fruited vine. The work is truly an appropriate symbol for the United Church of Canada, whose roots are in some 40 Protestant denominations. A like ecumenical spirit is expressed in the decoration of chalices made (1993) for use by a gathering of representatives from the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) and the United Church of Christ (UCC). Featured upon each chalice are the Disciples’ emblem (a chalice marked with a cross) and the UCC emblem (circle, cross, and crown), set together beneath the Gateway Arch of St. Louis, Missouri, where the first joint general assembly/synod of the two churches took place.

Sharing, reconciliation, forgiveness, love, peace—it is these priceless gifts that Christians of today seek, and often find, in the sacrament of Communion, very much as did their spiritual forebears of nearly 2,000 years ago. As long as the Christian faith endures, belief in the power of Communion will likely remain strong and will continue to be richly honored in visual arts around the world.

See also Betrayal; Devotion/Piety; Protestantism

Selected Works of Art

Early Christian and Byzantine

Swimming Fish with Basket of Loaves on Its Back, wall painting, late second century, Rome, Catacombs of St. Callisto, Lucina’s Crypt

Banquet of Loaves and Fishes, wall painting, late second century, Rome, Catacomb of Callixtus

The Breaking of the Bread, wall painting, late second century, Rome, Catacomb of Priscilla

Figures Partaking of Bread and Wine, relief on the Sarcophagus of Baebia Hermophile, late third century, Rome, Museo delle Terme

Figures Partaking of Bread and Wine, sarcophagus relief, late third century, Rome, Museo delle Terme

The Miracles of the Manna and the Rock of Horeb; The Feeding of Daniel; The Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes, scenes in carved wooden doors, circa 432, Rome, St. Sabina

The Sacrifice of Melchizedek, mosaic, 432–440, Rome, Santa Maria Maggiore

The Chalice of Antioch, fourth–seventh century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

The Last Supper, mosaic, early sixth century, Ravenna, Italy, St. Apollinare Nuovo

The Last Supper, from the Codex Purpureus Rossanensis, circa 550–575, Rossano, Italy, Museo del Arcivescovado (MS. 50, fol. 3r)

Communion of Apostles, from Codex Purpureus Rossanensis, circa 550–575, Rossano, Italy, Museo del Arcivescovado (MS. 50, fol. 4r)

Patens with Communion of the Apostles, 565–578, Istanbul, Turkey, Istanbul Arkeoloji Müzeleri

Patens with Communion of the Apostles, 565–578, Washington, D.C., Dumbarton Oaks Collection

Medieval

The Last Supper, from the Gospels of Saint Augustine, circa 600, Cambridge, England, Corpus Christi College (MS 286, fol. 125r)

The Ardagh Chalice, eighth century, Dublin, National Museum of Ireland

Communion of Judas, from Stuttgart Psalter, circa 820–830, Stuttgart, Germany, Württembergische Landesbibliothek (Cod. 23, fol. 431)

- Ciborium of King Arnulf of Bavaria*, circa 870, Munich, Germany, Schatzkammer, Residenz
- Chalice from Constantinople*, circa 950–1000, Venice, Italy, Cathedral of St. Mark, Treasury
- Crucifix of Archbishop Gero*, wood sculpture, 969–976, Cologne, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek
- Mass of St. Erhard*, from the Uta Gospels, 1002–1025, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek (Clm. 13601, fol. 4)
- Icon with Communion of the Apostles and Christ Washing the Disciples' Feet*, eleventh century, Mount Sinai, Monastery of St. Catherine
- Mary as Orant and Communion of the Apostles*, mosaic, circa 1050–1100, Kiev, Ukraine, Hagia Sophia
- Communion of Judas*, from the Coronation Gospels of King Vratislav, 1085–1086, Prague, Czech Republic, Národní knihovna v Praze (MS. XIV A13, fol. 38v)
- Communion of Judas*, from The Book of Pericopes from Saint Erentrud, Salzburg, circa 1140, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek (Clm. 15903, fol. 13r)
- Communion of Judas*, stone relief, pulpit, twelfth century, Volterra, Italy, Cathedral
- Chalice of Abbot Suger of Saint-Denis*, circa 1140, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Widener Collection
- Nicolas of Verdun, Communion of Judas, 1181, Klosterneuberg Altarpiece, Klosterneuberg, Austria, Monastery
- Eucharistic Dove*, late twelfth or early thirteenth century, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Gallery
- Eucharistic Dove*, thirteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, The Cloisters Collection
- Chalice, Paten, and Straws*, set, circa 1225–1250, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, The Cloisters Collection
- The Last Supper*, relief on rood screen, circa 1250–1260, Naumburg, Germany, Cathedral
- Paten with Communion of Judas*, circa 1300, Halberstadt, Germany, Cathedral Treasury
- Pucelle, Jean, David Before Saul; Cain and Abel; The Host Offered to the Holy Spirit, from Belleville Breviary, circa 1323–1326, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France (MS Latin 10483, fol. 2Av)
- The Communion of the Apostles*, Florentine polytypch, fourteenth century, Rome, Pinacoteca Vaticana
- Renaissance*
- Dalmatic of Charlemagne*, early fifteenth century, Rome, St. Peter, sacristy treasury
- Eyck, Jan and Hubert van, Lamb of God Bleeding Into a Chalice, Ghent Altarpiece, circa 1425–1432, Ghent, Belgium, Cathedral of St. Bavon
- Multscher, Hans, Nativity with Eucharistic Symbols, Wurzach Altarpiece, 1437, Berlin, Staatliche Museen
- Angelico, Fra, Studio of, The Risen Christ Holding Chalice and Paten, circa 1450, Pisa, Italy, Museo Nazionale di St. Matteo
- Bouts, Dieric the Elder, The Last Supper, 1464–1467, Louvain, Church of St. Pierre
- Gent, Joos van, Communion of the Apostles, 1473–1474, Urbino, Italy, Galleria Nazionale delle Marche Palazzo Ducale
- Leonardo da Vinci, The Last Supper, circa 1495–1498, Milan, Italy, Refectory of Santa Maria delle Grazie
- Michelangelo, The Creation of Adam, 1511–1512, Rome, Vatican, Sistine Chapel ceiling
- Beccafumi, Domenico, Communion of Saint Catherine, from predella of Saint Catherine Altarpiece, circa 1518, Siena, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
- Cranach, Lucas the Younger, True and False Churches, woodcut, circa 1540, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
- Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Circle of, Luther and Hus Giving Communion to the Family of the Elector of Saxony, woodcut, circa 1540–1550, Nürnberg, Germany, Germanisches Nationalmuseum
- Tintoretto, The Last Supper, 1547, Venice, Italy, St. Marcuola
- Tintoretto, The Last Supper, circa 1557, Venice, Italy, St. Trovaso, Capella del Santissimo Sacramento
- Tintoretto, The Last Supper, 1560s, Venice, Italy, S. Polo
- Cranach, Lucas, Studio of, Altarpiece of the Reformers, 1565, Dessau, Germany, Schoss Church
- Juanes, Juan de, Christ with the Sacrament, circa 1550, Budapest, Hungary, Museum of Fine Arts
- Göding, Henrich, Lutheran Communion, from predella of altarpiece, 1569, Mühlberg an der Elbe, Germany, Convent Church
- Tintoretto, The Last Supper, 1592–1594, Venice, Italy, St. Giorgio Maggiore
- Carracci, Agostino, The Communion of Saint Jerome, circa 1592, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
- Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century*
- Caravaggio, Supper at Emmaus, circa 1600, London, National Gallery
- Vanni, Francesco, The Last Communion of Saint Mary Magdalene, circa 1605, Genoa, Italy, St. Maria di Carignano
- Domenichino, The Last Communion of Saint Jerome, 1614, Rome, Vatican Gallery
- Velázquez, Diego, The Watercarrier of Seville, 1619, London, Wellington Museum
- Rubens, Peter Paul, The Last Communion of Saint Francis of Assisi, 1620, Antwerp, Belgium, Franciscan Church of the Recolets
- Le Nain, Louis, The Peasants' Meal, 1642, Paris, Louvre
- Ribera, Jusepe de, The Communion of the Apostles, 1651, Naples, Italy, St. Martino
- Le Sueur, Eustache, Mass of Saint Martin of Tours, 1655, Paris, Louvre
- Ferri, Ciro, and Silvani, P. S., Saint Mary Magdalene Receiving the Host from Jesus, bronze medallion, mid-seventeenth century, Florence, Italy, Church of Maria Maddalena dé Pazzi
- The Last Supper*, second half of seventeenth century, Cuzco, Peru, Cathedral
- Father Spinola Prepares to Offer Communion to a Multi-Racial Congregation*, etching, 1680, Lisbon, Portugal, Biblioteca Nacional

The Diamond Monstrance, 1699, Prague, Czech Republic, Treasury of Loreta, Gregorius Vaith of Augsburg
Monstrance with Last Supper/Communion of the Apostles and Trinity, 1705, Kraiburg, Germany, Inn

Nineteenth Century

Millais, Sir John Everett, Lorenzo and Isabella, 1849, Liverpool, Lancashire, England, Walker Art Gallery
 Gogh, Vincent van, The Potato Eaters, 1885, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Van Gogh Museum
 Picasso, Pablo, First Communion, oil on panel, Paris, Musée Picasso
The Last Supper, Chinese painting on silk, circa 1900, Vatican City, Italy, Museo Missionario Etnologico
 Nolde, Emil, The Last Supper, 1909, Copenhagen, Denmark, Statens Museum for Kunst
 Dalí, Salvador, The Sacrament of the Last Supper, 1955, Washington, D.C., National Gallery
Communion Table with Ecumenical Symbols, 1956, Regina, Saskatchewan, Lakeview United Church
 Jurysta, Gary, Chalice, 1969, Greensburgh, Pennsylvania, Seton Hill College

Further Reading

- Anonymous, "Ecumenical Chalices," The Disciple: Journal of the Christian Church 131:5 (June 1993)
 Beckwith, John, Early Christian and Byzantine Art, Harmondsworth, England and Baltimore: Penguin, 1970
 Bell, Rudolph Mark, Holy Anorexia, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985
 Buechner, Frederick, The Faces of Jesus, New York: Harper, 1974
 Burkhart, John E., Worship: A Searching Examination of the Liturgical Experience, Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1982
 Calkins, Robert G., Monuments of Medieval Art, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1979
 Frere-Cook, Gervis, ed., Art and Architecture of Christianity, Cleveland, Ohio: Case Western Reserve University, 1972
 Gough, Michael, The Origins of Christian Art, London: Thames and Hudson, 1973; New York: Praeger, 1974
 Haftmann, Werner, Emil Nolde, New York: Abrams, 1959; London: Thames and Hudson, 1959
 Haraszti-Takács, Marianne, Spanish Masters, New York: Taplinger, 1971
 Hartt, Frederick, Art: A History of Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, London: Thames and Hudson, 1976; Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1989
 ———, History of Italian Renaissance Art: Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, New York: Abrams, 1969
 Held, Julius Samuel, and Donald Posner, Seventeenth and Eighteenth-Century Art: Baroque Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, New York: Abrams, 1971
 Hofstätter, Hans H., Art of the Late Middle Ages, translated by R. E. Wolf, New York: Abrams, 1968
 Kahr, Madlyn Millner, Velázquez: The Art of Painting, New York: Harper, 1976
 Kent, Corita, Footnotes and Headlines: A Play-Pray Book, New York: Herder, 1967
 Maus, Cynthia Pearl, The Church and the Fine Arts: An Anthology of Pictures, Poetry, Music and Stories Portraying the Growth and Development of the Church Throughout the Centuries, New York: Harper, 1960
 McManner, John, ed., The Oxford Illustrated History of Christianity, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
 Moir, Alfred, Caravaggio, New York: Abrams, 1982
 Rosand, David, Painting in Cinquecento Venice: Titian, Veronese, Tintoretto, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1982
 Ryan, Monsignor William Granger, and Gary Jurysta, "Alive and Unfinished," Liturgical Arts 38:1 (November 1969)
 Schiller, Gertrud, Iconography of Christian Art 2: The Passion of Jesus Christ, translated by J. Seligman, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1971
 Steinberg, Leo, "Who's Who in Michelangelo's Creation of Adam: A Chronology of the Picture's Reluctant Self-Revelation," Art Bulletin 74 (1992)
 Stoddard, Whitney S., Art and Architecture in Medieval France, New York: Harper, 1972
 Waterhouse, Ellis, Italian Baroque Painting, London: Phaidon, 1962
 Willimon, William H., Word, Water, Wine, and Bread: How Worship Has Changed Over the Years, Valley Forge, Pennsylvania: Judson Press, 1980

CRUCIFIXION

Alicia Craig Faxon and Nancy Frazier

The following iconographic narratives and periods are included in the discussion of the theme Crucifixion:

CRUCIFIXION OF POLYCRATES

CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST:
EARLY CHRISTIAN

CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST:
BYZANTINE

CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST:
MEDIEVAL

CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST:
RENAISSANCE

CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST:
SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST:
NINETEENTH CENTURY

CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST:
TWENTIETH CENTURY

CRUCIFIXION OF ST. PETER
CRUCIFIXION OF ST. ANDREW
TYPOLOGICAL
PREFIGURATION OF THE CRUCIFIXION

Matthias Grünewald, Crucifixion, Isenheim Altarpiece, 1510–1515, oil on panel, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden. (Courtesy of Foto Marburg)

Historically, there is nothing remarkable about the death of Jesus Christ. As a form of punishment, crucifixion was widespread in ancient Assyria, Egypt, Persia, Greece, Carthage, and Macedonia as well as in Rome. Deuteronomy 21:22–23 contains these instructions:

And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be to be put to death, and thou hang him on a tree: His body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day; (for he that is hanged is accursed of God;) that thy land be not defiled, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance.

This passage suggests that Jews of biblical times also punished by hanging on a tree, or a form of crucifixion. Crucifixion in Roman times was an extreme punishment for non-Romans, usually meted to the worst offenders. Christ's death on the cross therefore was the most heinous and painful form of sacrifice.

The story of Polycrates, told by Herodotus in the Histories (III, 39–45, 120–26), is one of the few sources of depiction of a crucifixion in the classical era. Although a brutal tyrant, Polycrates seemed to be unfailingly awarded by good fortune. Acting on the advice of a friend, who suggested he appease the potentially jealous gods by casting away his most precious possession, Polycrates threw his ring into the sea. When the jewel was returned to him in the belly of a fish, Polycrates realized he would come to a bad end. Lured by his enemies with a promise of gold, he was betrayed, killed in a manner not fit to be told, Herodotus states, and crucified. Salvator Rosa was one of the few to depict the scene of this crucifixion, a rare subject in the history of art. In his painting done after his etching of the subject in 1661–1662, Rosa shows Polycrates' wrists and ankles tied, not nailed, to the branches of a dead tree. His etching shows an even more contorted pose, one arm outstretched on a limb, the other stretched upward on the main trunk of the tree. In both works, a group of people contemplate the crucified figure, some pointing, others with arms outstretched in amazement. Although the scene projects the cruelty of crucifixion, it has none of the associations of sacrifice and salvation inherent in the Christian image.

Notable crucifixions occurred in 73 B.C. when 6,000 fugitive slaves, followers of Spartacus, were executed along the road to Damascus, Syria. In the first century after the death of Christ, the legate to Syria, Quintilius Varus, was said to have crucified 2,000 seditious Jews. The historian Josephus also described a period of Roman rule during which 500 Jews were crucified every day. Among other tortures devised by the Romans for outlaw Christians, crucifixion remained an option until the fourth century, when it was abolished by Constantine the Great. Constantine's conversion to Christianity, his dramatic vision of a cross accompanied by the words, "With this conquer," publicly and effectively preempted use of the cross for Christian endeavor. From then on the crucifixion was the central symbol of what would become the world's most populous religion.

If unexceptional historically, the Crucifixion of Jesus Christ is extraordinary conceptually. In concept, his Crucifixion reverses the pattern of religious rites as they had been followed for millennia. Consistently, since the earliest prehistoric civilizations for which evidence has been found, humans had made sacrifices to their gods. Shrines, ziggurats, temples—all were built around altars on which animal and human offerings were made to the deities. The death of Christ turned convention upside down. This time God made the sacrifice. In Christian doctrine, Christ, although innocent, redeemed the sins of the world by his self-offering as a ransom for humanity in obedience to God's command (John 3:16–17). Philosophically, theologically, intellectually, poetically, this turn of events was unprecedented. In fact, for sheer dramatic impact, the power of the idea has never been equaled.

Not simply a painful death, crucifixion was also designed to degrade and humiliate the victim. He was stripped naked and whipped with spiked thongs before being forced to carry the crossbar (not the whole cross, as in many Passion pictures) to the place of execution where he was exposed, naked, on the cross. In the civilizations of ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia, nakedness had been symbolic of vulnerability, defeat, and subservience.

The narrative of the Crucifixion of Jesus Christ is given in Matthew (chapter 27), Mark (chapter 15), Luke (chapter 23), and John (chapter 19). All four accounts agree that Jesus was forced to carry the cross to the place of execution at Golgotha, the place of the skull in Hebrew. They all recount how Jesus was crucified in the third hour and that the inscription on the cross read "THE KING OF THE JEWS." The account in John 19:19–22 mentions that the chief priests objected to this, saying not to write "King of the Jews," but that he said, "I am King of the Jews." Pilate refused, saying, "What I have written I have written." Where the accounts differ is in the words of Jesus from the cross, or the "seven last words," which are used in many Christian Good Friday services, the day designated as the day of Christ's death, two days before Easter. In the Gospels of Mark and Matthew, Christ says only one thing, given in its original Aramaic as well as the vernacular: "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?" (My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?). In Luke 23, he utters three other things: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Luke 23:34); "Verily I say unto thee, To day shalt thou be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43), which Jesus said to the penitent thief; and

"Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Luke 23:46). The fourth Gospel supplies other last words of Jesus: first the words to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son!", and then to his disciple John, "Behold thy mother!" (John 19:26–27), giving his mother to the care of someone who would take his place as son. The other words are "I thirst" (John 19:28) and "It is finished" (John 19:30).

All accounts agree that darkness fell from the sixth hour to the ninth hour and that Jesus died on the ninth hour of Good Friday, designated as "good" because in Christian belief it presages Christ's resurrection on Easter Sunday. All four accounts also tell of Christ being crucified between two thieves, but only Luke has one penitent thief, who says to the other thief mocking Christ, "Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward for our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss," and turning to Christ, says, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom" (Luke 23:40–42). Three narratives also have a centurion at the foot of the cross at the time of Christ's death. Luke 23:47 records his words as, "Certainly this was a righteous man," Mark 15:39 and Matthew 27:54 have him say, "Truly this was the Son of God," and John records only soldiers on the scene.

The Crucifixion is one of the most frequently represented scenes in art. The elements in paintings, drawings, prints, and sculpture differ a great deal, partly owing to the particular use intended for the work of art (for example, a church altarpiece or a work for private devotion), to the desires of the patron or artist, and to what significance the scene holds for patron or artist. The representations of the Crucifixion, particularly of the figure of Christ, also evolved over time, reflecting changes in attitudes and theology surrounding this scene, so central to Christian worship.

Although the Romans usually propagandized their conquests, surprisingly they apparently never made crucifixion images. Nor did early Christians. It may be that the idea of the suffering of the son of God was a difficult one to absorb, or perhaps there was also a residual fear of breaking biblical injunctions against worshiping graven images. Another reason that the Crucifixion was not depicted in early Christian art is that it represented a shameful, criminal form of death—much like a modern-day electric chair—and one with which Christians did not wish to identify Jesus. Furthermore, in the first centuries of the Common Era, conversion was the pressing need and mission of the Christian church. Under those circumstances, the subject of the Crucifixion was not an encouraging one. Not until Christianity was secure did images of the Crucifixion become widespread and important.

The earliest known Crucifixion images—small oval seals—date from the middle of the fourth century. In these rudimentary and symbolic images, Christ seems merely to be standing with his arms wide. Even over the next centuries, when the Crucifixion scenes begin to appear more frequently, the images reveal no emotion on Christ's part, and his eyes are open.

In the tenth century, when the church was secure, representations of the Crucifixion began to change. The wooden Crucifixion made at this time for Archbishop Gero of Cologne, Germany, reveals evidence of Christ's suffering. By the fourteenth century, the Crucifixion had changed from something too terrible to be seen to something terrible to see. This was particularly true of pictures in northern Europe as the Protestant Reformation approached. Images of Christ's body torn by lashes and contorted by pain sometimes symbolize the cycle of plagues that decimated Europe beginning in the fourteenth century. The Black Death of 1348, in which an estimated quarter of the population of Europe died, was followed by successions of epidemics throughout the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, some no less destructive than the Black Death. Death was a constant preoccupation of the population.

During the period from 1470 to 1500, the choir of the chapel at the Monastery of St. Anthony in Isenheim, in what is now French Alsace, was rebuilt and a major altarpiece commissioned for the chapel. Of enormous size (almost 18 feet wide), the Isenheim Altarpiece has many scenes within its wings, but in its closed position it shows the Crucifixion by Matthias Grünewald, completed in 1515. In this painting, bits of wood, thorns, or splinters are knitted into Christ's flesh. The sky is black, the background is barren, flat, and stony, and rigor mortis has set in. The INRI plaque, an abbreviation of the Latin for "Jesus of Nazareth King of the Jews" (Pilate had it written in Hebrew and Latin, according to tradition), is above the crossbar. Christ's feet are bleeding profusely. In many Crucifixions, angels hold a cup to capture Christ's blood, symbolic of the transubstantiation of the Eucharist; but there are none here. At the bottom right, however, next to John the Baptist, a lamb bleeds into a chalice. Usually, such a lamb is an alternative to the figure of Christ. Although not unique, it is uncommon to see them both in the same image.

Although Perugino's serene Crucifixion is often compared with Carlo Crivelli's tempestuous one, in general, Italian Crucifixions are less tortured than those of northern Europe or of Spain. Michelangelo studied the Crucifixion in his youth and again toward the end of his life. In three drawings of Christ on the cross that Michelangelo created during the 1550s, there is the sense that the aged artist had reached a state of religious beatitude. The power of these images is that the artist is inside his work, seeking

That love divine
Which opened to embrace us
His arms upon the Cross

as Michelangelo himself wrote in a poem.

Michelangelo's work contrasts vividly with that of Albrecht Dürer, whose Great Crucifixion, although exquisitely accomplished, does not seem personally moving. Somehow Dürer never plumbed the emotional depths of the Crucifixion as Michelangelo seemed driven to do. Dürer was strongly influenced by the Protestant Reformation and perhaps by Martin Luther's insistence that the emphasis on the Crucifixion should move away from "the apprehension of God in suffering and lowness."

Lucas Cranach's Crucifixion (1503), created before the Reformation, focused on the physical and emotional impact of the event itself, with an unusual perpendicular perspective and lowering of the point of view. The effect is melodramatic and theatrical. Like Andrea Mantegna before him, Cranach pushed the eye level down close to the bottom of the picture, as though the viewer were seated in the first row of a theater, slightly to the left of center. Being that close, one is privy to the most particular details: the lugubrious head beneath the cross, a symbol of Adam's skull and the redemption.

This front-row seating in Cranach brings to mind the idea of French art historian Émile Mâle that the costumes and settings of mystery plays of the Middle Ages had a profound influence on art. Cranach's painting does seem to be a sort of tableau vivant. Cranach liked this experimental angle of the Crucifixion well enough to use it at least two other times. The first time he used it was in an earlier work, the supercharged The Penance of Saint Jerome (1502). He also used it much later, in 1527, in Cardinal Albrecht von Brandenburg as Saint Jerome in the Wilderness, in which he echoes his earlier St. Jerome. In both images, however, the Crucifixion is in the background, implying a meditative vision.

In Lucas van Leyden's 1517 engraving Calvary, the Crucifixion is also in the background, and the apparently secular foreground scene might be an outdoor Passion play or perhaps a Palm Sunday processional. These productions had become increasingly popular as the Middle Ages progressed and included dramatic representation of the Passion cycle. The variety of costumes in the Lucas Calvary gives the impression of a snapshot of a Passion play in progress. Such celebrations would soon be condemned by the Reformation, and many of the props and icons created for them were destroyed. Indeed, fear of iconoclasm contributed to a decrease in religious art during the sixteenth century in the north.

This was not as true in Italy, where Jacopo Tintoretto executed three cycles of religious paintings for the Scuola di San Rocco in Venice, including a Crucifixion (1565) on the end wall of the Sala dell'Albergo on the second floor. This painting is approximately 40 feet long and depicts a huge cast of characters at Golgotha, including soldiers, executioners nailing the two thieves to their crosses, Joseph of Arimathea, St. John, and the Virgin, all illuminated by supernatural radiance around the central figure of Christ on the cross.

The intense drama of Tintoretto's treatment of the subject can be seen on a smaller, but no less devotional, scale in the works of El Greco, who left Crete to study in Venice, where he was undoubtedly influenced by Tintoretto. El Greco traveled to Spain (1576–1577) to carry on this religious tradition, both in terms of Mannerist elongation of the figure and in intensity of feeling. In the seventeenth century, a number of painters favored the solo figure of Christ on the cross, lit against a dark background in a Caravaggesque rendering of tenebrism.

In 1597 Francisco Pacheco questioned the tradition of showing Christ nailed to the cross with three nails, one in each hand and one penetrating his crossed feet. He instituted a type with four nails, the feet separated, with one nail in each (shown in his Crucifixion in Madrid, Spain). This tradition was followed by his student Alonso Cano in an early Crucifixion and also by Diego Velázquez's moving Crucifixion in the Prado in Madrid, his bent head surrounded by a halo. Two Crucifixions by Francisco de Zurbarán (in Chicago and in Seville, Spain) also follow the four-nail tradition, but a later Crucifixion by Cano and Murillo's Crucifixion, in the Prado in Madrid, revert to the three-nail representation. These works show a great variety of pose and expression. Zurbarán's Chicago Crucifixion shows Christ with his head bent toward the right, possibly dead, whereas his work in Seville shows a still-living figure gazing upward, as if to say, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Images of the Crucifixion were increasingly politicized during the Reformation, and with the benefit of the newly invented printing press, widely used for propaganda. We find numerous images in which Christ rests almost benignly on the cross, while individuals around him carry either antipapist or anti-Reformation messages. In one picture, the pope and cardinals are depicted as wolves ravaging Christ's flock, who seek shelter around the crucifix, while Luther, holding his pen and Bible, approaches to chase the predators away. Even in Lucas Cranach's last Crucifixion, on the panel of an altarpiece, finished by Lucas the Younger, the presence of Christ on the cross speaks not of the suffering of the Savior, but rather of the anointing of Cranach himself. Cranach's image was added to the painting, perhaps by his son, with white beard and mustache, receiving the blood of Christ on his forehead, flanked by Christ and Luther.

Images such as these—in fact, many representations of the Crucifixion that clearly reflect Lutheran doctrine—are strangely reminiscent of the very earliest Crucifixions, where, rather than flesh and blood, the figure of Christ was symbolic, seemingly indifferent to mental or physical pain. During the Counter-Reformation, the Crucifixion again became emotional, as Peter Paul Rubens's Three Crosses and, even more, his Descent from the Cross show. In the former, closely flanked by the two thieves, with no mourners and the barest of landscapes, Christ hangs heavily from a tall cross. A very different mood is presented in Rembrandt van Rijn's etching Three Crosses. The plate was reworked at least four times, and with each print the artist came closer to the essence of the Crucifixion as the incandescent center of religion. Although the foreground is crowded and he is flanked by the thieves, Christ is showered with and isolated by light from above.

As the view of the meaning of the Crucifixion changed over time, the use of different figures to express the iconography of the Crucifixion scene fell into different patterns. The Crucifixion of Christ as the solo figure occurs in such hanging sculptural pieces as the Crucifix of Archbishop Gero (969–976) in Cologne Cathedral and the bronze crucifix of the Abbey of Werden in Germany (circa 1070) and in such paintings as Zurbarán's Crucifixion in the Art Institute of Chicago and Diego Velázquez's Crucifixion (circa 1631–1632) in the Prado. The reason for using the single figure in sculpture is fairly obvious: it is a devotional form usually hanging in a church. In the paintings, the singling out of the figure of Christ emphasizes the loneliness of death and possibly a personal connection to the viewer. Other, nearly solo representations of Christ with symbolic references are found, such as a pastel by Eugène Delacroix in the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa, Ontario, which shows a coiled serpent rearing its head on the ground to the right, representing original sin that Christ defeated by his death on the cross. An 1846 oil by Delacroix, in the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore, Maryland, focuses on the single crucified figure of Christ; in the right background the centurion on horseback holds a flag, possibly symbolizing the witness of the centurion and the contrast of two realms, spiritual and physical.

A common representation of the Crucifixion shows Christ with his mother and the disciple John, as in an early fifth-century relief on an ivory casket in the British Museum in London. This representation positions Mary and John on Christ's right and a soldier piercing Christ's side on his left, a possible juxtaposition of Christ's supporters and his enemies. This is one of the earliest representations known of the Crucifixion. Christianity, being an outlawed religion, was represented symbolically in catacomb art, with Christ as the Good Shepherd, or referred to by Old Testament prefigurations of salvation such as the sacrifice of Isaac or Jonah delivered from the whale.

One of the most common forms of the Crucifixion with two figures has Mary the Mother of Christ on the left and John the beloved disciple on the right, possibly representing the past in Mary and the future in John. An early example of the subject is a tenth-century Byzantine ivory triptych that shows Mary and John in the central panel on either side of the cross. This representation type was popular during the Middle Ages and Renaissance; examples are provided by Duccio di Buoninsegna, Carlo Crivelli, Fra Angelico, Francia, Taddeo Gaddi, Giovanni Bellini, Andrea del Castagno, Lorenzo Monaco, and Jacopo da Pontormo, among others. This symmetrical pairing of opposites is also shown in representations of the sun and moon, the lance and the chalice, and the penitent and impenitent thief.

The Crucifixion was depicted with great feeling in the seventeenth century by Hendrik Terbrugghen. His Crucifixion, now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, shows a change from a narrative or icon to one of emotive response. Another person often included in the Crucifixion scene is Mary Magdalene. She is either alone, embracing the cross, as in the depiction by Fra Angelico and assistants in cell 25 of the Convent of S. Marco in Florence, Italy, or with the Virgin Mary and John and others, as in Crucifixion by Bernardo Daddi in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, by Spinello Aretino in the Worcester Art Museum, or by Giotto in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy.

Still another variant of the scene includes a skull at the base of the cross, which could refer to the place of Crucifixion (Golgotha means "skull" in Hebrew) or to the legend of Adam's skull beneath the cross, a symbol of Christ's victory over death. This detail can be seen in a number of representations, including that of Flemish artist Joos van Cleve in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston and that of Perugino in Washington, D.C. Occasionally, a whole skeleton appears under the Crucifixion, as in the Lenzi family altar, The Holy Trinity, by Masaccio in Sta. Maria Novella in Florence. One of the first works to employ the linear perspective system discovered by Filippo Brunelleschi in the 1420s, The Holy Trinity creates the illusion of an aisle chapel. The image of a pelican piercing its breast to save its young is sometimes included in Crucifixion scenes to symbolize Jesus's sacrifice, giving his blood for the salvation of humankind. Spinello Aretino's Christ Crucified with the Virgin, the Magdalene, and St. John, in the Worcester Art Museum, and Giotto's work in the Arena Chapel in Padua include the figure of the Magdalene.

The cast of main characters in the Crucifixion was enlarged by Matthias Grünewald's Isenheim Altarpiece, in the Musée Unterlinden in Colmar, France, which depicts Mary, John, and Mary Magdalene on the left side of the cross and John the Baptist on the right, pointing to the figure of Christ. The majority of paintings of the Crucifixion show a crowd of onlookers as well as the main characters. Rembrandt dramatically depicts this in Christ Crucified Between the Two Thieves (also called The Three Crosses), a third state drypoint created in 1655. The central figure of Christ is brilliantly lit against a dark background. Mary Magdalene embraces the cross on the right, while a group of mounted soldiers look on indifferently on the left. The figure of the Virgin Mary is shown fainting on the right, while, lit below the cross on the left, the centurion kneels in awe. Some of the figures turn away while others shield their eyes from the brutality of the execution. In the center of the plate is an empty space, possibly to include the viewer.

Another version that includes a large cast of characters is the Raising of the Cross. This theme is depicted brilliantly in a triptych by the young Peter Paul Rubens (1609–1610, in the Antwerp Cathedral in Belgium) and by Rembrandt in a series on the Passion, death, and Resurrection of Christ, in Munich, Germany. In a 1634 version, Rembrandt includes himself in the painting; actually, he is the figure nailing Christ to the cross. Both the drypoint and the painting testify to the personal involvement of artist and viewers in the drama of Christ's betrayal and death. Artists earlier had included self-portraits in such scenes, as in Fra Angelico's San Marco paintings and in Pontormo's self-portrait in the upper right side of the Entombment (1525–1528) in the Capponi Chapel of Sta. Felicità in Florence.

Occasionally, a crucifix with the figure of Christ on it is included in a painting in which the Crucifixion is not a main event. Fra Angelico uses the technique in the San Marco altarpiece Madonna and Saints (circa 1438), in which the Crucifixion is placed in the bottom center of the painting to symbolize that the viewer is admitted to paradise only through Christ's sacrifice. Masaccio also used the Crucifixion as a painting within a painting in his 1426 Crucifixion on the summit of the Pisa polyptych, in Sta. Maria del Carmine in Pisa, Italy (now in the Museo di Capodimonte in Naples, Italy), and also in his Lenzi altarpiece, The Trinity (circa 1427–1428), in Sta. Maria Novella in Florence. A Crucifixion is included in Titian's St. Catherine of Alexandria in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, where the saint is shown worshipping the figure of Christ on the cross, and in Paul Gauguin's The Yellow Christ (1889), in the Albright-Knox Art Gallery in Buffalo, New York, which depicts Breton peasant women around a roadside crucifix. Caspar David Friedrich's Tetschen Altarpiece (1808), in Dresden, Germany, depicts only a carved wooden crucifix, lit by the setting rays of the sun, among rocks and fir trees, a deviation from the usual Crucifixion scene that shocked many nineteenth-century viewers.

A prefiguration of Christ's Crucifixion is referred to in John 3:14: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up." In the Old Testament in Numbers 21:6–9, Moses made a brazen serpent and lifted it up on a pole to cure the Israelites bitten by serpents, an image pictured vividly by Michelangelo on a spandrel fresco in the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican and painted by Rubens in Moses and the Brazen Serpent in the National Gallery in London.

Although much less numerous than paintings of Christ's Crucifixion, representations of the crucifixions of saints also occur. Caravaggio and Michelangelo depicted St. Peter on the cross, in Sta. Maria del Popolo in Rome and in the Pauline Chapel in the Vatican, respectively; St. Andrew was painted on a cross saltire by Domenichino, in S. Andrea della Valle in Rome, and by El Greco, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

Christ's Crucifixion is also shown as one of the 14 Stations of the Cross in the Roman Catholic Church. An outstanding modern presentation of the Stations of the Cross was created by Henri Matisse for the church in Vence, France, while a totally abstract version was created by Barnett Newman between 1960 and 1966. Now in the National Gallery in Washington, D.C., Newman's Twelfth Station (the Death of Christ on the Cross) is plunged in black, while the Fourteenth Station (the Entombment) is flooded with white and may point to the resurrection.

Throughout the history of Christianity, images of the Crucifixion reflect contemporary theological and political questions. This holds true for the twentieth century. Consider Marc Chagall's Crucifixions series, in which symbols of Judaism, such as a menorah, torah, and prayer shawl, surround Christ. A Russian Jew, Chagall witnessed the pogroms and the rise of Nazism. Surrealist Salvador Dalí painted several Crucifixions between 1951 and 1954. In The Christ of St. John of the Cross, in which he positions the viewer above and to the front of the crucified figure, he tried to replicate the vision of the Spanish mystic and to paint "the metaphysical beauty of Christ." Fascinated by cubical forms of matter, Dalí incorporated these forms in the unsupported cross of his Crucifixion or Corpus Hypercubicus (1954), declaring his wish to paint "the Christ who will be the absolute antithesis of the materialist and savagely anti-mystical of Grünewald" (Ades, p. 178).

Twentieth-century representations of the Crucifixion are particularly controversial because the inclusion of modernist abstractions often conflict with traditional views of religion. Germaine Richier's crucified Christ, created for the church at Assy, France, in 1950, for example, attracted much criticism for its abstract Giacometti-like style, its sexual ambiguities, and its facial indecipherability. In the 1980s, a scandal surrounded the work of Andres Serrano, Piss Christ, in which the artist photographed a crucifix submerged in a bottle of urine. The public uproar over that image confirms the lasting power of the Crucifixion to incite emotion.

The image of the Crucifixion at its most aesthetically moving was a personal inquiry on the part of the artist. It also posed important artistic, theoretical, theological, philosophical, political, and psychological challenges, particularly troublesome during the sixteenth century and, it might seem, during modern times as well.

In addition to the biblical account and to devotional literature, a major literary source for references to the Crucifixion is found in the Divine Poems of John Donne. Donne, a seventeenth-century Metaphysical poet, uses references to the Crucifixion in relation to his own life and to his knowledge of himself as a sinner, as in Holy Sonnet #II: "They killed once an inglorious man, but I Crucify him daily." This is most powerfully said in his poem Good Friday, 1613, Riding Westward, a meditation on the Crucifixion:

But that Christ on this cross, did rise and fall,
Sin had eternally benighted all.
Yet dare I almost be glad, I do not see
That spectacle of too much weight for me.
Who sees God's face, that is self life, must die;
What death were it then to see God die?

The metaphor of Crucifixion is used by St. Paul in Galatians 5:24: "And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." Here Crucifixion stands for a relinquishing and death of sin in the follower of Christ. In Galatians 6:14, Paul also speaks of the renunciation of sinful desires and the standards of the world in his own life: "But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Paul places the life of the believer in the context of Christ's life in Romans 6:6, 8: "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. . . . Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him."

The power of the metaphor of Crucifixion was used in a more secular sense by the orator William Jennings Bryan in a speech at the National Democratic Convention in 1896, when he inveighed against the gold standard for currency: "You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns. You shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold."

In the Christian concept of Crucifixion, two seemingly contradictory ideas are fused: the cross as a means of painful death and the cross as a path to eternal life through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ. What was the mark of a shameful death became a symbol of the new Christian religion, or as Paul said, "For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (I Corinthians 2:2). In the Crucifixion of Christ not only the sins of the world but its sufferings are portrayed and often identified with.

See also Death; Grieving/Lamentation; Martyrdom; Offering; Sacrifice

Selected Works of Art

Crucifixion of Polycrates

Rosa, Salvator, Crucifixion of Polycrates, etching,

1671-1672, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Rosa, Salvator, Crucifixion of Polycrates, oil on canvas, after 1672, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute

Crucifixion of Christ: Early Christian

Crucifixion, oval seals, fourth century, London, British Museum

Crucifixion, relief, ivory casket, early fifth century, London, British Museum

Crucifixion, carved wooden door, circa A.D. 430, Rome, St. Sabina

Crucifixion and the Holy Women at Christ's Tomb, Syriac manuscript, from Rabbula Gospels, A.D. 586, Florence, Italy, Laurentian Library

Crucifixion of Christ: Byzantine

Triptych of Khakhuli, ninth century, Tbilisi, Republic of Georgia

Crucifixion with Mary and John, ivory triptych, tenth century, London, British Museum

Crucifixion, eleventh century, Daphni, Greece, Monastery

Crucifixion of Christ: Medieval

Crucifixion, bronze, from a book cover, eighth century, Dublin, Ireland, National Museum of Ireland

Gero Crucifix, wood, circa 975–1000, Cologne, Germany, Cathedral

Christ on the Cross, bronze, circa 1070, Werden, Germany, Abbey Church

Crucifixion, panel on bronze doors, eleventh century, Hildesheim, Germany, Cathedral

Crucifixion, left tympanum, west portal, thirteenth century, Reims, France, Cathedral

Cimabue, Crucifix, painting, circa 1280–1285, Florence, Italy, Santa Croce

Crucifixion of Christ: Renaissance

Giotto, The Crucifixion, fresco, circa 1305–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Bulgarini, Bartolommeo, The Crucifixion, circa 1335, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Daddi, Bernardo, Crucifixion, painting, fourteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Duccio, Crucifixion, circa 1310–1320, London, Buckingham Palace

Master of St. Veronica, Crucifixion, painting, 1400–1410, Washington, D.C., National Gallery

Spinello, Aretino, Crucifixion, tempera on panel, circa 1400, Worcester, Massachusetts, Worcester Art Museum

Masaccio, Crucifixion, painting, 1426, Pisa Santa Maria del Carmine, now in Naples, Italy, Museo e Galleria Nazionali di Capodimonte

Masaccio, The Trinity, fresco, circa 1428, Florence, Italy, Museo di Santa Maria Novella

Angelico, Fra, Crucifixion, fresco, 1435–1445, Florence, Italy, St. Mark

Angelico, Fra, Madonna and Saints, painting, circa 1438, Florence, Italy, San Marco

Angelico, Fra, Mystical Crucifixion, fresco, circa 1440, Florence, Italy, San Marco, Chapter House

Bellini, Giovanni, Crucifixion, 1455, Venice, Italy, Museo Correr

Mantegna, Andrea, Crucifixion, panel, from the predella of the Saint Zeno Altarpiece, 1456–1459, Paris, Louvre

Castagno, Andrea del, Crucifixion, circa 1470, Budapest, Hungary

Gaddi, Taddeo, Crucifixion, painting, late fourteenth century, Florence, Italy, Academia

Monaco, Lorenzo, Crucifixion, late fourteenth or early fifteenth century, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery

Cleve, Joos van, Crucifixion, circa 1485, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Perugino, The Crucifixion, oil, 1485, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Crivelli, Carlo, Crucifixion, painting, circa 1490, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute

Francia, Francisco, Calvary with Saint John at the Foot of the Cross, painting, late fifteenth or early sixteenth century, Paris, Louvre

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, The Penance of Saint Jerome, painting, 1502, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorische Museum

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Crucifixion, panel, 1503, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorische Museum

Grünewald, Matthias, Crucifixion, oil on panel, Isenheim Altarpiece, 1510–1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden

Dürer, Albrecht, Great Crucifixion, painting, 1511, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorische Museum

Leyden, Lucas van, Calvary, engraving, 1517

Pontormo, Jacopo, Entombment, painting, 1515–1528, Florence, Italy, St. Felicità, Capponi Chapel

Burgkmair, Hans the Elder, Triptych of the Crucifixion, painting, 1519, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Cardinal Albrecht von Brandenburg as Saint Jerome in the Wilderness, panel, 1527, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

Cranach, Lucas the Elder and the Younger, Crucifixion with an Allegory of Redemption, panel, 1555, Weimar, Germany, Stadtkirche

Pontormo, Jacopo, copy after Crucifixion, painting, sixteenth century, Berlin, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin

Michelangelo, Crucifixion, drawing, 1550s, Paris, Louvre

Michelangelo, Crucifixion, drawing, 1550s, London, British Museum

Michelangelo, Crucifixion, drawing, 1550s, Windsor, England, Royal Library

Titian, Saint Catherine of Alexandria, painting, circa 1567–1568, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Tintoretto, Crucifixion, painting, 1554, Venice, Italy, Academia

Tintoretto, Crucifixion, oil on canvas, 1566–1567, Venice, Italy, Scuola di San Rocco, Sala dell'Albergo

Crucifixion of Christ: Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Rubens, Peter Paul, Raising of the Cross, triptych, 1609–1610, Antwerp, Belgium, Cathedral

Rubens, Peter Paul, Descent from the Cross, painting, circa 1612, Saint-Omar, France, Cathedral

Rubens, Peter Paul, Three Crosses, circa 1620, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans-Van Beuningen

Zurbarán, Francisco, Crucifixion, 1627, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
 Velázquez, Diego, The Crucifixion (Christ on the Cross), oil, 1631–1632, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Raising of the Cross, oil, 1633, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek, Gemäldegalerie
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Descent from the Cross, oil, 1633, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek, Gemäldegalerie
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Ascension, oil, 1636, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek, Gemäldegalerie
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Entombment, oil, 1639, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek, Gemäldegalerie
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Resurrection, oil, 1639, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek, Gemäldegalerie
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Christ Crucified Between Two Crosses (The Three Crosses), drypoint, 1653, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
 Terbrugghen, Crucifixion, painting, 1626, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Crucifixion of Christ: Nineteenth Century

Friedrich, Caspar David, Tetschen Altarpiece, oil, 1808, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Prud'hon, Pierre-Paul, Crucifixion, 1822, Paris, Louvre
 Préault, Augustin, Crucifixion, wood sculpture, 1840–1846, Paris, Saint-Germain-Saint-Protais
 Delacroix, Eugène, Christ on the Cross, oil, 1846, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Delacroix, Eugène, Crucifixion, pastel, circa 1846–1852, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada
 Flandrin, Hippolyte-Jean, Crucifixion, mural painting, circa 1860, Paris, Saint-Germain-des-Près
 Bonnat, Léon, Crucifixion, oil on canvas, 1874, Paris, Musée du Petit Palais
 Morot, Aimé-Nicolas, The Martyrdom of Jesus of Nazareth, oil on canvas, 1883, Nancy Musée des Beaux Arts
 Gauguin, Paul, The Yellow Christ, oil, 1889, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Art Gallery
 Denis, Maurice, Orange Christ, 1889, Alençon, France, Collection J. F. Denis
 Lacombe, Georges, Crucifixion, wood sculpture, 1899, Brest, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Crucifixion of Christ: Twentieth Century

Munch, Edvard, Golgotha, 1900, Oslo, Norway, Munch Museet
 Rouault, Georges, Crucifixion, oil, circa 1918, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
 Spencer, Stanley, Crucifixion, 1921, Aberdeen Art Gallery Museum
 Corinth, Lovis, The Red Christ, oil, 1922, Munich, Germany, Neue Sammlung
 Picasso, Pablo, Crucifixion, 1930, Paris, Musée Picasso
 Johnson, William Henry, Mr. Calvary, circa 1939, Washington, D.C., Smithsonian Institution, National Collection of the Fine Arts
 Chagall, Marc, Crucifixion, oil on canvas, 1943, Pierre Matisse Gallery, collection of the artist

Sutherland, Graham, Christ, sculpture, 1950, Assy, France, Church de Plateau
 Matisse, Henri, The Stations of the Cross, 1951, Venice, Italy, Chapel of the Rosary
 Dalí, Salvador, Christ and Saint John of the Cross, oil on canvas, 1951, Glasgow, Art Gallery and Museum
 Dalí, Salvador, Crucifixion or Corpus Hypercubicus, 1954, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Richier, Germaine, Crucified Christ, sculpture, 1950, Assay, France
 Bacon, Francis, Three Studies for a Crucifixion, 1962, New York, Guggenheim Museum
 Newman, Barnett, Twelfth Station of the Cross: Death of Christ on the Cross, oil, 1965, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Newman, Barnett, Fourteenth Station of the Cross: Entombment, oil, 1965, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Chagall, Marc, Crucifixion, lithograph, 1972
 Serrano, Andres, Piss Christ, photograph, 1988

Crucifixion of St. Peter

Masaccio, Crucifixion of Saint Peter, panel from the predella of the Pisa polyptych, 1426, Berlin, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin
 Michelangelo, The Crucifixion of Peter, fresco, 1540s, Rome, Vatican Capella Paolina
 Caravaggio, The Crucifixion of Peter, oil, 1600–1601, Rome, Cerasi Chapel, St. Maria del Popolo

Crucifixion of St. Andrew

El Greco, Saint Andrew, painting, circa 1590, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Domenichino, Saint Andrew, early seventeenth century, Rome, St. Andrea della Valle

Typological Prefiguration of the Crucifixion

Rubens, Peter Paul, Moses and the Brazen Serpent, painting, circa 1635–1640, London, National Gallery

Further Reading

Ades, Dawn, Dalí, London: Thames and Hudson, 1982; New York: Thames and Hudson, 1989
 Apostolos-Cappadona, Diane, “Christ on the Cross: A Study in Image,” Liturgy 23:5 (1978)
 Bainton, Roland, Behold the Christ, New York: Harper, 1974
 Brown, Stephanie, Religious Painting: Christ's Passion and Crucifixion, Oxford: Phaidon, 1978
 Carroll, Margaret Deutsch, “Rembrandt as Meditational Printmaker,” The Art Bulletin LXIII:4 (December 1981)
 Donne, John, The Complete English Poems, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1978
 Getlein, Frank, George Roualt's "Miserere", Milwaukee, Wisconsin: Bruce, 1964

- Henkes, Robert, The Crucifixion in American Painting: 80 American Painters and the Crucifixion Theme, New York: Gordon Press, 1977
- Marrow, James H., Passion Iconography in Northern European Art of the Late Middle Ages and Early Renaissance, Kortrijk, Belgium: Van Ghemmert, 1979
- Moore, P. G., "Cross and Crucifixion in Christian Iconography," Religion: A Journal of Religion and Religions 4 (1974)
- Pocknee, Cyril Edward, Cross and Crucifix in Christian Worship and Devotion, London: A. R. Mowbray, 1962
- Raw, Barbara Catherine, Anglo-Saxon Crucifixion Iconography and the Art of the Monastic Revival, Cambridge, New York: University of Cambridge, 1990
- Sass, Else Kai, Comments on Rembrandt's Passion Paintings and Constantijn Huygen's Iconography, Copenhagen, Denmark: Munksgaard, 1971
- Serillaz, Maurice, Christ on the Cross, London: M. Parrish, 1947
- Smith, G., "On the Original Arrangement of Pontormo's Passion Cycle," Zeitschrift für Kunstgeschichte 42 (1979)
- Steinberg, Leo, Michelangelo's Last Paintings: The Conversion of St. Paul and the Crucifixion of St. Peter in the Cappella Paolina, Vatican Palace, New York: Oxford University Press, 1975; London: Phaidon, 1975
- Talbot, C. W., "An Interpretation of Two Paintings by Cranach in the Artist's Late Style," Report and Studies in the History of Art (1967)
- Thoby, Paul, Le Crucifix des Origines au Concile de Trente, Nantes, France: Bellanger, 1959
- Todd, Alden L., and Dorothy B. Weisbord, Favorite Subjects in Western Art, New York: Dutton, 1968

DAMNED SOULS

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following periods and cultures are covered in the discussion of the theme Damned Souls:

ANCIENT CLASSICAL CHRISTIAN

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES
NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY
JAPANESE
CAMBODIAN

Albrecht Dürer, Christ's Descent into Limbo, 1510, woodcut, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums, bequest of Grenville L. Winthrop. (Courtesy of the Harvard University Art Museums, Cambridge, Massachusetts)

The term damned souls is often applied to the dead in hell, Hades, or some sort of underworld that is the opposite of heaven, paradise, or an afterworld of bliss, the reward for good deeds, right thoughts, and pious living. Damned souls are usually pictured in a place of fire and brimstone with demons and devils to torment them as a punishment for their evil deeds and sinful living. However, damned souls can also define people still living who are under a burden of guilt and sin, tormented more by their own consciences than by any external agency. Their consciousness of damnation is within, a living hell. This state is described by Christopher Marlowe in Dr. Faustus (1616):

Hell hath no limits, nor is circumscribed
In one self-place; for where we are is Hell
And where Hell is, there must we ever be.
(Dr. Faustus, act I, scene 5, lines 135–137)

The feeling of damnation does not have to go with a religious belief in the existence of hell but can be seen in modern psychological terms as a guilt complex.

The belief in damnation, damned souls, or a place where sinners are punished after death is not a particularly Western or Christian belief. It occurs in a number of cultures both Oriental and Occidental and can be traced back to ancient times in one of the earliest known pieces of literature: 14 Sumerian tablets, which date from 2000 B.C. The tablets relate the myth of the descent to the netherworld by the Sumerian goddess Inanna, but identified in the tablets as Ishtar, Inanna's Semitic counterpart. It tells of Inanna, queen of heaven and goddess of love, visiting the netherworld, perhaps to free Tammuz, her lover. The queen of the netherworld is Inanna's older sister and enemy, Ereshkigal. Inanna fears Ereshkigal will put her to death, so she makes provisions for the other gods to rescue her if she does not return in three days. To get to the kingdom of Ereshkigal, Inanna must pass seven gates, and at each she leaves an article of clothing or jewelry so that she arrives naked before Ereshkigal and seven dreaded judges in an underworld complete with demons and the torture of sinners. Ereshkigal condemns her either to death (one source) or to a torture of 60 miseries; however, the god Enki sends messengers to bring Inanna back, and she revives and returns to Earth.

The concept of damned souls also occurs in Etruscan art beginning in about 350 B.C. At this time, Charun, a bluish green demon, first appears and is later joined by an army of demons in the underworld. He appears on the walls of the tomb of Orcus I in Tarquinia, Italy, and murals in the tomb of Orcus II also depict the king and queen of the netherworld, Hades and Persephone. Before the mid-fourth century B.C., the walls of the tombs at Tarquinia and Cerveteri had depicted scenes of dancing and merriment, but later they depict an increasingly fearsome underworld, with demons tormenting the damned souls.

In classical literature, Hades, as he was known to the Greeks, or his Roman counterpart, Pluto, brother of Zeus (Jupiter) and Poseidon (Neptune), is monarch of a gloomy kingdom of death. During Odysseus's visit to the underworld in book XI of the Odyssey, Homer describes the everlasting torments of such damned souls as Tityus, whose liver was eaten by a pair of vultures; Tantalus, who suffered hunger and thirst because food and water were always just out of reach; and Sisyphus, who forever strained to push a boulder uphill only to have it crash down again. Virgil's Aeneid (19 B.C.) also contains a section on damned souls. In book 6, Aeneas visits Tartarus, ferried by Charon, to see his dead father, Anchises.

From within loud groans are heard, and wailings of dismay
The whistling scourge, the fetters dank and din
Shrieks, as of tortured fiends, and all the sounds of sin.
(Aeneid, book 6, stanza 73)

At Avernus, where Rhadamanthus judges the dead and metes out punishment, Aeneas sees Tityus tortured by vultures, and he speaks of sinners rolling boulders uphill and others hung on wheels, racked with endless woe.

Although hell and damned souls are often associated with Christian tradition, very little Scripture refers to this subject. The Gospel According to Luke (16:19–31) tells the story of the rich man Dives, who goes to hell and is tormented by flames, and Revelation (20:12–15) refers to a Last Judgment. Revelation 21:8 is the closest to a description of damned souls:

But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death.

The Bible makes it very clear that souls are judged by their own deeds, not by an external, arbitrary standard.

The Christian tradition associates the time between Jesus Christ's death on Good Friday and his resurrection on Easter Sunday with his visit to hell or Limbo. The Apostles' Creed declares: "He descended into Hell. The third day he rose again from the dead. He ascended into Heaven." This descent to the dead has further been explained as Christ's releasing the righteous of the Old Testament, from Adam and Eve on, from the bonds of hell into the everlasting life that his death purchased. This event is commonly called the harrowing of hell, from an Old English word meaning "to rob" or "to take away" (in this case, from Satan's power). Often in art and literature Christ is pictured lifting Adam or Adam and Eve from the underworld. The drama of this scene inspired German artist Albrecht Dürer to portray it at least three times in woodcuts and engraved prints between 1509 and 1512. In all the Dürer representations, Christ stretches his hand out to figures below him, and released souls stand in an archway on one side, while grotesque demons look on. The nude figures of Adam and Eve have already been released, and in some representations Adam still clutches the apple. The souls in these representations are “saved,” not “damned,” and it is significant in Christian theology that Christ’s first act in the afterlife is the pardoning and release of souls rather than their damnation.

Like the Crucifixion, the theme of damnation and damned souls is not known to occur in early Christian art. Allegorical references to the good shepherd separating the sheep from the goats are found, for example, in an early sixth-century mosaic in S. Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna, Italy. In the medieval era, however, the representation of damned souls, especially in Last Judgment scenes, became increasingly popular. This is particularly true in the sculpture of Romanesque and Gothic churches where, in the tympanum or lunette over the entrance, the fate of those who do not live a righteous life serves as a warning. The Last Judgment usually portrays Christ as judge and St. Michael as the weigher of souls, with the righteous joining the blessed on the right hand of God and the damned souls hauled away by gloating demons on the left (or sinister) side of God. The fate of damned souls is shown in the west tympanum of Autun Cathedral in France (circa 1130–1135), where the terror of the damned and the hideousness of the demons are particularly expressive. This scene is matched in Gothic sculpture by the damned souls on Lorenzo Maitani’s facade of Orvieto Cathedral in Italy (circa 1320). The anatomy of the tormented souls in Orvieto is more correct than that of Autun, but the expression of terror and hopelessness is in no way blunted; rather, it is increased by identification with the humanity of the figures. Giotto’s painting created an equally terrifying vision of damned souls in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy (1305–1306).

In painting, damned souls are portrayed extremely graphically by Hubert and Jan van Eyck in the Last Judgment (circa 1420–1425, in the Metropolitan Museum in New York), with figures rising from graves on Earth and in the sea and the damned cast down in the lower center portion of the painting, under a grinning skeleton. Flemish painter Rogier van der Weyden’s fall of the damned in his Last Judgment (1446, in the Hôtel Dieu in Beaune, France) has the falling figures assume the features of the sins they committed in life. One of the most frightening portrayals of damned souls is in Hieronymus Bosch’s Garden of Earthly Delights (circa 1500, in the Prado in Madrid, Spain), in which the right panel of the triptych portrays a hallucinatory and almost surrealistic hell.

During the early Renaissance in Italy, Christ’s deliverance of souls from hell was depicted in works by Fra Angelico (in San Marco in Florence, Italy), Giovanni Bellini (in the Bristol Art Gallery in England), Duccio di Buoninsegna (in the Opera del Duomo in Siena, Italy), and Andrea Mantegna. A less charitable view is presented by Luca Signorelli’s frescoes of The Damned Cast into Hell (1499–1500, in S. Brixio Chapel at the Orvieto Cathedral), which offers an excellent opportunity to study the artist’s mastery of human anatomy. Another early Renaissance representation of damned souls can be seen in Botticelli’s drawings for Dante’s Inferno (1492–1497, in the Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz in Berlin, Germany).

Perhaps the greatest vision of damned souls is in Michelangelo’s Last Judgment fresco (1534–1541, in the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican). In it, Michelangelo offered himself for judgment: he included a self-portrait on the flayed skin held by St. Bartholomew to the right of Christ. At the bottom of the representation, instead of a fiery mouth of hell, Charon, the mythological ferryman, carries damned souls to the netherworld. This raised the question for one art historian whether Michelangelo, who belonged to a liberal group of Roman Catholic thinkers, might have meant to imply that hell itself was a myth. This theory, however, seems unlikely because Charon as a ferryman in hell had already appeared in a Christian context in Dante Alighieri’s Divine Comedy in the early fourteenth century; and a view of hell as a mythic world would have been heretical in both Dante’s and Michelangelo’s times.

In the seventeenth century, the staring eyes and gaping mouth of Gian Lorenzo Bernini’s Baroque marble representation Damned Soul (or Anima Dannata) (circa 1619, in the Palazzo de Spagna in Italy) brought expressiveness of features to dramatic heights. This expressiveness is equaled on a grand scale by Peter Paul Rubens’s painting The Fall of the Damned (circa 1620, in Munich, Germany), in which the nude bodies of the damned are inextricably intertwined in a terrifying spiral downward.

The topic of damnation was not very popular in the Age of Reason, but representations of damned souls again become more prevalent in the late eighteenth century, thanks to John Flaxman’s illustrations for Dante’s Divine Comedy, published in 1793 and much copied by nineteenth-century artists. The young Eugène Delacroix showed Dante and Virgil in the Underworld (also called the Barque of Dante) in the Salon of 1822, peopling the water around Charon’s boat with a variety of damned souls. William Blake’s illustrations of Dante’s Divine Comedy, made between 1824 and 1827, depict an encyclopedia of damned souls, from The Whirlwind of Lovers, which contains the ill-fated Paolo Malatesta and Francesca da Rimini, to The Self Murderers and The Blasphemers. Here Blake’s style of dematerialized bodies in expressive poses perfectly matches the portraits of Dante’s epic. Gustave Doré’s Illustrations to Dante’s Inferno (1865) lack the imaginative power of Blake’s vision, except in a few instances.

Auguste Rodin’s Gates of Hell, incomplete at the time of the sculptor’s death in 1917, presents a modernized version of Dante’s Inferno combined with Charles Baudelaire’s Les Fleurs du mal, poems of nineteenth-century life and lust. The Gates of Hell depicts familiar characters described in the Inferno, such as Ugolino and his sons, but the fluidity of form suggests the unfulfilled restlessness of Rodin’s contemporaries. In a sense, all those portrayed in the reliefs are damned souls, from the prodigal son to Paolo and Francesca and “She Who Was Once the Helmet-Maker’s Beautiful Wife,” or the old courtesan. All appear beneath the brooding figure of the thinker above the door in various poses of despair or flight, an encyclopedia of angst and loss.

In literature, the greatest compendium of damned souls is surely Dante’s Inferno, completed shortly before his death in 1308. In it, in addition to classic sinners, such as traitors and usurers, he featured a number of his contemporary enemies in Florentine politics, such as Filippo Argenti and Farinata degli Uberti. Their punishments run the gamut from lakes of ice to searing fire; the more extreme the sin, the greater the punishment in this encyclopedia of sinners and damned souls. As Dante dealt with a community of the damned, Christopher

Marlowe's play Dr. Faustus (1616) dealt with the subject of individual damnation in which a man sells his soul to the devil (Mephistopheles) to gain his goals. This work probably was the origin of selling one's soul to the devil to succeed. Marlowe's Dr. Faustus also inspired artists, among them Delacroix and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. In the seventeenth century, John Milton dealt with the problem of Satan and damned souls in Paradise Lost. In it, he dramatized the sense of personal damnation within a person's consciousness, and not in any place, metaphorical or metaphysical:

Which way shall I fly?
Infinite wrath and infinite despair?
Which way I fly is hell; myself am hell.
(Paradise Lost, book III, line 73)

Arthur Rimbaud echoed this view in A Season in Hell in 1875, which portrays the poet as a damned soul.

In the twentieth century, secularized visions of damned souls were presented in George Bernard Shaw's Don Juan in Hell and Jean-Paul Sartre's No Exit, in which the devil is urbane and the demons are interior, although no less powerful for being so. Literary critic and Christian scholar C. S. Lewis gave an up-to-date version of temptation and damnation in The Screwtape Letters, in which an elderly, experienced fiend counsels his young protégé on the latest techniques of producing a damned soul. Lewis also pictured a modern view of damned souls in The Great Divorce, in which addiction is shown overcome and where pride creates individual hells for its adherents as they move away from an unbearable source of goodness and mercy in God.

In Drawings for Dante's Inferno (1959–1960, in the Museum of Modern Art in New York), Robert Rauschenberg used the technique of solvent transfer—transferring magazine clippings pasted with lighter fluid onto the paper—with collage, watercolor, and pencil drawing added. His Dante was a man wrapped in a towel from a Sports Illustrated magazine advertisement for golf clubs, and the image of Adlai Stevenson became Virgil, Dante's guide and mentor. Wall Street businessmen appear as corrupt Florentine politicians, and athletes from Sports Illustrated appear in a number of roles in his 34 illustrations of the 34 Inferno cantos. The figures appear within a swirling haze of pencil strokes and dismembered body parts. His choice of agonized heads for the heretics, the divines, and the inhabitants in Malebolge is particularly telling. The colors used also have significance: white for heaven, ocher for the stench of Malebolge, yellow and orange-red for clerics, and dark red for blood.

Another example of twentieth-century reference to an older work of art is Martha Clarke's inspired 1984 production The Garden of Earthly Delights, which depicted the three panels of Hieronymus Bosch's painting. The third act of this dance, music, and drama production brought the damned souls of Bosch's Hell panel into vivid being by means of musical instruments. The instruments were scraped raucously as dancers floated on trapezes amid the caperings of assorted demons and sinners.

The concept of damned souls tormented in an afterlife appears in a number of cultures. In addition to the record of Sumer and the weighing of souls in Egyptian art and literature, vivid depictions occur in Japan and Cambodia. In Japanese art of the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries, Fujiwara

Nobuzane created an account of the life of Michizone, in which the spirit of his enemy Tokihira is carried to a flaming hell by devils who torture him for four long horrible scrolls. Another Japanese tale tells of a man with an unlovable, mean mother who died and went to hell while the son went to heaven. He felt it was his duty to get his mother out of such a bad place, and Buddha said if he could find one good deed his mother had done, she would be released. He remembered that she had given a leek to a hungry beggar—her one act of charity. When the leek was lowered to draw her up from hell, it broke because it was rotten, just like the one she had given the beggar, and she was not able to leave hell.

At the Angkor Wat temple complex in Cambodia, relief sculpture shows heaven and hell, with a Last Judgment by Yoma, the Hindu lord of death. The damned souls are punished in a hell of many hideous tortures, while those going to heaven are saved by celestial ladies filled with inextinguishable amorous desire. What happened to heaven-bound females does not seem to be represented, a rather one-sided view. Suffice it to say that the idea of damned souls, whether dead in places of torment or living a doomed existence in this life, seems to be widespread among a number of cultures.

See also Ascent/Descent; Sin/Sinning; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Etruscan Wall Paintings, 350 B.C., tombs of Orcus I and

Orcus II, Tarquinia, Italy

Nude Goddess: Ereshkigal, Queen of the Underworld, Mesopotamian terra-cotta figure, London, British Museum

Dumuzi in the Underworld, Flanked by Snakes,

Mesopotamian cylinder seal, London, British Museum

Anubis Weighing the Heart Against the Feather of Maat, from Funerary Papyrus of Princess Entiu-ny, Egyptian, from Thebes, Tomb of Queen Meryet-Amun, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Classical

Achelous Painter, Labor of Sisyphus, black-figure amphora, late sixth century B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek

Hades' Kingdom, Greek vase painting

Persephone Painter, Hermes Leading Persephone from the Underworld, Athenian krater, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Titian, Sisyphus, part of The Four Condemned Series, 1548–1549, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Ribera, Jusepe de, Sisyphus, circa 1634, copy, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Giordano, Luca, Sisyphus, circa 1705, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshus

Christian

Hell, Byzantine mosaic, twelfth century, Torcello, Italy, Cathedral

Damned Souls, relief, west tympanum, circa 1130–1135, Autun, France, Cathedral

Hell, mosaic, circa 1300, Florence, Italy, Baptistery, Cupola
 Giotto, The Last Judgment, fresco, circa 1305–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
 Maitani, Lorenzo, The Last Judgment, relief on facade, circa 1320, Orvieto, Italy, Cathedral
 Nardo di Cione, Last Judgment: Hell, fresco, 1350s, Florence, Italy, St. Maria Novella, Strozzi Chapel
 Limburg Brothers, Hell, manuscript illumination from Très Riches Heurs du Duc de Berry, circa 1416, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé (Ms. 65, fol. 64v)
 Traini, Francesco, Last Judgment and Inferno, fresco, mid-fourteenth century, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santo Weyden, Rogier van der, The Last Judgment, oil, 1446, Beaune, France, Hôtel Dieu
 Botticelli, illustrations to Inferno, by Dante, 1480s and early 1490s, Berlin, Kupferstichkabinett; Rome, Vatican Library
 Signorello, Luca, The Damned Cast into Hell, fresco, 1499–1500, Orvieto, Italy, St. Brixio Chapel
 Bosch, Hieronymus, Garden of Earthly Delights: Hell, oil, circa 1505, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Albrecht Dürer, Christ's Descent into Limbo, 1510, woodcut, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums
 Michelangelo, The Last Judgment, fresco, 1534–1541, Rome, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Anima Dannata, sculpture, circa 1619, Rome, Palazzo di Spagna
 Swanenburgh, Jacob van, Charon's Boat, before 1638, Leiden, The Netherlands, Stedelijk Museum de Lakenhal
 Rubens, Peter Paul, The Fall of the Damned, oil, circa 1620, Munich, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Subleyras, Pierre, Charon Passing the Shades, before 1749, Paris, Louvre
 Flaxman, John, A Soul Appearing Before the Judges in Hades, drawing, circa 1783, Cambridge, England, Fitzwilliam Museum

Nineteenth Century

Delacroix, Eugène, Dante and Virgil in the Underworld, oil, 1822, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Blake, William, The Whirlwind of Lovers, illustrations to Divine Comedy, by Dante, 1824–1827, London, Tate Gallery
 Delacroix, Eugène, Seventeen Lithographs on Goethe's Faust, 1827, Paris, Bibliothèque National de France
 Burne-Jones, Edward, Souls on the Bank of the River Styx, 1871–1872, London, Nahum Collection

Twentieth Century

Rauschenberg, Robert, Thirty-four Drawings for Dante's

Inferno, 1959–1960, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Clarke, Martha, Garden of Earthly Delights, performance based on Hieronymus Bosch's triptych, 1980s

Japanese

Nobuzane, Fujiwara, Hell Episodes, four scrolls in Life of Michizone, late twelfth century or early thirteenth century, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts, Fenellosa Collection

Cambodian

Judgment of Yoma, Hindu Lord of Death, stone relief, Angkor Wat

Further Reading

Alighieri, Dante, The Divine Comedy
 Alloway, Lawrence, Robert Rauschenberg, Drawings, 1958–1968, New York: Acquavella Contemporary Art, 1986
 Ashton, Dore, Rauschenberg: XXXIV Drawings for Dante's Inferno, New York: Abrams, 1969
 Brendel, Otto J., Etruscan Art, New York and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1978
 Camporesi, Piero, The Fear of Hell: Images of Damnation and Salvation in Early Modern Europe, translated by Lucinda Byatt, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1991; Cambridge: Polity, 1991
 Alighieri, Dante, The Divine Comedy
 Elsen, Albert E., Rodin's Gates of Hell, Minneapolis, Minnesota: 1960
 Fenollosa, Ernest F., Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art, volume one, New York: Dover, 1963
 Forge, Andrew, Rauschenberg, New York: Abrams, 1969
 Kotz, Mary Lynn, Rauschenberg: Art and Life, New York: Abrams, 1990
 Kramer, Samuel Noah, Sumerian Mythology, New York: Harper, 1966
 Lewis, Clive Staples, The Great Divorce, London and New York: Macmillan, 1945
 ———, The Screwtape Letters, London: Centenary Press, 1942; New York: Macmillan, 1942
 Marlowe, Christopher, Dr. Faustus in Works and Life, ed. by R. H. Case, New York: Macmillan, 1966
The Odyssey of Homer, translated by E. V. Rieu, Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, 1970
 Shaw, George Bernard, Don Juan in Hell, London: Hamlyn, 1965
 Steinberg, Leo, "Michelangelo's Last Judgment as a Merciful Heresy?" Art in America (November 1975)
 Virgil, The Aeneid, translated by F. Fairfax Taylor, London: J. M. Dent, 1943

DANCE/DANCERS/DANCING

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following subjects are covered in the discussion of the theme Dance/Dancers/Dancing:

ANCIENT

ETRUSCAN

MYTHOLOGICAL SUBJECTS

BIBLICAL SUBJECTS

DANCE OF DEATH

BALLET AND FORMAL DANCE

ALLEGORICAL

FOLK

NON-WESTERN

MODERN

PHOTOGRAPHY

Siva as Nataraja (Lord of Dancers), circa sixteenth–seventeenth century, bronze, South India, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Marianne Brimmer Fund. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

Through the centuries, the many occasions and uses for dance have included fertility rites, creation embodiment, entertainment, healing, war and victory dances, dramatic dances reenacting earlier events, community rituals, and individual performances. The different types of dance range from the orgiastic, such as Dionysian rites, to the formal measures of a minuet or a ballet performance and to self-expression in modern dance. Dances may be all-female, all-male, mixed, costumed, masked, sacred, or secular. It is impossible to cover the great variety of meanings, uses, and expressions of dance in human history without writing an encyclopedia. This account will encompass primarily dance in art, a category that covers eras from before 2000 B.C. to the twentieth century.

The most ancient forms of dance were probably fertility dances to increase crops, animal populations, and the tribe itself. These included rain dances, which are still practiced among some Native American and African peoples. Mimetic magic is invoked in the fertility dance of the Bambara tribe of Mali, in which antelope-head masks are worn by dancers impersonating male and female antelopes. They dance in the fields to bring fertility to the land. Harvest dances are another form of fertility rite, often performed around a sacred tree in European, African, and Native American rituals. This custom still exists in England as the Maypole dance. These dances are community festivals, totally different in function from erotic dances, such as the dance of the seven veils, representations of Salome's dance, or the more contemporary striptease.

One of the most significant forms of dance is the cosmic Hindu ritual of creation in the dance of Siva Nataraja in South India, represented in a number of bronze sculptures, many from the twelfth century. In Hindu doctrine, the dance of Siva expresses his role as nataraja, or the lord of the cosmic dance, and represents the union of time and space in which Siva is creator, preserver, and destroyer of the world. According to Hindu legend, when Siva danced, the world was shaken; and when begged to stop, he consented to delay the dance until the end of the world, when it would become a dance of final destruction. In the cosmic dance, Siva is usually represented with four arms. In his upper-right hand he holds a little drum, which creates the beat of time. His second right hand is in a "fear-dispelling" position, while his extended left hand holds the flame of spiritual light. The lower-left hand across his chest points to the raised foot signifying teaching, the left foot lifted symbolizes release, and the right foot on the back of a dwarf drives souls into the vortex of rebirth. The god's right earring is a man's; his left, a woman's, for the figure includes and transcends opposites. His wildly streaming hair is that of a yogi; the skull in it is an attribute of his role as lord of death opposite a crescent moon symbolizing birth. In this representation of the cosmic dance, past, present, and future are included, both time and the end of time, a truly extraordinary achievement of this type of Indian art and philosophy. Also dating from this early era are sacred dances in the temples of India, Indonesia, Africa, and among Native Americans.

In ancient art and literature, dance appears very early in a painted relief of dancers doing a high kick in unison in the Tomb of Mehu at Saqqara, Egypt, in the sixth dynasty before 2000 B.C. These appear to be dancing girls entertaining at a banquet, possibly an early version of the Rockettes. In Sumerian literature, the myth of Inanna's (or Ishtar's) descent to the netherworld, inscribed on 14 tablets dating from about 2000 B.C., may be the origin of the dance of the seven veils. Inanna leaves a garment or veil at each of the seven gates leading to her elder sister's kingdom, so that she arrives naked in the underworld. Another type of dance of the ancient world were the rites that accompanied Etruscan funerals. These are shown in frescoes at Tarquinia, Italy: The Tomb of the Leopards (480 B.C.), the Tombs of the Lionesses, and the Tomb of the Banquet (the last two from a slightly later date). The frescoes depict pipers, wine carriers, and all the festivity of a banquet, as well as dancers.

Another form of dancing in classical myth tells of the dance of the Curetes (often confused with the Corybantes) around the baby Zeus, who is destined to be king of the gods. His father, Cronus, fearing the oracle's prediction that a child of his would supplant him, swallowed his children, but Zeus was hidden by his mother, Rhea. Her attendants, the Curetes, danced with swords clashing on their shields so that Cronus would not hear the baby's crying and realize that he had not devoured him.

In the classical myth of Theseus, as Mary Renault has suggested in The King Must Die, the seven youths and seven maidens that were sent to Crete as tribute were actually trained as bull dancers in the bullring; and the so-called Toreador Fresco (circa 1500 B.C.) at Iráklion, Crete, showing a youth leaping through the bull's horns, may be part of a ceremonial dance. Another type of dance associated with Theseus, called Ariadne's dance, was an imitation of a maze or labyrinth, performed as she gave Theseus the ball of thread he used to trace his way out of the Cretan labyrinth after he succeeded in killing the Minotaur.

In ancient Greece, the followers of Dionysus, the god of wine, always included dancing maenads, which are pictured on many Greek vases and sculptural reliefs. Bacchus, the ancient Roman counterpart of Dionysus, also inspired wild, intoxicated dancing among his followers. Bacchanals are often depicted on Roman sarcophagi (such as the Sarcophagus with Triumphal Procession of Dionysus, A.D. 215–225, in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston), perhaps with the hope that the afterlife will be a happy dance with wine, women, and song. The classical bacchanal dance was often depicted in Renaissance and later paintings, in such works as Titian's Bacchanal of the Andrians (1520, in the Prado in Madrid, Spain) and Nicolas Poussin's Bacchanal Before a Herm of Pan (1630s, now in the Guildhall Art Gallery in London).

Still another classical example was dances of war, such as the Greek Pyrrhic dance. The theme was successfully appropriated in the nineteenth century by Lawrence Alma-Tadema in his painting The Pyrrhic Dance, for the Royal Academy exhibition of 1869. It was a great success, although the critic John Ruskin said of it: "The general effect was exactly like a microscopic view of a small detachment of black-beetles in search of a dead rat."

Dances are also part of the biblical tradition. One of the earliest mentioned in the Old Testament is the Dance of Miriam, celebrating the deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Exodus 15:20–21). Another reference to dance occurs when the Israelites made a golden calf and danced around it (Exodus 32:1–20). The scene was depicted by Raphael, Tintoretto, Poussin, and Claude Lorraine, among others. When Moses saw this idolatry, he broke the tablets of the law he was carrying and destroyed the golden calf.

Two New Testament passages (Matthew 14:6–11 and Mark 6:21–28) recount the story of Salome dancing for Herod's birthday and demanding the head of John the Baptist, who had insulted her mother, Herodias. This scene has been depicted in a number of paintings, from Benozzo Gozzoli's Dance of Salome (in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D. C.) to Gustave Moreau's Dance of Salome (or The Apparition), which was a cause célèbre of the Paris Salon of 1876 (now in the Harvard Art Museums in Cambridge, Massachusetts). Another Christian dance, although one not found in the Bible, was the Dance of Mary Magdalene. The dance was used in a fifteenth-century Italian mystery play and in an engraving by Lucas van Leyden as a symbol of Mary Magdalene's worldliness before her conversion.

In the Middle Ages, the first known example of the Danse Macabre, or Dance of Death, was painted in the cemetery of the Church of the Holy Innocents in Paris in 1425. This theme was translated into woodcuts in the first printed version of La Danse macabre des charniers des saints innocents, by Guy Marchant, in which all the persons visited by Death, from the pope to the peasant, must join in the Dance of Death. No one is exempt from the procession, no matter how good his or her excuses. This version was followed by Hans Holbein the Younger's woodcut series, Dance of Death (1538), in which Death visits all from the highest to the lowest and carries them off to be part of the dance.

During the Renaissance, artists borrowed many themes from the ancient Greek and Roman periods in a rebirth of classical literature and art. An example commemorating the role of the dance in Greek mythology occurs in Giulio Romano's painting The Muses Dancing with Apollo (in the Pitti Palace in Florence, Italy); the nine muses of the arts are joined with Apollo, the god associated with all branches of art in a celebratory dance. Classical figures were also used in the Baroque period by Poussin in his Dance to the Music of Time (circa 1640, in the Wallace Collection in London). Here four female figures in brilliantly colored classical robes, probably representing the seasons of the year, dance in a circle to the lyre music of the winged, bearded figure of Time on the right, while on the left the two-headed herm represents Janus, or Terminus, the god of boundaries of all things (including life and its dance).

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, folk dancing was depicted in a number of paintings, especially in the northern tradition. Examples include Pieter Bruegel the Elder's Peasant Dance (1566–1567, now in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria) and Wedding Dance (1566, in the Detroit Institute of Arts in Michigan) and Peter Paul Rubens's Flemish Kermesse (1635–1638, now in the Louvre in Paris). Rubens evoked the exuberant rhythms and movements of sixteenth-century peasant or folk dancing as shown in the work of the Flemish artists Pieter Bruegel the Elder, David Teniers the Younger, and Adriaen Brouwer. Here the emphasis is not on the significance of the dance but on the rude and rollicking peasant revelers.

In the nineteenth century, dance in its many variations was a favorite subject of artists. Edgar Degas probably created more representations of the ballet in painting, sculpture, pastel, and drawings than did any other artist in history. Although he occasionally showed dancers on stage, the majority of his views of dancers show them practicing, resting offstage, or waiting in the wings. Degas's works range from the Orchestra of Paris (1868–1869, in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris), where the dance performance on stage is only a background for the musicians, and the Rehearsal (circa 1878, in the Frick Collection in New York), to sculptural portraits of the Little Dancer 14 Years Old (1881, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston), which show a typical ballet student, complete with a ribbon in her hair and a tulle tutu. Other of his dancer sculptures, such as Grande Arabesque (in the Harvard Art Museums) and The Spanish Dancer (in the Norton Simon Museum in Pasadena, California), were not cast in bronze until after Degas's death because he used them primarily as working tools to capture characteristic movements of the dance. Another, more formal sculptural representation of the dance is Jean-Baptiste Carpeaux's nude figures dancing on the facade of the Musée de l'Opéra in Paris, the new opera building (1867–1868). Impressionistic painter Pierre-Auguste Renoir celebrated the dance in scenes of contemporary life in his Moulin de la Galette (1876, now in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris) and Le Bal à Bougival (1883, in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston). Renoir's contemporary, Georges Seurat, attempted to capture the motion of the cancan in his pointillistic style in Le Chahut (1889, in the Kröller-Müller Museum in Otterloo, The Netherlands). Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec created another version of the cancan in The Dance at the Moulin Rouge (1892, in the Philadelphia Museum of Art in Pennsylvania). He also painted a number of dancers performing, including Jane Avril and Loie Fuller. Norwegian artist Edvard Munch's Dance of Life (1899, in the National Gallery in Oslo, Norway) represented an allegorical view of life as a dance.

In the twentieth century, many artists turned to primitive sources to portray the primeval energy of the dance, as did Henri Matisse in his oil paintings Dance I (1909, in the Museum of Modern Art in New York) and Dance II (1910, in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia). They were originally commissioned by Sergei Schukin, along with another painting,

Music (1909, also in the Hermitage). Although both paintings are quite large in size (approximately 8.5 feet by 12 feet), Matisse simplified the composition to include five nude female figures in a round dance against the green and blue of land and sky. He reprised this theme in 1931–1933 for a commissioned mural, Dance (First Version), to fill three lunettes at the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania. It did not have the correct dimensions, however, so he made a second version in 1932–1933 for the Barnes Foundation. The first version is now at the Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris. Because of the divided nature of the space in the Barnes Foundation, the figures are interrupted and cut off, but they appear to be continuing the same wild dance of 1909–1910.

Pablo Picasso's African period painting The Dance of Veils (1907, in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg) and André Derain's Dance (1906, in a private collection in Switzerland) emphasize the primal energy and origins of dancing. German Expressionist artist Emil Nolde referred to his South Seas visit to Palau and to the biblical story in his orgiastic Dance Around the Golden Calf (1910, in the Staatsgalerie Moderner Kunst in Munich, Germany). Even as austere and geometric a painter as Piet Mondrian was a devotee of dancing and incorporated the syncopated rhythms and dance steps of contemporary jazz into such paintings as Broadway Boogie-Woogie (1942–1943, now in the Museum of Modern Art in New York). He believed that true boogie-woogie destroyed melody and constructed new dynamic abstract rhythms, similar to the destruction of nature and the construction of new abstractions in his own paintings.

In photography, Barbara Morgan captured the essence of modern dance in her silver prints of Martha Graham, especially those taken in the 1930s, and Edward Steichen's series on The Russian Pupils of Isadora Duncan (1929) shows group action following a pioneer of modernity.

In literature, in addition to the ancient, classical, and biblical sources already cited, The Dance of Death was translated by John Lydgate sometime between 1425 and 1431 when he was in Paris and published in England. Guy Marchant first printed a version of this dance in 1485, but it had a number of variants and new interpretations from the fifteenth century to the twentieth. A more cheerful dance of mirth appeared in the Roman de la Rose, by Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun. One copy of this was illustrated by the Flemish artist The Master of the Prayer Book in about 1500. The book details the allegorical quest of the Lover for the Rose, in which he meets such characters as Lady Idleness, Lady Wealth, Lady Largesse, Fair Welcome, Danger, and Jealousy. Twentieth-century literature on the theme of the dance includes Mary Renault's The King Must Die, which details the bull dance of Crete, and the work of British author Anthony Powell, in whose series of autobiographical novels, Dance to the Music of Time, the characters weave in and out of the narrative like figures in a dance.

An art itself, dance has worn various guises and symbolized many things from primitive times to the present. Its expressions run the gamut from the spontaneous response of children to the most sophisticated formal styles in the ballets of George Balanchine. It has been a locus for activities from communal rites to solo performances. By turns joyous, sad, and humorous, it has remained a vehicle of as many interpretations as there are experiences in life.

See also Bacchanalia/Orgy; Music

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

- Dancing Girls*, wall painting, Tomb of Mehu, sixth dynasty, before 2000 B.C., Saqqara, Egypt
Dance Lesson, crater, circa 460 B.C., Lecce, Italy, Museo 'Sigismondo Castromediano'

Etruscan

- Dancers*, wall paintings, Tomb of the Leopards, Tombs of the Lionesses, and Tomb of the Banquet, fifth century B.C., Tarquina, Italy

Mythological Subjects

- Psiax, Maenad Dancing, Attic amphora, circa 530–500 B.C., Madrid, Museo Arqueológico Nacional
 Titian, Bacchanal of the Andrians, oil, 1520, Madrid, Prado
 Poussin, Nicolas, Bacchanal Before a Herm of Pan, oil, 1630s, London, Guildhall Art Gallery
 Alma-Tadema, Sir Lawrence, Pyrrhic Dance, panel, London, Guildhall Art Gallery

Biblical Subjects

- Gozzoli, Benozzo, The Dance of Salome, oil, circa 1480s, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Remp, Franz Carl, The Dance of the Golden Calf, early eighteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie
 Moreau, Gustave, Salome Dancing Before Herod, 1875, Paris, Musée Gustave Moreau
 Moreau, Gustave, The Dance of Salome (The Apparition), oil, 1876, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums
 Beardsley, Aubrey, Illustrations to Oscar Wilde's Salome, 1895, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums
 Picasso, Pablo, Salomé, etching, 1905
 Nolde, Emil, Dance Around the Golden Calf, oil, 1910, Munich, Germany, Staatsgalerie Moderner Kunst
 Chagall, Marc, Miriam Dancing, from Illustrations from the Bible, 1931, Nice, France, Musée National Message Biblique Marc Chagall
 Kraezyna, Swietlan, Salomé, nine multiplate color etchings, 1975

Dance of Death

- Holbein, Hans the Younger, The Dance of Death, woodcuts, 1538
 Rowlandson, Thomas, Dance of Death, aquatints, circa 1815

Ballet and Formal Dance

- Watteau, Jean-Antoine, The Dance Fêtes Vénitienes, 1717–1719, Edinburgh, Scotland, National Gallery
 Lancret, Nicolas, La Camargo Dancing, oil on canvas, circa 1730, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Degas, Edgar, The Rehearsal, oil, circa 1878, New York, Frick Art Collection
 Degas, Edgar, Grande Arabesque, bronze, cast after 1917, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard Art Museums; Pasadena, California, Norton Simon Art Museum
 Rodin, Auguste, Dance Movement 'D', bronze, 1911, New York, Cantor Collection
 Schlemmer, Oskar, The Triadic Ballet, 1921–1923
 Cornell, Joseph, A Pantry Ballet (For Jacques Offenbach), construction 1942, New York, collection of Mr. and Mrs. Richard L. Feigen

Allegorical

Poussin, Nicolas, Dance to the Music of Time, oil, circa 1640, London, Wallace Collection
 Carpeaux, Jean-Baptiste, The Dance, plaster model, 1867–1869, Paris, Musée de l'Opéra
 Rodin, Auguste, La Ronde, drypoint, 1883–1884
 Munch, Edvard, Dance of Life, oil, 1899, Oslo, Norway, Nasjonalgalleriet

Folk

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, The Wedding Dance, oil on panel, 1566, Detroit, Michigan, Institute of Arts
 Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Peasant Dance, oil on panel, circa 1566–1567, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Flemish Kermesse, oil on panel, 1635–1638, Paris, Louvre
 Steen, Jan, The Dancing Couple, oil on canvas, 1663, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Kirchner, Ernst Ludwig, Negertanz, circa 1911, private collection
 Benton, Thomas Hart, Country Dance, oil on panel, 1928, New York, Bernard Daneberg Galleries

Non-Western

Siva as Nataraja (Lord of Dancers), circa sixteenth–seventeenth century, South India, bronze, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Marianne Brimmer Fund

Modern

Seurat, Georges, Study for Le Chahut, oil on canvas, 1889–1890, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Art Gallery
 Toulouse-Lautrec, Henri de, Miss Loie Fuller, color lithograph, 1893
 Rivière, Théodore, Loie Fuller: Lilly Dance, marble, 1898, San Francisco, California, The Fine Arts Museum of San Francisco
 Derain, André, Dance, oil on wood, 1906, Switzerland, private collection
 Picasso, Pablo, The Dance of Veils, 1907, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Picasso, Pablo, Dancer, oil, 1907–1908, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Dongen, Kees van, Souvenir of the Russian Opera Season, oil, 1909, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada
 Matisse, Henri, Dance I, oil, 1909, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Matisse, Henri, Dance II, oil, 1910, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Sloan, John, Isadora Duncan, oil, 1911, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Milwaukee Art Museum
 Lewis, Wyndham, The Dancers, watercolor, 1912, Manchester, England, Manchester Art Galleries
 Picabia, Francis, Star Dancer and Her School of Dance, watercolor, 1913, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Nolde, Emil, Dancer, color lithograph, 1913
 Kirchner, Ernst Ludwig, Dancing Couple, 1914, oil, Essen, Germany, Museum Folkwang
 Lachaise, Gaston, Dancing Woman, gilded bronze, 1915, Boston, Massachusetts, Lachaise Foundation
 Manship, Paul, Dancer and the Gazelles, bronze, 1916, Washington, D.C., Smithsonian Institution, National Collection of Fine Arts
 Ray, Man, The Rope Dancer Accompanies Herself with Her Shadows, aerograph and tempera, 1918, Chicago, Illinois, private collection
 Henri, Robert, Ruth Saint Denis in the Peacock Dance, 1919
 Roberts, William, The Dancers, 1919, Glasgow, Scotland, Glasgow Art Gallery and Museum
 Roberts, William, The Dance Club, 1923, Leeds, England, Leeds City Art Galleries
 Severini, Gino, Bal Tabarin, oil, 1925, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Picasso, Pablo, Three Dancers, oil, 1925, London, Tate Gallery
 Picasso, Pablo, Four Dancers, pen and ink, 1925, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Matisse, Henri, Dance (First Version), oil, 1931–1933, Paris, Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris
 Matisse, Henri, Dance (Second Version), oil, 1932–1933, Merion Station, Pennsylvania, Barnes Foundation Collection
 Mondrian, Piet, Broadway Boogie-Woogie, oil, 1942–1943, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Pollock, Jackson, Night Dancer (Green), oil, 1944, New York, Marlborough Gallery
 Johns, Jasper, Tango, encaustic on canvas, 1955, Cologne, Germany, Ludwig Museum
 Warhol, Andy, Dance Diagram, painting, 1962, Estate of Andy Warhol
 Halprin, Ann, Paper Dance, performance piece, 1963

Photography

Steichen, Edward, The Russian Pupils of Isadora Duncan, silver prints, series, 1929, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Morgan, Barbara, Martha Graham: Sixteen Dances in Photographs, 1937–1938, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Further Reading

Art and Dance: Images of the Modern Dialogue, 1890–1980, Boston: Institute of Contemporary Art, 1982

- Campbell, Joseph, The Mythic Image, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1974
- Cavendish, Richard, Mythology: An Illustrated Encyclopedia, New York: Rizzoli, 1979; London: Orbis, 1980
- Chaney, Edward Frank, ed., La Danse Macabre, Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 1945
- Dube, Wolf Dieter, The Expressionists, London: Thames and Hudson, 1972; New York: Thames and Hudson, 1985
- Elderfield, John, The "Wild Beasts": Fauvism and its Affinities, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1976
- Emmanuel, Maurice, Antique Dance After Sculptured and Painted Figures, translated by H. J. Beauleu, New York and London: John Lane, 1916
- Frazer, Sir James George, The Golden Bough, New York and London: St. Martin's Press, 1966
- Gay, Peter, Art and Act, New York: Harper, 1976
- Kren, Thomas, ed., Renaissance Painting in Manuscript, New York: Hudson Hills, 1983; London: British Library, 1983
- Morgan, Barbara, Martha Graham: Sixteen Dances in Photographs, New York: Duell, Sloan and Pearce, 1941
- , "Martha Graham, Letter to the World 1940 (Kick)" in In Her Own Image, Elaine Hedges and Ingrid Wendt, eds., Old Westbury, New York: Feminist Press, 1980
- Parrinder, Geoffrey, African Mythology, London: Hamlyn, 1967; New York: Peter Bedrick, 1986
- Renault, Mary, The King Must Die, New York: Pantheon, 1958; London: Sceptre, 1958
- Rischbieter, Henning, ed., Art and the Stage in the Twentieth Century, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1968
- Rubin, William, ed., Henri Matisse: A Retrospective, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1990
- Scheyer, E., "The Wedding Dance in the Detroit Institute of Arts: Relations and Derivations," Art Quarterly XXVIII (1965)
- Steichen, Edward, A Life in Photography, London: Allen, 1963; Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1963

DAWN/DAWNING

Rudolf M. Bisanz

The following subjects are included in the discussion of the theme Dawn/Dawning:

ANCIENT THEOGONY

HELLENIC AND HELLENISTIC
PERSONIFICATIONS

JUDEO-CHRISTIAN ALLEGORY

HUMANIST INTELLECTUAL-IZATION

EDO MOOD INSPIRATION

ROMANTIC METAPHYSICS

OPTICAL POSITIVISM

PSYCHOLOGICAL PROJECTION

Albrecht Altdorfer, The Resurrection of Christ, 1518, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum. (Courtesy of the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna, Austria, Archivphoto)

A monumental figure of a woman, her hands and feet touching the ground, appears arched over what seems like the arc of the sky. Near her mouth looms a globular object, while another sphere emerges from her lap, throwing a stream of rays downward, toward what seem like the outlines of a building. Among the more unusual symbolic representations of dawn in art, this image is iconographically also one of the more intriguing conflations of normally experienced life and nature with cosmic flights of imagination. The woman is the Egyptian celestial sun goddess Nut (possibly identical with the Greek goddess Rhea, wife of the Titan Cronus), who devours the evening sun and literally gives birth to the sun at dawn, in all its newborn eastern glory, symbolizing the process of perennial death and rebirth. Nut literally encompasses a star-spangled, lapis-colored sky over an azure-tinted, primordial sea, while the rays of a golden dawn emanating from her womb envelop a simple square with the ray-embazoned Hathor-head within. The Hathor-head symbolizes the temple to that sun goddess (identified with Aphrodite, Greek goddess of love). It is to her that the late Ptolemaic and Roman temple at Dendera on the Upper Nile, a center of the Egyptian New Year's Hathor ritual, is dedicated. By virtue of her association with the renewing powers of the rising sun in the guise of Nut, Hathor is endowed with life-giving force. This striking representation of her heavenly collaborator, the arching dusk-and-dawn goddess, one of numerous ones in Egyptian art, summarizes with an elegant economy of symbolic means the pagan fascination with an anthropomorphizing theogony. The intimate iconography of the woman-birth-life cycle, fused with a legendary diurnal, seasonal, and annual astronomic macrocosm in the crucible of a dawn-inspired mythical fantasy of creation, birth, and resurrection, creates a fabulous universe of consuming poetic splendor.

Nearly all ancient cultures understood dawn and its companion, the rising sun, as occasions for important theogonies: for example, the Hindu god Surya, who ascends the sky in his four-horse celestial chariot, and Ushas, the sun goddess, who arrives majestically through the morning clouds. The progeny of Vivasvat, the rising sun, gave birth to Manu, the ancestor of all humankind, who was the first to offer sacrifices. The Michabo, or Great Hare, second only to the Great Spirit in the Native American pantheon, whose abode is "the place where the sun rises," personifies dawn in Algonquian cosmogony. According to California Pericu Indian lore, Michabo's cosmological kinfolk, the morning and other times of day, are characterized as cross-ocean swimmers advancing the light of day around the Earth. Perhaps most surprising in art is Nut, the resplendent Egyptian sun goddess. The extremely wide variety of such cosmogonies in ancient and world religions makes clear ordering impossible, beyond the assertion that all derive from the phantasms of "humanity's childhood," about the creation of the universe and the mysterious forces that shape its continued existence. However, anthropomorphically, ancient Greek cosmology has no equal in the all-too-human phase of its enchanted theogonic visions of daybreak.

In addition to Apollo, archetypal "bringer of light," the sun god, Helios (or Phaëthon), rose in his quadriga in the east from the ocean. Mature Greek myth further distinguished between Hemera, the goddess of day, and Eos (Aurora), sister of Helios, the "rosy-fingered" goddess of dawn. Eos, a primal symbol of lust and beauty, rose from the eastern ocean into the heavens to awaken humans at daybreak, then followed her amorous yearnings. She was imagined wearing a saffron mantle and spreading dew from an upturned urn, or, torch in hand, riding Pegasus, or in her golden chariot. Because of her various concubines with beautiful youths, her many offspring, and her multifold magic relationships with gods and heroes—for example, she bestowed immortality on the Greek hero Achilles—her activities enmesh much of the classical pantheon. The Aurora Painter created what may be the most impassioned of all enlarged Eos narratives in art. Accompanied by wild geese, spray sea monsters, and the morning star as a winged figure, four spirited steeds draw her chariot upward through the firmament, while Aurora herself, emblazoned by a light glory, indulges her favorite lover, Cephalus, in a hearty embrace. Here Dawn titillates with the intrigue of abduction, celebrates rapturous bliss, and seduces with antiquity's zestiest joie de vivre. Later, in dynamic Hellenistic art, the light deities—Helios, Eos, and their other sister, Selene (Moon)—and Rhea-Cybele (the mother of the gods and powers of nature), collectively symbolizing logos (reason), battle with the giants (the senseless ones).

In Judaism, dawn has multiple layers of allegorical and tropological meanings. These include dawn as devotional allegory. The glory of God's assembly is made metaphoric in the query "Who is it that appears like the dawns?" (Song of Songs 6:10); dawn as the love of God for his faithful: "Then your light will break forth like the dawn" (Isaiah 58:8); and morning's earliest gleaming as the glory of Zion: "Arise, shine . . . Nations will come to your light, and kings to the brightness of your dawn" (Isaiah 60:1–3). But the most enigmatic and exegetically provocative is dawning as a metaphor for the origin of national identity. The Old Testament's greatest patriarch, Jacob, had his name changed to Israel (fighter of God) at dawn, after he had wrestled with a messenger of God throughout the night (Genesis 32:22–32). In his encounter with his mysterious opponent, Jacob would "not let go" unless he would bless him, thus forcing by sheer willpower a shift in his and his people's personality and destiny. This auspicious event, forever associated with dawn, prefigures an important symbolic phase in the consciousness and birth of a nation.

Allegorically and anagogically, the spiritual meaning of Jacob's struggle at dawn ramifies into Christian eschatology and signifies the victory of the church over the synagogue, of the new covenant over the old. Since the Middle Ages, artists stressed the identity of God as the “opponent” and the struggle as one of good over evil. From Byzantine art—for example, Vienna Genesis—to Eugène Delacroix, artists have interpreted the subject of Jacob wrestling with the angel. But few have exploited the subject’s symbolic import with as much panache for original design as Paul Gauguin. In his treatment, dawn becomes part of a radical confrontation of brilliant white masses (the women’s bonnets) and bright red, a symbolic sunrise. Intensified into a radiant carmine middle ground as the defining moment of the form and the arresting center of the iconography of the painting, this “dawn” also figures as the birthplace of French symbolism.

In developed Christology, dawning is complicated by the fact that it augurs both good and evil: the birth of Jesus Christ, his betrayal, arrest, Crucifixion, and Resurrection, and, eschatologically, the rising of the Christian spirit and of the new era. The star of Bethlehem, or star in the east, is believed by some to be the morning star or morning planet (perhaps an aurora, Venus, or a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn) that led the Magi to the manger (Matthew 2:1–2). Thus, the generic scene of the adoration of the Magi is, by definition, a representation of the new dawn, replete with the rising star. This seems to be how many medieval and Renaissance painters imagined it, including Lorenzo Monaco, Fra Angelico, Fra Filippo Lippi, Giovanni di Paolo, Albrecht Dürer, and Juan de Flandes. Christ’s agony in the garden can be assumed to terminate at early dawn, when his betrayal and arrest ensue. “Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice” (Luke 22:61). Thus, Peter’s betrayal of Christ and a massive (if temporary) character failure of a foremost apostle is commonly imagined as also having been brought on by the fateful time of daybreak. Accordingly, scenes in art that correspond to all the above events are naturally to be understood as occurring at dawn; Albrecht Altdorfer painted vehemently crimson-colored dawn landscapes for his two panels, The Agony in the Garden and The Betrayal by Judas and Arrest of Christ.

Early Christian art seems to have known a very rare hybrid that harmonized the pagan Helios—replete with horses, chariot, and light glory—with primitive kerygma: Christ as the bringer of light at the dawn of the new age. Apolitically, dawn is taken to be the revelation of God in Christ (Luke 1:78). And Christ also said, “I am the light of the world” (John 8:12). In apocalyptic language, he said, “And I will give [to him who overcomes] the morning star” (astera ton proinon; Revelation 2:28). And again, “I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star” (ho aster ho lampros ho proimos; Revelation 22:16). The awesome transformation of Christ into pure light has never been more effectively or magically portrayed than by Matthias Grünewald. His Resurrection from the Isenheim Altarpiece is ushered in by the Matthean scene of the two Marys at the tomb, “In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week” (Matthew 28:1).

Scripturally, the Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus Christ and the spiritual transformation of humanity through Christ’s sacrifice are couched in such allegorical terms of the coming of the Messiah as the morning star and as a “light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star [phosphoros] arise in your hearts” (II Peter 1:19). A very inspirational interpretation of the Ascension as dawn is depicted in Altdorfer’s Vienna panel of The Resurrection of Christ. The awesome, roiling turbulence on the eastern horizon seems literally to consume the scene and its participants in a blazing conflagration at dawn. Jesus seems transfigured into an effulgent light-color radiance at dawn. Here, the total allegorical identification of the Risen Christ with the magic of dawning is fulfilled.

In a different iconological vein, Altdorfer, the “painter of dawns,” astonished the world of art with his spectacular interpretation of a world-historical event in the context of naturally conceived diurnal pyrotechnics on a global scale. His epic realization of Alexander the Great and Darius at the fateful Battle of Issus in 333 B.C.—replete with many hundreds of warriors—uses a conflagration of the sky at dawn as a metaphor of a heroic process of civilizational transformation. The sinking crescent moon, at upper left, symbolizes the declining fortunes of the Persians. The rising sun, at right, is perhaps the most spectacular dawn scene ever realized in art. Its colossal wheeling and eddying masses of red, yellow, and orange clouds vitalize a seemingly infinite panorama, as if seen from the stratosphere, revealing the curvature of the Earth and extending dynamically over hundreds of miles of sky, mountains, and sea. It symbolizes and seems to drive Alexander’s surging hegemony over the ancient world as a literal natural event, a conspiracy of human genius with nature’s vital energy. Altdorfer’s famous painting counts among the most impressive and successful of all artistic efforts at expressing history as an unfolding spectacle of nature, visualizing a historicopoetic reciprocity between human drama and cosmic event.

The Quattrocento reintegrated Neoplatonism and Scholasticism in a new summa of knowledge and inspiration. In the process, Renaissance iconography became increasingly circumscribed by academic protocol. Later, during the so-called Mannerist crisis, artists extrapolated and enlarged upon their received iconographic formulas. But with his Dawn, Michelangelo broke the mold of the then-conventional meanings for Christian-cum-Hellenic metaphor. He indulged in complete expressive freedom, hence, total iconographic license in his representation of dawn for the Medici tombs at St. Lorenzo in Florence, Italy. His figure lacks all metonymic attributes and can, therefore, be neither classified tropologically nor identified according to Renaissance conventions (although, of course, he did honor tradition by dedicating his Times of Day to the glory of princely powers). Instead, his Dawn’s tortured female beauty, her storied tension and suffering, express broad humanist thoughts. His Dawn’s psychological and existentialist anxieties—early avatars of the basal romantic-modern “human dilemma”—are oppressive: dawn as angst and ratiocination of existence slipping into the dread of nonbeing.

The Baroque, the age of discovery and of expanding horizons, loved ceremony, triumphant processions, and dynamism in its art. Iconographically, however, this contributed less to the intellectual spread of the subject of dawn and dawning in art than to making it more pedantic and rarefied. Accordingly, in ceiling frescoes by Guido Reni and Il Guercino, Aurora and her celestial chariot were joined in complex ancillary groupings involving, for example, her husband Tithonus, Phoebus Apollo and his quadriga, the Horae (sometimes known as the seasons, although their numbers vary from two to 11), Flora (goddess of flowers), and putti. This makes for lavish painted parades but actually detracts from Eos-Dawn. The ideational context and clientele for classical subjects became increasingly erudite, relying more on ancient sources, for example, Ovid's Metamorphoses, than on artistic sense. Nicolas Poussin, for example, embroidered the actions of his two dawn versions of the rape of Cephalus with enough accessory allegorical figures to neutralize the central concerns: primal passion and unrequited love. Later, the rococo often exploited the Baroque dawn/sunburst motif for sundry apotheoses; but it also disencumbered the dawning/sunrise mythologies from fastidious scholarship, allowing pure sensual pleasure to advance (as in the works by Paul Troger, James Thornhill, and Robert Le Lorrain).

Utamaro and Katsushika Hokusai presaged Romanticism in landscape painting in later eighteenth-century Japan. Eishosai Choki then produced one of the most refined terrestrial genre scenes of dawn. A female half-figure shivers and clasps her nightgown as the magnificent red quarter-disk of the sun breaks through the horizon between the sea and a darkling sky: dawn as a poetic study in mysterious contrasts between the sublime and the intimately human.

With Romanticism, dawn became an iconographic mainstay. Natural religion—the philosophy of being that anticipated modern process theology—appropriated dawn and the other times of day as preferred manifestations of the power and glory of God as active in a transcendent sphere (providence) and as immanent on Earth (natural phenomena). Accordingly, German Romantics, including Philipp Otto Runge and Caspar David Friedrich, developed the landscape altar. This picture type features the ephemera of color, light, and atmosphere as signals of providential revelation. Friedrich's followers—for example, Ernst Ferdinand Oehme, Carl Gustav Carus, Johann Christian Clausen Dahl, Karl Blechen, Karl F. Schinkel, and many other Romantics—mostly intended their extremely naturalistic scenes to be understood theistically, namely, as divine disclosure. Appropriate to the tenets of a dualistic Erdlebensbildkunst (the art of Earth life), in Friedrich's theory and as conveyed by Carus's writings on landscape painting, the viewer is supposed to experience the painted scene as phenomenal actuality. Simultaneously, the viewer is to intuit the ultimate noumenon—God as the necessary ground of freedom—in nature's mysterious infinity. In this fashion, the Romantics eliminated the ancient gods as stand-ins for the powers of nature (pantheism) as well as traditional Christian symbolism from the iconographic repertory of Western art. They substituted these with a radically new, modern theistic iconography: nature and its processes—for example, the rising sun at dawn—embody the miracle of creation and the promise of God in Christ.

Beyond general revelation, the Romantic notion of transcendence implicit in the event of dawn functioned even in the context of special revelation, that is, as a surrogate of the Trinity. Accordingly, and as so often with Friedrich, the Crucifixion may be used as a supernumerary of a dawn landscape. The most complex of all iconographies attendant on the idea of dawn as a process of universal renewal is Runge's Morning. Here, idealism and naturalism are fully accommodated, while dawn is typed or represented several times along the central vertical axis: as the morning star, the lily, the figure of Aurora, a newborn child on the meadow, and a protoimpressionist dawning. With his metaphysics of dawn, Runge wished to allegorize spring, birth and childhood, creation and the process of natural and spiritual becoming, as well as the day spring of the coming of the Messiah and the morrow of the new covenant in Christ. He speculated that, in the long run, his philosophy of dawn could best be expressed by means of abstract art. J. M. W. Turner seemed to have attempted an analogous synthesis with his countless, quasi-abstract, coloristic depictions of daybreak. Similarly, to Runge, he enriched the iconographic repertory of dawn by very often harmonizing it with ancient Greek mythography, Christian motifs, scientific speculation, and personal fantasy.

Naturalist artists painted countless dawns as quickly passing instants of diurnal mechanics—meteorologically degraded light. Such scientific reductionism was long in the advanced stages of preparation (as exemplified in the works of the German landscape specialists of the Munich School, Alexander Cozens, John Constable, Adalbert Stifter, the Barbizon School, the Hudson River School, and Eugène Boudin). Realism and its positivist successor movements, impressionism and neoimpressionism, dealt a near deathblow to dawn as a spiritual event. In the process, dawn was debased to an optical phase: nature's equivalent of the banal, as in Claude Monet's Impression, Sunrise and Camille Pissarro's River—Early Morning.

Symbolism (e.g., the Nabis or the Worpswede School) and Expressionism once again reignited artists' imaginations on behalf of dawn as a concept worthy of a poet's inspiration. Many treatments of dawn are found in the works of the neoromantic moderns, for example, Paul Gauguin, Vincent van Gogh, Edvard Munch, Ferdinand Hodler, Maurice Denis, Pierre Bonnard, Giovanni Segantini, Hans am Ende, and Karl Schmidt-Rottluff. They transformed dawn from a reflection of theogonic, cosmic, Christian-allegorical, or natural forces to a neurological condition of dawning, with potent psychic or psychoreligious emanations associated with the notion of daybreak. Then they found formal, often abstract, means with which to "objectify the subjective" in a self-expressive manner that was personally compelling to them. Thus, dawn rose once more in the iconography of modernism and to the challenge of contributing to a voluble art.

From the above sketch of the iconography of dawn/dawning, certain iconological mainstreams can be inferred. From these, in turn, the mass of examples, at which this essay merely hints, can be organized. For instance, "primitive" cultures and the ancient kingdoms, whatever their obvious polytheistic divergences, shared a common pagan belief in theogonies based on straightforward anthropomorphic substitutions. This resulted in an art of naive symbolic transfers of natural forces (in this case, dawn) to various gods or goddesses in predictable actions of routinely fulfilling their appointed cosmic rounds—a static universe. By contrast, a dynamic Judeo-Christian tradition gave rise to an iconology that is vastly more sophisticated and complex. Its monotheistic sources, the Bible and ecclesiology, do not equate natural with spiritual matters directly but rather suggest oblique metaphoric relationships between them. Most significantly, they reveal mighty prospects of infinitely progressive spiritual development. In biblical criticism, these latent affinities need to be explored with various exegetical means to yield meaning. Accordingly, exploration of Christian iconography must include study of (1) the historical or literal sense; (2) the allegorical or christological sense; (3) the tropological, or moral or ethical, sense; and (4) the anagogic or eschatological sense. Finally, modern art, especially since Romanticism, expanded the range of iconological possibilities with regard to natural phenomena, including the diurnal process of dawn/dawning. It did so by explaining them religiously; by humanizing and personalizing them with a view to deepening the psychological, phenomenological, and existentialist dimensions of nature experience; and by degrading them iconologically to a picturesque equivalent of physics—the recording of data on optics, spectroscopy, and meteorology. Interestingly, from banal naturalism then sprang abstraction and nonobjective abstraction. This development potentially liberated and empowered iconology and advanced a new dawning of dawn iconography. This happened with the occasional explorations of light-and-sky phenomena by, among others, the Expressionists, the futurists, and the Constructivists, promising more for times to come.

See also Light I; Light II; Night; Whiteness

Selected Works of Art

Ancient Theogony

Surya (Sun God) Riding Chariot, Vihara, Nr. 19, Ghaja, circa 100–70 B.C., Maharashtra, India

The Rising Sun Over Dendara, Roman period, A.D. first century, Dendara, Egypt, Hather Temple

Hellenic and Hellenistic Personifications

Phidias (?), Helios' Horse, Attic (theoretical reconstruction of east gable of the Parthenon), circa 440 B.C., London, British Museum

Aurora Painter, Aurora and Cephalus, Faliscan volute krater, Etruscan, circa 340 B.C., Rome, Museo Nazionale di Villa Giulia

Helios, metope from Temple of Athena, probably second century B.C., illustrated in Dictionary of Classical Antiquities, edited by O. Seyffert, p. 274

Zeus Altar, The Light Deities Helios, Eos and Selene in Combat with Giants, south frieze, circa 180–160 B.C., Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Antikensammlung

Judeo-Christian Allegory

The Sun-Christ (Cristo-sole; Helios Christ), in His Chariot, polychrome vault mosaic, circa A.D. 150–275, Rome, Mausoleum of the Julii, Vatican Grottoes

Jacob Wrestling with the Angel, from illuminated manuscript Vienna Genesis, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Nationalbibliothek

Monaco, Lorenzo, Adoration of the Magi, probably 1418–1422, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Piero della Francesca, Risen Christ, fresco, 1463–1465, Borgo San Sepolcro, Italy, Museo Civico

Lippi, Fra Filippo, The Adoration of the Magi, 1496, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Dürer, Albrecht, Paumgartner Altarpiece, The Nativity, 1498, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen

Flandes, Juan de, The Adoration of the Magi, probably 1510,

Washington, D.C., Kress Collection

Altdorfer, Albrecht, The Passion Altar: The Agony in the Garden; The Arrest of Jesus, circa 1510, Linz, Austria, Augustinerchorherrenstift, St. Florian

Grünwald, Matthias, Isenheim Altarpiece, Resurrection, circa 1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden

Altdorfer, Albrecht, The Resurrection of Christ, 1518, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Altdorfer, Albrecht, The Battle of Issus, oil on wood panel, 1529, Munich, Germany, Bayerische

Staatsgemäldesammlungen, Alte Pinakothek

Delacroix, Eugène, Jacob Wrestling with the Angel, Chapelle des Saints-Anges, circa 1860, Paris, St. Sulpice

Gauguin, Paul, Vision After the Sermon: Jacob Wrestling with the Angel, 1888, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland

Humanist Intellectualization

Michelangelo, Dawn, Tomb of Lorenzo de' Medici, marble, 1519–1534, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo, New Sacristy

Reni, Guido, Aurora, ceiling fresco, 1613–1614, Rome, Casino Rospigliosi

Guercino, Aurora, ceiling fresco, 1621–1623, Rome, Villa Ludovisi

Poussin, Nicolas, Cephalus and Aurora, circa 1635, London, National Gallery

Poussin, Nicolas, Cephalus and Aurora, circa 1629–1630, Yorkshire, England, Hovingham Hall, Worsley Collection

Thornhill, James, Apotheosis of King William and Queen Mary (with Mythologized Dawn), ceiling fresco, circa 1708–1712, Greenwich, England, Navy Hospital, Painted Hall

Le Lorrain, Robert, Watering of the Sun-Horses, relief, circa 1731–1738, Paris, Hôtel de Rohan

Troger, Paul, Apotheosis of Charles VI (with Aurora-Dawn), ceiling fresco, 1739, Mautern, Austria, Benedictine Monastery Güttweig

Edo Mood Inspiration

Eishosai Choki, Sunrise on New Year's Morning, multicolor woodblock and glitter, circa 1794, Lausanne, Switzerland, private collection of Otto Riese

Romantic Metaphysics

Friedrich, Caspar David, The Cross in the Mountains, Dawn, 1807, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Runge, Philipp Otto, Morning (large version), 1809, Hamburg, Germany, Hamburger Kunsthalle

Friedrich, Caspar David, Landscape with Morning Fog and the Crucifix, 1810–1811, Berlin, Verwaltung der Städtischen Schoösser und Gärten

Carus, Carl Gustav, Chimes at Dawn, circa 1840, Essen, Germany, Museum Folkwang

Turner, J. M. W., Mercury Sent to Admonish Aeneas (Beneath the Morning Mist), 1850, London, Tate Gallery

Turner, J. M. W., Dawn of Christianity (The Star Has Risen), 1884, Belfast, Northern Ireland, Ulster Museum

Fantin-Latour, Henri, L'Aurore et la Nuit, 1894, Birmingham, England, City Museum and Art Gallery

Optical Positivism

- Monet, Claude, Impression, Sunrise, 1872, Paris, Musée Marmottan
 Pissarro, Camille, River—Early Morning, 1888, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art

Psychological Projection

- Denis, Maurice, Easter Morning (Mystery of Easter), 1891, Rouen, France, private collection of Dr. J. B. Denis
 Denis, Maurice, Jacob and the Angel, 1892–1893, private collection
 Segantini, Giovanni, Becoming, 1899, St. Moritz, Segantini Museum
 Ende, Hans am, Early Spring Day, probably 1890s, Bremen, Germany, Kunsthalle Bremen
 Munch, Edvard, The (Rising) Sun, 1911–1912, Oslo, Norway, Munch Museum

Further Reading

- Bisanz, Rudolf M., German Romanticism and Philipp Otto Runge: A Study in Nineteenth-Century Art Theory and Iconography, DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1970
 ———, “Andacht als Kunsterlebnis. Gottesoffenbarung und Pietätsbekundung in der Landschaft und im Figurenbild der deutschen Frühromantik,” Das Münster 44:2 1991
 Blunt, Anthony, Nicolas Poussin, New York: Pantheon, 1967; London: Pallas Athene, 1967
 Borsch-Supan, Helmut, and Karl Wilhelm Jahnig, Caspar David Friedrich, Munich, Germany: Prestel-Verlag, 1973
 Bultmann, Rudolf, “Zur Geschichte der Lichtsymbolik im Altertum,” Philologus 97 (1948)
 Buttrick, G. A., “Sun,” in The Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible, New York and Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon, 1962
 Conzelmann, Hans, “Phos,” in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, volume 9, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1964–1974
 Grabar, André, Christian Iconography, A Study of Its Origins, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1968; London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1968
 Hagner, Donald A., “Sun, Moon, Stars,” in The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1975; Exeter, Devon, England: Paternoster, 1975
 Hahn, Hans Christoph, et al., “Light” in The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1975; Exeter, Devon, England: Paternoster, 1975
 Hartt, Frederick, Michelangelo, The Complete Sculpture, New York: Abrams, 1968; London: Thames and Hudson, 1969
 Hartzler, H. Harold, “Star of the Wise Men,” The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1975; Exeter, Devon, England: Paternoster, 1975
 Huntington, Susan L., The Art of Ancient India, New York and Tokyo: Weatherhill, 1985
 Panofsky, Erwin, Meaning in the Visual Arts, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1955; Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1983
 Schefold, Karl, Die Griechern und Ihre Nachbarn, in Propyläen Kunstgeschichte, Berlin: Propyläen Verlag, 1964
 Schöne, Wolfgang, Über das Licht in der Malerei, Berlin: Gebrüder Mann, 1954
 Seznec, Jean, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, New York: Pantheon, 1953
 Tarrant, D., “Greek Metaphors of Light,” The Classical Quarterly 54 (1960)
 Wilton, Andrew, J. M. W. Turner, Secaucus, New Jersey: Poplar, 1979

DEATH

Elaine Shefer

The following motifs and genres are included in the discussion of the theme Death:

MEMENTO MORI

THE SKELETON

THE DANCE OF DEATH

MARTYRDOM AND DEATH OF
JESUS CHRIST

DEATH OF THE HERO

THE MOURNERS

THE ROMANTIC VIEW OF DEATH

VICTORIAN PAINTINGS OF DEATH

PRE-RAPHAELITE PAINTINGS OF DEATH

FRENCH REALISM AND DEATH

DEATH IN WAR

SUICIDE

OTHER VIEWS OF DEATH

Hans Baldung Grien, Death and the Maiden, 1517, painting, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum. (Courtesy of Foto Marburg/Art Resource, New York)

From the earliest recorded time to the present, death has fascinated and frightened humankind. Humans have never been able to solve to their emotional satisfaction the mystery of how vitality and personality inhabit matter during one instant and depart from it in another. From Paleolithic portrayals of dead animals in caves (Altamira in Spain; Lascaux, Font-de-Gaume, Trois-Frères in France) to primitive African sculptures of departed chiefs and ancestors, art has given form to humankind's attempt to understand, if not to master, the fear and mystery of death.

In early cultures, art was, in fact, a matter of life or death. Whether magical or symbolic, art was intended to secure well-being both in this life and in the hereafter. Art aided early human beings in their endeavors to control their environment and to intervene in the course of events—to preserve health, aid childbirth, ensure fertility, and ward off death. Among Stone Age tribal societies in Africa, the Northwest coast of America, and the South Pacific, the mask played a major role in the attempt to protect one from death or from evil spirits; it was a symbol of supernatural forces—a fulcrum between the living and the dead. Art expresses the anxiety of humans about the finality of death, as in the monuments of ancient Egyptian art, which were state-supported enterprises aimed at overcoming anxiety that attends the death of a king who is revered as a god. Death, in fact, takes on many forms in the history of art: superstitious, religious, political, social, and personal.

Memento Mori

The medieval mind was fascinated by the image of death, generally seen as an animated skeleton wielding a great scythe. In Italian art, the figure of Death is often merged with that of Time. The Old Testament book of Ecclesiastes, a meditation on the vanity of life, inspired much of such imagery. The concern with inevitable death and the moralizing about human vanity produced the memento mori. The solemn words memento mori, "Remember that thou shalt die," acquired a special significance for medieval people: it was a call to repentance. The skeleton in the Middle Ages was awe-inspiring or repellent, as opposed to the comic figure it may have represented in classical times. The most drastic means were employed to bring home to the public the sense of impermanence of the physical body and of all earthly things, to teach a moral lesson. A single scene depicting a skeleton and a human being is a memento mori, probably derived from the Dance of Death, or the Danse Macabre.

In England, both before and after the Reformation, images reminding people about their mortality were found in all kinds of public and private situations: as furnishings, on the walls of buildings, or carried about on the person. Reminders of mortality were included in countless woodcuts, embroidered samplers, drawings, paintings, and printed books.

A memento mori can be seen in an early fifteenth-century depiction of a manuscript by the Rohan Master. Entitled Dead Man Confronted by the Lord from the Grandes Heures de la Famille de Rohan, the work depicts an emaciated, naked man surrounded by skulls and bones. The devil and an angel fight over his body, while the Lord's image seems hopelessly ineffective.

The skeleton and the physician were a most popular form of memento mori representation, showing up often in fifteenth-century manuscripts and block books. Examples of this can be seen in Death and the Physician, from the Heidelberg Block Book, early fifteenth century; Death and the Physician, from Le Grat Dance Macabre (1499), in Lyons, France, after the original in the British Museum in London; the Book of Hours by Simon Vostre, printed by Pigouchet (1502), in Paris; and the Des Does Dantz (1489), in Lübeck, Germany. The skeleton can be seen in Hans Baldung Grien's sixteenth-century Death and the Maiden.

The figure of Death is often merged with that of Time, featuring an animated skeleton wielding a great scythe and/or holding the traditional sands of time. From the late Middle Ages, the skeleton figure appears in various guises, wielding a giant scythe, flying through the air, or as a horn player or fiddler—in all cases, a reminder of our mortality. Examples include Guyot Marchant, Dance Macabre: Pope and Emperor in Basel, Switzerland; Dance of Death: Two Emperors, in Basel; Hans Holbein, woodcuts of the Dance of Death in Lübeck.

From early seventeenth-century Holland came the morbid association of food with human vanity or life's brevity. In Jean Leclerc's Memento Mori (1615–1620), a marriage banquet is interrupted, thus implying a more obvious meaning of the memento mori: the Roman Catholic fear of a death too sudden to permit the last rites.

The skeleton motif became essential in the personal iconography of James Ensor in nineteenth-century Belgium, as can be seen in his drawings Death Pursuing the People (1886) and The Sad and Broken: Satan and His Fantastic Legions Tormenting the Crucified Christ (1886). For Ensor, the skeleton was a symbol not only of his own mortality, as in My Portrait in 1960 (1888), but of his art, in which he portrays himself either humorously as a fey creature wearing small slippers, or more seriously as the artist in his studio (Skeleton Painter in His Studio, 1896).

The figure of the animated skeleton wielding a great scythe continues into the early twentieth century in such American paintings as Albert Pinkham Ryder's The Race Track or Death on a Pale Horse (circa 1910, in the Cleveland Museum of Art in Ohio), but the message is more personal than universal. Here, Death carries its conventional attribute, a scythe (to cut down lives), as it rides a white horse around a race track. No one is present to view the sinister race, which clearly does not have other competitors. The skeleton is used by Ryder to serve his personal anguish, the death of a close friend who had just passed away. In this light, the work is reminiscent of that of another American, John Steuart Curry. His 1938 Parade to War might have been inspired by the death of a high school friend who had been killed in the Argonne during World War I; the work also presages the tumult of World War II. In Parade to War, the faces of the marching soldiers are death's-heads, and a young girl in a white dress gazes adoringly into the face of one such soldier and strides alongside him, unaware of the devastation he represents.

The Dance of Death

The Dance of Death was created to express the inevitability and universality of death, along with the inference that immortality resides not in physical preservation but in a spiritual connection with Jesus Christ. The origin of the Dance of Death can be found in the Middle Ages when death was thought of in its horrible and gruesome aspects; death was rarely conceived as a release from suffering or as a rest for the weary. The fear of the agony of death transcended all other emotions; the chief mental image was that of the transitory nature of all things. The obsession with death actually led people to take pleasure in its horrors; hence, a materialistic conception of death developed. The Roman Catholic Church was opposed to this state of fear and offered the possibility of salvation through righteous living. The wandering mendicant preachers made the most of such promises in their sermons. From liturgy, sermons, mystery plays, legends, and poems, together with the morbid psychology and superstitions of the people, evolved a great folk-cultural idea that took the form of the Dance of Death, which was often represented in wall paintings and woodcuts of the period.

The Dance of Death was a kind of satire on social equality in that death makes all humans equal and levels all distinctions. To this democratic concept, religious and political satires were later added, especially during the Reformation. Iconographically, death was personified as a skeleton who collects into a chain representatives of all classes of human society and dances with them to the grave. In short, the Dance of Death is a procession in which both the living and the dead take part. The living are arranged in an order of precedence, such as pope, cardinal, archbishop, emperor, king, or duke. The dance expresses an allegorical, moral, or satirical idea. Media for this imagery varied greatly: including manuscripts and printed books; paintings on wood, stone, and canvas; stained-glass windows; sculpture; embroidery and tapestry; metalwork; engravings on stone or metal; and woodcuts (Three Living Nobles and Their Dead Counterparts, from the Recueil de Poésies Françaises, circa 1285). Nowhere is the obsession with this theme more apparent than in the work of Francesco Traini. In his Triumph of Death, a mid-fourteenth-century fresco in the Camposanto in Pisa, Italy, he paints a symphony of death. At the lower left is the traditional meeting of the Three Living and the Three Dead. While hunting, three dressed noblemen and their friends and attendants come upon three open coffins, each occupied by a corpse: one bloated, the next half-rotten, the third reduced to a skeleton. Worms and serpents play over all three; one nobleman holds his nose at the stench, and even the hunting dogs sniff and draw back in disgust. Young gentlemen and ladies sitting in a grove playing music and caressing pets and one another pay no attention to the approach of Death, depicted as a terrible, white-haired hag flying toward them on bat wings and brandishing the ax with which she will cut them down. In the center is a heap of Death's recent victims, all richly dressed; above the corpses, demons carry off their souls. This painting is an allegory of the tragic tensions in Tuscany after the Black Death.

The subject of death, the great leveler, is summarized again in Pieter Bruegel the Elder's sixteenth-century Triumph of Death, which is a triumph not only over the living but over everything that is human. Earlier that century Hans Holbein the Younger popularized the Dance of Death. His designs for the Dance of Death were so popular that by the time he died, in 1543, the set of woodcuts he made was pirated and copied dozens of times over the next 60 years.

The Dance of Death depicts the living and the dead mingling in energetic procession, a scene often painted on a wall, usually in a churchyard or some other burial place. The Dance of Death was characteristic of the early modern death ritual in two ways: the living appeared in the order of their social rank, emperors and kings followed by nobles, the gentry, and commoners; the dead were displayed as part of an instruction to the living about the nature of death. Viewers took the dance of the living and the dead to refer to their own mortality. Sixteenth-century versions of the theme, Holbein's especially, stressed its didactic application in the tradition of the memento mori. Death was ready to strike anywhere at a moment's notice. Holbein's Dance stresses social rank. As the king sits at the table, Death pours his wine. The very symbols of power are points of vulnerability. The power of the pope to anoint princes is subverted; that of the emperor to rule princes is challenged as Death removes the crown. The cardinal, about to sell an indulgence, also has his hat removed. The empress in her finery is confronted by a grave as she walks through the city. And always, the hourglass is Death's emblem. The series also focuses on the universality of death: "Who is the man, however strong or great / Who can escape the final destiny?" This kind of sentiment illustrated what was alarming about death; therefore, the focus of the ritual of dying was on devotional or spiritual preparation, which tended to deny class or social differentiation.

The sixteenth-century Dance of Death was closely related to such early publications as The Art of Good Lyving and Good Eeyng and to the plot and drama of the confrontation known as the "Three Living and the Three Dead." In the latter, a small group of mortals on a journey are accosted by a party of the dead, with horrendous results. In all such works, the main focus of didactic attention—that is, the means by which the artist tries to persuade viewers to abandon sin and to live a life of virtue—is the contrast between the living and the dead. The living were often shown as well-to-do and fashionably dressed, and the dead as subversive and disrespectful of the niceties of social discourse. The more dramatic and unexpected the confrontation and the more stark the contrast between the social status and physical state of the two groups, the stronger was the didactic appeal.

The Dance of Death could also have its humorous appeal, as in Richard Dagley's Death's Doings (1827), in which Death is seen in one scene as a victorious boxer, "The Champion," and in another as a demon bowler in a cricket game. In the 1750s, William Hogarth had used a similar idea in two preliminary drawings undertaken for a monument to George Taylor, a famous pugilist. The endless fight for supremacy is evident in the titles of the drawings: Death Giving George Taylor a Cross Buttock and George Taylor Breaking the Ribs of Death.

Martyrdom and Death of Jesus Christ

The central martyrdom of Western civilization is the death of Jesus Christ. In art, the theme of Christ's martyrdom and death is depicted in the forms of the Crucifixion, the lamentation, and the deposition.

The Romans probably borrowed the painful crucifixion technique for executing non-Romans and the worst criminals, mostly slaves, from the Carthaginians, who had inherited it from their ancestors, the Phoenicians. After the victim had been scourged, his executioners nailed or tied him by his hands to a cross while it lay on the ground or stood in the air. It is thought that Christ was nailed rather than tied to the cross, probably when it lay on the ground. But many painters, to emphasize his suffering, include a ladder in their work to suggest that he was nailed to it when it was already mounted. To hasten death, the victim's legs were sometimes broken; this did not happen to Christ.

In the deposition from the cross, all four Gospels describe the treatment of Christ's body after his death on the cross. Luke 23 records the role played by the major participant in the events, the wealthy Joseph of Arimathea. "This man went unto Pilate and begged the body of Christ. And he took it down, and wrapped it in linen . . . and the women also, which came with him from Galilee . . . prepared spices and ointments" (Luke 23:52–56). Because of the significant role of Joseph of Arimathea, a man of standing, the subject of the deposition had a special attraction for wealthy patrons; their portraits in rich garb are often depicted in paintings of the subject. The artist also often included symbolic objects, such as a ladder, skull, and crossbones.

Through the ages, the martyrdom of Jesus has been expressed in almost every stylistic alternative except outright satire. The first portrayals were highly symbolic representations of the human body, denaturalized to dramatize the more-than-human significance of his death. Throughout the Middle Ages, touches of naturalism crept in. Thus, death in the Middle Ages has two faces: tragic pathos and mystical abstractions (classical versus nonclassical elements), and both appear as early as the fourth century in Rome.

In the ivory panel Apotheosis of an Emperor (late fourth century), the belief in a life after death—illustrated in the upper half of the panel where the emperor is carried to heaven by two naked and winged genies—is put forth in a manner totally in keeping with the Neoplatonic and Mithraic beliefs that dominated philosophy and religion in late Roman times. The interest here is the supernatural and transcendental as opposed to the realism of classical antiquity, and this is expressed in a total neglect of the third dimension. Figures appear on one plane; no illusion of depth occurs; there is a loss of individual character in the faces; and the rigid, staring eyes and the clumsy attitude of the figures are further testimony to the deliberate protest of the artist to be antirealistic. This work is an attempt to propagate a new art concerned with the abstract relationship among things rather than the things themselves. The spiritual, symbolic, transcendental character of this panel contains the root of later medieval art, which attempts to seek an escape from the material world, to find refuge and consolation in the spiritual. As opposed to the self-containment of classical art, this art is presented ceremonially: all the figures are conscious of the viewer's presence (Kitzinger, p. 15).

Throughout early Christian art, the medieval church used the death of Christ as a didactic instrument and vehicle for the propagation of the faith. The spiritual, transcendental form, with its rigid symmetry, flat composition without perspective, and strong linear design was not a straightforward development. Art frequently returned to the classical/Hellenistic tradition, especially in Italy, which was continuously subjected to the influence of other styles from the East. From late Roman art throughout the Middle Ages, this struggle—classical versus anticlassical tendencies—is apparent in the depictions of the death of Christ.

The Byzantine style preserved a hieratic style apart from the classical descriptive one, as exemplified in a tenth-century ivory triptych with the Crucifixion and saints. In this Crucifixion, no emotion is shown. All signs of individual life have been suppressed, and the faces and attitudes are stereotyped. In this type of Crucifixion, death is no longer a story; the narrative has been turned into a devotional icon. Depictions of Christ's death swing back and forth between the Hellenistic and the Asiatic tradition.

Sometimes one style triumphs over the other; sometimes they are in harmony. An example of the latter is the eleventh-century mosaic Crucifixion in the Monastery Church at Daphne, Greece, which combines classicism with a spiritualized ideal of death. Beyond the Byzantine linear style are the emotions of the figures, a pathos that is restrained, noble, yet suffering. The gestures and facial expressions suggest Christ's sacrificial death and are different from those in early Christian art, in which the Crucifixion was depicted only rarely because the emphasis was on the divine wisdom and power of Christ. While a few earlier examples of this kind of death exist, the Daphne Crucifixion, created in the second golden age after the iconoclastic controversy, is the most powerful example of an appeal to the emotions of the beholder.

Crucifixions influenced by this compassionate view of Christ's death include the German Gero Crucifix (circa A.D. 975–1000), in Cologne, Germany, in which the wooden sculpture is almost expressionistic in its agony. The monumentality of the piece, the bulge of the heavy body that further stresses the tensions and strain on the arms and shoulders, and the deeply incised angular features show the depth of suffering in death for the first time in the history of Western art.

In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, depictions of Christ's death depended very much on geographic factors. Siena, Italy, was isolated and medieval; thus its art, at the close of the thirteenth century, held close to the Romanesque-Byzantine tradition of abstraction. A city characterized by mystic religious fervor, it was dedicated more to understanding the death of Christ, not through emotion but through the reading of the story. Hence, Duccio di Buoninsegna's Crucifixion from the back of the Maestà Altarpiece (1308–1311) describes violence and tragedy through endless detail. In his Crucifixion, Duccio depicts not one but three crosses. He has even shown the legs of the two thieves, broken to put an end to their misery, while Christ's legs are left intact in fulfillment of the prophecy recorded in the Gospel of St. John: "A bone of him shall not be broken" (John 19:36). The penitent thief turns toward Christ; the impenitent thief faces away and is shown in a darker color. The angels do not have any connection with events on the ground, but they hover above the clouds, above Christ. Everyone who might have been present at this event appears in the scene, and the result is crowding and lack of logic or perspective. Figures fill their roles in keeping with the religious text Meditations on the Life of Christ, which was probably written in Sienese territory by an early Trecento Franciscan mystic. Thus, Mary swoons below the cross into the arms of the holy women. She looks upward toward the agonized Christ, from whose side blood and water gush in powerful streams.

It was Giotto in Florence, Italy, who translated St. Francis's thoughts on naturalism into a readily understandable image of people and situations. This is made clear in his Lamentation for the Arena Chapel, in Padua, Italy. As opposed to the static universal concepts of the Byzantine tradition, Giotto's definitions of time, place, and circumstance permit us to identify completely with the figure he represents. In the Lamentation, two groups participate in this death: those on the Earth and those in the sky. On the ground, the figures move in a slow dance of grief; each figure responds individually, according to his or her nature. The women appear to be wailing in despair, and the older men stand in quiet resignation. The face of the Virgin, as she bends to embrace her son, shows excruciating pain and sorrow. No less than the figures on the main stage, the angels in the sky form a synthesis between heaven and Earth, the real and the unreal, the transcendental and the human, by repeating the emotions and poses of the figures on the ground. Giotto emphasizes feeling in this human mourning of a dead, religious figure, a scene that depends on grasping an emotion through movement or choreography.

An example of how the two currents—Florence and Siena—dominated early fourteenth-century medieval art can be seen in Pietro Lorenzetti's depiction of Christ's death in the fresco Descent from the Cross (circa 1320–1330) in the Lower Church of S. Francesco in Assisi, Italy). Pietro must have visited Florence and been familiar with Giotto's work. This familiarity can be seen in his Gothic treatment of the figures, the intense humanity of his art, the stronger hands, and the ample proportions of his figures. These all serve to emphasize a more humanistic, painful version of Christ's death, one belonging more to the classical tradition of Florence than to the Byzantine one of Siena. The gaunt body of Christ—the effect perhaps of rigor mortis—and the Virgin pressing the head of her son to her cheek so that the two heads seem united in a way that the dead and the living eyes appear to be on the same line indicate the humanism the artist depicts in this scene of death.

The immediate tragedy inherent in the Crucifixion can be seen in Masaccio's panel Crucifixion from the summit of the Pisa polyptych (1426). Sacrifice is Masaccio's theme rather than the historical incident, and the assembled are limited to four figures—Christ, the Virgin Mary, St. John the Evangelist, and Mary Magdalen—to emphasize the formal, symbolic, tragic effects. The Magdalen prostrates herself before the cross, her arms thrown wide so that the cross seems to grow upward from her gesture of despairing guilt, to culminate in the arms of Christ stretched out in pitying self-immolation. The Magdalen's sinking figure and her traditional yellow hair and red mantle are a contrast to the soft rose of St. John's cloak. Mary stands firm under her son's cross, her hands folded in prayer, her eyes gazing inward rather than upward, her mouth open as she calls to him across the void. Earlier versions of the death of Christ are fused and transfigured by Masaccio's new humanity. In these four figures, Masaccio achieves simplicity, universality, and power.

While Masaccio's Christ makes a strong humanistic statement, it is at the expense of naturalism because all of Masaccio's drama happens in the foreground. Fra Angelico's Descent from the Cross (1430–1434) marks the first successful Italian attempt to set Christ and a group of figures into a harmoniously receding landscape space rather than on a foreground stage as in Masaccio's depiction. Fra Angelico's Descent—filled as it is with innumerable figures grouped on a flowering lawn and all united by their common adoration of the sacred body—was a milestone in the early 1430s. At that time, few painters could surpass his grasp of the new naturalism; he not only matched his harmony of figures with landscape forms, but he included the death of Christ into this new scenario.

Strong classical tendencies come to the fore in Renaissance sculpture. In Donatello's Crucifix (1444–1447) in S. Antonio, in Padua, Italy, the bronze Christ is depicted as a powerful, athletic man with a handsome, rather classical face. His face displays great intelligence and the ability to endure pain calmly in the manner of an ancient Stoic. The classicism of this crucifix is emphasized by the strong arms, extended hands, sturdy rib cage, firm thighs, and the way the artist displays the body more completely; that is, the loincloth is parted to show the nude left flank.

The religiosity, emotion, and anguish so characteristic of Florentine Crucifixions are absent in central Italy. For example, in Perugino's Crucifixion with Saints (before 1481), Christ hangs calmly on the cross, in fact he seems almost to stand on the footrest. Mary looks downward, St. John looks upward, and neither betrays a trace of grief. Mary Magdalen's pose is almost a carbon copy of St. John's; there is no difference between them, save for a slight change in the position of the clasped hands. Perugino seems to have made a pattern book of stock poses for saints and repeated them uncritically and endlessly, not only from one picture to the next but even within the same picture. Nature is his real subject, and against this the sacred figures are set with little more purpose than to give human scale to the landscape and the distance to the sky.

As opposed to central Italy, northern Italy displays not only more concern with Christ's death but an obsession with his suffering, as exemplified by the Pietàs by Carlo Crivelli (1470), Giovanni Bellini (1467–1471), and Cosimo Tura (circa 1480). A study of opposites can be made between Perugino's quiet, emotionless Crucifixion and Andrea Mantegna's Crucifixion from the predella of the S. Zeno Altarpiece (1456–1459). Mantegna's Crucifixion stresses tragic emotion and is monumental. The cross of Christ is placed so that his toes, deprived of the usual footrest, issue from the junction between the two distant hills. His body is fully silhouetted against the sky, and his arms are thrown wide, in a heroic gesture of suffering. The suffering women, the indifferent soldiers, and the landscape and cityscape are brought together by the grandiose pose of the outstretched arms of the suffering Christ; all is held together by the restraint of an emotional outpouring within a restrained style.

Mantegna was so obsessed with the death of Christ that he even turned him into a memento mori, inventing an unusual type of memento mori in the fifteenth century. Instead of the traditional skeleton, Mantegna's Dead Christ (1466) is a shocking and realistic reminder of how close human beings are to death. Christ lies on a marble slab with a white cloth over his legs. His head is raised on a pillow so that the viewer can look at the closed eyes, still haunted by pain, and see the slightly parted lips.

This image was indeed a grim reminder of mortality. It is probably the painting that was placed by Federigo Gonzaga, first duke of Mantua, just outside his bride's bedchamber. In the Quattrocento, the death of Christ was a matter for frequent personal meditation. In his Imitation of Christ, Thomas à Kempis exhorted his readers to "dwell on the wounds of Christ," which is what Mantegna asked viewers to do. Mantegna's sculptural form gives a most convincing three-dimensionality to the body and the open wounds. The perspective recession has the effect of catapulting the body past the frame and at the viewers, and the viewers cannot escape, because Christ's feet follow them wherever they stand in the room, and the wounds always lie open to their gaze. In the nineteenth century, Édouard Manet's The Dead Christ with Angels (1864) seems to be a parody on Mantegna's version. If Mantegna had reinterpreted the theme of Christ's death into a new iconography of compelling drama and visual shock, Manet reduced the theme to such banality that one critic implored the spectators to come and see a "Poor miner pulled out of the coal mines" (Nochlin, p. 57).

The emotion of depicting Christ lessened considerably by the mid-fifteenth century, and nowhere can this be seen better than in the cool rendering of Piero della Francesca's Crucifixion for the Misericordia Altarpiece (1445). The apex of the altarpiece is a commentary on Masaccio's Pisa Crucifixion in its similar minimalism and drama. Yet Piero's work offers no communion between the crucified and his mourners. He has locked the cross to the frame and shown Christ as inert and unresponsive to the grief expressed in the reaching gesture of Mary and the wide-flung arms of St. John. It is as though only the crowned Mother in the image below, robed in the mantle of heaven, can bridge the gulf fixed between God and humankind.

The coolness of Piero's work shows the artist's preoccupation with reason and physical laws. His work is testimony to an age that attempted to combine faith and reason, form and symbol, religion and humanity, art and science. It stands in sharp contrast to the agonized religiosity of Botticelli's Pietà of the late 1490s, which is more specifically a lamentation. This work is a transformation of Botticelli's earlier softer style and speaks of the gathering intensity of his own private religious fervor. In this deeply religious work, one sees the influence of Florentine religious reformer Girolamo Savonarola's doctrine: a self-flagellating gloom. Jagged foreboding rocks form the entrance to the tomb and enclose the mourning figures. Inside the tomb is the sarcophagus and blackness. The pose of Christ, with his hanging arm, was inspired by a window designed by Andrea del Castagno for the dome of the Florence cathedral. Botticelli also seems inspired by Pietro Lorenzetti's harsh Descent from the Cross in Assisi. From this work Botticelli borrowed the appearance of rigor mortis and the upside-down confrontation of the Magdalen's face with that of Christ.

Emotion has many faces. While Mantegna stressed realism to the point where the religious message might almost be missed, Matthias Grünewald in Germany stressed emotion to the point of the grotesque. In Grünewald's 1519 Crucifixion (The Small Crucifixion), the body of Christ is knobby and skeletal. His head protrudes forward in agony. His outstretched arms end in crooked, distorted fingers that seem to make one final appeal. Although Christ's feet were not broken in the Crucifixion, in this work the one foot over the other suggests that they were, adding to the suffering and pain.

The passionate narrative of the suffering of Christ's death took an even more emotional form in the image of the Pietà, which was designed to serve private devotion. The Pietà (an Italian word derived from the Latin pietās, the root word for both "pity" and "poetry") was a representation of the Virgin grieving over the dead Christ. No such scene occurs in the scriptural account of the Passion; it was invented as a tragic counterpart to the familiar motif of the Madonna and Child. An early fourteenth-century example in wood, in the Provinzialmuseum in Bonn, Germany, depicts the scene in exaggerated realism; the agonized faces and the blood-encrusted wounds of Christ are enlarged, elaborate, and grotesque. The bodies are more like thin and rigid bones. The purpose of the work is clearly to arouse an overwhelming sense of horror and pity over the death of Christ and the suffering of his mother, so that viewers could identify with the grief.

The Avignon Pietà (circa 1470), attributed to Enguerrand Quarton, is another example of the motif. Italian and Flemish sources influenced this southern French version; consequently, the agony is somewhat softened and more restrained. The figure types and the expressions seem to be inspired by Rogier van der Weyden's The Descent from the Cross (circa 1435). The heavy figures of The Avignon Pietà are compressed into a tight rectangle, the body of Christ in the center, unrelieved by any sense of space or perspective. The emphasis on suffering and anguish is reiterated by the cross in the background, which is repeated twice, once as an actual cross and once in the wall itself, which architecturally forms another cross. The emotionalism of the painting centers on the grief-stricken followers of Christ, in both their facial expression and body gestures, and emphasizes a tragic period in Christianity at the end of the Middle Ages. The complex unity of the suffering of the participants was meant to induce the same suffering and empathy with the viewer. This viewpoint is very different from that of Michelangelo's work of the sixteenth century, even though it shares a deep emotionalism with the latter.

Michelangelo's apparent obsession with Christ in his late drawings and sculptures emanated from his belief, in his later years, that salvation depended on one's attitude toward the sacrifice of Christ. This turn to religion may have been a result of his own frustration with art at the end of his life. The strong, spiritual aspect of such works as the Rondanini Pietà (1550–1564) reflect this conflict. The rough, almost liquid treatment of the stone reflects his search for the spiritual inner self, as opposed to earlier works that in their muscular structure and clean finish reflected his faith in the world of science and knowledge. In the Rondanini Pietà, he has turned away from the vigorous, healthy, and beautifully classical body in favor of the unfinished, rough, almost eaten-away flesh.

An even more personal approach to Christ's death is found in Pontormo's Deposition (1525–1528). The distortions, artificial poses and gestures, shocking colors, and eerie quality suggest a disturbing and mystical interpretation of Christ's death.

The Crucifixion shows up sporadically in nineteenth-century Europe but more often in an antireligious position. The Crucifixion, once a symbol of belief, faith, and love, was contrasted to the modern world's changing social and economic condition. In Gustave Courbet's Interior of My Studio, a Real Allegory Summing up Seven Years of My Life as an Artist (1855) and again in his Funeral at Ornans (1864), the incongruous Crucifixion motif stands as a reminder that religion has passed. In the former work the Crucifixion aligns itself with the poor and suffering, and in the latter the participants of a funeral, including the dead, do not "behave" in correct funeral form. The motif became a symbol of the confrontation between society and modernity. This point was made more poignant in Manet's anti-Christ painting of The Dead Christ with Angels and more blatant in Ensor's Christ's Entry into Brussels (1889).

Paul Gauguin returned to the theme of the death of Christ with a renewed interest and enthusiasm in Brittany and in Tahiti because it expressed his generation's search for the pure and the primitive and it expressed his personal feelings at that time. As a self-imposed exile, Gauguin often saw himself as a martyr. Self-Portrait and Yellow Christ (1889), Self-Portrait Near Golgotha (1896), and Christ in the Garden of Olives (1889) are self-portraits in which Gauguin has transformed himself into a modern-day Christ. Ultimately, Gauguin's images stand like ancient pieces of sculpture in a parade or procession of figures that do not interact with one another and that are related only because they are found in the same space. This is especially true of the last enigmatic painting Gauguin did before his death, which was perhaps meant as a suicide painting: Where Do We Come from, What Are We, Where Are We Going? (1897). Here then the theme of death seems to have come full cycle, returning to one of the earliest expressions of death, the Dance of Death.

Suicide, Murder, and War

A thin line separates martyrdom from suicide. The hallmark of martyrdom is some cause or belief for which one gives one's life. Others must know and believe in that cause, and the cause must be significant. Suicide, on the other hand, contains within it both the forbidden and the heroic. Sometimes noble, sometimes futile, its form in art does not follow an evolutionary pattern but alternates randomly according to the needs of history. In this respect, it is similar to death as a result of murder or war.

To compensate for the loss of purgatory as part of their religious beliefs, Protestant churches gradually developed the theory of memoria, which stressed the didactic potential of the lives and deaths of the virtuous. In the second half of the eighteenth century, this theory gained strong ground in France and England, where artists revived the death theme as an antidote to the then-prevailing excesses of the rococo. To illustrate this didactic theme, images were produced of exemplary "good" deaths. Following the example of Nicolas Poussin's Death of Phocian and his Death of Germanicus in the seventeenth century, artists from all over Europe began to produce works depicting the theme of the death of the hero, preferably one from antiquity. Examples of such neoclassical paintings are Gavin Hamilton's Andromache Bewailing the Death of Hector (1764), Heinrich Füger's Death of Germanicus (1789), José de Madrazo's Death of Viriathus (1818), and François Ménégoet's Death of Leonardo da Vinci (circa 1781). In 1770, over the objections of Joshua Reynolds and King George III, Benjamin West depicted his Death of General Wolfe in modern dress, providing a successful precedent for many other similar paintings.

It was not just the hero on his deathbed, surrounded by friends and family, that gave a new sense of morality and seriousness to art but the variety of death scenes presented. Jacques-Louis David's Death of Socrates (1787) and Death of Seneca (1773) sang the praises of the ancient heroes about to die; his The Lictors Bringing Brutus the Bodies of His Sons (1789) and Oath of Horatii (1784–1785) show the hero swearing to sacrifice all, including his own life and his family's lives, for his country. There were also contemporary heroes, like David's Marat (1793). Although this was a political murder—Marat was murdered by Charlotte Corday—David emphasized the martyrdom of Marat and raised the banal subject to a religious status.

These death scenes not only introduced a new kind of morality of the nobility of sacrifice to French society, they also stressed gender differences. It is not women who are dying, dead, or about to die, but men. The emphasis of these paintings is on the masculine principle. From a physical and metaphysical point of view, women are literally pushed to the side, perhaps playing a significant role, but certainly a different one from that of their male counterparts. Even when men die and are no longer in the paintings, their presence is still felt by the women portrayed, who seem to exist only to keep alive the memory of the men they lost. This can be seen in the many widow paintings produced at this time, such as Joseph Wright of Derby's The Dead Soldier (1789), Wright's Indian Widow (1785), Jean-Baptiste Greuze's Inconsolable Widow (1763), Angelica Kauffman's Andromache and Hecuba Weeping over the Ashes of Hector (1770), and Benjamin West's Agrippina with the Ashes of Germanicus (1763).

Along with the emphasis on the masculine principle that these paintings stressed came the principle of optimism. Death is shown not as a punishment, nor as a reminder of the fragility of life, but rather as a moment of glory and a way to prove greatness or nobility of soul or masculinity. Death is taken out of all proportion; indeed, it is raised to such a level of importance that it becomes a focal point of early nineteenth-century French art. This can be seen in the paintings of the romantics.

The morbid preoccupation with the end of life or with some oncoming tragedy that will result in death is best presented in the paintings of Antoine-Jean Gros, Eugène Delacroix, and Théodore Géricault. The joy of suffering, the love of disease, stress, and disaster, the lack of satisfaction with life—these themes are stressed in Gros's Napoleon at the Plague House in Jaffa (1804), Delacroix's Death of King Sardanapalus (1828), and Géricault's Raft of the Medusa (1819). Moreover, the actual moment of death itself has been removed. Real death is replaced with the threat of death, implied by terminal illness, insatiable desires, or natural disasters. In Delacroix's Death of King Sardanapalus, Sardanapalus is threatened with death not only through the massacre of everything that he holds dear, which unfolds before the viewer's eye, but also through murder of the king himself. In this instance, the Sardanapalus is not only a murder scene, but one of suicide. Thus, it falls within the category of Romanticism. The Romantics were in love with suffering. The climax of suffering was proximity to death. Sardanapalus is like Francisco de Goya's Saturn Devouring His Son (1820–1823). Both have insatiable appetites; neither one can ever be satisfied in life.

Many of the Romantic paintings of death were inspired by literature. William Shakespeare's Ophelia is one such character depicted in both French and English iconography. In Delacroix's The Death of Ophelia (1844), Ophelia is very close to the description Shakespeare gave her in his play Hamlet. In the painting, she grasps the remains of her garland, her white dress swirls into the river, her face is puzzled and confused, and she clings to the branch above her. Not knowing how she will choose, Delacroix emphasizes her innocent perplexity. She hangs forever in the dark water between life and death, helpless to rescue herself. The Romantic sense of lost innocence and inner torment are captured in this depiction of Ophelia. This is in keeping with the play, which places in doubt the matter of Ophelia's burial. This was a perfect subject for the nineteenth-century Romantics in France and in England, whose depictions of Ophelia show their own ambiguity toward death and women.

Like Delacroix's other great death scene, The Death of King Sardanapalus, the traditional portrayal of death—decay, skeletons, and the horrific—have been exchanged for the figure of a beautiful woman. Ophelia represents woman in nature, woman in her most natural surroundings. Delacroix's women are more sensual than suffering, more alive than dead, even when faced with the possibility of death. In the Sardanapalus, they are squirming and twisting in poses that are more an affirmation of life than a resignation to death. In his Ophelia, instead of a corpse, half a fleshy nude is presented, not on her back but on her side.

Although England was faced with grueling death statistics during this period, death was not a popular theme in Victorian painting. Outstanding exceptions are Arthur Hughes's Home from the Sea (1856–1862) and Henry Alexander Bowler's The Doubt: Can These Dry Bones Live? (1854–1855). This aversion to the death theme might be connected with the Victorian's distaste for depicting unpleasant realities in their paintings. The young Pre-Raphaelites, a small avant-garde of the Royal Academy, did take up the theme; in keeping with their Romantic style, however, they presented it in a way that denied any real identity between the viewer and death. At most, it was the kind of identity that the viewer had come to expect from more conventional Victorian paintings.

Part of this Romantic tradition was grounded in literature—the poems, plays, and stories of Shakespeare, John Keats, and Alfred, Lord Tennyson, to mention a few—and the literary and intellectual nature of these paintings may have acted as a deterrent to an understanding of these works by the everyday visitor to the Royal Academy. This is true of John Everett Millais's Mariana (1850–1851), which appears in both Tennyson and Shakespeare; his Ophelia (1851–1852), from Shakespeare; and his Isabella or The Pot of Basil (1848–1849), an original story by Boccaccio, retold by Keats. The Pre-Raphaelites dealt with a new kind of death, not one occurring through natural circumstances. Mariana's fate or destiny depends on a man, without whom she has no desire to live. Ophelia, floating down the river, speaks of self-destruction and madness; and in Isabella or The Pot of Basil, the theme is related to death through murder.

Even personal death was reshaped into a literary form, showing how literary themes could sometimes serve a double purpose. This is apparent in William Holman Hunt's Isabella and the Pot of Basil (1866–1868), based on Keats but this time done more as a memorial to the artist's young wife, Fanny, who had died of cholera in Florence while the couple were on their way to the Middle East. The same can be said for Dante Gabriel Rossetti's portrait of Beata Beatrix (circa 1863), which was dedicated to his late wife, Elizabeth Siddal.

Although a foreboding of death appears in the works of the Pre-Raphaelites, they do not treat death in direct terms. The paintings are more mood paintings. Death is not used for moralizing. Instead of the heavy, didactic paintings of neoclassicism, the Pre-Raphaelite paintings are more like poetry in terms of atmosphere and symbolism. This can be seen in Millais's two paintings Spring (Apple Blossoms) (1856–1857), and the pendant he painted for it, The Vale of Rest (1858). The Vale of Rest has many references to death:

The nun on the left is digging a grave, which is positioned ominously to suggest the spectator might be in it with her. The other nun's rosary has a skull attached to it as well as a cross. It is sunset of autumn-time and a vaguely coffin-shaped cloud appears in the sky—a harbinger of death according to Scottish superstition. (Tate Gallery, p. 175)

Nevertheless, The Vale of Rest, like Spring with its own hints of mortality, remains ambiguous and provoking in different ways.

Death continued to fascinate this group in a more spiritual, occult fashion in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. A new source of literature served the needs of the late Pre-Raphaelites (a second group, which included Edward Burne-Jones and William Morris and excluded Millais and Hunt). In Burne-Jones's work, the fairy tale takes on a new importance. Instead of the classic heroines of the earlier period—Ophelia, Mariana, and Beatrice—there are now witches, fairies, and princesses. Death itself has become more abstract, a good example being Burne-Jones's Briar Rose series, in which sleep and the trance symbolize a deathlike condition.

In England, death is transformed into the realm of the spiritual, giving sleep, dreams, and repose a much broader, more ambiguous meaning; in France the idea of death is used by the realists to stress their new iconography. Gustave Courbet does away with the body completely in his Funeral at Ornans, which emphasizes not the dead person, who no longer exists and is of no interest, but the community of the living—all those who, for an assortment of reasons, attend town funerals. His contemporary, Édouard Manet, invented a new death iconography by emphasizing the nonchalant, matter-of-fact type of death, which had never before been treated. Coverage of historic paintings, like Manet's The Execution of Emperor Maximilian (1868), a subject that in the past would have been treated with all the respect due a painting of this scale and importance, were reduced to a one-line sentence in a history book.

The last quarter of the nineteenth century in France saw a great deal of English influence in the works of Paul Gauguin, who imparted yet another meaning to the theme of death in his interpretation of Tahitian culture. Far from the European tradition of death paintings, artists like Gauguin were in search of the self. Death became, as Søren Kierkegaard wrote, the dread of despair at not “being conscious of having a Self” or the “despair at Not Willing to be Oneself” (Kierkegaard, pp. 146–154). In Tahiti, Gauguin found a religion that he equated with simplicity and innocence. This was a kind of primitivism that he translated to his real “self.” He effectively represented this mysterious self in paintings dealing with the superstitions and beliefs of the Tahitians in regard to death or dying. Gauguin’s Tahitian women are often depicted lying in a horizontal position, either asleep or silently listening to the voices of death. These paintings have much of the qualities of English art in their search for truth: simplicity, the self, and a style that insists on a two-dimensional surface with strong, flat lines. Like the Pre-Raphaelites, Gauguin, too equated death with sleep and trances, what he eventually called the “mysterious centers of thought.” His mysterious “center,” or self, is suggested in paintings like The Yellow Christ (1889) and Breton Calvary (1889). Here a regression in style and subject matter match what he believed was a simpler society; an intensity of faith in which he wished to immerse himself. Ironically, in this primitive definition of self, Gauguin returns to one of the oldest European themes in the Christian world from which he wished so badly to escape: the death and martyrdom of Christ.

The dread of the self takes on a frightening face in the work of Edvard Munch in Norway. In his lithograph The Death Chamber (1896), the echoes of Kierkegaard’s fear of “Sickness unto Death” reverberate in every corner of the room. In this homely setting, death has more than one victim. Although the print was based on the artist’s sister’s death, each figure is facing death alone and without comfort. The print is like a modern version of the medieval memento mori. The stark contrasts between black and white and the poses of the figures emphasize not death itself but the fact that, in the final analysis, everyone is alone with his or her self.

Artists looked at death differently in the twentieth century. No longer a vehicle for questioning our spiritual place in the universe, death as something inevitable was not the main concern of the artist. Death as a result of inhumanity toward others and death as a result of stupidity, hypocrisy, and cruelty became the overriding themes; pointless death through war and its consequences preoccupied the modern artist. This was a new point of view. For example, death through war maintained an idealized dignity in the classic period. The Dying Warrior from the east pediment of the Temple of Aphaia on the Greek island of Aegina (circa 490 B.C.) represents the idealized spirit of sacrifice stated in universal terms. Little is known of the warrior, certainly not the particular war that he represents. His death is more communal and religious and for public view. He represents national ideals and morality. There are no signs of war, no blood or pain, nor is he romanticized with any superspiritualism. The sculpture is really a prototype that represents universal destiny and resignation.

This warrior is in sharp contrast to the Dying Gaul (a Roman copy of a Greek original, circa 230–220 B.C.), which, true to the era of Alexander the Great, stresses suffering and an active fight against death. As opposed to the Dying Warrior, whose pose was clearly dependent on the demands of the architecture, the Dying Gaul stresses elements that relate to the anguish of death: the wound in the side, the flared nostrils, the knotted hair, and the battlefield paraphernalia nearby. As different as these works are, they still depict noble deaths. The Dying Gaul may stress a realism unknown to the Dying Warrior, but he is still represented as a hero, a physical specimen who, even in these last moments, is seated in a pose that stresses the muscularity and masculinity of his character. He is not a victim.

The image of the death of a victim was left to other artists, such as Goya, whose etching The Disasters of War, Number 36: Nor This Tampoco (circa 1814) documented the horror resulting from Napoleon’s invasion of Spain. This etching, which could be readily reproduced in quantity, emphasized the horror of war and transgression by focusing on such subject matter as garrottings, hangings, shootings, and beatings.

Unlike Goya, Käthe Kollwitz’s lithographs of war show neither the enemy nor the obvious victim. Kollwitz’s lithographs were influenced not only by her marriage to Karl Kollwitz, a physician dedicated to caring for the poor in Berlin, Germany, but also by the events of World War I and the death of her son. Her 1934 lithograph Death and the Mother emphasizes a new kind of death in which Kollwitz stresses the insane terror that grips a mother whose child is about to be taken from her. The power of this image speaks of the horror of war and of the symbolic force of death that goes back to the medieval period.

The major painting of the 1930s that dealt with death in war was Pablo Picasso’s Guernica (1937). This work was inspired by the bombing and destruction of the Basque town of Guernica by German bombers in the service of Spanish Fascists during the Spanish Civil War. Many of Picasso’s works reflect the violent and frightening events leading up to 1937 and ultimately find a place in Guernica. Some of the forms already show up in the 1920s and 1930s. Around 1930, Picasso made a number of studies for scenes of the Passion of Christ, and he picks up again the theme of the Crucifixion. The suffering depicted looks back to Grünewald’s Isenheim Altarpiece and looks forward to the destruction of total warfare in Guernica. During the 1930s, many motifs appear in his art that culminate in Guernica, such as the Minotaur (the bull-man monster of ancient Crete), the savagery of the bullfight, the Christlike figure on the ladder, the little girl holding flowers and a candle, and the screaming horse carrying the dead woman with bared breasts.

Although Guernica is one of the most complete and complicated paintings of war and death—perhaps 100 sketches and related drawings preceded the final painting—other of Picasso’s works created through the end of World War II reflect this savage period in modern history. His paintings and sculptures of this period are deeply disturbing: the theme of the skull is frequent, his colors are dark, and his distortions are extreme and obsessive. The luxury of past times, when artists could indulge in the metaphysics of death had passed. Death in Picasso’s work was a luxury no one could afford.

See also Apocalypse; Beheading/Decapitation; Crucifixion; Destruction of City; Grieving/Lamentation; Hanging;

Love and Death; Martyrdom; Plague/Pestilence; Serpent's Bite; Widowhood

Selected Works of Art

Memento Mori

- Three Living Nobles and Their Dead Counterparts*, from Recueil de Poésies Françaises, circa 1285, Paris, Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal
- Traini, Francesco, Triumph of Death, fresco, mid-fourteenth century, Pisa, Italy, Camposanto
- Rohan Master, Dead Man Confronted by the Lord, from Grandes Heures de la Famille de Rohan, early fifteenth century
- Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Triumph of Death, before 1569, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Leclerc, Jean, Memento Mori, oil on canvas, 1615–1620, Isaac Delgado Museum of Art

The Skeleton

- Baldung Grien, Hans, Death and the Maiden, 1517, Basel, Switzerland, Oeffentliche Kunstsammlung Basel Kunstmuseum
- Wright, Joseph of Derby, The Old Man and Death, 1773, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery
- Bresdin, Rodolphe, Comédie de la Mort, lithograph, 1854, The Hague, The Netherlands, Haags Gemeentemuseum
- Gogh, Vincent van, Skull with a Burning Cigarette, 1885, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Van Gogh Museum
- Ensor, James, Death Pursuing the People, drawing, 1886, private collection
- Ensor, James, The Sad and Broken: Satan and His Fantastic Legions Tormenting the Crucified Christ, drawing, 1886, private collection
- Ensor, James, My Portrait in 1960, 1888, private collection
- Munch, Edvard, Death and the Maiden, drawing, 1894, Oslo, Norway, Munch Museet
- Ryder, Albert Pinkham, The Race Track (Death on a Pale Horse), 1895–1910, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art
- Ensor, James, Skeleton Painter in His Studio, 1896, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten
- Corinth, Lovis, Self-Portrait with Skeleton, oil on canvas, 1896, Munich, Germany, Städtische Galerie im Lenbachhaus

The Dance of Death

- The Art of Good Lywing and Good Eeyng*
- Three Living and the Three Dead*
- Italian School, Time Passes, woodcut, late fifteenth century
- Holbein, Hans, Dance of Death, woodcuts, 1538
- Hogarth, William, George Taylor's Epitaph: Death Giving George Taylor a Cross Buttock, drawing, circa 1750, Marquess of Exeter Collection
- Hogarth, William, George Taylor's Epitaph: George Taylor Breaking the Ribs of Death, drawing, circa 1750, Marquess of Exeter Collection
- Rowlandson, Thomas, Dance of Death, 1815–1816
- Dagley, Richard, Death's Doings, 1827

Martyrdom and Death of Jesus Christ

- Crucifixion and Saints*, Byzantine ivory triptych, tenth century, London, British Museum, Department of British and Medieval Antiquities
- Gero Crucifix, wood, circa 975–1000, Cologne, Germany, Cathedral
- Crucifixion*, mosaic, eleventh century, Daphne, Greece, Monastery Church
- Pietà*, wood sculpture, early fourteenth century, Bonn, Germany, Provinzialmuseum
- Giotto, Lamentation, fresco, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
- Duccio, Crucifixion, from the Maestà Altarpiece, panel, 1308–1311, Siena, Italy, Museo dell'Opera del Duomo
- Lorenzetti, Descent from the Cross, fresco, circa 1320–1330, Assisi, Italy, Lower Church of S. Francesco
- Masaccio, Crucifixion, panel, 1426, for Santa Maria del Carmine, now in Naples, Italy, Museo e Gallerie Nazionali de Capodimonte
- Angelico, Fra, Descent from the Cross, 1430–1434, Florence, Italy, Museum di San Marco dell'Angelico
- Weyden, Rogier van der, The Descent from the Cross, circa 1435, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Donatello, Crucifix, bronze sculpture, 1444–1447, Padua, Italy, S. Antonio
- Piero della Francesca, Crucifixion, for the Misericordia Altarpiece, 1445, Sansepolcro, Italy, Pinacoteca
- Mantegna, Andrea, Crucifixion, panel, from the predella of the S. Zeno Altarpiece, 1456–1459, Paris, Louvre
- Mantegna, Andrea, Dead Christ, oil on canvas, 1466, Milan, Italy, Brera
- Quarton, Enguerrand, The Avignon Pietà, panel, circa 1470, Paris, Louvre
- Perugino, Crucifixion with Saints, before 1481, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Botticelli, Pietà, late 1490s, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
- Grünwald, Matthias, Isenheim Altarpiece, 1512–1515, Colmar, France, Musée d'Unterlinden
- Grünwald, Matthias, Crucifixion (The Small Crucifixion), 1519, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Pontormo, Deposition, 1525–1528, Florence, Italy, Sta. Felicità
- Michelangelo, Rondanini Pietà, 1550–1564, Milan, Italy, Museo d'Arte Moderna
- Michelangelo, The Crucifixion with the Virgin and Saint John, drawing, 1550–1556, London, British Museum
- Courbet, Gustave, Interior of My Studio, a Real Allegory Summing up Seven Years of My Life as an Artist, 1855, Paris, Louvre
- Manet, Édouard, The Dead Christ with Angels, 1864, New York, Metropolitan Museum
- Ensor, James, Christ's Entry into Brussels, 1889, Antwerp, Belgium
- Gauguin, Paul, Christ in the Garden of Olives, 1889, West Palm Beach, Florida, Norton Gallery and School of Fine Arts
- Gauguin, Paul, The Yellow Christ, 1889, Buffalo, New York, Albright Art Gallery

- Gauguin, Paul, Breton Calvary, 1889, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique
- Gauguin, Paul, Self-Portrait and Yellow Christ, 1889, private collection
- Gauguin, Paul, Self-Portrait Near Golgotha, 1896, São Paulo, Brazil, Museu de Arte de São Paulo

Death of the Hero

- The Dying Warrior*, marble sculpture, from east pediment of Temple of Aphaia at Aegina, Greece, circa 490 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek
- Dying Gaul*, Roman copy after bronze original from Pergamum, circa 230–220 B.C., Rome, Capitoline Museum
- Apotheosis of an Emperor*, ivory panel, late fourth century, London, British Museum, Department of British and Medieval Antiquities
- Poussin, Nicolas, Death of Germanicus, circa 1627, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Art
- Poussin, Nicolas, Death of Phocian (Burial of Phocion), oil on canvas, 1648, Paris, Louvre
- Hamilton, Gavin, Andromache Bewailing the Death of Hector, 1764
- West, Benjamin, Death of General Wolfe, 1770, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada
- David, Jacques-Louis, Death of Seneca, 1773, Paris, Musée de Petit Palais
- Ménageot, François, Death of Leonardo da Vinci, circa 1781, Amboise, France, Musée de l'Hôtel de Ville
- David, Jacques-Louis, Oath of Horatii, oil on canvas, 1784–1785, Paris, Louvre
- David, Jacques-Louis, Death of Socrates, circa 1787, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Füger, Heinrich, Death of Germanicus, 1789, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie Belvedere
- David, Jacques-Louis, The Lictors Bringing Brutus the Bodies of His Sons, oil on canvas, 1789, Paris, Louvre
- David, Jacques-Louis, Marat, 1793, Brussels, Musée Royal des Beaux-Arts de Belgique
- David, Jacques-Louis, Death of Bara, 1794, Avignon, France, Musée Calvet
- Madrazo, José de, Death of Viriathus, 1818, Madrid, Spain, Reina Sofía
- Gerôme, Jean-Léon, Death of Caesar, oil on canvas, probably 1865, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery

The Mourners

- Greuze, Jean-Baptiste, Inconsolable Widow, 1763, London, Wallace Collection
- West, Benjamin, Agrippina with the Ashes of Germanicus, 1763, Burley House, Northamptonshire, England
- Kauffman, Angelica, Andromache and Hecuba Weeping Over the Ashes of Hector, 1770
- Wright, Joseph, of Derby, Indian Widow, 1785, Derby, Derbyshire, England, Museum and Art Gallery
- Wright, Joseph, of Derby, The Dead Soldier, 1789, James Ricau Collection
- Munch, Edvard, The Death Chamber, lithograph, 1896, Oslo, Norway, Munch Museum

The Romantic View of Death

- Gros, Antoine-Jean, Napoleon at the Plague House in Jaffa, 1804, Paris, Louvre
- Géricault, Théodore, Raft of the Medusa, 1819, Paris, Louvre
- Delacroix, Eugène, Death of King Sardanapalus, 1828, Paris, Louvre
- Delacroix, Eugène, The Death of Ophelia, 1844, Paris, Louvre

Victorian Paintings of Death

- Bowler, Henry Alexander, The Doubt: Can These Dry Bones Live?, oil on canvas, 1854–1855, London, Tate Gallery
- Hughes, Arthur, Home from the Sea, 1856–1862, Oxford, England, Ashmolean Museum
- La Thangue, Henry Herbert, The Man with the Scythe, circa 1880s, London, Tate Gallery

Pre-Raphaelite Paintings of Death

- Millais, John Everett, Isabella (The Pot of Basil), 1848–1849, Lord Sherfield Collection
- Millais, John Everett, Mariana, oil on panel, 1850–1851, Makins Collection
- Millais, John Everett, Ophelia, 1851–1852, London, Tate Gallery
- Millais, John Everett, Spring (Apple Blossoms), oil on canvas, 1856–1857, collection of Viscount Leverhulme
- Millais, John Everett, The Vale of Rest, oil on canvas, 1858, London, Tate Gallery
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Beata Beatrix, oil on canvas, circa 1863, London, Tate Gallery
- Hunt, William Holman, Isabella and the Pot of Basil, oil on canvas, 1866–1868, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, Laing Art Gallery
- Burne-Jones, Edward, Briar Rose, series, 1871–1890, Faringdon, Oxfordshire, England, Buscot Park

French Realism and Death

- Daumier, Honoré, Rue Transnonain, le 15 Avril, 1834, lithograph, 1834
- Courbet, Gustave, Funeral (Burial) at Ornans, oil on canvas, 1864
- Manet, Édouard, The Dead Toreador, oil on canvas, 1864, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Manet, Édouard, The Execution of Emperor Maximilian, oil on canvas, 1868, Mannheim, Germany, Städtische Kunsthalle

Death in War

- Gros, Antoine-Jean, Napoleon on the Battlefield of Eylau, oil on canvas, 1808, Paris, Louvre
- Goya, Francisco, The Disasters of War, Number 36: Nor This Tampoco, etching, circa 1814
- Kollwitz, Käthe, Death Reaches for a Group of Children, from Death Cycle, lithograph with watercolor, 1934–1935
- Picasso, Pablo, Guernica, oil on canvas, 1937, Madrid, Spain, Reina Sofía

Suicide

- Carolsfeld, Ludwig Schnorr von, The Leap from the Rocks, oil on panel, 1833, Schweinfurt, Germany, Georg Schafer Collection
- Manet, Édouard, The Suicide, oil on canvas, circa 1877–1881, Zurich, Switzerland, Kunsthaus, Buhrle Collection
- Netti, Francesco, The Suicide, before 1894, Venice, Italy, Museo d'Arte Moderna
- Gauguin, Paul, Where Do We Come from, What Are We, Where Are We Going?, oil on canvas, 1897, Boston, Massachusetts, Boston Museum of Fine Arts
- Picasso, Pablo, Death of Casagemas, oil on panel, 1901, Paris, Museo Picasso

Other Views of Death

- Kahlo, Frida, The Wounded Table, oil on canvas, 1940, present location unknown
- Kahlo, Frida, Without Hope, oil on canvas, 1945, Mexico, Dolores Olmedo Collection
- Rivera, Diego, Dream of a Sunday Afternoon, fresco, 1947–1948, Mexico City, Mexico

Further Reading

- Ariès, Philippe, The Hour of Our Death, translated by Helen Weaver; London: Allen Lane, 1981; New York: Vintage, 1982
- Binion, Rudolph, Love Beyond Death: The Anatomy of a Myth in the Arts, New York: New York University Press, 1993
- Boase, Thomas Sherrer Ross, Death in the Middle Ages: Morality, Judgment and Remembrance, London: Thames and Hudson, 1972; New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972
- Bronfen, Elisabeth, Over Her Dead Body: Death, Femininity and the Aesthetic, New York: Routledge, 1992; Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1992
- Camille, Michael, Master of Death: The Lifeless Art of Pierre Remiet, Illuminator, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1996
- Cassirer, Paul, Kaethe Kollwitz, Berlin, 1997
- Clark, James Midgley, The Dance of Death in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, Glasgow, Scotland: Jackson, 1950
- Eichenberg, Fritz, Dance of Death: A Graphic Commentary on the Dance Macabre Through the Centuries, New York: Abbeville Press, 1983
- Hewelly, Nigel, The Art of Death, London: Victoria and Albert Museum, 1991
- Jalland, Pat, Death and the Victorian Family, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996
- Kierkegaard, Søren, The Sickness Unto Death, London and New York: Penguin, 1989
- Kitzinger, Ernst, Early Medieval Art in the British Museum, London: British Museum, 1940
- Kollwitz, Hans, ed., The Diary and Letters of Kaethe Kollwitz, Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1955
- Llewellyn, Nigel, The Art of Death: Visual Culture in an English Death Ritual, London: Reaktion, 1991
- Lloyd, Jill, German Expressionism: Primitivism and Modernity, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1991
- Morley, John, Death, Heaven and the Victorians, London: Studio Vista, 1971; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1971
- Nochlin, Linda, Realism, Harmondsworth, England, and New York: Penguin, 1971
- Rosenblum, Robert, Transformations in Late Eighteenth-Century Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1967
- Scholl, Sharon, Death and the Humanities, London: Associated University Presses, 1984; Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, 1984
- Smith, Margaret Denton, The Elegy of Death in French Painting at the End of the Eighteenth and Beginning of the Nineteenth Centuries, (Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1986)
- Sourvinou-Inwood, Christine, Reading Greek Death: To the End of the Classical Period, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995; New York: Oxford University Press, 1995
- The Tate Gallery, The Pre-Raphaelites, London: Tate Gallery, 1984
- Warthin, Aldred Scott, The Physician of the Dance of Death, New York: Hoeber, 1930

DESTRUCTION OF CITY

Eugene Dwyer

The following periods and cultures are covered in the discussion of the theme Destruction of City:

CLASSICAL

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

JAPANESE

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

John Martin, The Fall of Nineveh, 1827–1828, hand-colored mezzotint, Oberlin, Ohio, Oberlin College, Allen Memorial Art Museum. (Courtesy of the Allen Memorial Art Museum, Oberlin College, Ohio, Friends of Art Endowment Fund, 1974)

The destruction of a city, whether by natural forces or by human agency, is one of the most dramatic and terrifying objects of the human imagination. It emerged as a major (although ambivalent) theme in literature and in the visual arts from their very beginnings, and it retains a foremost position in contemporary thought and expression.

The destruction of a city is represented in one of the earliest masterpieces of Egyptian art, the Palette of King Narmer from Hierakonpolis (circa 3000 B.C.). In the bottom register of the obverse side, the pharaoh is depicted in the form of a bull destroying, with its horns, the walls of a fortified city. Thus, from the very beginning in Egypt, regal power is equated with the power of destroying cities as it is with the power of founding them.

The literature of the ancient Near East included the lamentation over the defeated city, a form that originated perhaps in lamentations for a dead god or deceased individual. The city is thus treated as a personification, or at least as the personal property of a sympathetic but, under the circumstances, powerless minor divinity. In the biblical book Lamentations, Jerusalem is mourned as a woman, her former beauty contrasted with her present state. In theocratic cultures, such as those of ancient Mesopotamia, the lamentation for the destruction of a city emphasized the role of divine disfavor or abandonment, seeing the supposed moral transgression of the victims as responsible for the natural and humanly wrought devastation that followed as the consequence of the alienation of the city's tutelary deities. Even Virgil referred to the defeated Troy as superbum (proud) (Aeneid, III, 2–3), a line echoed by Dante (Purgatorio, XII, 61–63) in his choice of the unfortunate city as an emblem of pride. Hence, the imagery of divinely sent thunderstorm, earthquake, and tidal wave is often accompanied by, and confounded with, that of the sack and destruction by a hostile army. In addition to the destruction of walls, temples, houses, and the murder and enslavement of inhabitants, such lamentations often note the introduction of profanations by the new inhabitants. The Israelites covered the fields of the defeated Moabites with stones, and the Romans later sowed salt in the fields of Carthage.

In addition to Lamentations, where the narrator empathizes with the fate of the city, Near Eastern literature contains numerous accounts of the destruction of hostile cities. Such accounts (for example, in the annals of the kings of Assyria and in the Hebrew prophets writing of Nineveh, destroyed in 612 B.C., and Babylon, destroyed in 538 B.C.) are marked by no compassion for the victims and often revel in vicious irony.

I slew their warriors with the sword, descending upon them like Adad when he makes a rainstorm pour down. In the moat of the town I piled them up, I covered the wide plain with the corpses of their fighting men, I dyed the mountains with their blood like red wool. . . . I erected pillars of skulls in front of his town, destroyed his other towns, tore down their walls and burnt them down. (Shalmaneser III, in Pritchard, p. 277)

The Greeks introduced a note of universal human pathos into their treatment of the destruction of cities, often focusing sympathetically on the fate of specific individuals during the catastrophe. The fall of Troy, for example, witnessed such diverse episodes as the defeats of the Trojan heroes Troilus and Hector by the Greek besieger Achilles; the gruesome murders of Troy's king, Priam (slain by Pyrrhus, son of Achilles, at the altar of Zeus Herkeios) and of Troy's Astyanax (thrown from a tower by Ulysses, the leader of the Greeks); the rape of Cassandra, daughter of Priam, by the Greek Ajax; and the enslavement of the Trojan women. A red-figure hydria in Naples, Italy, by the Kleophrades Painter depicts two particularly heinous acts of sacrilege by the attacking Greeks, namely, the murder by Neoptolemus of Priam, who had taken refuge at an altar, and Ajax's rape of Cassandra before the image of the goddess Athena. The legendary cycle of the fall of the Greek city Thebes also produced episodes sympathetic to the victims, such as that of Antigone, daughter of Oedipus. Sympathy for the victims increases in later treatments, such as those by the painter Polygnotos (whose painting in the Lesche of the Knidians at Delphi survives in the description by Pausanias) and the playwright Euripides (The Trojan Women). In his painting the Fall of Troy (Ilioupersis), Polygnotos described the scene of the devastation: the Greeks are striking their tents, some are setting off loaded with spoils, some are still intent on dismantling the walls of the defeated city. The Trojan women—Andromache, Medicate, Polyxena, and others—are grouped together, awaiting an uncertain fate. Here and there lie the corpses of victims. A small boy still clings to an altar in fear. On the faces of all can be seen an expression of their misfortune. The late fourth-century painter Aristides of Thebes continued in the same vein with his picture "of a mother lying wounded to the death in the sack of a city; she appears conscious that her babe is creeping towards her breast, and afraid lest, now that her milk is dried up, he should suck blood" (Pliny, Natural History, 35.98). This topos was later used by Eugène Delacroix in The Massacre of Chios, shown in the Salon of 1824.

In a culture that was dominated by the image of the fall of Troy, the destruction of individual cities in historical times reemerged as a theme of major importance. The fall of Miletus to the Persians in 494 B.C. was the subject of a drama by Phrynichus staged in Athens. Treatments of the Trojan legend abound in dramatic poetry and in painting of the time. Clearly the fear that they themselves might become subject to such treatment at the hands of the Persians or some other power accounts for the popularity of this theme with the Athenians.

The image of the physical destruction of the city at the hands of an enemy lent itself to related themes of the decay of the city from within, the destruction of the city's inhabitants through epidemic, or the destruction of political autonomy by externally imposed regime. John Martin's Fall of Nineveh (1827–1828) thus includes the suicide, together with his companions in luxury, of the last decadent ruler, Sardanapalus, in a panoramic view of civic destruction.

The destruction of the city of Rome is a topos that goes back to the very foundation myth of the city. Romulus was believed to have murdered his twin brother Remus for jumping over his newly built wall, hence breaking the sacred perimeter. After the sack of Rome by Gauls in 387 B.C., the city was long thought to be unconquerable from without, although susceptible to fire and rebellion from within. Until its eventual capture and sack by Alaric in A.D. 410, the myth of Rome's eternity exacted an enormous toll in the repressed anxiety of the Romans as evidenced by their treatment of Carthage, Corinth, and Jerusalem and by the popularity of the Trojan story in later Roman imagination. The fall of Troy, for example, is the subject of a remarkable series of frescoes found in Pompeii. The legacy of guilt became self-fulfilling prophecy. The sibylline oracles predicted the city's end, as did the Christians in their teachings. When the city finally fell to the Germanic tribes, an event hastened no doubt by the removal of the popular leader Stilicho, the lamentation of St. Jerome was sounded from Jerusalem: "It is the end of the world. . . . Captured is the city that captured the entire world" (Letter CXXVII, 12).

Despite the finality of St. Jerome's lamentation, the city of Rome has enjoyed numerous renewals of the myth of its eternity—all, however, containing a germ of the prophecy of destruction. One medieval legend held that so long as the Colosseum stood, Rome itself would stand; when the Colosseum fell, so would Rome. Moreover, as demonstrated by the scholar Arturo Graf in his study of Rome in medieval legend, the survival of the city of Rome (as well as its destruction) was equated by Christians with the survival of the world before the Second Coming of Christ.

To judge from the large number of recorded examples, the destruction of Troy (i.e., the mythical antecedent of Rome) regained paradigmatic status during the Renaissance and Baroque periods. Raphael chose to model his historical painting The Fire in the Borgo on the Virgilian scene, making a historical event that took place in ninth-century Rome into an episode from the Sack of Troy.

In paintings by Adam Elsheimer and Pieter Schoubroeck, among others, the destruction of Troy was the destruction of every city. During this period, warfare consisted largely of attacks upon cities such as that documented meticulously by Jacques Callot in his Siege of Breda (1628). Callot's epic engraving contrasts markedly with the horrific Virgilian image in its presentation of a disciplined and civil army engaged in what appears to be little more than an extreme act of diplomacy. During this period of history, organized warfare presented less a threat to civilization than did the periodic peasant uprisings and the bands of outlaws created by the wars of religion in the seventeenth century. These, however, were more to be feared by inhabitants of the countryside than by those who lived in cities. Callot's two series of engravings, The Miseries of War (large and small formats, 1633) vividly portray the destruction of peaceful life in villages, farmhouses, convents, and the like by renegade soldiers and other lawless elements, setting the stage for Francisco Goya's gruesome etchings of the revolutionary period.

The destruction of the greater portion of London by fire in 1666 is depicted, apparently without moralizing, in Wenceslaus Hollar's engraving of 1669, which contains a map of the area destroyed with a view of the raging fire as seen from the borough of Southwark (Hind, pl. XII–XIII). The same event was represented as divine punishment on a medal contrasting the fire and plague (SIC PVNIT) with the blessings of peace and plenty (MERA BONITAS) (Hawkins, Charles II, no. 173). The destruction caused by the fire was commemorated by the Monument to the Great Fire, a 202-foot Doric column designed by Sir Christopher Wren. The column was set atop a tall pedestal covered with allegorical reliefs: haggard London seated on ruins as she is raised up by Time, with Science, Agriculture, and Liberty sent to her aid by Charles II, as Envy lies nearby.

With the Romantics, the repertoire of destroyed cities increased dramatically. In modern times, the destruction of a city has also occasioned the discourse of theocracy, even if in irony. The destruction of Lisbon, Portugal, by an earthquake in 1755 gave rise to numerous contemporary sermons on the iniquity of the victims. Voltaire, who reacted with horror both to the event and to the pietistic reaction that it provoked, treated the event in his deeply pessimistic poem on Lisbon and in the fifth chapter of Candide (1759). The recovery, beginning in the mid-eighteenth century, of the buried cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii from the ashes of Mount Vesuvius greatly affected the imagination of Europeans and Americans. Romantics in particular gave expression to the fate of these cities in poems, novels, operas, paintings, and other works. To some, it appeared that the cruel fate that befell the cities had been punishment, justly deserved for the supposed luxury of the inhabitants. As if to confute Voltaire and justify the targets of his criticism, excavators at Pompeii discovered the bizarre graffito "SODOM GOMORA" on a wall uncovered there, doubtless put there by some moralist subsequent to the destruction of the city (and not, as some have suggested, by an ancient Jeremiah predicting the destruction of the city). Pompeii and Herculaneum, although ancient cities themselves, were crucial to the displacement of Troy as the paradigmatic representative of all destroyed cities. The vividness of their destruction, graphically depicted for an eager world audience in literally thousands of images, made the more classical and literary Troy pale in the details, if not in the ensemble.

Building on images of the cataclysmic destruction of the Vesuvian cities, John Martin expanded the iconography of the destroyed city with his dramatic treatments of the biblical cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, Nineveh, Babylon, and Tyre, in addition to Pompeii. Martin's treatments include human figures for pathos, as in his Fall of Nineveh (1827–1828) and Fall of Babylon (1831). Like Martin, J. M. W. Turner depicted destruction by fire on a sublime scale in his watercolor sketches and oil paintings of the fire that destroyed the English parliament building in 1834. Although conventional contemporary interpretations of Turner's paintings may have settled on the opposition of human vanity to the awesome power of the elements, the paintings anticipate the aesthetic preoccupation of much later painting in their elimination of human figures.

Classical Japanese painting, discovered by European artists shortly after the mid-nineteenth century, had independently arrived at a balance of human drama and aesthetic effect that strikingly parallels the European experience. In his illustration The Burning of the Sanjo Palace, from accounts of the Heiji Insurrection of the thirteenth century, the Japanese painter Sumiyoshi Keion balances aesthetic spectacle with human pathos reminiscent of Polygnotos:

Beyond the scene of bullock carriages, armed men, and confusion comes the terror of billowing flames and of the disorder of escape. The words of the text describing the moment when many have thrown themselves into a well read: "Alas, the lowermost are drowned in the water, those in between are crushed to death, while those on top are engulfed in flames." (Paine and Soper, p. 152)

The American Civil War marked the end of civilized warfare and the beginnings of modern total warfare. The burning of Atlanta, Georgia, remains to this day an important icon of the war, memorably recorded in Margaret Mitchell's novel Gone with the Wind (1936) and the 1939 film of the same name. The devastation of Paris during the Franco-Prussian War produced similarly grim images, recorded in contemporary photographs. Attracted to the subject matter of Paris at war, Édouard Manet produced a series of pictures that include "corpses . . . strewn before the barricades with the casualness of figures who might be resting in the Paris parks" (Rosenblum and Janson, p. 326). Photographs of the dead from the same era show a similar lack of pathos, calling the traditional rhetoric of the painter of destruction into question.

Around this time, symbolic images of the sinister forces of war began to appear and even to take precedence over realistic images of destruction. V. V. Vereshchagin's Apotheosis of War (1871) depicts in vivid color a mountain of blanched human skulls in a landscape of devastation, the only sign of life being the innumerable ravens attracted in the hope of food. On the other hand, the city of Calais, France, opted for classical tradition in selecting a moment of human pathos to commemorate the loss of French cities to Germany during the Franco-Prussian War. Auguste Rodin's statue Burghers of Calais (1885–1895) depicts the heroism of fourteenth-century citizens in offering themselves as hostages for their city, a theme reminiscent of the Trojan women.

Total warfare in the twentieth century added new dimensions to the concept of the destroyed city. Despite the scale and the efficiency of destruction, the old psychological and theological components remain valid. The Holocaust during World War II, which entailed the destruction of many cities, in addition to the problems of representing human suffering and assessing human guilt, brought about the necessity of reexamining the very nature of the supreme deity in both Christian and Jewish religious communities. The fact that epic poets and artists had dealt with similar themes earlier in depicting the destruction of the city makes the numerous Holocaust memorials the natural successors of the earlier civic iconographic tradition. The destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Japan; Dresden, Germany; Coventry, England; Lidice, Czechoslovakia; and other cities during the war continues to haunt the imagination of both the victims and the perpetrators. Despite numerous expressions of will, the number of canonical masterpieces of modern art that have dealt with the destruction of cities remains small. Pablo Picasso's Guernica (1937), commissioned by the Spanish Republican government in exile to commemorate the aerial bombardment of the Basque town of that name, and Alain Resnais's Hiroshima Mon Amour (1960), a film that depicts two individual responses to the nuclear destruction of that city, come immediately to mind. More are planned.

See also Death; Excess; Luxury

Selected Works of Art

Classical

The Palette of King Narmer, circa 3000 B.C., Cairo, Egypt, Egyptian Museum

Reliefs from the Palace of Ashurbanipal, circa 650 B.C., Nineveh, Iraq, presently in London, British Museum

Kleophrades Painter, Sack of Troy, red-figure hydria, circa 480 B.C., Naples, Italy, Archaeological Museum

Polygnotos, The Fall of Troy, fresco, circa 450 B.C., from Guide to Greece, Pausanias, Greece, Museo Archeologico Nazionale

The Trojan Horse, fresco from Pompeii, presently in Naples, Italy, Archaeological Museum

Japanese

Keion, Sumiyoshi, The Burning of the Sanjo Palace, horizontal scroll painting, thirteenth century, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Renaissance

Raphael, Fire in the Borgo (Troy Burning), fresco, 1514, Rome, Vatican Palace

Primaticcio, Francesco, Departure of the Greeks After the Fall of Troy, fresco, 1555–1559, formerly in France, Galerie d'Ulysse, Château de Fontainebleau

Sustris, Lambert, or Schiavone, Andrea (?), Fall of Troy, oil on canvas, before 1584, Turin, Italy, Galleria Sabauda

Seventeenth Century

Elsheimer, Adam, Burning of Troy, oil painting, circa 1600–1601, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Schoubroeck, Pieter, Burning Troy, oil painting, 1606, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum; Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique; Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten

Callot, Jacques, The Siege of Breda; The Siege of La Rochelle, etchings, 1628, 1631 respectively, from The Miseries of War (Large and Small Series), etchings, 1633

Collantes, Francesco, Burning of Troy, oil painting, before 1634, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bella, Stefano Della, Burning of Troy, oil painting, circa 1634, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Bloemaert, Abraham, Burning of Troy, oil painting, before 1651, Frankfurt, Germany, Städtisches Kunstinstitut

Hollar, Wenceslaus, Burning of London, engraving, 1669

- Wren, Christopher, and Hooke, Robert, Monument to the Fire of London, column; with relief by Caius Gabriel Cibber, 1671–1677, London, Eastcheap
- Wet, Jacob de, the Elder, Burning of Troy, oil painting, before 1672, Brunswick, Germany, Herzog Anton Ulrich-Museum
- Sic Punit, Mera Bonitas*, medal, seventeenth century

Eighteenth Century

- Voltaire, Pierre-Jacques, Eruption of Vesuvius by Moonlight, 1774, Paris, Ministère de la Culture, Direction du Patrimoine Caisse Nationale des Monuments Historiques et des Sites
- Wright, Joseph of Derby, Vesuvius in Eruption, 1774–1775, Derby, Derbyshire, England, Museum and Art Gallery

Nineteenth Century

- Valenciennes, Pierre-Henri de, The Eruption of Vesuvius, 24 August, 79 A.D., oil on canvas, 1813, London, Marshall Spink
- Martin, John, The Fall of Babylon, oil on canvas, 1819, mezzotint, 1831
- Martin, John, The Destruction of Pompeii and Herculaneum, oil on canvas, 1821, London, Tate Gallery; Cheshire, University of Manchester, Tabley House
- Martin, John, The Fall of Nineveh, oil on canvas, 1827–1828, Brussels, Belgium
- Martin, John, The Destruction of Tyre, oil on canvas, 1840, Toledo, Ohio, Museum of Art
- Martin, John, The Destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, Laing Art Gallery
- Cornelius, Peter, Destruction of Troy, fresco, 1826–1830, Munich, Germany, Glyptothek
- Briullov, Karl, The Last Days of Pompeii, oil on canvas, 1828, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
- Turner, J. M. W., The Burning of the Houses of Parliament, watercolor and oil painting, 1834–1835, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art
- Cole, Thomas, The Course of Empire: Destruction, oil on canvas, 1836, New York, The New York Historical Society
- Vereshchagin, V. V., Apotheosis of War, oil on canvas, 1871, Moscow, Russia, Tretyakov Gallery
- Rodin, Auguste, The Burghers of Calais, bronze sculpture, 1885–1895, Calais, France

Twentieth Century

- Picasso, Pablo, Guernica, oil on canvas, 1937, Madrid, Spain, Reina Sofia
- Nakian, Reuben, The Burning Walls of Troy, terra-cotta sculpture, 1957, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Hiroshima Mon Amour*, film directed by Alain Resnais, 1960
- Bearden, Romare, The Departure from Troy, oil, circa 1972, New York, private collection
- Bearden, Romare, The Fall of Troy, collage, 1974, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Ladd Collection

Further Reading

Primary Texts

- Homer, The Sack of Troy (Iliupersis), (lost)
- Virgil, The Aeneid, Book II
- Alighieri, Dante, The Divine Comedy
- , Inferno, 30.13ff
- , Purgatorio, 12.16–24; 61–62
- Heiji Monogatari, Japan, thirteenth century
- Voltaire, Poème sur le Désastre de Lisbonne, Paris: Firmin Didot Frères, 1756
- Kramer, Samuel Noah, ed., Lamentation Over the Destruction of Ur
- Leopardi, Giacomo, La Ginestra, 1836
- Lytton, E. Bulwer, The Last Days of Pompeii, London and New York: G. Routledge, 1834

Secondary Sources

- Brilliant, Richard, Pompeii: The Treasure of Rediscovery, Kent, Ohio: Volair, 1979
- Bowersock, Glen, “The Rediscovery of Herculaneum and Pompeii,” The American Scholar 47 (1978)
- Childs, William A. P., The City-Reliefs of Lycia, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1978
- Döhl, Hartmut, “Mykenische Kampfdarstellungen: Bild und Deutung im prähistorischen Griechenland,” Beiträge zur Archäologie Nordwestdeutschlands und Mitteleuropas 16 Hildesheim, Germany: Lax, 1979
- Dougherty, James, The Fivesquare City: The City in the Religious Imagination, South Bend, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1980
- Graf, Arturo, Roma nella memoria e nelle immaginazione del medio evo, Turin, Italy: Giovanni Chiantore, 1923
- Hawkins, Edward, Medallic Illustrations of the History of Great Britain and Ireland, London: Spink, 1885; New York: B. Blom, 1972
- Hind, Arthur Mayger, Wenceslaus Hollar, London: John Lane, 1992
- Leppmann, Wolfgang, Pompeii in Fact and Fiction, London: Elek, 1968
- Moret, Jean Marc, L'Iliupersis dans la céramique italique: Les mythes et leur expression figurée au IV Siècle, Rome: Institut Suisse de Rome, 1975
- Paine, Robert Treat, and Alexander Soper, The Art and Architecture of Japan, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1974
- Pritchard, James Bennett, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969
- Scherer, Margaret R., The Legends of Troy, New York: Phaidon, 1963
- Vandier, Jacques, Manuel d'archéologie égyptienne, Paris: Picard, 1952

DEVOTION/PIETY

Rudolf M. Bisanz

The following motifs, periods, and cultures are covered in the discussion of the theme Devotion/Piety:

VOTIVE OFFERINGS: THE ANCIENT KINGDOMS AND ANTIQUITY

SAINTS “IN ORANS”:
EARLY CHRISTIAN AND BYZANTINE

DEVOTIO MODERNA: FROM THE PROTO-RENAISSANCE
TO THE BAROQUE

HYBRID DEVOTIONS:
NINETEENTH AND
TWENTIETH CENTURIES

Philippe de Champaigne, Portrait of Mother Catherine Agnes Arnauld and Sister Catherine de Sainte Susanne (Mother Agnes and Sister Therese in Thanksgiving), 1662, painting, Paris, Louvre.
(Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

Devotion, piety, and their equivalents—religious loyalty, fidelity, zeal, affection, reverence, etc.—seem to exist on two levels: the manifesting, as attested by objective proofs of faith through outward signs or actions; and the latent, the internal and subjectively felt. As to the first level, Jesus Christ condemned the hypocrites (literally “actors upon a stage”) who “for a shew make long prayers: the same shall receive greater damnation” (Luke 20:47). Philosopher Immanuel Kant associated outward devotion with “statutory religion” and degraded it to a form of “religious illusion whose consequence is pseudo-service . . . inadvertently deceptive,” as well as “absurd . . . and reprehensible” (Kant, pp. 156–158). A leading contemporary Protestant theologian, Wolfhart Pannenberg, is even more negative.

Defining the nature of deity in terms of the means of manifestation in its works . . . lead(s) to perversion (of faith), which . . . replaces the deity with the finite medium of its manifestation. When fixation on a particular form happens . . . perversion (of religion) takes place.” (Pannenberg, p. 183)

Philosopher Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel had inner devotion in mind with his triform definition of the authentic cultus: devotion (the self-moving spirit holding to itself), sacrament/sacrifice (reconciliation), and remorse/repentance (offering one’s heart or inmost self to God . . . the consciousness of one’s own immediate natural state) (Hegel, p. 193). In art, it is necessary to keep both aspects of devotion in mind—its devolving-manifesting branch and its ascending-spiritual branch—even though art has historically favored the former.

In the main, art deals with formalizations of evidential devotion. Historically, it objectified the relation of humans to divinity by representing such tests of fervor as were appropriate to a period’s notions of proper faith. Iconologically, therefore, the topic of devotion emerges as the study of the changes in religion and its effects on ritualistic expression over the centuries. For the most part, the essay will not deal with images for devotion—cult objects and icons—but rather with the iconography of artistic representations of acts of devotion and piety.

Artistic representations of devotional and pious acts are plentiful throughout most major cultures and periods in art history. One major work of worshipful reverence from antiquity involves two figures: King Hammurabi of Babylon lifting up his right hand in supplication before the flame-engorged sun god Shamash. This relief on the upper part of the Stele of Hammurabi served as a reminder to all that the formation of the Hammurabian code of laws and the success of a centralized Mesopotamian government were owing to a king whose devotion to the gods was unassailable. The three-figure neo-

Assyrian grouping of King Melisipak with his daughter before an enthroned goddess surprises with its suggestion of familiarity bordering on the intimate; it may be both an act of private devotional thanksgiving (for a cure?) as well as an act of statecraft via religious ritual. The Egyptians would often picture their pharaohs supplicating before their major gods, as in a relief depicting Mentuhotep II worshipping Amun. In art, the Egyptians would be shown entreating Re, Atum, Horus, Osiris, or other gods for worldly success in war and diplomacy or a safe haven in their tombs and “continued spiritual participation in cosmic processes” (Orthmann, p. 411). A frequent devotional theme in the art of the ancient kingdoms was sacrifice to the gods. An eighteenth-dynasty pharaonic tomb scene, Servants Offering a Burnt Sacrifice, depicts servants making a burnt offering to the sun god Amun-Re during a religious festival.

The ancient Greeks regarded their public demonstrations of piety as a civic duty, which they sometimes expressed in grand shows of consecration during high festivals, inaugurations, and thanksgivings for favors bestowed upon them by the gods. Perhaps the most famous of all Greek scenes of public devotion is the representation of the citizens of Athens in their quadrennial procession to the Acropolis in worship of the goddess Athena. Another form of devotional iconography can be found on the many private votive steles showing celebrants of thanksgivings or dedications in humble genuflection and often, as in the Votive Relief for Cybele and Attis, before their favorite gods. The best documented and most copiously inscribed of all late Hellenistic works of a personal form of piety may be a relief by Archelaos of Priene, Votive Relief with the Apotheosis of Homer. It depicts an elaborate votive thanksgiving to the gods by a victorious author and the overlapping theme of the apotheosis of Homer. The relief depicts more than a dozen identified mythological figures in various attitudes of dedication, presided over by Zeus, king of the gods. The “grateful” author himself views this devotional extravaganza.

Ancient Rome also utilized the votive processional. The iconological context shifted from an invocation of politico-ethical ideality to a more businesslike injunction to self-sacrifice to the commonweal of the state and to devotional patriotism. The Ara Pacis of Augustus—with its solemn processionists with their authentic demeanors—represents the finest such achievement of the Romans. It shows a combination of late Republican and very early Imperial ideals of family values, civic life, statecraft, and religious fealty.

War, conquest, subjugation of prisoners, enslavement of populations, and their forced conversion to the religion of the victors are common motifs in the art of antiquity, and the vanquished are often depicted in displays of forced devotion and loyalty. The Romans of the late Empire probably knew best how to exploit artistically such instances of coercive oblation by their prospective vassals. Among the Roman deities, the emperors themselves figured prominently as enforcers of divine decrees and recipients of devotion. Trajan's Column, for example, features the emperor in the roles of high priest, making sacrifices before battle; as supreme commander, exhorting his generals; and as pontifex, forcing the vanquished Dacians to compulsory allegiance and idolatry to his person. Such old habits died slowly. The base of the Theodosius Obelisk, an early Christian document of the Orthodox Church, details captive barbarians—Asians and Germans—humbly paying obeisance to the emperor.

In early Christian, Byzantine, and Carolingian-Ottonian art, what appear to be frank and impulsive expressions of devotion actually follow published sentiments of the Apostolic Fathers and the fathers of the church and pagan behavior of worship. Such expressions can be found in innumerable icons or groupings of saints in attitudes of worshipful piety. The Virgin Mary is often shown as the recipient of prayerful devotion by angels or by other accessory supplicatory figures. During this period, the Last Supper also rises in importance among the prominent iconographic vehicles for the conveyance of devotional sentiments.

From the tenth century onward, the growing monastic movement gave dramatic new theological impulses to the depiction of representations of pious acts in art. The rule of Western monasticism, as devised by St. Benedict of Nursia and evolved by St. Bernard of Clairvaux's Cistercian movement, assimilated Augustinian influences and stressed saintly behavior; salvation based on free will, grace, and charity; and the formation of a church "militia" focused on love, austerity, and self-denial. This ecclesiastical program influenced virtually all manifestations of piety and, therefore, virtually all iconographic phrasings of related subjects in art during the following centuries. But it was the Franciscan movement that had the most specific impact on iconography and inspired the most sustained following among artists dealing with devotional subjects, beginning in the proto-Renaissance.

St. Francis's personal and passionate devotion to God, human beings, and nature is attested by his widely read Canticle of the Sun (1225), a hymn to his love of divine revelation. Moreover, his movement's enthusiasm for popularizing the Angelus, the Crib, and the Stations of the Cross as expressions of religious fervor offered an iconological cornucopia for specific iconographic exploitation by artists. (It also hastened naturalism in art.) Additionally, the hugely popular collection of stories Little Flowers of St. Francis (1325) fired the imaginations of countless clerics and artists to "picture" additional devotional subjects. The colorful and miraculous events in the lives of St. Francis and his fellow Franciscans gave rise to myriad artistic interpretations with their dramatic "attitudinal devotionism," as exemplified by the series by Giotto featuring St. Francis.

Throughout the Trecento and Quattrocento, ecclesiastical life echoed these sentiments and those expressed by Jacobus de Voragine in Golden Legend (circa 1255), the perennial medieval "best-seller" about the saints. This work provided artists with background information for their images of piety and, more particularly, the behavioral model for the depiction of devotion in art. Among favorite subjects pregnant with devotional potential were the Nativity (with the Magi and/or the shepherds), the Last Supper, the Passion Cycle, the Sacra Conversazione, the narrative events from the lives of the saints, and portraits of donors and patrons.

Devotio moderna—fostering inner devotion and methodical meditation—permanently framed the spiritual dimension of the life and Passion of Jesus Christ, especially as it was defined by the mystic Thomas à Kempis in his manual of spiritual devotion, Imitation of Christ (1418). This manual influenced innumerable artists' conceptualizations of piety, including Albrecht Dürer's. The rapidly growing cult of the Virgin Mary, moreover, enlarged upon the existing range of Mariological subjects in art, providing a sizable portion of devotional scenes in painting. Trecento and Quattrocento artists swept up in these intellectual currents included, in Italy, Taddeo Gaddi, Simone Martini, Gentile da Fabriano, Donatello, Masaccio, Piero della Francesca, Ghirlandaio, the Dominican Fra Angelico, the Carmelite Fra Filippo Lippi, Botticelli, Perugino, and Giovanni Bellini; and in the north, Jan van Eyck, Rogier van der Weyden, Dirk Bouts, and Hugo van der Goes.

Jan and Hubert van Eyck's Ghent Altarpiece contains more than 200 worshipers in diverse attitudes of prayerful devotion before the Agnus Dei. But Dürer's majestic Adoration of the Trinity may even exceed it in its iconographic complexity of devotion. Based on Augustinian theology and the doctrine of the City of God, it is replete with many dozens of worshipful figures—sibyls, prophets, prophetesses, saints, popes, and crowned heads—all professing their profound devotion.

Potentially the most effective subject in pressing "inner" devotion is the Lord's Supper, or the sacrament of Communion. St. Paul's first epistle to the Christians of Corinth (I Corinthians 11:23–29) contains the earliest mention of the subject in the New Testament and a three-fold devotional message: remembrance of Jesus; looking forward to the Parousia, or the Second Coming; and the recognition of the spirit of the Lord as present at the meal. As a result of the fusion of its three-fold devotional message, the Lord's Supper is fraught with enormous pitfalls for all artistic translation. For similar metaphysical reasons, the same is true for the Pentecost, the feast commemorating the descent of the Holy Spirit on the apostles. Seldom, if ever, therefore, was an artist able to depict successfully the mystery of these subjects; some things simply cannot be visualized.

The philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein suggests that "... what we cannot talk about we must pass over in silence" (Wittgenstein, p. 3). By failing to close the gap between appearance and substance (the spiritually transcendent moment), art may miss visualizing the profoundest reach of religious consciousness, "inner devotion." Despite its monumentality of form and innovative staging, Andrea del Castagno's The Last Supper is only one example among many of the failure to come to grips with the spiritual dimension of the institution of the Eucharist. His version's redoubtable virtues to the contrary (or because of them!), Leonardo da Vinci's similar failure presses an indictment of the High Renaissance to fathom the unfathomable with logical techniques of visualization, dramatic intensification, and humanistic aplomb.

The Roman Catholic Counter-Reformation was fostered by the friars of the Capuchin, Theatine, and Barnabite orders, all founded in the 1520s. Their promulgation of the perfect life in Christ affected most Catholic iconology underlying devotional art virtually until the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). St. Ignatius Loyola's Spiritual Exercises (1523) became the method of spirituality and his Society of Jesus, or Jesuits (founded in 1540), the premier spiritual power of the emerging regime of devotional correctness in worship and in iconology. To counter the carnal excesses of High Renaissance art, the Council of Trent (1562–1563) spelled out an iconographic program for religious art. St. Francis of Sales (Introduction to a Devout Life, 1609) and St. Carlo Borromeo were major "patrons" of the new devotional practices, which focused on pious meditation upon the lives of Christ and the saints and their miracles, martyrdoms, virtuousness, and saintliness. The revival of the writings of medieval mystics such as St. Bernard, St. Hildegard von Bingen, St. Francis, Meister Eckehart, and Johannes Tauler enriched the iconological mix of ideas. Likewise, such influential writers as the latter-day Spanish mystics St. Teresa of Ávila (The Way of Perfection, 1560s) and St. John of the Cross as well as the German mystic Jacob Böhme (Der Weg zu Christo [The Way to Christ], 1623) further expanded the range of religious imagination and the conduct of sanctioned spiritual practice. These ministrations furnished the artists with myriad iconographic models for translation into the argot of devotional iconography.

Virtually all art in the Roman Catholic lands was defined by those intellectual premises and consecrated to the proposition that extremes in ecstasy are power to the cause of devotion. This idea was manifested most effectively in the Baroque style. Among the foremost artists showing such impassioned devotion are Agostino, Annibale, and Lodovico Carracci; Domenichino; Caravaggio; Guido Reni; Giovanni Battista Gaulli (Baciccio); Andrea del Pozzo; and Gian Lorenzo Bernini in Italy and Jusepe de Ribera, Francisco de Zurbarán, and Bartolomé Esteban Murillo in Spain.

Philippe de Champaigne's personally intensified but formally subdued devotional style is revealed in his celebrated Portrait of Mother Catherine Agnes Arnauld and Sister Catherine de Sainte Susanne (Mother Agnes and Sister Therese in Thanksgiving), painted for the miraculous cure from paralysis of his daughter, the Jansenist Sister Therese. It is a riveting moment of poignant and absolute devotion, reverberating with the earnest spirit of her convent at Port-Royal, France, and with the spirit of French scientist and religious philosopher Blaise Pascal's fervent confessional Pensées (1669). In Pensées Pascal wrote, "Choose carefully the devotional work that you desire . . . for life changing benefits to your soul. Pray seriously and seek someone to help you in the quest" (Houston, p. 317). Champaigne and Pascal were deeply influenced by the schismatic Augustinian asceticism of the Jansenists, who were bitter opponents of the Jesuits.

Discouraged by its clergy, the devotional genre virtually did not exist in the Protestant realm. Consequently, the work of "the painter of the soul," Rembrandt van Rijn, is among the rarest of exceptions; a sizable portion of his work falls within the subject of devotion and piety.

After a slackening of innovation during much of the eighteenth century, the nineteenth century saw a surfeit of representations of devotion and piety in art. Strong influences came from a resurgent Pietism, founded by the seventeenth-century evangelical Philipp Jakob Spener, and from early nineteenth-century intuitive theism, developed by Protestant theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher. In complete iconological accordance, German Protestant painter Caspar David Friedrich (and his many followers of the Dresden School) turned inward through contemplation and psychological devotionism directed at a transcendent God: a Pietist inner vision. Simultaneously, they turned outward through reverence before a God-immanent nature as recipient of devotional fervor: an outer vision evincing natural theology. Friedrich's many memorable compositions with the supine or supplicatory Rückenfigur (a figure seen from behind) before a seemingly transfigured nature panorama as incarnation of God's glory on Earth are iconographic fusions comprised of evangelical pietism, virtual pantheism, and psychological insights.

From the early nineteenth century, the German Nazarenes, a Catholic revivalist movement in art (e.g., Friedrich Overbeck), promoted neomedieval visual representations of piety. As a consequence of the movement's subsequent domination of the Munich School and the flourishing Düsseldorf School, Germany, produced sizable quantities of Pietist devotional art throughout most of the century.

Two artists' organizations shared some commonality with the Nazarenes. The British Pre-Raphaelites, founded in 1848, favored a devotional iconography steeped in pathos and ritualistic displays of piety. Some associated the Pre-Raphaelites with the Catholic-leaning reformist Anglican Oxford Movement, which echoed the Cambridge Camden Society for the renewal of medieval liturgy, The Beuron School, founded in 1868 at that Benedictine Monastery in the Black Forest, also dedicated its imagery to ecclesiological reform within a neomedieval iconographic protocol. Via its branch convents in Belgium, Beuron influenced artists there along with several of the French symbolists, including the Nabis painters Paul Sérusier and Maurice Denis. The latter's Catholic iconography favored intimate and psychologically intensified imaging of exquisite devotional moments.

Historicism fostered a plethora of recombinant doctrinal, ethical, and aesthetic premises for devotional styles in art. Many fine salon technicians of various revivalist orientations, as well as naturalists, specialized in a didactic devotional genre: sociologically salubrious or politically ameliorating representations of liturgical practices on the national, regional, and parochial levels (where they appear conflated with the peasant genre), as well as private votive events. Whereas much of the routine academic production in this area suffered from the pitfalls of grinding orthodoxy, susceptibility to sham sanctimoniousness, and a kind of devout voyeurism, notable exceptions exist. These exceptions include the best French specialists of the genre: Jules Breton, Isidore Pils, Alphonse Legros, and François Bonvin.

Jean-François Millet's monumental Angelus and his Man with the Hoe are outstanding examples of the genre. Influenced by his own early work as a farm laborer, Jean-Jacques Rousseau's discourses on the natural man and ingenuous goodness, Catholic spirituality, and possibly a degree of situational socialism, Millet's iconographic armamentarium repudiates decadence and evinces a robust symbolic piety. By contrast, Wilhelm Leibl's Three Women in Church, the product of an advanced state of aestheticism, goes in a very different cultural and iconological direction, a nihilistic, post-mystical effacement of the state of desires and self-consciousness. It symbolizes modern antiratiocination—deconstruction of the event of devotion to the central creative act of the artist as artist. Reversing religious introspection to psychic introversion, man becomes a kind of “Heideggerian ‘Creative Workman,’” in an existentialist conundrum and vacuous “state of perennial and ubiquitous consciousness of dread” (Bisanz, “Proto-Modernist . . .”).

The nineteenth century's frequent hypocrisy and simulations of piety in art did little to stimulate continuation of the genre during the twentieth century. Nor did twentieth-century dogma—nihilism, cynicism, positivism—do much to reawaken interest in devotionalist illusionism. The shocks of World War I seemed to reverse the trend temporarily with certain German Expressionists, such as Emil Nolde, Ernst Barlach, and Karl Schmidt-Rottluff. In a heroic gambit to recapture artistic originality, they autosuggestively regressed to a state of quasi infantilism. In this state of aesthetic tabula rasa, they seemed to have snared, if only fleetingly, the elusive symbolic moment of veritable piety, the iconography of personal “inner devotion.” Similarly, the genre seemed to survive at its most widespread and authentic in neoprimitivism. Its iconography of devotion and piety was born of psychological displacement, substitution, regressive superstition, and a naive wonderment about the mystery of the human relationship to divinity. In the midst of the atomic age, the instinctive, charmed, and deeply religious art of Ferdinand Desnos in France, Tivadar Kosut in Yugoslavia, Edmund Monsiel in Poland, and Gertrude Morgan in the United States, among others, seemed to reconnect with the frank devotional spirit of early Christianity.

See also Arms Raised; Communion; Offering

Selected Works of Art

Votive Offerings: The Ancient Kingdoms and Antiquity

Mentuhotep II Supplicating Amun, Egyptian relief, painted limestone, eleventh dynasty, circa 2020 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Stele of Hammurabi, Babylonian relief, basalt, circa 1760 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Servants Offering a Burnt Sacrifice, Egyptian relief, limestone, eighteenth dynasty, circa 1365 B.C., Thebes, Egypt, Tomb of Ramses

Head of the Procession, Greek relief, marble, from the east frieze of the Parthenon, 448–432 B.C., Paris, Louvre

King Melisipak Before a Goddess, neo-Assyrian relief, limestone, 1188–1174 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Votive Relief for Cybele and Attis, Greek relief, marble,

Hellenistic, circa 230 B.C., Venice, Italy, Museo Archeologico

Archelaos of Priene, Votive Relief with the Apotheosis of Homer, relief, marble, late Hellenistic, end of second century B.C., London, British Museum

Census and Sacrifice, Roman relief, marble, 115–100 B.C., Ara Domitus-Abhenobarbus, Paris, Louvre

Commander Sacrificing, Roman relief, marble, 40–30 B.C., Civita Catellana, Italy, Cathedral

Ara Pacis of Augustus, Roman sculpture, altar, marble, 13–9 B.C., Rome, Campus Martius

Trajan's Column, Roman reliefs, marble, A.D. 113, Rome, Forum of Trajan

Emperor Trajan Sacrificing, Roman relief, marble, Triumphal Arch, A.D. 114, Benevento, Italy

Saints “In Orans”: Early Christian and Byzantine

Barbarians Paying Devotional Homage to an Emperor, base of Theodosius Obelisk, marble, A.D. 390, Istanbul, Turkey

Painted Ceiling with Christ as Good Shepherd and Saints in Orans, catacomb wall painting, fourth century A.D., Rome, catacombs of St. Pietro and St. Marcellino

Saint Menas in Orans, Byzantine relief, stone, fifth century A.D., Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Saint Apollinaris in Orans, apse mosaic, circa A.D. 549, Ravenna, Italy, Sant' Apollinare in Classe

Madonna and Child with the Adoration of the Magi, Syrio-Palestinian ivory panel, sixth century, London, British Museum

The Lord's Supper, Carolingian-Ottonian relief, marble pulpit, ninth century, Milan, Italy, Sant' Ambrogio

Devotio Moderna: From the Proto-Renaissance to the Baroque

Giotto, Saint Francis and the Miracle of the Spring, fresco, probably 1297–1300, Assisi, Italy, Upper Basilica of S. Francesco

Giotto, Saint Francis Receiving the Stigmata, tempera on wood panel, probably 1300, Paris, Louvre

Giotto, Lamentation, fresco, 1305–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Fabrizio, Gentile da, The Adoration of the Magi, tempera on wood panel, 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Eyck, Jan, and Hubert van, The Ghent Altarpiece: The Adoration of the Holy Lamb, tempera on oil on wood panel, completed 1432, Ghent, Belgium, St. Bavo

Eyck, Jan van, The Madonna with the Chancellor Rolin, oil on wood panel, 1435, Paris, Louvre

Weyden, Rogier van der, The Escorial Deposition, tempera on wood panel, circa 1435, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Castagno, Andrea del, The Last Supper, fresco, circa 1445–1450, Florence, Italy, St. Apollonia

Donatello, Mary Magdalene, wood sculpture, circa 1454–1455, Florence, Italy, Cathedral Baptistry

Goes, Hugo van der, The Portinari Altarpiece: The Adoration of the Shepherds, oil on wood panel, circa 1476, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

- Bellini, Giovanni, San Giobbe Altarpiece: Sacra Conversazione, circa 1485, Venice, Italy, Galleria dell'Accademia
- Leonardo da Vinci, The Last Supper, fresco, circa 1495–1498, Milan, Italy, Santa Maria delle Grazie
- Dürer, Albrecht, The Adoration of the Trinity (All Saints), oil on wood panel, 1511, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Carracci, Agostino, The Last Communion of Saint Jerome, oil on canvas, 1592, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
- Zurbarán, Francisco de, Saint Francis Embracing Christ on the Cross, oil on canvas, circa 1620, Valencia, Provincial Museum
- Ribera, Jusepe de, Martyrdom of Saint Bartholomew, oil on canvas, 1630, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Saint Theresa in Ecstasy, marble sculpture, 1645–1652, Rome, Cornonaro Chapel, Santa Maria della Vittoria
- Champaigne, Philippe de, Portrait of Mother Catherine Agnes Arnauld and Sister Catherine de Sainte Susanne (Mother Agnes and Sister Therese in Thanksgiving), oil on canvas, 1662, Paris, Louvre
- Hybrid Devotions: Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries*
- Overbeck, Friedrich, Christ and the Disciples at Emmaus, oil on canvas on plywood, 1808, Lübeck, Germany, Behnhaus Museum
- Friedrich, Caspar David, Women Before the Setting Sun, oil on canvas, 1818, Essen, Germany, Folkwang Museum
- Pils, Isidore, Prayer in the Hospice, oil on canvas, 1853, Paris, Musée de l'Assistance Publique
- Vautier, Benjamin, Village Church with Congregation in Devotion, oil on canvas, 1856, Worms, Germany, Stiftung Kunsthaus Heylsof
- Legros, Alphonse, The Ex-Voto, oil on canvas, 1860, Dijon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Bovin, François, The Vocation of Saint Francis, oil on canvas, 1862, Alençon, France, Musées d'Alençon
- Uhde, Fritz von, Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, 1884, Frankfurt, Germany, Städelsches Kunstinstitut und Städtische Galerie
- Gebhardt, E. K. F. von, The Raising of Lazarus, oil on canvas, 1896, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstmuseum Düsseldorf im Ehrenhof
- Nolde, Emil, Last Supper, oil on canvas, 1909, Copenhagen, Denmark, Nationalmuseet
- Nolde, Emil, Pentecost, oil on canvas, 1909, Muri, Switzerland, private collection
- Schmidt-Rottluff, Karl, The Way to Emmaus, woodblock, 1918, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Museum of Art
- Desnos, Ferdinand, The Bridge of Arts (The Last Supper on the Seine), oil on canvas, probably 1930s, Paris, Musée National d'Art Moderne
- Morgan, Gertrude, Christ is the Head of This House, crayon, colored pencil, watercolor on paper, 1970s, New York, private collection of Herbert Waide Hemphill

Further Reading

- Bäumler, Suzanne, Studien zum Adorationsdiptychon, Munich, Germany: C. and M. Hofbauer Drucken, 1983
- Bazin, German, The Baroque, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1968
- Berenson, Bernard, Italian Pictures of the Renaissance, London: Phaidon, 1963
- Bihalji-Merin, Otto B., and N. B. Tomasevic, World Encyclopedia of Naive Art, Secaucus, New Jersey: Chartwell, 1984; London: F. Muller, 1984
- Bisanz, Rudolf M., "Die Siebensachen eines romantischen Kunsterneuerungs-programmes," Kunst und Unterricht 12:134 (August 1989)
- , "Proto-Modernist Aesthetics and Art Criticism Amended: From Behaviorist Doctrinaire Realism to Existentialist Process Art and Wilhelm Leibl's Three Women in Church," Art Criticism 9 (1992)
- , "Devotion into Art; From C. D. Friedrich to Early Biedermeier: Toward a Modern Psychology of Iconography and its Understanding Today," Studies in Iconography 14 (1992)
- Boardman, John, ed., Greek Art and Architecture, New York: Abrams, 1967
- Buchheim, Lothar-Gunther, Die Kunstlergemeinschaft Brücke, Feldafing, Germany: Buchheim Verlag, 1956
- Chastel, Andre, Italianische Renaissance, Munich, Germany: C. H. Beck, 1965
- Driskel, Michael Paul, Representing Belief: Religion, Art, and Society in Nineteenth-Century France, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992
- Giffords, Gloria Fraser, The Art of Private Devotion: Retable Painting of Mexico, Fort Worth, Texas: InterCultura, 1991
- Grabar, Andre, Christian Iconography, A Study of its Origin, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1961
- Hegel, G. W. Friedrich, Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1985
- Houston, James M., ed., The Mind on Fire: An Anthology of the Writings of Blaise Pascal, Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press, 1989
- Kant, Immanuel, Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone, New York: Harper, 1960
- Kraus, Theodor, Das Romische Weltreich, Berlin: Propylaen Verlag, 1975
- Loades, Ann, and Loyal D. Rue, eds., Contemporary Classics in Philosophy of Religion, LaSalle, Illinois: Open Court, 1991
- McBrien, Richard P., Catholicism, London: G. Chapman, 1980; Minneapolis, Minnesota: Winston, 1981
- Orthmann, Winfried, Der Alte Orient, Berlin: Propylaen Verlag, 1975
- Os, Henk van, et al, The Art of Devotion in the Late Middle Ages in Europe, 1300–1500
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart, Systematic Theology, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1991; Edinburgh, Scotland: Clark, 1991

Tapie, Victor L., The Age of Grandeur: Baroque Art and Architecture, New York: Praeger, 1961
 Vandersleyen, Claude, Das Alte Ägypten, Berlin: Propylaen Verlag, 1975
 Weisberg, Gabriel P., The Realist Tradition: French Painting and Drawing, 1830-1900, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980

Wente, Edward F., "Egyptian Religion," in The Anchor Bible Dictionary, New York and London: Doubleday, 1992
 White, John, Art and Architecture in Italy, 1250-1400, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1966
 Wittgenstein, Ludwig, Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus, London: Routledge, 1988; Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press International, 1988

DREAMS/VISIONS

Elaine Shefer

The following genres and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Dreams/Visions:

ART AND THE DREAM:
ANCIENT SOURCES

CONFIGURATIONS OF DESTINY: THE BIBLE AND OTHER CHRISTIAN SOURCES

VISIONS OF IMMORTALITY

APOCALYPTIC VISIONS

DREAMING

THE ARTIST AND THE DREAM

DREAMS AND HEALING

DREAMS OF NATIONAL ASPIRATIONS

DREAMS AND UTOPIAS

Vittore Carpaccio, The Dream of St. Ursula, 1495, painting, Venice, Italy, Accademia.
(Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource)

The act of dreaming has forever fascinated and perplexed humankind. From primitive humans to contemporary psychiatrists, we have yet to fathom the depths of the dream's hidden meanings, and as a result it is a subject that has obsessed artists throughout history.

The characteristics of the dream are both particular and peculiar. It is as unconscious as it is conscious. We can be in a dream at the same time we passively stand by as observers. It has neither end, nor beginning. While always composed of images and symbols, both recognized and unrecognized, it sometimes contains words. It is subjective yet universal. Sometimes a dream feels like music, but it never produces sound. It can have color but not odor. It has space yet is spaceless. It can be experienced at night but can occur during the day. It can be happy or sad, haunting or frivolous. It can speak of the past or tell of the future; it hardly ever dwells only on the present. It can speak of unresolved tension or anticipate the fulfillment of desire. It can be the visible sign that stirs a person to action or a sign of one's inability to act. It represents at once truth and illusion; it is both a prophecy and a fantasy.

By definition, an artist is a dreamer. To artists belong the world of dream streets, dream landscapes, dream frontiers, dream fantasies, and dream utopias, all of which the artist records in order to impose a kind of order or rationality on life. This order presupposes a separation between the conscious and the subconscious, between good and evil, between the ordinary and the extraordinary. Those who interpret have gained the power to explain the dream to the dreamer and, therefore, are in charge of separating the good from the evil, the past from the present.

Art and the Dream

Since ancient times artists have been intrigued by the variety of dreams. The ancient Egyptians recorded thousands of dream books. The Chester Beatty Papyrus (1300 B.C.) in the British Museum in London is an example of such a dream book. The papyrus illustrates women's dreams about games, drinks, snakes, legal evidence, animals, and more, each one having some arbitrarily imposed opposite meaning. The clay tablets found at Nineveh, Iraq, in the library of the Assyrian King Ashurbanipal (669–626 B.C.), provide a link in a chain of dream theory that stretches from the most remote past to the present. It is believed that Ashurbanipal's dream book was used in the second century A.D. by the Roman soothsayer Artemidorus, whose work in turn inspired every subsequent compiler of dream books.

During ancient times, however, the most important dreams were those dreamed by gods, priests, and kings and were called "great dreams." Predictive and prophesying, they could be political, perhaps foretelling of the coming of a "miraculous" leader. Tanuath-Amen, the Ethiopian conqueror of Egypt, was said to have dreamed of a serpent lying both to his right and to his left, a dream that has been interpreted as a harbinger of his rule over the two Egypts, Upper and Lower. An Egyptian stele inscribed with an account of the Tanuath-Amen dream was found at Gebel Barkal. Similarly, a large stone inscription in front of the Great Sphinx at Giza tells of the dream of King Thutmose IV, who reigned in about 1450 B.C., in which the god Horemakhu promises him the Egyptian kingdom. It is said that in return, upon attaining the throne, Thutmose cleared the sands away from the Great Sphinx.

Such dreams of prophecy seem to thrive only in a special atmosphere, with historical time and place being the essential ingredients. The most significant dreams—those that are interpreted as having extraordinary power—usually have occurred in times of trouble. The dreams recounted in the Old Testament are a case in point.

Dreams in the Bible: Configurations of Destiny

In Jewish history, dreams of prophecy were most widespread during the Jews' exile. Jewish monotheism was strongly reflected in their dreams. If there was but one God, then only that God could be the source of a divine revelation-through-dream. The God of the Jews was known to speak clearly only to them; dreams containing important messages would appear to non-Jews as garbled or enigmatic, such as pharaoh's dream of seven fat and seven lean cows. A Jew—be it a Joseph or a Daniel—would often be called upon to interpret such a dream, as Joseph did for the pharaoh. Although Jews recognized both the power of the dream and their power to interpret it, they were not all rightful interpreters. Jewish prophets gave warnings against "false" dreams and "false" interpreters, thus suggesting a systematic effort to sharpen the distinction between divine and significant dreams as well as distinguish those that were evil or without significance. The orthodox prophets feared the danger of "religious heresy," the warning against which first appeared in Deuteronomy:

If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams . . . saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul. (Deuteronomy 13:1–3)

Dreams in the Old Testament helped to consolidate Judaism; that is, they appear to have confirmed the "chosen people's" claim to a messianic vocation and the spiritual hegemony of its God. Of the approximately 15 dreams in the Old Testament, most have the peculiar characteristic of coming at the beginning of a vital stage in Israel's history, as in the dream of Jacob, which sealed the covenant between the patriarch and his God.

Resting for a night on his journey to Haran (now in Turkey), Jacob took some stones for a pillow and lay down to sleep. He dreamed of a ladder reaching up to heaven with angels in both ascent and descent. From the top, God spoke to him, promising the land Jacob lay upon to his descendants, the Israelites (Genesis 28:10–22). This subject is rendered, in a synagogue in Dura-Europos, Syria. The north wall reveals a portion of Jacob's Dream of the Ladder (A.D. 245–256), but the upper right corner, which would reveal what was at the top of the ladder, is missing. As the text describes it, we only know that God “stood above it” (Goodenough, p. 167).

Despite this missing detail, biblical scholars have interpreted this fresco as significant of a momentous occasion through an interpretation of several of its motifs. Jacob's covered hands are said to indicate “coming into divine presence.” The lower part of the ladder rises toward heaven, and the two men who stand on it—presumably royal figures because of the additional cloak attached to their Persian dress (reserved for kings)—were clearly inspired by the biblical account of the angels. Although this fragment seems to invoke controversy more than it offers a clear explanation, scholar Erwin R. Goodenough does suggest it may be an allegory of Israel. As he notes, “he who sees God” correlates with Jacob's covered hands, and Jacob's face was indeed associated with the “throne” of the Merkabah in many references in rabbinic literature (Goodenough, p. 167). The dream of Jacob also appears on a fresco in the catacomb of Via Latina in Rome, the Haggadah of Sarajevo (Jacob Dreams and Anoints the Stones) in Bosnia-Herzegovina, and the Homilies of Gregory Nazianzenus (Jacob Dreams and Wrestles with an Angel) in the Bibliothèque National de France in Paris.

Many of these various accounts of Jacob's dream would appear to be prototypes for later Christian iconography, especially in the Middle Ages, when a vision was often regarded as a “type” of the Virgin Mary, through whom or which a union of heaven and Earth was accomplished. This very theme was repeated in many subsequent paintings.

Although not necessarily associated with Jacob, the idea of dreams signifying destiny continued in fifteenth-century iconography, as is apparent in Piero della Francesca's Vision of Constantine, from The Legend of the True Cross (1453–1454), a fresco in Arezzo, Italy, in which Constantine's dream prophesizes a battle that was to make him Roman emperor. Constantine's vision takes place in a tent where an angel appears to him in a dream and says, “In this sign thou shalt conquer.” Said to be protected by his faith in the cross, Constantine subsequently vanquished Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge outside Rome.

In Francesca's painting the curtains are parted to show the emperor asleep upon his bed. His servant waits nearby upon a bench, and two soldiers guard the tent. No waking figure is aware that an angel has appeared over the group. The angel's right hand is extended, pointing downward with the little finger, from which extends a miraculous radiance. Although the “true” cross does not appear in the painting itself, it appears inherent in its construction: the central column that holds the tent up and the horizontal line of the tent form a large cross.

Visions of Immortality

The dream-as-vision has also played a major part in dream iconography. Visions dictated messages not only of destiny but also assurances of the immortality of man's soul. Such visions have their representational basis in Cicero's Dream of Scipio, part of the sixth book of his De republica (circa 51 B.C.). A Roman answer to Plato's Republic (fourth or fifth century B.C.), Cicero's De republica tells of Scipio Aemilianus's campaign in Africa, where he was entertained by Massinissa, king of Numidia. After falling into a deep sleep, Africanus appears to Scipio Aemilianus in a dream that prophesizes the destruction of Carthage, the end of Scipio's career, and his eventual death. The angel then reveals that there is a place in heaven set apart for the souls of virtuous statesmen. This message is reinforced by Scipio's father, who explains to him that the journey to heaven cannot be reached faster by suicide and that the Earth is insignificant compared to the universe as a whole.

The subject of Scipio's dream is the reward given to good statesmen after death, the immortality of the soul that comes only to those who care for their country on Earth. “The soul of every man is the man, and not that form which may be delineated with a finger” (Hadas, p. 168). According to Scipio's dream, this is all-important and in strong contrast to humankind's existence on Earth, which is transitory and insignificant.

Whatever we achieve in this life, any merely earthly reward will in the end be unsatisfactory. The pursuit of earthly rewards—power, fame, wealth or pleasure—reduces men to the level of slaves of their own desires, and leads to dishonor, injustice and crime. . . . By practicing virtue in both action and contemplation, the good statesman can free himself from earthly contagion and achieve eternal life and happiness after death. (Powell, p. 125)

Cicero's Dream of Scipio was preserved with the commentary by Macrobius (circa A.D. 400), in which form it was widely read in the Middle Ages and thereafter. Cicero's vision of the cosmos and the good statesman's rewards of immortality were important for their influence on the literature of the Middle Ages—Chaucer's account of his own dream in the Parlement of Foules (1477) starts from his reading of Scipio's dream with the commentary by Macrobius, for instance. It also remained a vital influence on the art of the twentieth century.

The notion of immortality (typically portrayed in art as a hovering vision) preoccupied artists throughout the Middle Ages. In Hugo van der Goes's The Death of the Virgin (circa 1478–1480), in the Musée Communal in Bruges, Belgium, earthly existence is represented by an assembly of grieving disciples and by the figure of Christ and his angels descending to receive the Virgin's soul. The humble and the ugly, as represented by the disciples, are thus “elevated” through their expressions of faith and understanding—but not without problems. A harmonious synthesis seems to be absent: the strongly delineated figures appear to contradict the painting's religious message. This apparent conflict—earthly materialism versus heavenly dreams or visions—could reflect van der Goes's own personal conflict (at one time he renounced secular life for a monastic life). However, deep feelings of guilt concerning the adequacy of his devotion and the conflict between his worldly interests as a painter and those of a strongly ascetic man were thereafter to cause him severe mental problems and illness (Elsen, p. 116). Van der Goes's condition, in which the synthesis of heavenly and earthly values could not be easily or finally achieved, was an affliction of conscience not uncommon during the late Middle Ages.

The conflict between heavenly dreams or visions and earthly materialism was reconciled in the visions of Birgitta (Bridget) of Sweden in the fourteenth century, primarily because her visions steered away from traditional notions of a devoted Christian woman's nuptial ties to Jesus Christ and immortality toward more earthly political beliefs (St. Bridget of Sweden Writing of her Visions, German woodcut, fifteenth century, National Gallery in Washington, D.C.; and Birgitta of Sweden, Revelations Celestes, MS 498, f. 343v, reproduced in Labarge, p. 136). Birgitta's visions represented a substantial change from the prototypical figure of the female committed to Christ through chastity to that of the committed Christian widow. Different from other medieval women mystics because she was a widow—she had married Ulf Gudmarsson, a Swedish nobleman, and had eight children—she did not lead an officially recognized “religious” life. She eventually used her visions and/or revelations to support various causes—reform within the Roman Catholic Church and an end to the abuses perpetrated by bishops and abbots—as well as to advise princes and kings on various political matters. She was especially concerned for the return of the Avignon Popes to Rome. Many saints experienced visions like those of Birgitta, including Anthony of Padua, Bernard, Catherine of Siena, Francis of Assisi, Helena, Hyacinth, Ignatius of Loyola, Jerome, Peter, and Ursula.

The vision itself was not particularly problematic for post-medieval artists, but the position of that vision was: hovering high above the reach of the dreamer's earthly world. A new formula of heavenly immortality was soon envisioned by artists such as the Italian Vittore Carpaccio, who, in his Dream of St. Ursula (1495), portrayed the dreamer and the dream (or vision) sharing the same space, a paradigm much favored by subsequent artists. In Carpaccio's painting, St. Ursula sleeps while a golden-haired angel enters the room. If not for the dramatic lighting and wings, the angel's entrance would seem unremarkable. But this is not just a visitor; it is a vision of what is to come. St. Ursula's palm is held in the angel's hand, a gesture that symbolizes St. Ursula's immortal soul and foretells her impending martyrdom. All of this—the angel, the martyrdom, and St. Ursula's immortal soul—stands in stark contrast to the painting's symbols of secular, material, and earthly delights: the nude statue of a water-carrier that rests over one door and the provocative Venus reclined on her shell that rests over another door.

This is not to say visions were not represented in art prior to the twentieth century but, as Frenchman Paul Gauguin's Vision After the Sermon (1888) makes clear, they were visions seen here on Earth that did not concern immortality. In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, Gauguin turned his back on the modernism of Paris and its concomitant capitalistic interests and found in the countryside of Brittany a people who still believed in visions. In Vision After the Sermon, a vertical tree ostensibly divides the earthly existence of all-believing parishioners from the vision of Jacob and the angel (the parishioners have just heard a sermon from the priest, who is also included in the painting). Still, for all intents and purposes, they occupy the same space. Gauguin achieves a synthesis: a marriage of heaven and Earth through abstract color and biomorphic form that penetrates the real and the unreal with the same intensity. In Gauguin's painting, the struggle to merge earthly existence with visionary images is over. His people are so pure that the vision does not appear to them after their deaths or in sleep, as it does in the work of van der Goes or Carpaccio, but rather in front of their believing eyes while they are still awake and alive.

Apocalyptic Visions

Not all representations of visions were so positive, however. Nightmarish hauntings of disease, war, and death abound in the history of art. Examples can be found in the works of Hieronymus Bosch, as in the Garden of Earthly Delights (1480–1505), in the Prado in Madrid, Spain; and of Albrecht Dürer, as in Seven Trumpets, illustration of Revelation 8 and 9 from the Apocalypse (1498), at Indiana University in Bloomington.

In the twentieth century, apocalyptic political events and a desire to escape restrictive social and sexual taboos inform the work of many European artists. Suffering, impending disasters, and death characterize Ludwig Meidner's Apocalyptic City (1913), in a private collection, and his The Uncertainty of Visions (1914), in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The impending nightmare is visualized in these works through an emphasis on unstable diagonal lines, a disintegration of forms, explosive lights, toppling of buildings, and ominous shadows.

Max Beckmann and George Grosz go beyond suggestive visual effects by providing an actual nightmare with which one can identify. Beckmann's The Dream (1921), with its amputated, bandaged hands of a man in red stripes, a blinded street musician, and a maimed harlequin, deals with one of humankind's greatest fears: deformation. Grosz also makes powerful use of representations of amputation, as well as facelessness and blindness. In his Untitled (1920), in Düsseldorf, Germany, a faceless head, a perfect cylinder, matches the indistinguishable black squares that make up the windows of the buildings across the street. All individuality is effaced as a tribute to the collective citizen, or collective dream. This mechanical absence of individuality carries with it a sense of critique as well as nightmare—what happens to a person when the fate of the individual is no longer important, when individuality is surrendered. Visually, the figure is quite truncated, with neither hands nor expression: a torso rooted in a cube, unable to move. The featureless head is equivalent to the hard, cold, impersonal architecture behind it; it has the soullessness of an automaton.

Is the human like a machine or is the machine like a human? Heinrich Hoerle presents this dilemma in his Mechanical Men (1930), in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, which portrays the physical and psychological alienation of those who live and work in the machine age. In this work, manikinlike figures stand in regimented formation, their torsos schematized, hardened, and polished like metal casings. Their limbs have been metamorphosed into nonhuman appendages, and with their closed eyes, they resemble the blind and deformed figures of Grosz and Beckmann's paintings. Strikingly, a trancelike effect, or state of hypnosis, is induced in the viewer of Hoerle's painting through his nightmarish repetition of figure. Similar fears inscribe the works of Franz Marc, especially his Fate of the Animals (1913), which represents “a longing for the destruction of the present world of corruption, evil, and degeneration, and its replacement with a world of innocence, goodness, and purity” (Rosenblum, p. 142).

Dreaming

A person dreaming, above all, is a person in a condition in which he or she has no control. Dreamers appear to be in an unconscious state, even though things that appear to them may come from the conscious world. This lack of conscious control over one's mind has led philosophers and artists to associate dreaming with a wide spectrum of afflictions. According to art historian Erwin Panofsky, in the Middle Ages dreaming was associated with laziness, idleness, and sloth. These notions are duly represented in Dürer's engraving Dream of the Doctor (1497–1498). As one critic has described this painting, “An elderly man is asleep on a bench by an enormous, apparently well heated stove . . . his body comfortable resting on thick pillows” (Panofsky, vol. 1, p. 71).

This example of a medieval “morality”—the man slumbers while he ought to work or pray—is similar to another work of art that personified the idea of sloth, Allegory of Envy and Sloth (circa 1490), by an anonymous north Netherlandish master, in the Musée Royal in Antwerp, Belgium. The pillow, a prevalent motif in these types of works, appears again here symbolic of the sin of laziness. (“Idling is the pillow of the devil” goes the old medieval proverb). The tradition that lies behind these allegories is summarized in these lines from Sebastian Brant's satirical poem Das Narrenschiff (The Ship of Fools, 1494):

A sluggard is no use except to be a hibernating dormouse and to be allowed a full measure of sleep. To sit by the stove is his delight. . . . But the Evil One takes advantage of laziness and soon sows his seeds therein. Laziness is the root of all sin. It caused the children of Israel to grumble. David committed adultery and murder because he lolled in idleness.

Brant's words are in part derived from the belief that “sloth begets lewdness and makes the idler subject to the temptations of Luxury” (from the Somme Le Roi, one of the most popular treatises on moral theology [Panofsky, p. 72]).

The Spaniard Francisco de Goya's Los Caprichos (1794–1799) is another example of the negative connotations with which dreaming was often associated. Goya connected dreaming with the “sleep of reason,” humankind's departure from reason, the core of our very selves. Other Goya compositions like Dreams illustrate how the world of dreams was at one time symbolic of “human errors, vices and follies, and blunders common in every society” (Lopez-Rey, p. 84). The vagary of dreams, the overwhelming power of superstition, and humankind's obedience to passions and obscure impulses were thought by the best minds of Goya's time to be negations of human rational dignity. Goya's etching The Sleep of Reason Produces Monsters (1799) is just such a commentary on human foolishness, passion, and superstition. In this work, a flock of bats and owls fly around a slumbering man, a huge cat by his chair. The bats are said to represent the “infernal deities of dreams” and once suggested to Father Castenega, the then-famous physiognomist, “an ignoble passion which shuns light” (Lopez-Rey, p. 137). Castenega was a sixteenth-century writer who believed, among other things, that “the devil could give to his train of evildoers the appearance of a fox, a billy goat, a cat, or the like.” Hence, the monsters that surround Goya's slumbering man (while his reason might be said to be sleeping) could be seen as allusions to superstitious belief. However, as Lopez-Rey points out, the owl is also the symbol of Minerva, the goddess of wisdom and the arts. In Goya's etching, an owl stands on a desk and offers a pencil to the slumbering figure, a gesture that perhaps indicates reason should give way to unbridled imagination, so that “imagination, united with reason, may resume her role as mother of all arts, and the source of their wonders” (Lopez-Rey, p. 137).

In opposition to the rationalism of Goya, many artists in the late nineteenth century turned their backs on the doctrines of naturalism, which for them were synonymous with the crass materialism that prevailed in the 1880s. These artists were anxious to explore the different states or stages of dreaming, going beyond the obvious form of sleeping.

Aligning themselves with mysticism and spiritualism, these nineteenth-century artists attempted to create antinaturalistic visual environments. Figures were divested of action, social intercourse, dialogue, and even gravity. An obscure, hermetic iconography destroyed traditional notions of color, line, and perspective: color was of another, antinatural world; line was no longer described; draftsmanship was no longer valued; and perspective became antilogical, subjective, and whimsical. Description was abandoned in favor of suggestion, and understanding was replaced with exclusivity. This new aesthetic was adopted by writers as well, as in the revolutionary manifesto of Jean Moreau, the drug-influenced poetry of Arthur Rimbaud and Paul Verlaine, and the decadence of Joris-Karl Huysmans's novel À Rebours (1884; Against the Grain).

Influenced by French poet Charles Baudelaire, artists like Gauguin and the Nabis created new worlds of ambiguity where no distinction existed between animate and inanimate or dream and reality: all of nature was correspondent. Adopting the undulating, floating line of the English Romantic poet/artists William Blake, John Flaxman, and Henry Fuseli, Gauguin used an endless arabesque line to merge his people and landscapes, and as a result, space, setting, and time lose their conventional meanings. In his painting The Loss of Virginity (1888), the figure of a reclining female nude suggests—in a strange, foreboding way—that the past, present, and future are one and the same. Gauguin's Where Do We Come From, Where Are We Going, Who Are We? (1897), in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, suggests dreaming through the combination its figures (who all stand about in dreamlike poses), with the riddle of its perplexing title. As in a dream, the painting contains no answers. Within the strict horizontality of Gauguin's pictorial plane, silence, hypnosis, sleep, and rest might be said to have been captured, perhaps ultimately suggesting death. Other artists whom Gauguin admired and/or worked with have similar macabre strains running through their work. These include Pierre Puvis de Chavannes (The Dream, 1883), Émile Bernard (Madeleine in the Bois d'Amour, 1893), Lucien Lévy-Dhurmen (Silence, 1895), and Odilon Redon (Closed Eyes, 1890, and Silence, 1911).

In Redon's The Light of Day (1891), from the Dreams series, the viewer is able to glimpse a segment of a brightly illuminated tree through a window. But as the viewer's focus pulls back from the window, he or she is able to see that this is no ordinary room and that vague, softly luminous shapes hover in the darkness. What the viewer sees through the window he or she can describe, but what lies in front of it can only be suggested, not defined. Redon's painting reminds us of the mysterious dark world that exists behind the human eye.

Redon wrote of his drawings: "They inspire yet cannot be defined. They do not determine anything. Like music, they transport us into the ambiguous world of the undetermined." He deliberately cultivated his subconscious as a source for his imagery, and became especially interested in fantasy and dreamlike states. As he wrote, "Fantasy is also the messenger of the 'unconscious.' Nothing in art is achieved by will alone. Everything is done by docilely submitting to the arrival of the 'unconscious.' The analytical spirit must be quick when it appears, but afterwards it is of little importance to remember it."

The investigation into the unknown, dark forces of dreaming was taken up in the work of Gauguin's English counterparts Edward Burne-Jones and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. In Burne-Jones's Golden Stairs (1876), a painting reminiscent of Jacob and the Ladder, a dream world is captured where a series of women, each a mirror image of the other, eerily float down an unending spiral staircase in defiance of the laws of gravity. The critic F. G. Stephens has noted that the figures in this work "troop past like spirits in an enchanted dream." In paintings like Burne-Jones's The Evening Star (1872–1873), the human figure actually flies. This particular tactic was part of William Blake's signature style, as in Europe (1794), an illustration to Thomas Gray's Ode on the Spring (circa 1797–1798), and an illustration to Edward Young's Night Thoughts (1795–1797). The leaping, soaring, gravity-defying figures in The Evening Star represent a psychic energy that is noncorporeal. Both choreographically and symbolically, flying is a movement that symbolizes joy, wishing, and aspiration. It also expresses the energy of sexual desire, as in Blake's The Whirlwind of Lovers (1824–1827), one of the illustrations to Dante Alighieri's Divine Comedy. Such an effect is achieved in Henry Fuseli's The Nightmare, a painting in which a horse is seen flying out a window after it has apparently had sexual intercourse with a woman, who appears sensually sprawled across the bed. Fuseli, in fact, used flying figures of various sorts on more than one occasion. Burne-Jones would have been familiar with these effects and connotations of flying because both he and Rossetti greatly admired Blake (Rossetti was in possession of Blake's notebook). Blake once wrote: "... the Just rise thro the Air . . . the Blessed . . . arise upon the Air rejoicing." Satan was even described by Blake as "falling headlong," Death as what "is dragged down" by a demon. It has been suggested that figures who rise are "governed by powers other than their own; while figures who descend are pictured in that attitude to suggest autonomous energy. The soaring straight-legged figures are drawn upwards as if attracted by a magnetic force" (Warner, p. 123).

For Rossetti, dreaming takes on an even more direct and personal meaning. Instead of employing conventional dream fragments or symbols—like repetition or descent—Rossetti uses a state of mental abstraction that is closest to dreaming itself, a slipping away from full-consciousness. Rossetti's paintings, especially those of his "women" series, create a specific state of mind in that they force the viewer to first focus his or her gaze on a singular image. Although Rossetti employed a variety of women as models, they all look alike in his portraits: heavy-lidded, droopy, or closed eyes; long necks; masculine shoulders and arms; red hair; and exaggerated mouths. It could be said that the spectator is part of the trance or hypnotic gaze of the subject, for in Rossetti's paintings the women are also in a kind of trance. Two motifs suggest this condition: music and flowers. The overpowering smell of honeysuckle almost seems to invade Rossetti's Venus Verticordia (1864–1868). Mixed with roses, the same flower again appears in the intoxicating garland of his La Ghirlandata (1873). Flowers not only accompany The Blue Bower (1865), Regina Cordium (1866), and Monna Vanna (1866), but in the Beata Beatrix (1864–1867) the white poppy—eerily reminiscent of the overdose of laudanum that actually caused the death of model Elizabeth Siddall—contributes even more directly to the dreamlike quality of the painting. Rossetti again suggests the thin boundaries that lie between dreaming, sleep, and death.

Like other artists of this time, Rossetti may have worked under the influence of laudanum, a derivative of opium (often symbolic of death in art), a drug used since ancient times to invoke dreams. His drug-taking certainly appears to have had an influence in the production of these trancelike, hypnotic paintings. As one writer noted of this correlation, the "absent mind which haunts us like a ghost or a dream," the "dozing style," and the "dreaminess of his paintings" appear to have resulted from his "experiences with spiritualism . . . mesmerism, his drinking and drug taking" (Roberts, p. 383).

The desire to explore dreaming, to enter the dreamer's head, was most seriously pursued in the twentieth century by the surrealists. For them, however, dreaming was not a state of escape but a condition preferable over so-called reality. Like the Dadaists, to whom they were initially attracted, the surrealists engaged in automatic writing, an act during which the mind was purged of purposeful thought through free association. Words were not necessarily attached to their literal meanings but rather used to symbolize the often-seething content of the unconscious mind. In his 1924 manifesto, French poet André Breton stressed psychic automatism, a process by which he believed one could express, either visually or verbally, the true function of thought. The manifesto was dictated in the absence of all control of reason and it stood outside all aesthetic or moral preoccupations. Surrealism, then, is based on a belief in the superior reality of certain forms of association heretofore neglected, in the omnipotence of the dream, and in the disinterested play of thought. It leads to the permanent destruction of all other psychic mechanisms and to their substitution in solving the principal problems of life.

Breton's psychoanalytic language reveals his involvement with medicine. Like the ancients, who used drugs for their spiritual process of "incubation," Breton conducted surrealist experiments, or "periods of sleeping fits," during which subjects were self-hypnotized. Without the attendance of their conscious minds, they produced automatic writings, answers to questions, and sudden and striking descriptions. Like a medical student, he wanted to isolate and study the germ of inspiration. In this sense, Breton resembled the nineteenth-century Romantics who, in trying to communicate with their subconscious muse, used such artifices as absinthe, laudanum, opium, and cocaine.

Unlike the Romantics, Breton and his comrades denied that the dream had any supernatural power. In a sense, they went further and claimed that the dream did not imply the recognition of a new or different reality beyond that of the everyday. In his essay Les Vases Communicants (1932), Breton stated, "The poet has come into being to overcome the depressing idea of an irreparable divorce between action and dream." On another occasion, he declared, "I believe in the future resolution of two states (in appearance so contradictory), dream and reality, into a sort of absolute reality; Surréalité" (Levy, p. 11).

In the surrealists' attempt to discover and explore the "more real than real world behind the real," they came closest to Sigmund Freud's theories, which stated that the dream and the subconscious exist and interact with reality. "Our assumption of the existence of the subconscious is necessary and legitimate, and we possess manifold proofs of the existence of the subconscious" (Freud, p. 99). The surrealists found a way to break down the barrier that lies between fantasy and reality, and the results of this were perceived by some as valuable reflections of actual life.

Surrealism was not, however, just a social doctrine; nor was it an involuntary, hypnotic practice. The artists affiliated with the movement were not content to be mere interpreters. In the passive, or literary phase, the dream (or reverie) would merely be recorded by automatic writing, free association, and similar experimental techniques. This was then followed by an active phase, during which the artist would attempt to elaborate the material and to give the dream a concrete form in reality. From the beginning, surrealism expounded two very different methods of working: illusionistic surrealism, also called "veristic surrealism," and "psychic automatist surrealism." The former method was exemplified by such artists as Max Ernst, Salvador Dalí, and Yves Tanguy, whose highly illusionistic manner rendered irrational content, absurd juxtapositions, and metamorphosed dream states.

Dalí's The Persistence of Memory (1931) dramatizes dream imagery through an enhancement of the trompe l'oeil technique. In a barren landscape of incongruous forms, time has expired like everything else: a watch is left crawling with insects like scavengers over carrion; three other watches hang limp and useless, one over a rectangular block, one over the branch of a dead tree, and one over a lifeless, amorphous creature that bears a curious resemblance to Dalí himself. This is a dream world based upon the juxtaposition of unrelated objects in an extraordinary situation. It is a surreality, reality above and beyond reality, an enigmatic personal dream.

On the other hand, psychic automatist surrealism, a direct outgrowth of automatic writing, was used to reveal the mysteries of the unconscious, or the state of dreaming, mostly through abstraction. The automatist phase is exemplified in the work of Joan Miró and André Masson.

Miró sought a more universal, less personal form of expression than the other surrealists. He believed the unconscious held a universal imagery that he attempted to reach through spontaneous, or automatic, drawing. Both he and Masson wanted to eliminate all rational thought as they traced their brushes across the surface of the canvas. Organic shapes were believed to be unadulterated by conscious thought and thus drawn from the unconscious. Once the basic designs had been outlined, a conscious period of work could follow. Because no conscious control was to be exerted to determine the early course of the designs, the automatist method was seen as spontaneous, as employing chance and accident.

In Miró's Painting (1933), meandering lines join and intersect to form the contours of clustered, organic figures. Some of these shapes are left void to display a nondescript background of subtly colored squares; others are filled in with sharply contrasted black, white, and bright red pigment. In this work, Miró applied Breton's principles of psychic automatism in an aesthetically pleasing, decorative manner.

Although different in style, both surrealist groups had a common goal: to re-create in visual terms Freud's analysis of the subconscious. As Dalí stated in his address to New York's Museum of Modern Art in 1934:

The subconscious has a symbolic language that is truly a universal language, for it does not depend on special habitude or state of culture or intelligence, but speaks with the vocabulary of the great vital constants, sexual instinct, feeling of death, physical notion of the enigma of space—these vital constants are universally echoed in every human. To understand an aesthetic picture, training in appreciation is necessary, cultural and intellectual preparation. For Surrealism, the only requisite is a receptive and intuitive human being.

Although surrealism has since fallen out of fashion, representations of dreams and dreaming have not disappeared from twentieth-century iconography. However, no group of modern artists has yet to come as close as the surrealists did to resolving the two contradictory states of dream and reality.

Dreams and Healing

Many ancient cultures distinguished between "divine" dreams, which had to be interpreted and obeyed, and "ordinary" dreams. Ordinary dreams could be divided into "good" dreams, sent by the gods, and "bad" dreams, which were sent by demons and demanded of the recipient some sort of cleansing or protective ritual. One of the functions of the ancient priests or magicians, a role that would eventually be taken over by the artist, was to distinguish between these two types of dreams—the good from the bad, the pious from the delusory, the divine from the merely superstitious—and to extricate the dreamer, if necessary, from the wrong dream. Many rituals were used to dispel the effect of the wrong or evil dream, often through interpretations offered by dream books. Once the enigma of the bad dream was worked out, the disturbing symptoms of the affliction were assured to soon pass.

Another method used was known as an incubation: an invocation through elaborate ritual of dreams for healing purposes. During an incubation, the tormented person would be brought to a temple, where they would sleep, fast, and often receive potions to induce beneficial dreams.

In ancient times, an entire caste of priests known loosely as the "masters of the secret things" practiced mysteries and attempted cures in special temples. One such temple, the Temple of Imhotep at Memphis, Egypt, was dedicated to the god of healing, known to the Greeks as Imouthes, who actually had been an earthly architect and medical man during the twenty-seventh century B.C. After his death, Imhotep was elevated to the status of a deity, and his temple became the center of a healing cult whose beliefs persisted almost to modern times.

In Egypt, the wooden statue of the god Bes was believed to protect sleepers against the demons of the night and to deliver to them good, pleasant dreams. Appeals to Bes took the form of rituals and magic spells that involved strange ingredients such as the blood of a white dove, mulberry juice, cinnabar, rainwater, and myrrh.

Much of this dream incubation has been ascribed to animism, a form of belief held by those who, in fear of gods, demons, and natural forces they could not understand, turned to an armory of devices for protection and reassurance: amulets, magic spells, prophecy, divination, and dream interpretation. It is wrong, however, to attribute such forms of belief only to the ancient peoples of Assyria or Egypt. People in modern times share the anxieties and fears of their ancestors. Nowhere is this better expressed than in art.

National Aspirations: Dreams that Heal

American art is an endless story of dreams: from those of early artists who cloaked such abstract notions as freedom, wisdom, and independence in the guise of a neoclassical vocabulary; to those landscapists who created vast, dreamlike vistas when it was already apparent they no longer existed in such a pristine state. No dream, however, was as compelling as that of the Wild West, a nineteenth-century myth that supplied material for artists, writers, and moviemakers for the next 150 years.

The multifaceted allure of the west, or the frontier, a word impregnated with dreamlike meanings, was once known as "God's country," an untouched land where the millennium would supposedly occur. Unknown and far away, its exotic otherness held many promises, both religious and social: freedom, specifically from man-made laws and regulations; anonymity; privacy; and respect for the individual. Difficult to reach, weighted down with myth, tale, and folklore, the frontier promised adventure, risk, and danger. Throughout the course of the nineteenth century, hundreds of artists brought life to Horace Greeley's cry, "Go west, young man."

For George Caleb Bingham and John Gast, the west was a place to expand the American dream of progress. Bingham's The Emigration of Daniel Boone (1852) and Gast's Westward, Ho (Manifest Destiny) (1872) illustrate the dream of cultivating and civilizing the untamed, uninhabited west. These paintings also illustrate the dream of bringing the east—its people, education, technical advancements, economy, and industry—to the west. Religious dreams of the west show up in such paintings as William S. Jewitt's Promised Land (1850) and James F. Wilkin's Leaving the Old Homestead (1854), in which the west was seen as a place to build a morally purified community purged of the sins of eastern urban life. The transcendentalism of this group of artists, grounded in imagination, religion, fanaticism, myth, and especially the spiritualism of the virgin land, helped to persuade the Mormons and other nineteenth-century groups to set up communes throughout the midwest.

Like the dreams of Jacob and Daniel, modern dream iconography appears to answer a particular need of a particular society at a particular time. The myth of the west answered such a need, not only in the nineteenth century but in the first quarter of the twentieth century as well, when Americans once again needed a dream. At this time the dream was provided by three artists whose bountiful midwestern utopias became the public's antidote from the big cities' depressing, grimy factories and the ravages of the dust bowl.

The fertile, prosperous dreams of the regionalists—a group that included Thomas Hart Benton, Grant Wood, and John Steuart Curry—were located in the roots of the effusive Jeffersonian ideal that was never realized, in a place where time was arrested. Benton, for example, found subject matter in the exploits of Jesse James, Huck Finn, and young Abe Lincoln. In Benton's world, the biblical tale of Susanna and the Elders took place in Kansas City, Missouri, while the ancient goddess Persephone could be found in an American melon patch. Curry dealt with John Brown, Coronado, and the wide-open Kansas prairies. Wood turned his attention to Paul Revere and even once painted a young George Washington, with hatchet in hand, on the front lawn of his new home in Iowa City, Iowa. These were dream worlds based not upon exact history but upon history mingled with substantial doses of myth. The folktales, legends, and lore written by Washington Irving, James Fenimore Cooper, and others inspired the paintings of Benton, Wood, Curry, and early nineteenth century artist John Quidor. In fact, the very impurity of these kinds of tales, rather than their truth, was what attracted these particular artists.

Grant Wood spared no pains to show that he recognized the cherry-tree fable of truth-telling for a barefaced lie, concocted by the shifty Parson Weems. Like the Regionalists' mythic Midwestern farms, their history was neither gospel truth nor precise model for action. Rather, history was a bittersweet reminder that doubt, confusion, and ambiguity have often dogged the nation's footsteps into tomorrow and that the localized deeds of people their neighbors once thought ordinary people have enlivened and ennobled the nation's trek through time. People's history resonates through time; it is also the stuff of dreams. (Schalz, p. 11)

But more than this, these myths also spoke of the nature of the American. Despite the American people's ups and downs, heroic weaknesses and strengths, failures and successes, they have managed to endure. During the Great Depression, Benton, Wood, and Curry once again reminded the American people to never give up on their dreams. These artists are thus connected to the ancient dream world in that their images and "dreams" provide a kind of healing.

Benton, Curry, and Wood uncannily resemble one another not only in their narrative style, but also in their lack of realism. Benton displays a hyperbolic perspective, with larger-than-life figures that seem to jump out of their environment into the spectators' space. The graphic-cartoonist flow of his line has an organic, spiritual quality that can only be compared to the Hollywood myth-making images of the same decade.

The Hollywood musicals of the 1930s were about as far away from the gritty realism of something like Dorothea Lange's photographs as art could possibly be. They were bubbly, frivolous, light, even saucy. A typical musical of the period might have an apple-cheeked kid on his or her way to their big break on Broadway. Another might portray the shenanigans of the wealthy few, a portrayal that supposedly offered amusement and inspiration to the masses without arousing potentially problematic feelings of social conflict.

Wood's circular trees and curving hills are flatter, stiffer, and more mathematically calculated than the endless biomorphic lines of Benton. Wood's spiraling line takes the viewer out of a modern-day environment into a spiritual no-man's-land where all imperfections and details vanish in a never-ending flow of simple line and pure, flat color. Curry shares with Benton the graphic line, but his animated, fairy-tale figures resemble Walt Disney characters, which allow a spectator to escape into a world of make-believe.

Dreams and Utopias

Dreams can be realized not only by looking back but also by looking forward. Whereas the regionalists looked to the past for a new world, urban painters like the precisionists looked to the future. Just the names of paintings like William R. Leigh's Visionary City (1908), Hugh Ferriss's The Metropolis of Tomorrow (1928), and Charles Sheeler's Incantation (1946) can conjure up the industrial dream. In the paintings of the precisionists, skyscrapers and machines were transmogrified into adulatory symbols of the new culture of tomorrow. "It is not industry as it really exists but the industry of my dreams," Ferriss explained.

Louis Lozowick's Urban Geometry (1925–1927) relies upon geometric forms but not their rationale: baseless skyscrapers soar up at disturbing angles, then fall backward, sideways, and forward as though the spectator were racing uncontrollably through space at an incredible speed. Black, opaque rectangles hint at windows that offer views neither inside nor out, and incredible proportions defy both weight and material. A dream perspective, with its typical irrationalities, is offered. Faceless oblongs and rectangles painted in variations of muted pinks and blues cover the surface.

The vacuous faces of Lozowick's skyscrapers, as well as their soaring, flying, almost infinite structure, are repeated in Ferriss's futuristic The Metropolis of Tomorrow. Leigh's earlier Visionary City—a megalopolis of endless bridges, arches, and buildings—is changed from a dream to a nightmare. Incredible scale and frightening perspective create a sense of soaring, while the unknown heights hint at one of the worst human fears, falling. The aesthetic employed in Ferriss's painting is similar to that of the then-new "streamline modern," the aesthetic that engineers used in designing early twentieth-century trains, planes, cars, and ocean liners. Streamline modern's smooth surfaces, fluid and horizontal lines, and rounded contours suitable for high-speed travel were appropriate for paintings intended to transport the spectator into the world of tomorrow. Whether seen in the construction of a painting or in the construction of a plane, train, or toaster, streamline modern came to be understood as a metaphor for the future. Nowhere was this better realized than at the 1933 Century of Progress world's fair in Chicago, a total environment of visionary optimism that became a utopian dream for the new age.

Dream utopias were not an American monopoly, however, as the works of the Italian futurists, Russian avant-garde, and Dutch de Stijlists attest. The futurists gave form to the power of the city and technology: Emilio Marinetti spoke of "shipyards blazing with violent electric moons . . . bridges that stride the rivers like giant gymnasts flashing in the sun." In the first stages of futurism, "realistic" images served as metaphors for dreamlike states of being. Thus, the machine or gun stood for violence, aggression, and action; crowds or mobs invoked fear, panic, and revolution; the staircase could represent ascending to a new world (another allusion to Jacob's ladder, which linked Earth and heaven), falling into the unknown, saying hello or good-bye, or the lack of beginning or conclusion. Eventually such images disappeared and were replaced by a new sense of interchangeable space, line, and form defined by such words as dynamism, kineticism, speed, and force. Language played a new role, as did theory, and both had an important impact on the surrealists, who were already working with psychoanalytic dream material. Related to these movements and ideas were Antonio Sant'Elia's The New City (1914); Virgilio Marchi's Futuristic City (1919); and Alex Korda's film Things to Come (1936), based on H. G. Wells's story The Shape of Things to Come (1934), with special effects provided by Bauhaus artist László Moholy-Nagy.

Stimulated by Italian futurism and contemporary metaphysical speculations, Kasimir Malevich emerged as the leading dream maker in Russia when he proposed an art grounded on an "intuitional awareness of a new and unfamiliar state of being." Transcending the conventional and predictable, Malevich's art attempted to mimic the subliminal world of feeling and perception. Like Piet Mondrian's de Stijl in The Netherlands and Wassily Kandinsky's experiments in Germany, Malevich's art was distrustful of "appearances." The physical and concrete—illusory images at best—were given up for the mystical and transcendental. In Russia and The Netherlands this was expressed not through dreamlike images but through a condition in which a dream might occur: the inner recesses of a person's mind.

If the futurists used dream feelings—height, depth, speed, flying—the Russian suprematists and the Dutch neoplasticists tried a new approach called "the fourth dimension." The fourth dimension, according to these groups, comprised metaphysical perceptions that would allow one to see beyond the illusory—what people called "real"—into a new world of non-materialist growth. It was an art that spoke of "the state of our inner animation," an art that was superpersonal, that was supernatural and expressive of a cosmic consciousness.

Dream utopias—whether grounded in the agrarian dream of the past or the urban fantasy of the future—all had one thing in common: they were dreams of wish fulfillment and daydreams for a better world.

See also Apocalypse; Automata; Ecstasy; Nightmare; Sleep; Upside Down

Selected Works of Art

Art and the Dream: Ancient Sources

Inscription, Giant Sphinx, Egyptian, circa 1450 B.C., Giza, Egypt

Dream Book, Chester Beatty Papyrus, Egyptian, 1300 B.C., London, British Museum

Egyptian Stele, inscribed with an account of the Dream of Tanuath-Amen, found at Gebel Barkal, Egypt

Configurations of Destiny: The Bible and Other Christian Sources

Jacob's Dream of the Ladder, fresco, north wall, A.D. 245–256, Dura-Europos, Syria

The Dream of Jacob, fresco, Rome, Catacomb Via Latina
Jacob Dreams and Anoints the Stones, from the Haggadah of Sarajevo, Sarajevo, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Zemaljski Muzej Bosne i Hercegovine

Homilies of Gregory Nazianzenus (Jacob Dreams and Wrestles with an Angel), Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

Giotto, Vision of Anna, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
Martino di Bartolomeo, Five Scenes from the Life of Saint Bridget, panels, before 1434, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Gemäldegalerie

Simone Martini, Vision of Saint Martin, fresco, circa 1528, Assisi, Italy, St. Francesco

Castagno, Andrea del, Vision of Saint Jerome, fresco, circa 1454–1455, Florence, Italy, SS. Annunziata

Piero della Francesca, Vision of Constantine, from The Legend of the True Cross, fresco, 1453–1454, Arezzo, Italy, St. Francesco

Lippi, Filippino, Vision of Saint Bernard, 1504–1507, Florence, Italy, Accademia

Bartolomeo, Fra, Vision of St. Bernard, 1504–1507, Florence, Italy, Accademia

Veronese, Bonifacio, The Vision of Helena, oil on canvas, circa 1560s–1570s, London, National Gallery

El Greco, Vision of Saint Hyacinth, before 1614, Rochester, New York, University Art Gallery

Subleyras, Pierre, Vision of Saint Ignatius Loyola, sketch, before 1749, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie; painting, Salamanca, Spain, Universidad Pontifica

Visions of Immortality

Goes, Hugo van der, The Death of the Virgin, circa 1478–1480, Bruges, Belgium, Musée Communal

Carpaccio, Vittore, Dream of Saint Ursula, 1495, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Gauguin, Paul, Vision After the Sermon (Jacob Wrestling with the Angel), 1888, Edinburgh, Scotland, National Gallery of Scotland

Apocalyptic Visions

Bosch, Hieronymus, Garden of Earthly Delights, 1480–1505, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Dürer, Albrecht, Seven Trumpets, illustration of Revelation 8 and 9, from Apocalypse, 1498, Bloomington, Indiana University

Meidner, Ludwig, Apocalyptic City, 1913, private collection

Meidner, Ludwig, The Uncertainty of Visions, 1914, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Marvin and Janet Fishman Collection

Beckmann, Max, The Dream, 1921, St. Louis, Missouri, Morton D. May Collection

Grosz, George, Untitled, 1920, Düsseldorf, Germany

Hoerle, Heinrich, Mechanical Men, 1930, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Marvin and Janet Fishman

Marc, Franz, Fate of the Animals, oil on canvas, 1913, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum

Dreaming

Weyden, Rogier van der, follower of, Dream of Pope Sergius, oil on oak panel, circa 1495, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum

Dürer, Albrecht, Dream of the Doctor (The Dream), engraving, 1497–1498

Lotto, Lorenzo, A Maiden's Dream, oil on panel, circa 1505, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Penni, Luca, Dream of Raphael (Melancholy of Michelangelo), engraved by Giorgio Ghisi, before 1582

Blake, William, Europe, engravings finished in watercolor, 1794, London, British Museum

Blake, William, illustration to Night Thoughts, by Edward Young, circa 1795–1797, London, British Museum

Blake, William, illustration to Ode on the Spring, by Thomas Gray, circa 1797–1798, collection of Mr. and Mrs. Mellon

Blake, William, The Whirlwind Lovers, illustration to The Divine Comedy, by Dante Alighieri, 1824–1827, Montreal, Quebec, McGill University, McLennan Library

North Netherlandish Master, Allegory of Envy and Sloth, circa 1490, Antwerp, Belgium, Musée Royal

Goya, Francisco, Los Caprichos, etchings, 1794–1799

Goya, Francisco, The Sleep of Reason Produces Monsters, etching 1799

Gauguin, Paul, The Loss of Virginity, 1888, Norfolk, Virginia, Chrysler Museum

Gauguin, Paul, Where Do We Come from, Where Are We Going, Who Are We?, 1897, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Chavannes, Puvis de, The Dream, 1883, Paris, Louvre

Bernard, Émile, Madeleine in the Bois d'Amour, 1893, Paris, Musée National d'Art Modern

Lévy-Dhurmen, Lucien, Silence, 1895, Paris, private collection

Redon, Odilon, Closed Eyes, 1890, Paris, Galerie Nationale du Jeu de Paume

Redon, Odilon, Silence, 1911, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Burne-Jones, Edward, The Evening Star, 1872–1873, private collection

Burne-Jones, Edward, Golden Stairs, 1876, London, Tate Gallery

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Venus Verticordia, 1864–1868, Bournemouth, Dorset, Rusell-Cotes Art Gallery and Museum

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, La Ghirlandata, 1873, London, Guildhall Art Gallery, Corporation of London

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, The Blue Bower, 1865, Birmingham, Barber Institute of Fine Arts

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Regina Cordium, 1866, London, Tate Gallery

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Monna Vanna, 1866, London, Tate Gallery

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Beata Beatrix, 1864–1867, London, Tate Gallery

Dalí, Salvador, The Persistence of Memory, 1931, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Dalí, Salvador, Dream of Venus, 1939, Isle of Man, private collection

Miró, Joan, Painting, 1933, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Ruiz, Antonio, The Dream of Malinche, oil on board, 1932, Mexico City, Mexico, Galeria de Arte Mexicano
 Rivera, Diego, Dream of a Sunday Afternoon, fresco, 1947–1948, Mexico City

The Artist and the Dream

Rousseau, Henri, The Dream, 1910, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Grosz, George, Untitled, 1920, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen
 Hoerle, Heinrich, Mechanical Men, 1930, Marvin and Janet Fishman, Milwaukee, Wisconsin
 Kahlo, Frida, Self-Portrait Dreaming, pencil on paper, 1932, Cuernavaca, Mexico, Rafael Coronel Collection

Dreams and Healing

Temple of Imhotep (Imouthes), Memphis, Egypt

Dreams of National Aspirations

Rosa, Salvator, Dream of Aeneas, oil on canvas, circa 1663–1664, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Bingham, George Caleb, The Emigration of Daniel Boon, 1852, St. Louis, Missouri Historical Society
 Gast, John, Westward, Ho (Manifest Destiny), 1872, Orange, Virginia, Collection of Harry T. Peters Jr.
 Jewitt, William S., Promised Land, 1850, private collection
 Wilkin, James F., Leaving the Old Homestead, 1854, St. Louis, Missouri Historical Society

Dreams and Utopias

Leigh, William R., Visionary City, 1908, New York, Hirsch & Adler Galleries
 Ferriss, Hugh, The Metropolis of Tomorrow, 1928, New York, Columbia University
 Sheeler, Charles, Incantation, 1946, Brooklyn, New York, Brooklyn Museum of Art
 Lozowick, Louis, Urban Geometry, 1925–1927, New York, Faber Collection
 Sant'Elia, Antonio, The New City, 1914
 Marchi, Virgilio, Futuristic City, 1919
 Korda, Alex, Things to Come, film, 1936

Further Reading

Bresdin, Rudolphe, Odilon Redon, Gustave Moreau, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1961
 de Becker, Raymond, The Understanding of Dreams and their Influence on the History of Man, New York: Hawthorn, 1968
 Eastbrook, Helen Slocum, Old Testament Stories in Woodcut, Boston: Beacon Press, 1947

Elsen, Albert E., Purposes of Art, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1962
 Fletcher, Valerie J., Dreams and Nightmares: Utopian Visions in Modern Art, Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1983
 Freud, Sigmund, Zeitschrift, Leipzig, Germany: Internationaler Psychoanalytischer Verlag, 1913
 Gibson, Michael, The Symbolists, New York: Abrams, 1988
 Goldwater, Robert, Symbolism, New York: Harper, 1979; London: Penguin, 1979
 Goodenough, Erwin R., Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, New York: Pantheon, 1953
 Guedon, Mary Scholz, Regionalist Art, London and Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1982
 Hadas, Moses, ed., The Basic Works of Cicero, New York: Modern Library, 1951
 Jackson, Halbrook, Dreamers of Dreams: The Rise and Fall of Nineteenth-Century Idealism, New York: Strauss, 1948; London: Faber and Faber, 1948
 Knapp, Bettina Liebowitz, Dream and Image, New York: Whitston, 1977
 Labarge, Margaret Wade, A Small Sound of the Trumpet, Boston: Beacon Press, 1986; London: H. Hamilton, 1986
 Levy, Julien, Surrealism, New York: Black Sun Press, 1936
 Lopez-Rey, José, Goya's Caprichos: Beauty, Reason and Caricature, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1953
 MacKenzie, Norman, Dreams and Dreaming, New York: Vanguard Press, 1965; London: Aldus, 1965
 Megroz, Rodolphe Louis, Dante Gabriel Rossetti: Painter Poet of Heaven in Earth, London: Faber and Gwyer, 1928; New York: Scribner's, 1929
 Miller, Patricia Cox, Dreams in Late Antiquity: Studies in the Imagination of a Culture, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994
 Panofsky, Erwin, Albrecht Dürer, London: Oxford University Press, 1943
 Powell, J. G. F., ed., Cicero: Laelius, On Friendship and the Dream of Scipio, London: Aris and Phillips, 1990
 Roberts, Helene E., "The Dream World of Dante Gabriel Rossetti," Victorian Studies 17:4 (June 1974)
 Rosenblum, Robert, Modern Painting and the Northern Romantic Tradition, London: Thames and Hudson, 1975; New York: Harper, 1975
 Sonstroem, David, Rossetti and the Fair Lady, Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1970
 Taylor, Joshua C., America as Art, New York and London: Harper, 1979
 Warner, Janet Adele, Blake and the Language of Art, Kingston, Ontario: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1984; Gloucester, England: A. Sutton, 1984
 Wood, Clement, Dreams: Their Meaning and Practical Application, New York: Greenberg, 1931

DRUNKENNESS/INTOXICATION

Beth S. Gersh-Nešić

The following iconographic narratives, genres, motifs, and periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Drunkenness/Intoxication:

EMBLEM	LAPITHS AND CENTAURS	EIGHTEENTH CENTURY:
DIONYSUS/BACCHUS	THE DRUNKENNESS	ENGLAND
SILENUS	OF NOAH	NINETEENTH CENTURY:
BACCHANALS AND RELATED	JUDITH AND HOLOFERNES	FRANCE
SUBJECTS	ANCIENT GREECE	ARTISTS AND ALCOHOL:
THE DRUNKENNESS OF	EARLY NETHERLANDISH	TWENTIETH-CENTURY
HERCULES	SEVENTEENTH CENTURY:	UNITED STATES
THE BLINDING OF	HOLLAND	ARTISTS AND ALCOHOL:
POLYPHEMUS		CHINA

Pablo Picasso, The Feast of the Fauns, 1957, lithograph, Harvard University Art Museums, gift of Meta and Paul J. Sachs. (Courtesy of the Harvard University Art Museums)

The act of drinking or offering a drink may refer to conviviality or taste, but a display of drunkenness or intoxication has typically been another matter entirely, as is apparent throughout its iconographic representations. A sixteenth-century emblem depicting a man serving wine to four young women explains:

*En un repas boire un coup, est louable:
Boire deux foyes, est besoing; troys, plaisir:
Quatre foyes boire, est fureur détestable:
Tout le surplus est honte et déplaisir.*

To drink one cup during a meal is praiseworthy,
to drink two is a need; three is for pleasure,
but to drink four cups is indeed detestable,
for all that excess is shameful and unpleasant.
(Henkel and Schöne, p. 272)

Some artists have agreed with this sort of virtue and conviction and illustrated drunkenness and intoxication to portray loose morals, weakness, and sin; others have treated the subject of drunkenness festively, humorously, or dramatically, depending on the context of the narrative or source. Images and stories produced by artists of both schools of thought and taken from Greek and Roman mythology, the Bible, morality tales, and direct observation will be examined and discussed.

Greek and Roman Mythology

The god of wine, known in Greece as Dionysus and in Rome as Bacchus, was delivered from the thigh of his father, Zeus/Jupiter, after his mother, Semele, perished in her lover's fiery embrace. Nursed by the nymphs of Nysa, Dionysus survived through fire and water, like the grapes and wine that were sacred to him (Ovid's Metamorphoses, 3:250–315).

Ancient Greek vase paintings of Dionysus initially characterized the god as a regal, mature, fully clothed, and bearded man—somewhat like Zeus—who demonstrated his love of pleasure with a kantharos (drinking horn) in one hand, a thyrsus (a symbol of fertility) in the other, and ivy as his crown (a symbol of his triumph over death). Often he was portrayed in repose, as on a mid-sixth-century black-figure kylix (540–535 B.C.) painted by Exekias where Dionysus lies on a boat entwined with grape vines and surrounded by the Tyrrhenian pirates he had transformed into dolphins (Hedreen, p. 67). On an early fifth-century red-figure stamnos (480–470 B.C.), Dionysus raises his arms jubilantly, a leopard skin tied around his neck, and a goat ripped apart in his hands, a reflection of the animal sacrifices made in his name. Curiously, these early Dionysian images did not display the drunkenness or sexual activity evident in his companions—the silenoi (half-human, half-beast with the hind legs, head, ears, and tail of a horse, and the shaggy hair and beards of a human), satyrs (a half-human, half-beast at first synonymous with silenoi, then later identified with the pastoral god Pan/Priapus, who had a beard and shaggy hair, as well as a goat's legs, ears, and tail), and maenads (frenzied women who were followers of Dionysus).

In the late fifth century, Dionysus's appearance changed from that of a fully clothed, mature man to that of a seminude youth. This Dionysus and his fellow revelers can be found on a red-figure hydria by the Meidias Painter (circa 400 B.C.) and again in a Roman wall painting in the Villa of the Mysteries at Pompeii, Italy (circa 50 B.C.), this time with his mortal wife, Ariadne. The late fifth century B.C. also saw an older version of the seminude Dionysus stamped on a Greek bronze coin (circa 460–420 B.C.). In this portrayal, Dionysus is an old, paunchy, bearded man who lumbers along on a donkey, his back toward the animal's head, his legs sprawled over the animal's rump in a state of inebriation. A similar older and drunken Dionysus can be found on a fourth-century B.C. gravestone for the Greek king Philip II (circa 330 B.C.), again seminude, this time embracing or leaning on Ariadne.

The younger and beardless Roman Bacchus influenced future depictions of the god in Italy, evidenced by a Roman wall painting in the Villa Dar Buch Ammera in Libya (early fifth century A.D.); Michelangelo's sculpture of a slightly drunken Bacchus (1496–1497); Titian's Bacchus and Ariadne (circa 1520–1522); Caravaggio's Bacchus (circa 1595); Annibale Carracci's The Triumph of Bacchus and Ariadne (1604); and Sandro Chia's Bacchus. In general, Bacchus represented a “passionate spirit” in stark contrast to Apollo, who represented sobriety and reason (Hall, p. 37).

The handsome and graceful image of Dionysus was not exclusively or universally repeated. In Germany, Hans Baldung Grien created a chubby, boyish god for his engraving Drunken Bacchus with Putti (circa 1517); in the Netherlands, Jacob Jordaens invented a middle-aged bearded god with Christlike features for his The Triumph of Bacchus (1635–1640); and in Spain, Diego Velázquez portrayed his Los Borrachos (circa 1629, Bacchus Among the Peasants) as a dark-haired, slightly flabby, coarse-featured teenager amid equally unidealized, seventeenth-century country bumpkins.

Velázquez's contemporary, Jusepe de Ribera, painted an older, ponderous Dionysos/Bacchus (circa 1635), whose gray beard and clothing resemble those of the philosophers and apostles of Renaissance and Baroque art. Ribera's composition and concept of Bacchus resemble the Teoxenia engraved in Antoine LaFréry's Speculum Romanae Magnificentiae (1549), which was itself a copy with some variations of a Roman relief (Darby, p. 140). The decision to paint Dionysos/Bacchus in Ribera's case may be linked to his patron, King Philip IV of Spain, who may have considered himself a successor to Bacchus. According to art historian Delphine Fitz Darby, Rodrigo Caro's 1634 book on the history of the city of Seville describes how Dionysus/Bacchus founded Bética (the ancient name for Cádiz) and ruled until his companion, Pan, took over as regent. The region became known as Pania (Hispania), hence the connection to the Spanish throne (Darby, pp. 146–147).

The god Silenus, a principle companion and mentor for Dionysus, was a lighthearted, chubby old man whose wisdom could spill forth under the influence of wine. Most often, Silenus is shown riding his donkey or reveling among the sileni or satyrs. The earliest known depiction of Silenus appears on a sixth-century Lakonian cup, on which an inscription identifies the figure. He is represented as having an erect penis, with an equine tail and ears, and a shaggy beard. Silenus stands next to a man with a wineskin, indicating that the god had been captured in the only way possible: with an offer of plenty of wine. In later renderings of the god, Silenus's equine features disappear (Carpenter, pp. 76–77).

In literature, Silenus is best known for his part in Euripides' satyr play Cyclops (circa 400 B.C.). The humorous story begins with Silenus and his fellow sileni/satyrs captured and enslaved by Polyphemus, the Cyclops. The legendary Greek king Odysseus arrives with his men and together with Silenus they ply the Cyclops with wine until he is drunk. Then Odysseus blinds Polyphemus with a red-hot wooden pole.

In another story recounted by Ovid in Metamorphoses, Silenus is found by the legendary King Midas, a follower of Bacchus who knew of their pleasure-loving ways. King Midas feted Silenus for 10 days and then returned him to Bacchus. Happy to see his foster father, Bacchus offered King Midas anything he desired. King Midas asked for the touch of gold, which caused his food to become inedible. Regretful, Midas went to Bacchus to retract his request. In Nicolas Poussin's King Midas Before Bacchus (before 1627), the artist depicts a youthful nude Bacchus, a nude Silenus asleep at his side, King Midas down on one knee, revelers in the background, a putti playing with a goat (which was associated with the worship of Bacchus and lust), and a maenad and putto apparently passed out from too much wine.

Although classical literature presents Silenus as wise, in art history he has been associated with evil, gentleness, and foolishness. For example, in Nicola Pisano's Last Judgment (1263), a pulpit relief in Siena, Italy, a child wearing a Silenus mask appears among the fallen, a demon now devouring a damned soul (Barasch, p. 18). In Andrea Mantegna's engraving Bacchanal with Silenus (early 1470s), Silenus seems to signify gluttony among lust as the hairy satyrs carry his portly body aloft. In the engraving Silenus with a Group of Children (circa 1490), he seems gentle and kind, like a fat, nude Santa Claus, as he overlooks a group of cherubs preparing and serving him wine. In Piero di Cosimo's Discovery of Wine (circa 1500), a besotted, jolly Silenus arrives on his donkey while nymphs and satyrs rejoice around a tree that harbors bee hives. In the pendant piece, The Misfortunes of Silenus (circa 1500), the god falls off his donkey while reaching for the honey in the tree, a broken tree branch broken in his hand from the enormous weight of his fall. On the right side of the work, the maenad and satyrs have begun to help him up, amused by his awkward position; on the left side, nymphs administer mud packs to the bee stings he received. Most unusual of all, Giulio Romano's Drunken Silenus Put to Bed by Nymphs and Satyrs (circa 1527) portrays a sad old man in a toga, rather than in the nude, a man somewhat frail or vulnerable in demeanor. In this rendering, Silenus looks like a philosopher or prophet.

Annibale Carracci created two different types of Silenus, both with equine ears. In Bacchus and Silenus (circa 1599), Silenus appears somewhat youthful and hefty, rather than chubby, and sits on the ground next to an adolescent, pipe-playing Bacchus. In Silenus Gathering Grapes (circa 1599), he is perhaps the same age or older than in the previous rendering, rounder, and held aloft on an animal skin by two spirited men. In Carracci's Drunken Silenus (circa 1599), a series of sketches and engravings for a silver cup and basket, an older and fatter Silenus lies beneath a bower while a Silenus and satyr fill his mouth with wine from a wineskin.

Peter Paul Rubens and Anthony Van Dyck, teacher and student, presented Silenus in two different lights. Rubens's dark-haired Drunken Silenus (1618) is troubling, the god portrayed staggering about in a lascivious crowd of maenads, satyrs, and putti. Much more amusing is the white-haired Silenus in The Triumph of Silenus (circa 1620) encircled by a merry company. Disdainful of the old mythological lush, Van Dyck thrust the weighty, flabby body of Silenus toward the spectator in both of his Drunken Silenus paintings (circa 1618 and 1620, respectively), causing both the revelers who support the falling drunk, as well as the viewer of the painting itself, to recoil at such a pathetic sight.

Ribera painted a reclining Drunken Silenus (1627) and engraved a similar picture in 1629 in which the bloated Silenus lifts his cup high while one of his attending satyrs pours. Darby has claimed that Ribera meant to scorn idleness by portraying a Silenus who is “. . . losing his shape and sex and strength of limb, [and] lies on his belly like the tortoise and the snake [alongside him] while the goat-men speed his degradation and the cynical ass utters those aspirates that are universally recognized as a cry of derision” (p. 148).

Honoré Daumier drew The Drunkenness of Silenus in 1850, probably influenced by Titian's Triumph of Silenus (which was available in an etching and engraving by Nicolas Delaunay the Elder in 1777) and Théodore Géricault's drawing of The Triumph of Silenus (circa 1816), which was at that time in Paris. Art historians T. J. Clark and B. Laughton believe that Daumier's Silenus looks so particularized that he probably is a caricature of an individual, such as Dr. Véron, the publisher of the newspaper Constitutional and a frequent target of Daumier's satire at the time (Ives et al., p. 106).

While Daumier's Silenus seemed slightly sinister, Jules Dalou's sculpture The Triumph of Silenus (1885) was considered obscene. Purchased by the French government and placed in the Luxembourg Gardens in Paris, the work consists of an old, naked Silenus teetering atop his donkey, fellow revelers on either side. With legs astride, his torso leaning back, and his penis thrust forward, this Silenus shocked Parisian mothers who requested the immediate removal of the sculpture from the gardens (Le Normand, p. 166).

A Silenus with ivy wreathed around his loins stumbles along a country path in Lovis Corinth's Homewardbound Bacchantes (1898). The god is depicted as a portly old drunk staggering along in the company of two young nude maenads and two satyrs. Lost in his stupor, Silenus may be at the end of both his journey home after a festive night as well as his life, so strong is Corinth's contrast between tired old age and youthful exuberance.

Bacchanals and Related Subjects

In the Barberini Faun (circa 220 B.C.), a satyr sleeps off his fill of wine and sexual pleasure. His head is crooked, an allusion to his previous drunken state, and his legs are splayed in a suggestive pose. The satyr epitomizes everything that they and the sileni and maenads symbolized for ancient Greeks and subsequent generations: vulgarity, eroticism, intemperance, and barbarism. The sileni, satyrs/fauns, maenads, and nymphs are creatures often depicted in the company of Dionysus/Bacchus, and sometimes on their own, engaged in orgies known as bacchanals or bacchanalia.

In many sixth-century vase paintings, the sileni and satyrs became one and the same. Looking more like men than centaurs, these creatures had equine ears and tails, shaggy hair and beards, and prodigious phalli, evidence of their hearty sexual appetite. They were usually shown drunk, dancing, playing musical instruments, preparing wine, or in the act of sexual conquest. On a black-figure Attic vase by the Amasis Painter (circa 530 B.C.), sileni/satyrs prepare wine on one side of the vase and imbibe with Dionysus on the other side. Another black-figure Attic vase in Boston's Museum of Fine Arts (circa 520 B.C.) shows tiny sileni/satyrs climbing grapevines surrounding a giant Dionysus, who raises a kantharos to his lips.

Guy Hedreen's book Silens in Attic Black-Figure Vase Painting (1992) points out that some sileni/satyr scenes do not come from a particular literary text but rather from performances of satyr plays or spectacles. Thus, the physical appearance of the sileni/satyrs on the vases may correspond to the costumes and dances of the period (p. 128).

Maenads (bacchantes or Bacchae) were women who shared the satyrs' love of wine and sexual abandon. On a vase by the Kleophrades Painter (circa 500–490 B.C.), a satyr plays his pipes while a maenad lifts her head, opens her mouth to shout, and shakes her phallic thyrsus. Her actions are ecstatic and sexually charged; she appears to be drunk on wine and sexual gratification.

In general, sileni, satyrs, and maenads represent the wild side of human nature, the reciprocal of reason and discipline. During the Italian Renaissance, satyrs were associated with evil and lust (Kaufmann, p. 81), as in Andrea Mantegna's engraving Bacchanal with a Wine Vat (early 1470s), which shows satyrs, putti, and revelers drinking or passed out around a large wine vat. A pendant to Mantegna's Bacchanal with Silenus, Bacchanal with a Wine Vat presents these revelers in a darker light, suggesting a nocturnal setting and a corrupt atmosphere.

Titian's Bacchanal (1523–1525), set on the sunny and dreamy island of Andros, depicts the jubilation of drunken abandon. Based on Philostratus's description of a mythical place where drinking, lovemaking, and singing songs in praise of wine are a way of life, the inhabitants of Andros examine, imbibe, urinate, and sleep off the wine, while Dionysus's ship remains moored in the misty background. To reinforce the focus on wine and drinking, Titian placed a sheet of music in the foreground upon which a French drinking song is written: "Chi boyt et ne reboyt / Il ne scet que boyre soit" (He who drinks and does not drink again / Does not know what drinking is) (Panofsky, p. 100).

Inspired by Titian's Bacchanal, which was then in Ferrara, Italy, Poussin painted his own series of bacchanals and narratives about Bacchus's life. Among these works are The Andrians (early 1630s), The Triumph of Silenus (1635–1636), and Bacchanal Before a Herm (1635–1640)—all of which display the joyous side of excessive drinking. Centuries later during World War II, Pablo Picasso, inspired by Poussin's Triumph of Pan (1638), painted a riotous Bacchanal as Paris was being liberated from Nazi occupation. A second Picasso lithograph on this theme, entitled Feast of the Fauns (1957), has four revelers playing instruments and dancing, two clapping, and two sleeping off too much wine.

The Drunkenness of Hercules

Early depictions of a drunken Hercules, the mythical Greek hero, often appear in Dionysian scenes on Roman sarcophagi, such as two from the second century A.D. and one from the third century A.D. Rubens may have been familiar with these sarcophagi (Huemer, p. 566). He certainly knew of a relief, now known from a 1779 engraving, where a besotted Hercules leans against a satyr and what appears to be a man (Stechow, p. 34). In Rubens's Drunken Hercules (1604), the mythological hero leans on the shoulders of a female and male satyr while a maenad dances behind and a satyr and putto walk alongside.

A singular purpose or meaning behind Rubens's Drunken Hercules is not clear. We know that this painting and The Virtuous Hero Crowned (circa 1611) belonged to the Dresden Art Gallery in Germany in 1905 (Rosenberg). More recently, however, art historian Kerry Downes traced the latter work's origins to a collection in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany. Downes suggests that the two works are pendants but cannot account for the literary subject in The Virtuous Hero Crowned (Downes, p. 28). Perhaps as pendants the paintings were meant to portray Hercules at the crossroads, a fable invented by the Greek philosopher Prodicus and set down by Xenophon in Memorabilia (circa 400 B.C., Memoires of Socrates) (Hall, p. 152). The Prodicus fable describes how Hercules was forced to choose between the symbolic characters of Virtue and Vice: Virtue who offered fame, and Vice who offered a life of debauchery.

In Rubens's The Virtuous Hero Crowned, a knight—perhaps Hercules—is crowned with laurels by a nude winged woman personifying victory. The hero treads upon Silenus, who lies beneath a snake: an attribute for a follower of Dionysus/Bacchus and a symbol of evil. On the knight's right side, a nude Venus (the Roman goddess of love), a maenad, and a putto look on, apparently spurned by this pure-hearted fellow. If this hero is indeed Hercules, this panel shows him defeating Vice by choosing Virtue. In Drunken Hercules, Hercules seems to have chosen Vice, as he is captured leaning on two satyrs who could be said to represent Gluttony and Lust.

The Blinding of Polyphemus

The defeat of the Cyclops Polyphemus was accomplished by Odysseus and his men with wine and a wooden pole to the giant's eye. In Euripides' late fifth-century play Cyclops, Silenus and his fellow satyrs are prisoners on Polyphemus's island. Odysseus arrives, and he and Silenus proceed to get Polyphemus drunk, whereupon Polyphemus drags Silenus to his bed. The opportunity is right, and Odysseus pierces the Cyclops's eye with a red-hot wooden pole. In Homer's earlier version, told in The Odyssey (circa 720 B.C.), Odysseus and his warriors act in unison to blind the drunken monster. The Blinding of Polyphemus (circa 675–650 B.C.) is featured on the neck of the Eleusis Amphora vase and in a Hellenistic sculpture group (late first century B.C.) found in Sperlonga, outside of Rome.

Lapiths and Centaurs

To fifth-century B.C. Athenians, the battle of the human Lapiths and the beastly centaurs represented the triumph of civilization over barbarism, reason over irrationality, order over chaos, as well as the Athenian victory over the Persians (Pollitt, pp. 81–82). Whether painted on a kylix interior by the Foundry Painter (circa 490–480 B.C.), sculpted for the pediment of the Temple to Zeus at Olympia, Greece (465–457 B.C.), or as the metopes for the Parthenon (447–443 B.C.), the significance of the Lapiths defeating the drunken, vulgar centaurs remained the same. The battle takes place at the wedding of the Lapith king, Pirithous, to Hippodamia. At the height of the celebration, a drunken centaur named Eurytus tries to abduct the bride, throwing the whole party into a violent rage (Ovid's Metamorphoses, 12:210–535). During the Renaissance, the theme's popularity and significance was renewed, evidenced by Piero di Cosimo's and Michelangelo's interpretations.

The Drunkenness of Noah

The story of Noah appears in several medieval and Renaissance examples: the fifth- or sixth-century Cotton Genesis manuscript; the twelfth-century mosaics in the nave of Monreale Cathedral in Sicily (circa 1183); the thirteenth-century mosaics in San Marco Basilica in Venice, Italy; the late fourteenth- and fifteenth-century frescos executed by Pietro di Puccio d'Orvieto and Benozzo Gozzoli in the Campo Santo in Pisa, Italy; a fifteenth-century painting by Paolo Uccello in Sta. Maria Novella in Florence, Italy; Lorenzo Ghiberti's fifteenth-century reliefs on the Baptistry in Florence; Jacopo della Quercia's fifteenth-century relief in Bologna, Italy; Michelangelo's early sixteenth-century frescos in the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican; Bernardino Luini's sixteenth-century painting in the Pinacoteca di Brera in Milan, Italy; and Antonio Zanchi's seventeenth-century painting, now in a private collection.

Benozzo Gozzoli's Drunkenness of Noah (1469) typifies most artistic interpretations of this narrative. On the left side of the fresco, Noah cultivates his vineyards; in the middle he drinks the wine produced from his grapes; and on the right side, having fallen asleep drunk, Noah lies naked in his tent where his youngest son, Ham, sees his father naked. Ham tells his brothers, Shem and Japheth, what he has seen. Shem and Japheth avert their eyes and cover their father's nakedness (Genesis, 9:20–23). In most representations of the story, all the personages are clothed except for the drunken Noah, except in Michelangelo's fresco The Drunkenness of Noah (1508–1512), in which all of the sons are nude beneath their capes as they stand over the uncovered Noah.

Interpretations of the significance of Noah's drunkenness vary. Don Cameron Allen, in his book The Legend of Noah: Renaissance Rationalism in Art, Science and Letters (1949), points out that the attitude toward the Noah story shifts over time from a medieval symbol of salvation, to a Renaissance commentary that emphasizes the loss of human life through the power of an angry God (portrayed best in Michelangelo's Sistine version) (Allen, p. 173). Both Allen and art historian Charles de Tolnay agree that in Michelangelo's fresco, the healthy, muscular bodies of the sons are in contrast to the old withered flesh of Noah, and thus refer to a confrontation between youth and old age (Allen, p. 173; de Tolnay, 2:25). Robert S. Liebert, in his Michelangelo: A Psychoanalytic Study of His Life and Images (1983), extended this observation to a personal level, suggesting that the confrontation between the sons and a fallen father reflected the artist's feelings about his own father's weakness and failures (pp. 40–41).

Liebert and iconographer James Hall also refer to the Christian interpretation of Noah's drunkenness. Noah's salvation prefigures the resurrection of Christ, and the scene between the father and his sons, who cover him in shame, can also be understood as the sons' derision, which prefigures the mocking of Christ by humankind (his "children"). A cup or jug, as in Antonio Zanchi's Drunken Noah (1697), left beside the slumbering Noah prefigures the wine of the Eucharist (Liebert, p. 41; Hall, p. 225).

In rabbinical commentary, Ham castrates Noah, reminiscent of the castration of Uranus by his son Cronus/Saturn in classical mythology. In The Drunkenness of Noah (1974), Hirsch H. Cohen pursues the sexual overtones of this interpretation by relating the biblical story to the east Mediterranean belief that wine creates sexual potency (i.e., Dionysus and his companions). To support his thesis, Cohen cites the passage in the Bible following the flood and before Noah cultivates the land, where God beseeches Noah to repopulate the Earth (Genesis 9:7). This passage calls into play Noah's sexuality and potency. Cohen then explains the word tent in the text may be translated as "her tent," and we may infer that Noah was found in his wife's tent. When Ham finds his father drunk and "uncovered," he is confronted with his father's sexuality, and he has looked at his father's potency or power. It was believed then that the act of looking brought about acquisition. The text (and perhaps iconography) is about the brothers' witnessing Ham's acquisition of power through beholding his father's penis (or what rabbinical commentary has interpreted as removing the penis). However, the acquisition of the power is denied. For, when Noah wakes and hears about what has happened, he curses Ham by condemning Ham's son, Canaan, to servitude among his brethren, nullifying what Ham might have acquired through sight (Cohen, pp. 1–30).

Judith and Holofernes

Wine, sex, and murder contribute to an act of heroism in The Book of Judith, a part of the Apocrypha written during the second century B.C. (Garrard, p. 281). In this story, the victim, rather than the hero or heroine, becomes drunk and loses his power and his life as a result.

The story begins with Judith, a Jewish widow, who takes it upon herself to end the war between her town, Bethulia, and the Assyrians. To accomplish her mission, Judith dresses in her finest clothes and goes to the Assyrian camp with her maid, Abra. Dazzling the guards with her beauty, she tells them that she has come to help Holofernes, the Assyrian general. She meets Holofernes, charms him with wine and the promise of herself until he becomes so drunk he falls asleep on his bed. Once he is asleep, Judith seizes the opportunity and beheads him with his own sword. Devastated over the loss of their leader, the army loses its purpose and decides to surrender.

In most representations, the assassination has already taken place, and Judith holds the head of Holofernes like a trophy, or a saint's attribute. However, in a few examples, such as the Bible of Charles the Bald (circa A.D. 879), Caravaggio's Judith Beheading Holofernes (1598–1599), and Artemisia Gentileschi's Judith Beheading Holofernes (circa 1612–1613), the deed takes place before the viewer's eyes. In the Bible of Charles the Bald, Holofernes continues to sleep as Judith cuts off his head, but in Caravaggio's and Gentileschi's paintings, his bloodshot eyes are wide open, conveying a last moment of terror as the sword slices through his neck. Although Judith achieved her goals through wine, seduction, and deception, within a Christian context she is considered a prefiguration of the Virgin in her triumph over the Devil (Garrard, p. 292).

Ancient Greece

Moderation was the credo of Hellenic culture but not necessarily the practice of its people. Thus, drinking vessels featured Dionysus and humorous bacchanals in order to celebrate the joys of drinking and the consequences of drinking too much. The Brygos Painter seems to admonish young drinkers in a beautifully rendered red-figure vase painting (circa 490 B.C.) that portrays a scene between a young man and young woman in which both are standing. The young man leans on a staff and seems to be vomiting from too much wine while the young woman holds his head. The delineation of the figures and the subject itself are as fresh and relevant as they were when they were created.

A sculpture of a drunken old woman sitting with a wine bottle in her lap was created during the Hellenistic period, when realism came into vogue, around the late second to early first century B.C. The purpose behind the production of this particular piece is still a matter of conjecture. Art historian and archaeologist Jerome Jordan Pollitt points out in his Art and Experience in Classical Greece (1972) that such rustic characters probably come from the Roman period and may have been “used to create a fanciful, illusionistic rural atmosphere in villas or baths” (p. 144) or “were connected with rustic festivals like the Lagynophoria at Alexandria” (p. 146).

Early Netherlandish

In his book Hieronymus Bosch (1973), Walter W. Gibson relates two Bosch works, Ship of Fools and Intemperance (both circa 1495), to an adage by the Roman playwright Terence, “Sine Cerere et Libero friget Venus” (Without Ceres and Bacchus, Venus freezes) (p. 46). Gibson notes: “that Gluttony and drunkenness lead to Lust was a lesson that the moralizers never tired of driving home to their audiences” (ibid.). Bosch was just such a moralizer, one who frequently drew upon contemporary sermons and didactic literature for his images (p. 7).

Art historian Charles D. Cuttler links Ship of Fools to Sebastian Brant's poem Das Narrenschiff (1494, The Ship of Fools), which was translated into Latin (1497), French (1498), and Flemish (1500)—any of which Bosch might have read (Cuttler, p. 172). Gibson also credits the popular medieval concept of the “ship of the church” that guided Christian souls to the “port of heaven” and the “ship of religion” featured in Guillaume de Deguileville's fourteenth-century poem Pilgrimage of the Life of Man as relevant to this painting (p. 41).

In Ship of Fools, Bosch crowds a merry company of two nuns, one monk, several peasants, and a fool into a small vessel. The fool is perched above the rest of the figures in the branches of a barren tree that serves as the vessel's rudder—the mast of the ship is a live tree rich in foliage. One nun strums a lute (a symbol of love) and sings. The monk sits opposite her and appears to be singing as he bobs for a pancake that hangs between them. The pancake hangs over a board upon which we see a drinking cup and a bowl of cherries. Next to the board a metal wine jug dangles, its strap held by a nearby peasant. The other nun leans toward him and gestures toward the metal jug with one hand while she holds a carafe in the other. This man and woman also exchange a glance of, perhaps, amorous intention. (Gibson points out that a similar wine jug and plate of cherries appear in the “Lust” portion of Bosch's Retable [p. 41]). In the water, one swimmer clutches at the hull and another swimmer reaches up with a bowl or cup. Meanwhile, a member of the party on board has ascended the mast and is about to cut down a roasted fowl tied to the tree's branches, as an owl (a symbol of foolishness or stupidity during this period) oversees the festivities from the uppermost branches.

Bosch's Intemperance also features drinking, food, and lust. In this work, a clothed fellow sits astride a wine barrel while four swimmers gather around his vessel. One swimmer lifts his cup to the spigot, which releases the barrel's contents. A fifth swimmer passes by with a meat pie on his head. To the right a couple drink and stare into each other's eyes as they sit inside a tent.

Gibson and other art historians explain that these two paintings portray two of the Seven Deadly Sins: gluttony and lust. Thus, they may be part of a larger program. According to compelling evidence published by art historians Lotte Brand Philip, Charles Seymour, and Anne M. Morganstern, The Ship of Fools and Intemperance were probably two halves of one panel (with the former on the top and the latter on the bottom), a panel that was probably part of an altarpiece (Morganstern).

A similar spirit of folly and moralizing occurs in Combat Between Carnival and Lent (1559) by Pieter Bruegel the Elder. More ambitious in its depiction of a town square and its people on Fat Tuesday, it too includes a stout fellow “riding” a barrel of wine, here with a skewer full of meat pies lifted like a knight's lance, ready for battle. Close by, aimed toward the stout fellow, a slender priest brandishes a shovel full of fish. Together they symbolize the license and limitations of the Lenten season.

Seventeenth Century: Holland

Seventeenth-century Dutch paintings of ordinary life called attention to moral issues as Bosch and Bruegel paintings did so many years before. Tavern scenes painted by Adriaen Brouwer and Adriaen van Ostade in the 1630s show peasants drinking and brawling in an effort to moralize about gluttony, and Jan Steen's Tavern Scene (mid-1660s) dramatizes the correlation between gluttony and lust.

In Steen's painting, a young well-dressed woman sits in the center of a tavern as an older man, sitting at her side, offers her a glass of wine. Judging by her ungainly posture, her legs spread open beneath her skirt, she has already had plenty to drink and is ready to accept the advances of the man. Her hand is out and open, palm up, indicating that she expects payment for her favors, and on the ground before her are broken eggshells, perhaps a symbol of her easy virtue (eggs were then considered an aphrodisiac and a symbol for the female gender).

An egg accompanied by wine and oysters (two other aphrodisiacs) appear on a table prepared before another amorous client in Hendrik Gerritsz Pot's painting Scene in a Bordello (early 1630s). The moral here may be of a vanitas (vanity) theme. In this painting an old procuress receives payment for the young prostitute as the client looks on. The vanitas theme may be understood through the juxtaposition of youth and old age.

Eighteenth Century: England

William Hogarth also associated gluttony with lust in The Orgy, scene III of The Rake's Progress, executed in oil in 1734 and in print in 1735. The Rake's Progress, a morality play told in eight etchings, focuses on T. Rakewell, Esq., who inherits the wealth of a rich old man, squanders everything, marries an older woman, squanders her money too, and then ends up in jail.

The Orgy shows a very drunk Rakewell sitting at a table surrounded by prostitutes and clients in a brothel. As the Rake wallows in his inebriation, two prostitutes surreptitiously pick his pockets. In the foreground, a woman prepares to dance while, on the left side, a servant holds a platter with a candle in front of it. Hogarth's interpreter Ronald Paulson explains in The Art of Hogarth (1975):

. . . with the dancing girl and the platter, on which she will dance, the beheaded portraits [on the wall] suggest the iconography of Salomé and the platter on which John the Baptist's head was served up. The Rake, in this scene, is going to be both Herod, for whom she dances, and John, whose head she serves up. He is still the judge of the Judgment of Paris (on the wall in [scene] 2) and Nero; but he is also being cheated, robbed, gulled, and literally 'burnt up' (like the 'totus mundus' the whore is setting afire) by the syphilis he will catch from the whores" (p. 105).

Nineteenth Century: France

In nineteenth-century Paris, the sight of an absinthe drinker seemed to symbolize all the ills of modern urbanization: alienation, dehumanization, and escapism. This potent anise-flavored drink, made with wormwood, aggressively attacked the nervous system and eventually produced dementia. Because of its deleterious effects, absinthe was eventually banned in France and other countries, but its significance has not been forgotten. Unlike wine or beer, which were associated with conviviality and sexual encounters, absinthe was a drink associated with losers, loners, and the lonely because the liquor worked at separating the drinker from his immediate world.

In 1863 Daumier produced a lithograph entitled L'Absinthe, ça vous remonte un homme (Absinthe, It Makes You a Man), which features two men at a cafe table set against a room full of customers. The man on the left side of the table leans forward, eyes half-closed, mouth slackened, demonstrating the full effects of an absinthe stupor, while his cafe partner sits erect, puffing on his pipe with arms crossed in front of a pitcher and glass of beer. The contrast between the two characters—one who retreats into oblivion and one who remains in control—underscores the artist's sarcastic title and warns against the ill effects of absinthe addiction.

In a less narrative mode, Édouard Manet isolates his Absinthe Drinker (1859) with a solid dark background. He is the ragpicker Colardet dressed in his usual eccentric fashion. His enormous black top hat nearly obscures his eyes, and his cape is wrapped around his torso like a serape. He sits on a stone wall or parapet all alone with an empty bottle lying at his feet and a glass of absinthe on the wall beside him. The absinthe, the "green goddess," glows in the darkness of the painting like a ghostly apparition.

Also moralizing, Edgar Degas places a man and a woman at a table across the room from the spectator in his Glass of Absinthe (1876). The woman, at the center of the composition, is the model Ellen Andrée, and the man, squeezed into the right side of the canvas, is the artist Marcellin Desboutin. They sit side by side as he stares wearily into space and she looks down into her glass of absinthe, lost in a drunken stupor. Their isolation from each other, which seems full of despair and estrangement, turns this unremarkable candid moment into a haunting and disturbing image.

Artists and Alcohol: Twentieth-Century United States

In the midst of the cubist epoch, when painting itself seemed "drunk" with its own expressionism, Marc Chagall drew The Drunkard (1911), an ink and gouache of a young man sitting at a square table with his head falling nearly upside down from his neck. In his right hand a cup is displaying the truncated Russian words na zdorovye (to health); in his left hand is a cigarette or cigar; and lying on the table is a bottle that spills its contents in a well-executed meander. Here everything is oddly positioned, tipped in strange directions—literally "tipsy"—especially the sharp angle of the table, all of which cause the viewer to feel kinesthetically the effects of too much alcohol.

That same year, Chagall produced another gouache also entitled The Drunkard, this of a seated, decapitated imbibor buttoning his jacket with his right hand and holding a knife in his left. His torso seems to fall away from his floating head, the mouth open in anticipation of the green bottle below its lips. A bowl of fruit and one tiny fish lie on the table, and an upside down painting of a red donkey hangs on the background wall. The mustard yellow of the head, body, table, and wall unify the composition and add an offbeat playfulness to the protosurrealist atmosphere. Ten years later, Chagall's oil painting The Drunkard (1921) also depicted a seated decapitated drinker fingering a jacket button and holding a knife, although in this version the bowl on the table holds a two-headed bird. And while the little fish remains, the picture of a donkey has disappeared.

Most artists portray someone other than themselves as a drunk, but in Elizabeth Murray's Undoing (1989–1990), the artist refers to her own problem with alcoholism (Wadsworth, p. 37). Made of three overlapping sheets of paper centered around a hole, Murray creates a vortex of serpentine lines formed from the liquid flowing out of two floating bottles and some oddly floating cords (which some critics have seen as umbilical cords). One hand and two kicking legs emerge from the dark green and brown background. The peculiar angle of the feet and the irregular meander of the serpentine cords create a dizzying effect, like a state of intoxication. One bottle pours its contents toward the central hole, leading the viewer's eye to what may be a mouth, drain, or abyss. In Chagall and Murray's work, the spirit of playfulness counterbalances references to self-destruction: in Chagall's two later versions of The Drunkard the figure holds a knife, and in Murray's Undoing all forms center around one dark emptiness.

With the rise of the study of psychology during the twentieth century, the artist's response to drunkenness shifted from ridicule or condemnation to analysis and, in some cases, introspection. Certainly, Murray's Undoing is a testimony to the latter, and such films as The Lost Weekend (1945), Days of Wine and Roses (1962), and Leaving Las Vegas (1995) reflect the former, providing a more sympathetic view of alcoholism that remains, nevertheless, moralistic.

Artists and Alcohol: China

In China, poets and painters responded differently to the drunken character. Yi Ch'ang-Wu, a Ming Dynasty artist, painted A Drunkard of a poet who staggers along in an inebriated oblivion as he leans his portly body on a friend. Chiang Yee, in The Chinese Eye: An Interpretation of Chinese Painting (1936), explains, "There is an atmosphere of past glory, as if at any moment the scene might become terrestrial and sordid,—that which had just now been rich in poetry, music and joy" (p. 123). The poet Li Po, a legendary drunk, may have been an inspiration for this work.

Tao-Chi, an artist from the Ch'ing Dynasty, painted Drunk in Autumn Woods during the late seventeenth to early eighteenth century. The tiny figures lost in the multiple tiers of trees, grass, and streams that lead to misty mountains bring to mind a poem by the twelfth-century poet Yang Wan-li entitled "On a Portrait of Myself":

The pure wind makes me chant poems.
The bright moon urges me to drink.
Intoxicated, I fall among the flowers, heaven my blanket, earth my pillow.

In both Tao-Chi's painting and Yang Wan-li's poem, a reference to drunkenness in nature evokes a sense of pleasure and peace.

See also Bacchanalia/Orgy; Ecstasy

Selected Works of Art

Emblem

A Goblet Reached for Many Times, illustration in La Morosophie, by Gillaume de la Perrire, 1553

Dionysus/Bacchus

Exekias, The Voyage of Dionysos, black-figure kylix, 540–535 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen

The Dance of Dionysus, Greek red-figure stamos, 480–470 B.C., London, British Museum

Meidias Painter, Dionysus Surrounded by Members of His Entourage, red-figure hydria, circa 400 B.C., Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Dionysus Riding a Donkey, Greek bronze coin, circa 460–420 B.C., Athens, Greece, Numismatic Museum

Dionysus and Ariadne, Hellenic sculpture for the grave of Philip II, circa 330 B.C., Thessaloniki, Archaeological Museum

Bacchus on a Panther, wall painting from Villa Dar Buch Ammera, early fifth century A.D., Tripoli, Libya Museum
Michelangelo, Bacchus, sculpture, 1496–1497, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale

Titian, Bacchus and Ariadne, 1520–1522, London, National Gallery

Caravaggio, Bacchus, circa 1595, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Carracci, Annibale, The Triumph of Bacchus and Ariadne, fresco, 1604, Rome, Palazzo Farnese

Carracci, Annibale, The Triumph of Bacchus and Ariadne, circa 1604, Vienna, Austria, Graphische Sammlung Albertina

Chia, Sandro, Bacchus, sculpture, Fessenburg-Offenburg, Germany, State Park

Baldung Grien, Hans, Drunken Bacchus with Putti, pen and ink drawing, circa 1517, Berlin, Kupferstichkabinett Sammlung der Zeichnungen und Druckgraphik

Jordaens, Jacob, The Triumph of Bacchus, 1635–1640, Kassel, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen

Velázquez, Diego, Bacchus Among the Peasants, circa 1629, Madrid, Prado

Ribera, Jusepe de, Dionysos/Bacchus, circa 1635, Madrid, Prado

Triumph of Bacchus, copy after a lost painting by Jusepe de Ribera, London, John Cooper Collection

Silenus

Poussin, Nicolas, King Midas Before Bacchus, before 1627, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen

Pisano, Nicola, Last Judgment, relief on pulpit, 1263, Siena, Italy, Duomo

Mantegna, Andrea, Bacchanal with Silenus, engraving and drypoint, early 1470s, Duke of Devonshire and the Chatsworth Settlement Trustees

Silenus with a Group of Children, engraving, circa 1490, London, British Museum

Brescia, Giovanni Antonio da, Silenus with a Group of Children, circa 1500–1504, Vienna, Austria, Graphische Sammlung Albertina

Romano, Giulio, Drunken Silenus Put to Bed by Nymphs and Satyrs, circa 1527, Mantua, Palazzo de Te, Sala delle Metamorfosi

Carracci, Annibale, Bacchus and Silenus, circa 1599, London, National Gallery

Carracci, Annibale, Silenus Gathering Grapes, circa 1599, London, National Gallery

Carracci, Annibale, Drunken Silenus (Tazza Farnese), circa 1599, Naples, Italy, Museo e Gallerie Nazionali de Capodimonte

Carracci, Annibale, study for Tazza Farnese, drawing, circa 1599, London, British Museum

Carracci, Annibale, Drunken Silenus (Paniere Farnese), engraving on silver by Francesco Villamena, circa 1599, Naples, Italy, Museo e Gallerie Nazionali de Capodimonte

Carracci, Annibale, study for Paniere Farnese, drawing, circa 1599, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Rubens, Peter Paul, Drunken Silenus, 1618, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Van Dyck, Anthony, Drunken Silenus, circa 1618, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique

Rubens, Peter Paul, Studio of, The Triumph of Silenus, circa 1620, London, National Gallery

Van Dyck, Anthony, Drunken Silenus, circa 1620, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Ribera, Jusepe de, The Drunken Silenus, 1627, Naples, Italy, Museo e Galleria Nazionali de Capodimonte

Ribera, Jusepe de, The Drunken Silenus, engraving, 1629, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art

Delaunay, Nicolas the Elder, The Triumph of Silenus, etching and engraving, 1777, Frankfurt am Main, Germany, Städtisches Kunstinstitut und Städtische Galerie

Géricault, Théodore, The Triumph of Silenus, drawing, circa 1816–1817, Orléans, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Daumier, Honoré, The Drunkenness of Silenus, drawing, 1850, Alençon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts et de la Dentelle

Dalou, Jules, The Triumph of Silenus, sculpture, 1885, Paris, Luxembourg Gardens

Corinth, Lovis, Homewardbound Bacchantes, 1898, Wuppertal, Germany, Von der Heydt-Museum

Bacchanals and Related Subjects

Barberini Faun, circa 220 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen

Amasis Painter, Silenus Preparing Wine, black-figure amphora, circa 530 B.C., Würzburg, Germany, Martin von Wagner Museum

Dionysos, Satyrs and Grape-Vines, Attic black-figure amphora, circa 520 B.C., Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Kleophrades Painter, Satyrs and Maenads, red-figure amphora, circa 500–490 B.C., Munich, Germany, Antike Kleinkunst Museum

Mantegna, Andrea, Bacchanal with a Wine Vat, engraving, early 1470s, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Brescia, Giovanni Antonio da, Bacchanal with a Wine Vat, engraving, circa 1500, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Piero di Cosimo, The Discovery of Wine, circa 1500, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg museum of Art

Bacchanal with a Wine Vat, engraving, circa 1510–1515, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Titian, Bacchanal, 1523–1525, Madrid, Prado

Poussin, Nicolas, The Andrians, early 1630s, Paris, Louvre

Poussin, Nicolas, The Triumph of Silenus, copy, 1635–1636, London, National Gallery

Poussin, Nicolas, Bacchanal Before a Herm, 1635–1640, London, National Gallery

Poussin, Nicolas, Triumph of Pan, 1638, Sudely Castle, England

Picasso, Pablo, Bacchanal, After Poussin, watercolor and gouache, 1944

Picasso, Pablo, Feast of the Fauns, lithograph, 1957, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

The Drunkenness of Hercules

Dionysiac Sarcophagus, Roman, second century A.D., Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale

Dionysiac Sarcophagus, Roman, second century A.D., Rome, Capitoline Museum

Dionysos and Ariadne, Roman relief on sarcophagus, third century A.D., Rome, Vatican Museum

Rubens, Peter Paul, Drunken Hercules, 1604, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

The Blinding of Polyphemus

The Blinding of Polyphemus, vase painting, proto-Attic, circa 675–650 B.C., Eleusis, Greece, Archaeological Museum

Lapiths and Centaurs

Foundry Painter, Lapith and Centaur, red-figure kylix, circa 490–480 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen

Battle of the Lapiths and Centaurs, Greek sculpture, circa 465–457 B.C., Olympia, Greece, west pediment of Temple of Zeus

Battle of the Lapiths and Centaurs, Greek sculpture, circa 447–443, B.C., metopes for the Parthenon, London, British Museum

Michelangelo, Battle of Lapiths and Centaurs, 1500, London, National Gallery

Piero di Cosimo, The Battle of Lapiths and Centaurs, 1500, London, National Gallery

The Drunkenness of Noah

The Drunkenness of Noah, Christian illuminated manuscript, fifth or sixth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

The Drunkenness of Noah, Italo-Byzantine mosaic, circa 1183, Monreale, Sicily, nave of the Cathedral of Monreale

The Drunkenness of Noah, Italo-Byzantine mosaic, thirteenth century, Venice, Italy, San Marco Basilica

Ghiberti, Lorenzo, The Drunkenness of Noah, relief, early fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, north doors of Baptistry

Quercia, Jacopo della, The Drunkenness of Noah, relief, 1425–1438, Bologna, Italy, portal of San Petronio
 Uccello, Paolo, The Drunkenness of Noah, fresco, circa 1450, Florence, Italy, Sta. Maria Novella
 Gozzoli, Benozzo, The Drunkenness of Noah, fresco, 1469, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santo Michelangelo, The Drunkenness of Noah, fresco, 1508–1512, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Luini, Bernardino, The Drunkenness of Noah, painting, sixteenth century, Milan, Italy, Pinacoteca di Brera
 Zanchi, Antonio, Drunken Noah, painting, 1697, Venice, Italy, private collection

Judith and Holofernes

Judith and Holofernes, Ottonian illuminated manuscript, Bible of Charles the Bald, circa 879, Rome, San Paolo fuori le Mura
 Caravaggio, Judith Beheading Holofernes, painting, 1598–1599, Rome, Galleria Nazionale Palazzo Barberini
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith Beheading Holofernes, painting, circa 1612–1613, Naples, Italy, Museo e Gallerie Nazionali di Capodimonte

Ancient Greece

Brygos Painter, Youth Vomiting and Girl, red-figure vase painting, circa 490 B.C., Würzburg, Germany, Martin von Wegner Museum
Drunken Old Woman, Roman copy of a late third century–late second century B.C. Hellenistic sculpture, Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek

Early Netherlandish

Bosch, Hieronymus, Ship of Fools, painting, circa 1495, Paris, Louvre
 Bosch, Hieronymus, Intemperance, painting, circa 1495, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Collection
 Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Combat Between Carnival and Lent, painting, 1559, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Seventeenth Century: Holland

Brouwer, Adriaen, Tavern Scene, painting, circa 1630, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans-Van Beuningen
 Ostade, Adriaen van, Tavern Scene, painting, circa 1635, Moscow, Russia, State Pushkin Museum
 Steen, Jan, Tavern Scene, painting, mid-1660s, private collection
 Pot, Hendrik Gerritsz, Scene in a Bordello, painting, early 1630s, private collection Steen, Jan, The Effects of Intemperance, oil on panel, 1662–1663, London, National Gallery

Eighteenth Century: England

Hogarth, William, The Orgy, scene III of The Rake's Progress, painting, 1734, London, Sir John Soane's Museum

Hogarth, William, The Orgy, scene III of The Rake's Progress, engraving, 1735, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Nineteenth Century: France

Manet, Édouard, The Absinthe Drinker, painting, circa 1859, Copenhagen, Denmark, Carlsberg Glyptotek
 Daumier, Honoré, L'Absinthe, ça vous remonte un homme, painting, 1863, lithograph
 Degas, Edgar, The Glass of Absinthe, painting, 1876, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Artists and Alcohol: Twentieth-Century United States

Chagall, Marc, The Drunkard, ink and gouache on paper, 1911, Basel, Switzerland, collection of Marcus Diener
 Chagall, Marc, The Drunkard, gouache on paper, 1911, Paris, Musée National d'Art Moderne
 Chagall, Marc, The Drunkard, painting, 1921, Caracas, Venezuela, Hans Neumann Collection
 Murray, Elizabeth, Undoing, lithograph, etching, aquatint, and drypoint, 1989–1990

Artists and Alcohol: China

Yi Ch'ang-Wu, A Drunkard, painting, Ming Dynasty, Shanghai, China, collection P'ing-Ten-Ke
 Tao-Chi, Drunken in Autumn Woods, painting, Ch'ing Dynasty, late seventeenth–early eighteenth century, New York, collection of John M. Crawford Jr.

Further Reading

Allen, Don Cameron, The Legend of Noah: Renaissance Rationalism in Art, Science and Letters, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1949
 Barasch, Moshe, "A Silenus Surviving in Nicola Pisano," Art Bulletin, LVII:1 (March 1976)
 Barr, Alfred H. Jr., Picasso: Fifty Years of His Art, New York: Museum of Modern Art and Arno Press, 1980; London: Secker and Warburg, 1980
 Blunt, Anthony, Nicolas Poussin, New York: Pantheon, 1967; London: Pallas Athene, 1967
 Boorsch, Suzanne, and Jane Martineau, Andrea Mantegna, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1992; London: Royal Academy of Art, 1992
 Carpenter, Thomas H., Dionysian Imagery in Archaic Greek Art: Its Development in Black-Figure Vase Painting, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1986; New York: Oxford University Press, 1986
 Cohen, Hirsch H., The Drunkenness of Noah, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1974
 Cuttler, Charles D., "Bosch and the Narrenschiff: A Problem in Relationships," Art Bulletin LI:3 (September 1969)
 Darby, Delphine Fitz, "In the Train of a Vagrant Silenus," Art in America, XXXI:3 (July 1943)
 de Tolnay, Charles, Michelangelo: The Sistine Ceiling, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1945
 Downes, Kerry, Rubens, London: Jupiter, 1980

- Garrard, Mary DuBose, Artemisia Gentileschi: The Image of the Female Hero in Italian Baroque Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989
- Gibson, Walter W., Hieronymus Bosch, London: Thames and Hudson, 1973; New York: Oxford University Press, 1973
- Hall, James, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art, New York: Harper, 1974
- Hamdorf, Friedrich Wilhelm, Dionysos/Bacchus: Kult und Wandlungen des Weingottes, Munich, Germany: Callwey, 1986
- Hamilton, George Heard, Manet and His Critics, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1954
- Hedreen, Guy Michael, Silens in Attic Black-Figure Vase-Painting, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1992
- Henkel, Arthur, and Albrecht Schöne, Emblemata: Handbuch zur Sinnbildkunst des XVI und XVII Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart, Germany: J. B. Metzlersche, 1967
- Houser, Caroline, and Albert Henrichs, Dionysos and His Circle: Ancient Through Modern, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University, 1979
- Huemer, Frances, "A Dionysiac Connection in an Early Rubens," Art Bulletin LXI:4 (December 1979)
- Ives, Colta Feller, et al., Daumier Drawings, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art with Abrams, 1992
- Kaufmann, Lynn Frier, The Noble Savage: Satyrs and Satyr Familiars in Renaissance Art, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Research Press, 1984
- Le Normand, Antoinette, "Le Triomphe de Silène de Jules Dalou," La Revue du Louvre et des Musées de France XXX:3 (1980)
- Liebert, Robert S., Michelangelo: A Psychoanalytic Study of His Life and Images, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1983
- Morganstern, Anne M., "The Rest of Bosch's Ship of Fools," Art Bulletin LXVI:2 (June 1984)
- Panofsky, Erwin, Problems in Titian: Mostly Iconographic, New York: New York University Press, 1969; London: Phaidon, 1969
- Paulson, Ronald, The Art of Hogarth, London and New York: Phaidon, 1975
- Pollitt, Jerome Jordan, Art and Experience in Classical Greece, Cambridge and London: Cambridge University Press, 1972
- _____, Art in the Hellenistic Age, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986
- Porter, Jeanne Chenault, "Ribera's Assimilation of a Silenus," Paragone Arte XXX:355 (September 1979)
- Rewald, John, The History of Impressionism, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1973
- Sickman, Laurence, et al., Catalogue of the Exhibition of Chinese Calligraphy and Painting from the Collection of John M. Crawford, Jr., New York: Pierpont Morgan Library, 1962
- Spiazzi, Anna Marie, "Un Dipinto da Cavelleto di Antonio Zanchi," Arte Veneta XXVII (1974)
- Stechow, Wolfgang, Rubens and the Classical Tradition, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1968
- Wadsworth, Susan M., "Elizabeth Murray: Prints," Art New England XII:4 (June/July 1992)
- Welu, James A., Seventeenth-Century Dutch Painting: Raising the Curtain on New England Private Collections, Worcester, Massachusetts: Worcester Art Museum, 1979
- Yang, Wan-li, Heaven My Blanket, Earth My Pillow: Poems from Sung Dynasty China, translated by Jonathan Chaves, New York: Weatherhill, 1975
- Yee, Chiang, The Chinese Eye: An Interpretation of Chinese Painting, New York: Stokes, 1936; London: Methuen, 1936

ECSTASY

Valerie (Hutchinson) Pennanen

The following periods are included in the discussion of the theme Ecstasy:

ANCIENT

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

MEDIEVAL

NINETEENTH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

TWENTIETH CENTURY

St. Hildegard von Bingen, Ball of Fire, from the Liber Scivias, Rupertsberg, Germany, original destroyed in World War II. (Courtesy of Otto Müller Verlag, Salzburg, Austria)

The literal meaning of ecstasy (Greek ecstasis) is “a state of being put out of place.” Classical Greek writers used the term loosely to describe almost any abrupt change of mind or mood; in time, however, ecstasy came to mean (in the words of the classicist E. R. Dodds) “a profound alteration of personality” (p. 77). True ecstasy tends to involve both a radical psychic departure from one’s usual self and a sense of deep, miraculous union with another—be that other a fellow human being, God, nature, or the universe. Among the common routes to ecstasy are prayer, meditation, the contemplation of beautiful or stirring sights, singing, chanting, dancing, fasting, physical illness (especially the kind involving vivid dreams or delirium), ingestion of alcohol or other drugs, and intimate (most often sexual) contact with another person. However, merely to enter into such experiences does not guarantee that an individual will reach ecstasy, nor do all ecstatic persons behave in the same way or remain ecstatic for the same length of time. Rather, a unique ecstatic experience is shaped by numerous factors, including the individual’s age, health, strength, temperament, spiritual beliefs and values, and personal history as well as the expectations of the culture in which the person lives. In general, the more religious a community, the more likely its members are to regard ecstasy as a healthful, appropriate response to life’s great moments. Conversely, many of the more secular societies are apt to regard ecstatic behavior with hesitation or embarrassment and as a sign of emotional weakness or instability. It follows that although the theme of ecstasy remains of interest to some late-twentieth-century artists and writers, it is not treated as frequently or with as much richness and variety as in the past.

The earliest portrayals of people in a genuinely ecstatic state occur on Attic Greek vases of the fifth century B.C. Here the subjects are maenads (female devotees of the wine god Dionysus) grasping musical instruments, thyrsi (sacred wands), and/or small animals (whose skins they may also wear). They dance, with evident abandon, in a variety of dramatic postures and gestures. Their dance is usually understood to be rapid, although slow, trancelike versions are not unknown; there are even a few depictions of maenads who have danced themselves into a collapse and are being trodden underfoot by their still-frenzied companions. The theme of Dionysiac ritual ecstasy received monumental treatment in literature by Euripides (whose play The Bacchae appeared in 406 B.C.) and in sculpture by Skopas (flourished circa 350 B.C.). Skopas created an eloquent type of maenad tossing her head—a violent, perhaps involuntary gesture that caused her disheveled locks to blow freely in the wind. This type was frequently re-created by later generations of artists, both Greek and Roman, in a wide variety of media.

In addition to possessing violent tendencies and an unearthly strength, maenads were said to be prone to hallucinations—deadly news for the Theban king Pentheus and the musician

Orpheus, whose legendary deaths at the hands of Dionysiac votaries are recounted in Greco-Roman literature and art. On the stuccoed vault of the Underground Basilica at Rome (circa A.D. 50), the tragic figure of Agave, Pentheus’s mother, holding her son’s severed head may well stand for all human sins. On Roman sarcophagi of the second century A.D., the deaths of Pentheus and Orpheus may be meant as allegories for all human death. Yet most ancient portrayals of maenads seem intended to call forth pleasant associations, and the same applies to other ecstatic pagan dancers, for example, satyrs (who in Roman art sometimes make the head-tossing gesture), Corybantes (female attendants of the goddess Cybele, a nature goddess of ancient peoples of Asia Minor), and Pan (an ancient Greek pastoral god). The motif of the blissfully dancing maenad is especially common on Roman sarcophagi, where it seems to reflect the promise of an ecstatic afterlife presided over by Dionysus. Some early Christians even accepted the image of ecstatic dancers as an allegory of their paradise. More than that, Clement of Alexandria went so far as to invite new converts to join “the Bacchic rites of my mysteries . . . [where] you too shall dance with the angels around the unbegotten and imperishable and only true God!” (Miller, p. 130, from Exhortation XI 120.1).

The sacred dance was not destined to be an integral part of Christian worship, however. Although it survived to some extent in popular festivals of the Middle Ages and remained a powerful metaphor—used to glorious effect by the Neoplatonists and Dante—the dance was an object of deep distrust to most medieval churchmen. Dancing, by nature sensual, infectious, and hard to stop, was held to be a path leading more often from God than to Him, and it was soon duly condemned to remain outside the walls of the Christian Church. However, the Church did endorse other ways of reaching ecstatic union with God: prayer, meditation, and participation in religious rites (especially the Eucharist) were means open to everyone. That the ecstatic experience was fully understood by monkish artists of the Carolingian age is clear from works such as the Utrecht Psalter and the Gospel Book of Archbishop Ebbo of Reims (both early ninth century). In the former, to quote art historian George Zarnecki,

The small figures are drawn with great rapidity and with only a few strokes. . . . Everything is movement, gesture, and expression. The crowds swarm like ants, agitated, tense, in constant motion, their robes swirling as if blown by the wind. (p. 191)

The Reims manuscript is best known for its full-page illuminations of the four Gospel writers. In each case, the Evangelist, with shining eyes and nervously moving fingers, is receiving inspiration from his special heavenly symbol. His drapery whips about him, and his hair stands on end, as though he were seated in the midst of a whirlwind. Meanwhile, the landscape appears to heave up behind him, and the details of the picture's border are also rendered as though blown by wind. Clearly, the experience here is analogous to that of Pentecost, when, according to Acts 2:1–4, Christ's disciples were filled with the Holy Spirit and spoke in tongues.

The Christian ecstatic experience could also be a visionary experience, and visions were an increasingly common subject in art of the later Middle Ages. St. Hildegard von Bingen documented her highly personal encounters with God in both literary and visual terms, most notably in the Liber Scivias (Scivias meaning Scito vias lucis, "Know ye the ways of light"). This brilliantly illuminated work presented some 26 visions, among them the Ball of Fire, which Hildegard described as "a huge image, round and shadowy . . . pointed at the top like an egg," with an outer layer of bright fire, a dark membrane farther within, and a great flaming orb and three additional lights at the center (Hartt, pp. 441–442; cf. Flanagan, p. 57ff.).

More generally, a strong visionary element was present in the sculpture of Romanesque churches (e.g., St. Madeleine at Vézelay, France). Here, carved in high relief on the tympanum of the central portal of the narthex (circa 1120–1132) and originally painted with bright colors and gilded, is an intensely dramatic scene of Christ commissioning his apostles. Rays of light stream from the Lord's hands, causing the apostles to start up from their seats, thus initiating their great mission to evangelize the world. The ground is made to undulate beneath their feet, and their drapery swirls, as do the clouds. The lintel and archivolts represent the vast spectrum of needy humanity to whom the apostles must preach. Signs of the zodiac and labors of the months emphasize that the apostles' mission must never cease until the whole world has been won over to the faith. Whether or not the sculptor who designed this splendid work ever had true visions of his own, he certainly knew how to evoke feelings of awe and mystery (and perhaps even ecstasy) from the devout who passed through this portal.

An equally strong gift for creating a mystic atmosphere that invited Christians to deeper communion with God was shared by the makers of Gothic stained-glass windows. Their richly glowing creations, combined with the effects of flickering candlelight, fragrant incense, and the whole intense drama of worship, must have brought many late-medieval souls to blissful ecstasy. Interestingly, during the thirteenth century, the German word Kunst (art) was used to denote ecstatic experiences among Christians. This seems to imply that religious ecstasy was something one consciously would prepare for and something to embrace eagerly whenever it came.

The art of the Renaissance includes many uplifting visions but few that could be described as ecstatic. Giovanni Bellini, to be sure, painted Saint Francis in Ecstasy, but this subject was little more than a pretext to explore lighting and spatial effects in landscape. St. Francis himself is shown barefoot in the foreground (an allusion to the holiness of God's earth) with his arms extended and face uplifted as he gazes in rapt wonder at the glowing vistas spread out before him. He retains the essential dignity of a Renaissance figure even as he invites the viewer to join him in glad thanksgiving for the created order. Genuine religious ecstasy was left for artists of the next two centuries to reexplore and for mystics and saints of the Counter-Reformation to reexperience.

Correggio's Jupiter and Io (circa 1531) is an early example of realistic style applied to the theme of ecstasy. A voluptuous nymph swoons in the embrace of a cloudlike being—the Roman god Jupiter in disguise—who imprints a kiss on her lips. The position of Io's nude body and the blissful tilt of her head, as well as her closed eyes and slightly parted mouth, convey that she is in a state of passionate excitement as she unites physically and spiritually with her lover. A drinking stag appears in a lower corner of the painting, a motif perhaps meant to recall the opening lines of Psalm 42:1–2: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." Such an openly sensuous portrayal of the soul's union with God was bound to inspire some and to shock others; it would certainly have been understood by St. Teresa of Ávila, who wrote much about the "divine union of love" and addressed Christ as her lover. Throughout her life, the frail Teresa had numerous visions of God that were often accompanied by strong physical sensations. She wrote of an angel who repeatedly stabbed her heart with a flaming arrow, causing pain "so great that I screamed aloud; but simultaneously I felt such infinite sweetness that I wished the pain to last eternally . . . the sweetest caressing of the soul by God" (Wittkower, p. 25). This event was immortalized by Gian Lorenzo Bernini in his Ecstasy of Saint Teresa (1645–1652), a sculpture made as the focal point for the Cornaro Chapel in Santa Maria della Vittoria in Rome. In this work, Teresa's half-closed eyes, flared nostrils, open mouth (suggestive of moaning), limp arms, and rumpled habit convey her helpless state while a glow of sunlight, admitted through a yellow-paned window and reflected from gilded wood rays, effectively imparts God's presence.

The paintings of El Greco present a fundamentally different view of religious ecstasy. Nothing is corporeal, let alone sensuous, in his portraits of saints and mystics, yet their dark glowing eyes and pale ethereal faces are matchless in their intensity. El Greco is best known for his portrayals of holy men and women and miraculous events from the past. These paintings, of which the Burial of Orgaz (1586–1588) is a prime example, use strongly attenuated figures, flickering, jewellike colors, and flamelike brush strokes to create the feel of a divinely inspired dream. This unique blend of pseudo-Byzantine splendor, Venetian color, and Spanish mysticism was much admired in El Greco's day and imitated by his pupils, but it quickly fell out of favor after his death. The immediate future belonged to Baroque artists such as Bernini, whose more physically intimate treatment of ecstasy became the seventeenth-century standard.

Other artists of the period who dealt convincingly with ecstatic themes were Caravaggio (Conversion of Saint Paul, 1600–1601), Annibale Carracci (Vision of Saint Francis, 1597–1598), and Bartolomé Esteban Murillo (Immaculate Conception, 1656–1660). Indeed, Baroque church buildings often enveloped the worshiper in an intimate way. Thus, the interior of Francesco Borromini's S. Carlo alle Quattro Fontane in Rome (1638–1641) is made to "expand" and "contract" in a manner suggestive of a beating heart. Bernini's colonnaded enclosure for the piazza of St. Peter's Basilica (1656–1667) in the Vatican was designed to evoke the feeling of being embraced by Holy Mother Church, "for," as he explained, "she embraces Catholics, so as to confirm them in their faith; heretics, to re-unite them to the Church; and infidels, to enlighten them in the true faith" (Martin, p. 151).

The dawn of modern times saw a marked decline of interest in religious ecstasy. This was true not only in Protestant lands (Protestants had often shunned ecstasy from the start) but also among Roman Catholics. Prominent thinkers of the Enlightenment, such as Jonathan Swift and Voltaire, held that the common man's dignity was threatened by participation in religious "excesses," which they felt the Church did much to encourage. In time, their views on this point came to be shared by many people; thus, a tendency to compartmentalize religion, making it "safe" and manageable, arose on both sides of the Atlantic. This tendency was never universal, and in fact the age of the Enlightenment saw periodic revivals of ecstatic worship. For example, the sacred dance was given new life by groups such as the Shakers (founded in 1747) and the Methodist "Jumpers" (founded in 1760). In general, however, the craving for ecstatic experience has been satisfied in less overtly religious ways since the Enlightenment.

Some modern Westerners (artists among them) have sought to attain ecstasy through contemplation of the natural world. Contemplation may proceed from a Christian standpoint in the tradition of St. Francis but more often is accompanied by a worshipful attitude toward nature itself, a kind of passionate pantheism. Nature is viewed as an ever-shifting drama of which the beholder, too, is a part, and the very clouds and lighting of the sky are seen to be gloriously animated. The late paintings of John Constable (e.g., Stoke-by-Nayland, 1836) show the beginnings of this tendency through their loose brushwork and dappled color. More striking pictorial dramas, often with a sharply defined foreground and vast, hazy background, were hallmarks of American painters of the Hudson River School, including Thomas Cole and Asher Durand. Above all, however, the landscapes of Vincent van Gogh contain a transcendent vision of nature or, rather, of the entire universe. As van Gogh put it,

I see in the whole of nature . . . expression, and so to speak, soul. A row of pollard willows sometimes has something of a procession of orphaned men about it. The young wheat can have something indescribably pure and tender . . . as for instance the expression of a sleeping child. . . . It's a question of giving the sun and the blue sky their full force and brilliance, of retaining the fine aroma of wild thyme which pervades the baked and often melancholy earth. (Letters, pp. 242, B20)

Little wonder that in Wheat Field and Cypress Trees (1889), a great gust of wind seems to animate everything, from the golden yellow wheat and deep green cypresses to the mountains and the sky itself. Similarly, in The Starry Night (1889), van Gogh's sky is a whirlpool of deep blue and creamy white shot through with vibrating heavenly bodies of lemon yellow and orange. "Putting little white dots on a blue-black surface," the artist maintained, "is not enough!" (Letters, W7).

That a high ecstatic state may also be reached through sexual intimacy is well known and much celebrated in the modern world. No longer confined to the realm of Christian allegory (although it still has a legitimate place there), sexual closeness in its own right has fired the imaginations of modern artists to produce some unforgettable visions. For example, Oskar Kokoschka's great expressionist painting Bride of the Wind (1914) shows a couple serenely resting amid a nightmarish swirl of stormy colors. The woman, asleep, rests her head on the shoulder of the watchful man; farther down, their bodies intertwine and finally merge with the surrounding maelstrom. Although the subjects (Kokoschka and his mistress) are far from conventionally handsome and their refuge far from secure, their union is portrayed as wonderful and triumphant—a miracle of goodness at the heart of an evil storm.

The theme of lovers uniting to transcend the limits of the physical world is treated also by Marc Chagall in paintings that celebrate his love for his first wife, Bella. In Birthday (1915), he shows Bella gliding effortlessly across the floor and himself floating directly above, his head swiveled around to give her a kiss.

More explicitly sensual than either the Chagall or the Kokoschka work is a series of intimate black-and-white photographs that Alfred Stieglitz took of his lover (and, from 1924, wife) Georgia O'Keeffe. These document O'Keeffe not only as creator of her own sensual art (see below) but also, and especially, as a sensuous human being who aroused the photographer's passion. As Stieglitz's friend Lewis Mumford observed,

It was his manly sense of the realities of sex, developing out of his own renewed ecstasy in love, that resulted in [these] photographs. In a part by part relation of a woman's body, in the isolated presentation of a hand, a breast, a neck, a thigh, a leg, Stieglitz achieved the exact visual equivalent of the report of the hand or the face as it travels over the body of the beloved. (p. 60)

Meanwhile, O'Keeffe was achieving fame and notoriety for her lush, enormous paintings of flowers that were so sensuous and so exalted that one group, a series of six calla lilies, was dubbed by Stieglitz "The Immaculate Conception." Whereas O'Keeffe's flower pictures to date stand alone among "ecstatic" works of art, Stieglitz's photographs of his wife have inspired many later photographers to work with sexual themes and sometimes, although by no means always, to portray true ecstasy as well.

Ecstasy has long been a valued experience among non-Western peoples, especially in the Far East, the Americas, and Africa, where shamanistic traditions still survive. The shaman (so called by the Siberian Evenki) is an extraordinary individual who "travels" back and forth between the human realm and the spirit world, bearing vital messages for his or her clients or community. Ethnic artists seldom portray the shaman's actual journey, either because it is considered impious or because the spirit realm is held to be irreproducible. (An exception to this rule occurs in a sixth-century tomb painting from Koguryo, Korea, in which a black-and-white-clad shaman rides heavenward on the back of a white goose.) On the other hand, the visual arts may be quite freely and lavishly used in ceremonies designed to help the shaman attain a state of ecstasy. Thus, a professional Korean manshin ([one who summons] ten thousand spirits) may require several changes of symbolically colored costume, elaborate feathered headgear (the feathers are believed to act as spiritual "antennae"), ritual fans painted with images of the Chesok-Buddha and other holy ones, and icons of the deceased ancestors whom she plans to involve—all for a single day's performance (kut). Similarly, an African shaman, such as the Dodoth (Ugandan) tribesman whose methods were observed by E. M. Thomas in the 1950s, might need to sit on an elaborately carved stool to begin his lucid dreaming. It should be added that when ethnic craftspeople make musical instruments such as the drum, rattle, bell, and flute—whose sounds have been heard for millennia in ecstatic rituals the world over—they frequently enrich them with decoration so that the instruments, too, become works of art.

Among North American Indian tribes of the Midwest and Great Plains, not only shamans (the so-called medicine men) but also youth on the brink of adolescence sought the ecstatic state. The vision quest required a time of complete isolation, fasting, contemplation, prayer, and sometimes even self-mutilation to win sympathy from the spirit world. Eventually, the devout seeker would be rewarded by a meeting with a personal “spirit patron” (e.g., a horse, an elk, a buffalo, or a whirlwind) that would then reveal to the individual special prayers and charms. The latter might afterward become the basis for painted decoration on the youth’s shield, face, and body. Ecstatic group ritual is likewise well documented among these peoples, as seen in the still-performed Dakota sun dance and the peyote ceremonies of the Native American Church (two rituals that have left their mark on Plains visual arts). Ritual paraphernalia from the sun dance and the peyote cult may be considered works of art in their own right; this is especially true of the “peyote fans,” made from the plumage of various prairie birds. Additionally, the sun dance has been immortalized by the modern Sioux painter Oscar Howe, first in a lyrical, seminaturalistic piece, Sioux Sun Dance (1950s), and later in a vibrantly colored, half-surreal, half-cubist work, Sioux Dancer (1960s).

Finally, sexual intimacy—with its manifold delights that can make lovers ecstatic—has been celebrated for many hundreds of years in countries around the world. Sexual intimacy receives especially rich treatment in the arts and poetry of India, where, as art historian Charles Fabri observed, “There has always been a marked sensuous element . . . shining, as it were, through the veil of sanctity and spiritualism” (p. 6). The Hindu doctrine of Tantrism holds that there is no greater earthly bliss than the coupling of man and woman. Moreover, through bliss, humans can awaken the spiritual force called kundalini and so attain union with the Divine Being. The temple sculptures at Khajuraho (circa A.D. 1000) express this theme repeatedly through the use of full, sensuous figures that, even as they embrace one another passionately, wear a look of deep and tender contemplation. The magnificent colossal bust of Siva Mahadeva (Siva the Great Lord) on the Indian island of Elephanta (seventh century) also shows how a Hindu deity (Siva is often androgynous and has multiple facets and roles) may pass into an ecstatic state. In the words of art historian Frederick Hartt, this triple-headed Siva, with nearly closed, heavy-lidded eyes, seems to be “rapt in his own divinity, unconscious of [the viewer’s] existence” (p. 1001).

A being put out of place—a temporary loss of self—a union with another or with “the Other”: regardless of the details, ecstasy is clearly a life-changing event for individuals and sometimes for whole communities. Persons who have been fortunate enough to know ecstasy may describe it as a breakthrough, an awakening, a rebirth, a baptism, or a remaking of the human soul in God’s image. They long to reexperience ecstasy, and as a rule they do, very often sharing their ecstatic memory with others so that it may be enhanced and relived for generations to come. This priceless gift was bequeathed to humanity by artists as diverse as the Khajuraho sculptors, Hildegard von Bingen, Georgia O’Keeffe, and Oscar Howe. But will even their creations be forgotten by our “civilized” world, in which fewer persons, it seems, have firsthand knowledge of ecstasy? Will there be no artists of the future to affirm, clarify, and expand the ecstatic vision of the past? And if there are not, how great will be our spiritual loss? The popular Roman Catholic writer Matthew Fox put it this way:

Every human person is a bearer of ecstasy and, therefore, of God. . . . [Boredom, and ultimately even] sadism is the price for lost pleasures of ecstasy. . . . We have received. . . . What more dare we ask for, beg for, even pray for than to be an instrument of something bigger than we are: instruments of ecstasy? (pp. 38, 90, 245)

Art critic Suzi Gablik concurred:

[Our] sacramental vision . . . can never be completely uprooted, . . . it can only be debased. . . . [We must now] look for means by which we can approach art again as total human beings. . . . [We must keep alive] the knowledge that life can be transformed by a sacramental experience. (pp. 93, 127, 128)

See also Abandonment; Bacchanalia/Orgy; Communion; Dance/Dancers/Dancing; Love and Death; Martyrdom

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

- Kleophrades Painter, Dionysos with Maenads and Satyrs, painted amphora, from Vulci, circa 500–490 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen
- Brygos Painter, Maenad, interior of cup, from Vulci, circa 490 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen
- Eretria Painter, Dionysos with Maenads and Satyrs, squat lekythos, from Trachones, circa 420 B.C., Berlin
- Skopas, Raving Maenad, sculpture, fourth century B.C., Dresden, Germany, Skulpturensammlung
- Dancing Satyr*, glass gem, from Cairnhill, Scotland, presently in Edinburgh, National Museum of the Antiquities of Scotland
- The Death of Pentheus*, Roman sarcophagus, Rome, Palazzo Giustiniani
- The Death of Orpheus*, Roman sarcophagus, Turin, Musei Civici di Torino

Medieval

- Utrecht Psalter*, circa 820–832, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Universiteitsbibliotheek Utrecht (MS. Script. eccl. 484)
- Gospel Book of Archbishop Ebbo of Reims*, 816–835, Épernay, France, Bibliothèque Municipale (MS. 1)
- Hildegard von Bingen, Liber Scivias, twelfth century, Rupertsberg, Germany (original destroyed during World War II)

Renaissance

- Bellini, Giovanni, Saint Francis in Ecstasy, circa 1485, New York, Frick Collection
- Correggio, Jupiter and Io, circa 1531, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- El Greco, The Burial of the Count of Orgaz, 1586–1588, Toledo, Spain, Santa Tomé
- Carracci, Annibale, Vision of Saint Francis, circa 1597–1598, London, Collection of Sir John Pope-Hennessy

Seventeenth Century

- Caravaggio, Conversion of Saint Paul, 1600–1601, Rome, Santa Maria del Popolo
- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, The Ecstasy of Saint Teresa, 1645–1652, Rome, Cornaro Chapel, Santa Maria della Vittoria
- Murillo, Bartolomé Esteban, Immaculate Conception, 1656–1660, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Nineteenth Century

- Cole, Thomas, The Titan's Goblet, 1833, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Constable, John, Stoke-by-Nayland, 1836, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
- Durand, Asher, Scene from Thanatopsis, 1850, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Gogh, Vincent van, Wheat Field and Cypress Trees, 1889, London, National Gallery
- Gogh, Vincent van, The Starry Night, 1889, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Twentieth Century

- Gill, Eric, Ecstasy, sculpture, 1911, London, Tate Gallery
- Kokoschka, Oskar, Bride of the Wind (The Tempest), 1914, Basel, Switzerland, Oeffentliche Kunstsammlung Basel Kunstmuseum
- Chagall, Marc, Birthday, 1915, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- O'Keeffe, Georgia, Red Canna, Tucson, Arizona, University of Arizona Museum
- O'Keeffe, Georgia, Two Calla Lilies on Pink, 1928, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
- O'Keeffe, Georgia, Black Iris III, 1926, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Nakian, Reuben, Ecstasy, bronze, 1946–1947, Washington, D.C., Hirshhorn Collection
- Howe, Oscar, Sioux Sun Dance, 1950s, Philbrook Art Museum
- Howe, Oscar, Sioux Dancer, 1960s, Denver, Colorado, Denver Art Museum

Further Reading

- Anonymous, "Bird of Power," in American Indian Mythology, edited by Alice Marriott and Carol K. Rachlin, New York: Crowell, 1968
- Barnstone, Willis, The Poetics of Ecstasy: Varieties of Ekstasis from Sappho to Borges, New York: Helmes and Meir, 1983

- Braunstein, Philippe, "Toward Intimacy: The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries," in A History of Private Life II: Revelations of the Medieval World, edited by Georges Duby, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1988
- Callaway, Nicholas, ed., Georgia O'Keeffe: One Hundred Flowers, New York, Knopf, 1987
- Cormack, Malcolm, Constable, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986
- Covell, Alan Carter, Ecstasy: Shamanism in Korea, Seoul, South Korea: Holly International, 1983
- Dodds, Eric Robertson, The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1951
- Fabri, Charles, "The Fulfillment of the Baroque at Khajuraho," in Khajuraho, edited by Mulk Raj Anand, et al., Bombay, India: Marg, 1960
- Feder, Norman, American Indian Art, New York: Abrams, 1968
- Flanagan, Sabina, Hildegard of Bingen: A Visionary Life, London and New York: Routledge, 1989
- Fox, Matthew, Whee! We, Wee All the Way Home: A Guide to Sensual, Prophetic Spirituality, Santa Fe, New Mexico: Bear, 1980
- Gablik, Suzi, Has Modernism Failed?, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1984
- Gardner, Albert Ten Eyck, and Stuart P. Feld, American Paintings: A Catalogue of the Collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, I: Painters Born by 1815, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1965
- Gogh, Vincent van, The Complete Letters of Vincent van Gogh, translated by Johanna van Gogh-Bonger and C. de Dood, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1958; London: Thames and Hudson, 1958
- Goldscheider, Ludwig, Kokoschka, London: Phaidon, 1963
- Goodman, Felicitas D., Ecstasy, Ritual, and Alternate Reality: Religion in a Pluralistic World, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988
- Gould, Cecil Hilton Monk, The Paintings of Correggio, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1976; London: Faber, 1976
- Gudiol, José, Domenikos Theotokopoulos, El Greco, translated by Kenneth Lyons, New York: Viking, 1973; London: Secker and Warburg, 1973
- Hartt, Frederick, Art: A History of Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1969; third edition, 1989
- Hecker, Justus Freidrich Carl, The Dancing Mania of the Middle Ages, translated by B. G. Babington, New York: Burt Franklin, 1970
- Highwater, Jamake, Myth and Sexuality, New York: Penguin, 1990
- , Song from the Earth: American Indian Painting, Boston: Little, Brown, 1976
- Hutchinson, Valerie J., Bacchus in Roman Britain: Evidence for His Cult, Oxford: British Archaeological Reports, 1986
- Kamenskii, Aleksandr, Chagall: The Russian Years 1907–1922, translated by Catherine Phillips, New York: Rizzoli, 1989; London: Thames and Hudson, 1989

Laski, Marghanita, Ecstasy: A Study of Some Secular and Religious Experiences, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1961; London: Cresset Press, 1961

Martin, John Rupert, Baroque, New York: Harper, 1977

Matz, Friedrich, Die Dionysischen Sarkophage, Berlin: Mann Verlag, 1968

Miller, James, Measures of Wisdom: The Cosmic Dance in Classical and Christian Antiquity, Toronto, Ontario, and Buffalo, New York: University of Toronto Press, 1986

Mumford, Lewis, America and Alfred Stieglitz: A Collective Portrait, Garden City, New York: Literary Guild, 1934

Robertson, Martin, Greek Painting, London: Macmillan, 1979

Seynhaeve, Pascal, Vézelay, Paris, Editions Franciscaines, 1969

Wittkower, Rudolf, Gian Lorenzo Bernini: The Sculptor of the Roman Baroque, London: Phaidon, 1955

Zarnecki, George, Art of the Medieval World: Architecture, Sculpture, Painting, the Sacred Arts, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1975

ENVY

Eugene Dwyer

The following subjects are covered in the discussion of the theme Envy:

ENVY AS AN ALLEGORICAL
FIGURE

ENVY EXEMPLIFIED

CAIN AND ABEL

AGLAUROS

ARTISTS

Pieter Bruegel, Envy, from The Seven Deadly Sins, circa 1557, plate 42 from H. Arthur Klein, Graphic Worlds of Peter Bruegel, the Elder (New York, Dover Publications, 1963).
(Courtesy of Dover Publications)

Envy (Latin invidia; Greek phthonos; German Neid; English emulation [obsolete]) may be defined as “sorrow for other men’s good . . . and joy at their harms” (Burton, 1.2.3.7, translating Cicero). Its opposite is mercy or charity. Petrarch opposed envy to fame. As Robert Burton’s formulation states, the object of one person’s envy is always another person. The good enjoyed by the object of envy may be either tangible (i.e., fortune) or intangible (i.e., fame). The object may be a living person or, in extreme cases (e.g., Caligula, as told by Suetonius), the illustrious dead or the gods themselves. Envy is so intimately connected with fame that it is frequently described as its “companion” (invidia gloriae comes).

Envy is almost universally held to be the most destructive of the vices, literally “consuming” its victims (French dévoré d’envie). Unlike the other vices, envy brings no pleasure to its victims, who are often represented as wasting away and even consuming themselves. “Eat your heart out!” is traditional unsympathetic advice to the envious.

In English, the color green has come to be seen as a symptom of envy, owing to a false etymology. To “green” for something once meant to long after, whence Shakespeare’s “green-eyed jealousy” (Merchant of Venice, III.ii.110). Jealousy is distinct from envy in denoting a three-party relationship: as Shakespeare’s “green-ey’d monster [Jealousy] which doth mock the meat it feeds on” (Othello, III.iii.166–167); that is, it is feline in its behavior. To be “green with envy” is now a common expression.

The persistent association of envy with nourishment or the denial of nourishment indicates its formative connection with the early stages of childhood development. Psychoanalyst Melanie Klein considered envy “an oral-sadistic and anal-sadistic expression of destructive impulses operative from the beginning of life” (p. 176). George M. Foster noted that given the inequalities that exist in nearly all societies, envy presents a significant danger to human socialization. He considered the fear of envy as a near-cultural universal and described cultural forms and symbolic behavior (such as avoidance of the evil eye) through which humans cope with that fear. Almsgiving and tipping are typical forms of addressing fears of envy.

Given the importance of the eye and of looking in the expression of envy, this vice has especially close associations with the visual arts. The Latin form invidia, from invidere (“to look upon,” i.e., with an evil eye), makes this relationship explicit. “There seemeth to be acknowledged, in the act of envy, an ejaculation, or irradiation of the eye” (Bacon). Sight and ownership are particularly involved in the relations of men and women. Covetousness being forbidden to the Hebrews by the Tenth Commandment (Exodus 20:17; Deuteronomy 5:21), Job’s “apologia” begins with the verse, “I made a covenant with mine eyes; why then should I think upon a maid?” (Job 31:1). The same connection of envy and sight may be found in the story of Gyges and Candaules, where the one objects to the other’s command to view his wife naked, citing an ancient maxim, “Let each man look upon his own” (Herodotus 1.8).

Writers of the Augustan period were especially interested in invidia. In his Tusculan Disputations, Cicero classed it among the disorders (perturbationes) to which the mind is subject, treating it as the first subcategory under “distress” (aegritudo). Nepos told of its effects on the lives of the great. Horace, a self-confessed victim, described its symptoms in his Epistles, and Ovid personified it (see below).

In his homily Concerning Envy, St. Basil wrote,

. . . some think that envious persons bring bad luck merely by a glance, so that healthy persons in the full flower and vigor of their prime are made to pine away under their spell, suddenly losing all their plumpness, which dwindles and wastes away under the gaze of the envious, as if washed by a destructive flood. (pp. 469–470)

Thus, popular belief in the evil eye transformed the symptoms normally associated with one who suffers envy to the one who is the object of envy. According to the Malleus Maleficarum, those possessed of a melancholy temperament are inclined to be envious (Kramer and Sprenger). Robert Burton, on the other hand, considered envy (i.e., emulation) a possible cause of melancholia (1.2.3.7). The iconography of envy may, in fact, be intertwined with that of melancholy. Commenting on an eleventh-century manuscript from Moissac, France, in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris (Ms. lat. 2077), art historian Adolf Katzenellenbogen noted the figure of Invidia (Envy): “[fol. 166v left.] . . . sad and morose, head in hand. . . . It is easy to understand how she came to be designated Tristitia (Sorrow)” (p. 13, n. 1). Given the connection that exists between envy and melancholy in contemporary sources such as The Malleus Maleficarum, it is surprising that art historians Erwin Panofsky, Fritz Saxl, and Raymond Klibansky failed to add envy to the iconographic pedigree of Melancholia I. With her starved dog and her remarkably withering stare, Albrecht Dürer’s figure is an excellent candidate for identification with envy, especially because artists were thought to be among her victims.

Theology identifies envy instrumentally with evil:

for God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of his own eternity. Nevertheless through envy of the devil came death into the world: and they that do hold of his side do fine it. (Wisdom of Solomon, 2:23–24)

from which Dante wrote,

He [i.e., the Hound] shall hunt her [i.e., the beast] through every town till he has thrust her back into Hell, whence envy first sent her forth. (Inferno, 1:109–111)

In canto 14 of the Purgatorio, Dante introduces two classical paradigms of envy: Cain, a son of Adam and Eve, and Aglauros, a legendary young woman of ancient Athens. It is hardly an accident that the two most famous tales of envy concern the rivalry of siblings. Cain murdered his brother Abel because God had preferred the latter's sacrifice to his. The first murder was occasioned by envy. Indeed, Cain's name is very similar to the Hebrew word qana' (to be jealous) (Peters, p. 1051). Art historian Meyer Schapiro has shown how the demonic orality of Cain, envious of his brother, contributed to the use in medieval iconography of an ass's jawbone as Cain's murder weapon. The physical brutality of Cain's crime was emphasized especially in paintings of the Renaissance and Baroque periods. In a painting in Naples, Italy, Leonello Spada represented Cain Killing Abel, where the animal force of the two combatants is emphasized in graphic detail and with erotic connotations.

Ovid's tale of Aglauros, told in book 2 of Metamorphoses (ll. 708–833), is perhaps the classic tale of envy. It contains the locus classicus of all subsequent depictions of envy in poetry and the visual arts. The story concerns the daughters of the legendary king and founder of Athens, Cecrops, who are thought to be represented by the caryatids of the south porch of the Erechtheum in Athens. Mercury, the god-messenger of the gods, passing through (or over) Athens, espied Herse in a procession of Athenian maidens and became enamored of her. When he approached the house of Herse, he encountered her sister, Aglauros, who demanded gold as the price of acting as go-between. Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, already angry with Aglauros for uncovering her hidden child, Erichthonius, determined to pay the greedy girl a lesson. Accordingly, she sought out the goddess Envy in her abode. Ovid's portrayal of Envy is one of his most memorable creations:

Pallor o'erspread her face and her whole body seems to shrivel up. Her eyes are all awry, her teeth are foul with mould; green, poisonous gall o'erflows her breast, and venom drips down from her tongue. She never smiles, save at the sight of another's troubles; she never sleeps, disturbed with wakefull cares; unwelcome to her is the sight of men's success, and with the sight she pines away; she gnaws and is gnawed herself for her own punishment . . . her staff, thick set with thorns . . . wherever she goes, she tramples down the flowers, causes the grass to wither, blasts the high waving trees, and taints with the foul pollution of her breath whole peoples, cities, homes . . . (Metamorphoses 2.775–794)

At Minerva's command, Envy grudgingly agrees to poison Aglauros. She does this by infecting Aglauros with her venom and by speaking to her of her sister's good fortune. Aglauros begins to waste away as she broods on Herse's success. Determined to block the access of Mercury to her sister's room, Aglauros takes up a position on the threshold. Mercury thereupon changes her with a stroke of his wand into a black, lifeless statue, then returns to Mount Olympus, the legendary home of the gods. Ovid tellingly omits any mention of Mercury's visit to Herse, as this is really Aglauros's story.

In the context of Ovid's narrative, Envy is a powerful, if understandably reclusive, goddess sought out by Minerva. She works her evil by touching her victim, Aglauros, with her festering hand and breathing "pestilential, poisonous breath into her nostrils." Ovid leaves little doubt that the sight of Envy is also harmful. Even Minerva, who sought her out for the evil deed, must avert her eyes (2.770). "And to fix a cause for her [Aglauros's] grief, Envy pictured to her imagination her sister, her sister's blest marriage and the god in all his beauty, magnifying the excellence of everything" (2.802–805).

The tale of Mercury, Herse, and Aglauros was illustrated by numerous artists of the Renaissance and Baroque periods. Sodoma depicted Aglauros Metamorphosed into a Rock as one of several Ovidian scenes on the ceiling of the Sala delle Nozze (i.e., the bridal chamber) of Agostino Chigi in the Villa Farnesina in Rome. His reason was doubtless to use the episode as a cautionary tale to protect his patron and his bride from envy. In his series of engravings after Ovid's Metamorphoses (1589), Hendrik Goltzius devotes three plates to the story of Herse and Aglauros. Goltzius concentrates on the love of Mercury and Herse, treating Aglauros as a malefactor who has to be dealt with. In the first plate, Goltzius represents Mercury flying above a procession that includes Herse. In the second plate, Minerva visits the den of Envy. The third plate shows three separate scenes. In the middle distance, within the house of Cecrops and his daughters, Envy visits Aglauros to poison her. In the background, Aglauros blocks Mercury on the threshold. Finally, in the foreground, Mercury visits the bed of Herse, in contrast with Ovid's narrative.

Paolo Veronese, in his Mercury, Herse, and Aglauros in the Fitzwilliam Museum in Cambridge, England, and Nicolas Poussin, in his painting of the same subject in the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris, treated the subject in a single scene. Veronese emphasizes the metamorphosis of Aglauros, adding a figure of Envy concealed behind a curtain. His Herse, seated at a table and with single breast exposed, is remarkably smug. The little dog at her feet may be emblematic of Envy. Poussin chose to cast his subjects in heroic nudity, emphasizing a voluptuous Herse and a graceful Mercury, but played down the psychological element. Renaissance treatments of the subject as an amorous mythology contrast with the greater psychological complexity of later interpretations, such as that of Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson. In a drawing in Montargis, France, Girodet-Trioson depicted the amorous encounter of Mercury and Herse as a dream of the distraught Aglauros.

Ovid's Envy was depicted on her own in works by Andrea Alciati, Cesare Ripa, and others and attained canonical status in the Renaissance and Baroque periods. Pieter Bruegel the Elder represented Envy among his Seven Deadly Sins, showing a personification of the Ovid-Alciati type surrounded by images of desolation that support Melanie Klein's notion of the oral- and anal-sadistic nature of envy. Bruegel's image also shows an abundance of shoe imagery, which commentators have attributed to the proverbial use of shoes as signifiers of social class (H. Arthur Klein, p. 193).

A well-known but enigmatic allegory of envy was presented by Andrea Mantegna in his engraving Battle of the Sea Gods.

A fearsome hag with wrinkled breasts rises above a group of battling men and tritons. In her left hand, the hag holds a tablet inscribed "INVID," presumably identifying her as Envy. She has been seen here as the demonic force behind the combat of otherwise peaceful folk (Förster). Possibly related to Mantegna's Envy is the figure of an old woman who stands as a disapproving presence between two groups of amorous nude couples in an engraving by Cristofano Robetta, known as an Allegory of Envy. In his catalog of the Washington exhibition of Italian engravings, J. Levenson asked, "Is she envious of the two amorous couples standing beside her? Or is she a personification of Envy, whose influence is responsible for the apparent discord between the lovers at the right?" (p. 298).

Other stories that may also represent envy (numerous examples of which are provided by Burton and others) are Cain and Abel (Genesis 4: for favor with God; see above); Rachel and Leah (Genesis 30: for ability to bear children); Joseph and his brothers (Genesis 37: for favor with the father); Saul and David (I Samuel 18: for military prowess) and, elsewhere, David himself (Psalm 73: for the prosperity of the wicked); Jeremiah (12:1: prosperity of the wicked); Habakkuk (1: prosperity of the wicked); Aglauros (see above); Myrsine (Constantine, Agricultus, 2.7 [Burton]: murdered by the Athenian women for her beauty); Laïs (Plutarch, Opera Moralia, 768A: murdered for her beauty); Salonina, wife of Caecina (Tacitus, Histories, 2.20: for her horse and her furniture); and Domitian and Agricola (Tacitus, Histories, 2.6: a case of luxury).

Giorgio Vasari's Life of Michelangelo describes the powerful force that envy represented in the lives of many artists of the Renaissance, especially Michelangelo. Because his genius had so thoroughly triumphed over his detractors, Michelangelo's catafalque bore, among other allegories, an image of Minerva, or Art, standing over Envy ("a shriveled hag with viperous eyes . . ."). Subsequent artists, such as Ludovico Cigoli, Salvator Rosa, and Pietro Testa, incorporated Envy into their works in important autobiographical contexts. Cigoli left two drawings depicting an Allegory of Envy, now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy (Chappell). Whether both drawings be interpreted as an expression of the artist's regard for Galileo—like the painter a victim of Envy—or as an autobiographical record of Cigoli's own troubles with his rivals, they depict the stately figure of a female nude (Virtus) crowned with laurel and hands transformed into laurel branches. At her feet is a thicket of thorns and in the shadow a burning figure of Ovidian Envy. The meaning is plain enough: virtue or talent assaulted by Envy. Salvator Rosa wrote a satire, Invidia, describing how his attempt to write his name in the Temple of Fame was blocked by Envy. In his poem, Rosa described the efforts of the classical painter Apelles to overcome his detractors by painting a self-referential allegory known as the Calumny of Apelles. N. R. Fabbri has attempted to see a reflection of such an allegorical painting contemplated by Rosa in his illustrated frontispiece made for Carlo de' Rossi. Pietro Testa, who died a suicide, is believed to have been a melancholic and a victim of envy. In numerous allegories of painting and the arts in general, Testa introduces envy as a force inimical to the artist. In an etching known as The Triumph of Painting on Parnassus, the chariot on which Painting rides rolls over Envy (i.e., here in the Petrarchan sense as the "companion of Fame") as the latter attempts to grasp the wheel. Art historian Elizabeth Cropper has shown how Testa came to the aid of his teacher Domenichino, another of Envy's victims. When the painter Giovanni Lanfranco accused Domenichino of stealing from Agostino Caracci for his Last Communion of St. Jerome, Testa identified Envy as the real author of the charge. A print of Domenichino's painting by Testa's nephew, Giovanni Cesare Testa, bears this inscription (presumably reflecting Pietro Testa's opinion): "The work of the great Domenichino. . . . It forces Envy to marvel and be silent" (Cropper, pp. 122–124). Cropper points to the life of Michelangelo as the paradigm for later artists who experienced the destructive effects of envy.

See also Calumny; Evil Eye; Fame; Humors; Melancholy

Selected Works of Art

Envy as an Allegorical Figure

Confictus Virtutum et Vitiorum, illustrated manuscript, from Moissac, eleventh century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France (Ms. Lat. 2077, fol. 166v left)

Mantegna, Andrea, Battle of the Sea Gods, engraving, circa 1485–1488

Dürer, Albrecht, Melancholia I, engraving, 1514

Robetta, Cristofano, Allegory of Envy, engraving, circa 1520

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Envy, etching from The Seven Deadly Sins, circa 1557

Goltzius, Hendrik, Envy, etching from Jacques Callot, 1924–1927, Paris

Callot, Jacques, Envy, from The Seven Deadly Sins, etching, circa 1620

Rubens, Peter Paul, Divine Love Chasing Envy and Calumny, drawing for a tapestry, before 1640, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Testa, Pietro, The Triumph of Painting on Parnassus, etching, circa 1644

Cadmus, Paul, The Seven Deadly Sins: Envy, egg tempera on pressed wood panel, 1945–1949, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Envy Exemplified

Veronese, Paolo, Mercury, Herse, and Aglauros, oil painting, circa 1576–1580, Cambridge, Fitzwilliam Museum

Goltzius, Hendrik, Mercury Enamored of Herse, Daughter of Cecrops; Minerva Commanding Envy; Mercury Entering Herse's Room After Changing Aglauros to Stone, engravings, 1589

Spada, Leonello, Cain Killing Abel, oil on canvas, circa 1615, Naples, Museo e Gallerie Nazionali de Capodimonte

Poussin, Nicolas, Mercury, Herse, and Aglauros, oil painting, circa 1625, Paris, École des Beaux-Arts

Ripa, Cesare, "Invidio-Neid," Joseph and His Brothers, from Iconologia, edited by J. G. Hertel

Lagrenée, Louis-Jean-François, Aglauros Tries to Hinder Mercury's Suit of Herse, oil painting, 1767, Stockholm, Sweden, Nationalmuseum

Girodet-Trioson, Anne-Louis, The Dream of Aglauros, drawing, before 1824, Montargis, France

Further Reading

- Alciati, Andrea, Emblemata, Patauii, Italy: Apud P. P. Tozzium, 1621; New York: Garland, 1976
- Bacon, Francis, Essays, "Of Envy"
- Burton, Robert, The Anatomy of Melancholy, Oxford: Henry Cripps, 1621
- Chappell, M., "Cigoli, Galileo, and Invidia," The Art Bulletin 57 (1975)
- Cropper, Elizabeth, The Ideal of Painting: Pietro Testa's Düsseldorf Notebook, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1984
- Eliasoph, Philip, "Paul Cadmus at Ninety: The Virtues of Depicting Sin," American Arts Quarterly XII:2 (Spring 1995)
- Fabbri, N. R., "Salvator Rosa's Engraving for Carlo de' Rossi and his Satire, Invidia," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 33 (1970)
- Foster, George M., "The Anatomy of Envy: A Study in Symbolic Behavior," Current Anthropology 13 (1972)
- Förster, R., "Die Meergötter des Mantegna," Jahrbuch der preussischen Kunstsammlungen 23 (1902)
- Joukovsky, Françoise, La gloire dans la poésie française et néolatine du XVI Siècle, Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 1969
- Klein, H. Arthur, Graphic Worlds of Peter Bruegel the Elder, New York: Dover, 1963
- Klein, Melanie, Envy and Gratitude, London: Tavistock, 1957
- Kramer, H., and J. Sprenger, The Malleus Maleficarum, translated by M. Summers, London: Allen Lane, 1928
- Levenson, J., et al., Early Italian Engravings from the National Gallery of Art, 1973
- Peters, E. H., "Cain and Abel," New Catholic Encyclopedia, 1967
- Ripa, Cesare, "Invidia," Iconologia, London: B. Motle, 1709
- Schapiro, Meyer, "Cain's Jaw-Bone that Did the First Murder," The Art Bulletin 24 (1942)

EVIL EYE

Eugene Dwyer

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Evil Eye:

ANCIENT

RENAISSANCE

The Evil Eye Attacked by Its Enemies, circa A.D. 200, marble relief, Woburn
Abbey, from Archaeologia, vol. 19 (1821), plate VI, facing page 74. (Courtesy of the author)

Despite its name, the evil eye is not a reified concept but a widespread pattern of symbolic behavior consisting of envy avoidance practices that are more or less comparable in their social and psychic elements. The Greeks knew it as baskania (literally, envy), the Romans as fascinatio (from the Greek), and modern Italians as mal'occhio (evil eye) and jettatura (casting or ejaculation).

Fundamental to the belief in the evil eye is the notion that the eyes or the sight of those harboring envy have the power to do harm, even if unintentionally. However, the real psychic power comes from the guilt of the person who thinks he or she has done something deserving of envy. As a result, the “victim” invests persons who may be suspected of harboring envy with an occult power.

Belief in the evil eye is remarkably widespread and remarkably consistent throughout the world (Maloney, intro.). This near universality has been explained by attributing the basis of the phenomenon to early childhood experience, specifically to the infant's nurture at the mother's breast and to weaning. This thesis draws from the belief that the destructive effects of the evil eye are most generally characterized as a loss of fluid (e.g., the mother's loss of milk) through desiccation. The eye is, in effect, a substitute for the breast: the “good” breast or the “bad” breast.

A psychological construct of such importance to individuals and societies naturally plays a significant role in the representational arts throughout the world and throughout history. Anything resembling the breasts and eyes in art or in nature is apt to be caught up in a complex association of related symbols. The sun may appear as an eye, harmful in its power to wither young plants and dry up life-giving moisture. Also, as a consequence of these fundamental psychological associations, the imagery of the breast and the eye is inevitably charged with the emotions of pleasure and abundance on the one hand and envy and scarcity on the other. Perhaps because the belief in the evil eye is a psychological projection—from the person who believes him- or herself the victim on the person believed to be the evildoer—many symbols of the evil eye are ambivalent. Writing of ancient remedies against the eye, scholar Campbell Bonner noted, the commonest of all amulets to ward off the evil eye consists of the apotropaic design which has been found on numerous monuments, and which, though subject to slight variations, remains the same through several centuries. It represents the eye, wide open, subjected to various injuries and assailed by a variety of animals, birds, and reptiles. (p. 97)

A relief of Roman imperial times from Woburn Abbey in England depicts the familiar eye assaulted by a collection of symbols, namely, a defecator (cf. Dundes, p. 289, and Holloway, p. 449, n. 14), a gladiator with trident, a lion, a serpent, a scorpion, a stork (or crane?), and a raven. A number of similar amulets are reproduced by Frederic Thomas Elworthy, an early writer on the evil eye (pp. 129–132). The animals—which also include a lizard, a goose, a cock, a dog, a tortoise, a frog, an owl, and a stag as well as a thunderbolt, a star, and a phallus—are reminiscent of the “allies” of the Roman sun-god Mithras in the tauroctony, the bull killing (i.e., raven, dog, serpent, and scorpion). The eye appears by itself, unassaulted, with a scene of ships entering the harbor at Ostia in a relief in the Museo Torlonia in Rome. Its function is apparently “to avert ill fortune” (Meiggs, pl. XX).

The iconography of the evil eye consists mainly of talismanic emblems intended to protect the bearer or user from harm. Recognizing that a pictured gesture or motive was intended to perform such a protective function may be problematic because such recognition depends on understanding a given work's intended function within a specific cultural context. Prehistoric works may be tentatively interpreted by analogy with those utilized in better-known social contexts. For example, the use of maze patterns to confound the evil eye in some Italian and Greek contexts (e.g., in the modern region of Puglia in Italy), including ancient Pompeii, may suggest a similar explanation for certain uses of the interlinked spiral in the prehistoric art of the Aegean and in the use of continuous meanders in certain Greek Geometric contexts.

Representations of the eyes themselves and frontal faces may have served to protect against the evil eye in archaic and classical Greece (Bonfante). Attic “eye cups” and skyphoi of the “glaux” (i.e., “owl”) type may have protected drinkers, who by tradition are most vulnerable to envy. In Greek myth, the tale of the snake-haired Gorgon Medusa embodies the awesome powers of the evil eye more than any other. The horrid face of this Gorgon was supposed to cause death to the unwary person whose eye caught it, but it was also a powerful amulet against the power of the evil eye. Only this belief can account for the popularity of the gorgoneion (or Medusa head) throughout the ancient world from the Archaic period of Greece to the end of the Roman Empire. Associated iconographically with the aegis, the ultimate in defensive armor, the gorgoneion might have been expected to ward off anything. Its visual properties made it ideal for defending against ocular assault. Its use as a talisman is evident in gems, especially “gnostic” gems.

The Romans used other masks, especially those of the drama, as amulets. In addition to numerous ring stones that bear the masks of the stage, many hanging masks of marble, known as oscilla, were found in the houses of Pompeii suspended from the rafters of garden porticoes. Disk- and crescent-shaped shields were also found in the same context, suggesting an apotropaic function for these symbols as well (Dwyer).

The bulla amulet, a hollow gold ball worn at the neck, protected its Etruscan and Roman wearers from the evil eye. A knotted leather cord was an alternative for the less wealthy. In the late republic and early empire, such ornaments were worn by young boys until the age of manhood. The Latin author Macrobius wrote during the fourth century A.D. that bullae had earlier been worn by triumphators as a safeguard against envy (Saturnalia, I, 6, 9). Similar talismans were worn by young women until marriage (Guhl and Koner, p. 744).

Exposed male or female genitalia have also been considered protection from the evil eye. Archaeologist Larissa Bonfante suggested that evil-eye avoidance might account for some ancient uses of nude figures generally and for specific exposures of the breast, vulva, and penis. The Greek goddess Nemesis, the agent and embodiment of the gods' own displeasure with human excess, was often invoked for protection against the evil eye. Even as early as the classical period, Nemesis was represented grasping the neck of her garment, a gesture that was associated with spitting on the breast as a protection against the eye (Legrand). The excavations of Herculaneum and Pompeii have produced a large number of terra-cotta figures that expose themselves in many ingenious ways. The purpose of such figures was presumably to cause laughter and thus confound the malicious. One type depicts a drunken woman who reveals her breasts (inv. 124844). Although intended as a bottle, it was being used as a decoration in the garden of a house at the time of Mount Vesuvius's eruption. Different in spirit, although probably not in apotropaic purpose, is a terra-cotta jug of a young woman giving her breast to a frail old man, called Cimon (Micon?) and Pero, or Caritas Romana (inv. 22580, 124846) after a story told by Valerius Maximus: "The eyes of men adhere and marvel when they behold the painted image of this deed" (V, iv, ext. 1). The subject also appears in numerous Roman wall paintings and in Renaissance paintings. Valerius Maximus considered the subject exemplary of filial piety, but the maker and the owner of the jug probably viewed it as a symbol of exposure and of nurture especially appropriate to the table and as a protection against the envious eye.

Archaeologist R. Ross Holloway argued that groups of copulating figures appearing in the decoration of the Tomb of the Bulls in Tarquinia, Italy, protected the owner of the tomb from the evil eye even after death. There is little doubt that the Pompeians employed representations of the phallus (either disembodied or as part of the nude or partially clad male or hermaphroditic figure) as emblems against the evil eye and as concomitant charms for acquiring wealth. The naked putti that abound in Pompeian decoration may well have been viewed as talismanic by their owners. Many of these, used as fountain figures in the garden, were associated with life-giving water (Kaposy, pp. 74–75).

Priapus, the god of gardens and male generative power, was the protector of property and prosperity par excellence. His image was frequently displayed in the houses of Pompeii and Herculaneum as a sign of good fortune, and he was the subject of a collection of "leveling" verses, the Carmina Priapea. Occasionally, as in a painting prominently placed in the vestibule of the house of the Vettii, Priapus is shown wearing a Phrygian cap and an oriental robe indicating his Asian origin. In this painting, he holds a pair of scales in which he weighs his own phallus against a sack of coins. A basket of fruit is placed on the ground next to his feet. At Pompeii and in Roman art generally, Priapus was a member of the cortege of Bacchus, the god of wine. This group of licentious, carefree drunkards, like Priapus, protected vulnerable drinkers from harm.

Hunchbacks and dwarfs with large genitalia constitute another genre that may have performed an apotropaic function. Their ugliness tended to provoke laughter or perhaps aesthetic injury to the eye, thus protecting the owner and bringing fortune (Fowler). One terra-cotta statuette from Herculaneum (Naples Archaeological Museum, Italy, inv. 27857) shows a grotesque old man dressed as a bulla-wearing schoolboy. His bald, low-browed, large-eared head and his enormous member reveal his true identity as Priapus. As he tugs at his bulla (recalling a similar gesture of the goddess Nemesis), he signals protection against the evil eye. Other dwarfs with enormous phalli (or phalli with appended dwarfs) were cast in bronze and fitted with chains and rings for suspension from rafters or from trees. Small bells were suspended from them for additional protection.

Finger gestures are a practical substitute for genital display. The cornua (a gesture that disguises a representation of the vulva between a pair of horns) has been used for protection in Italy continuously from Etruscan times to the present. This gesture is made by a dancer in the Tomb of the Lionesses in Tarquinia and in certain portraits on Volterranean urns (where it is disguised as a hand holding an inverted phiale). Another "vulva" gesture found in Hellenistic-Roman sculpture is that made by joining the index finger and thumb and extending the three remaining fingers of the hand. This gesture is supposed to have been a cult gesture of Venus, the goddess of love. Hands or gesturing hands were common as amulets in ancient Pompeii and are common today in Naples. The most popular gesture, both then and now, is a fist with the thumb protruding between the clenched index and middle fingers (Ovid, Fasti, V, 433). Another gesture may be represented in the "Sabazius" or "pantheistic" hands found in Pompeii and Herculaneum (Elia). These hands raise the index and middle fingers while closing the ring and little fingers. A magnificent bronze tripod (inv. 27874) found in the first excavations of Pompeii and now in the Naples Museum shows three satyrs with erect phalli. Each holds his right hand on his hip with the index, middle, and little fingers extended and the ring finger curled under while extending the left hand palm outward in an "averting" gesture. Each of the fauns is thus triply apotropaic.

Holloway accounted for the presence of certain animals, such as bulls and lions (or lionesses) in Etruscan tombs, as protection from the evil eye. He also explained the presence of the leopards in the Gorgon Pediment from the archaic temple of Artemis, the Greek moon goddess, in Corfu, Greece, as part of an amalgam of symbols designed to thwart the evil eye. Other symbols present are the Gorgon herself and two groups in which Zeus dispatches an opponent by piercing him with a sword or spear—piercing being treated as another traditional threat to the eye. Among the animals that offered protection against the eye, the stork was doubly powerful. Its long bill was a natural enemy of the eye, as depicted in the Woburn Abbey relief. The bill was its chief weapon in combating evil animals such as the serpent, a victory celebrated in an Aesopian fable by Babrius and in many works of Roman art. The heads of storks commonly appear on Roman silver as subsidiary ornaments, such as handle attachments. Two fine cups from the Boscoreale silver treasure are devoted entirely to scenes of storks feeding crabs, snakes, and the like to their young. A scene of nurture by an apotropaic animal is especially relevant to the function of the vessel on which it appears. Perhaps even more appropriate to the object that they decorate are the two storks attacking serpents that they will feed to their nearby young. This is found on a pair of gladiator's greaves from Pompeii.

Christian art subsumed, if it did not wholly replace, pagan talismans against the evil eye. The cults of St. Sebastian and St. Roch, both protectors against the plague, were (and still are) considered efficacious against the evil eye because they are believed to work by a similar contagion. Some current symbols used in Italy, such as "la sirena," the mermaid with split tail joined above her head, are not specifically Christian. Others are "Gobbo," the hunchback, and the ubiquitous red pepper.

Elworthy noted the appearance of several apotropaic hand gestures like the cornua in the Ravenna mosaics of the fifth and sixth centuries. Art historian Regina Stefaniak suggested plausibly that Andrea Mantegna's Madonna della Vittoria (1496) "presents . . . a complicated icon, thick with remedies against the evil eye, including coral branches, beads and rosaries, an eye-patterned agate throne, and a carbuncle-centered dossal decorated with more coral" (p. 215). Such talismanic protection would have been especially appropriate for the triumphant Francesco Gonzaga, who was exposed to envy from, among others, the Jews, who had been obliged to bear the expense of the commission.

With the growing fame of individual artists in the Renaissance, the theme of envy and enchantment enters into the biographical tradition. The young Leonardo da Vinci, as described by Giorgio Vasari, displayed much interest in subjects related to the evil eye, such as the head of Medusa and knotted cords. Vasari explicitly attributes to envy the malicious efforts made during Leonardo's lifetime to attack his propensity for leaving projects incomplete. One such incident recorded in the Life of Leonardo involves his lengthy commission painting The Last Supper for the Dominicans in Milan, Italy. Accused by the prior of the order of inactivity, Leonardo had his revenge by depicting the unfortunate man as Judas. Leonardo's gesture was all the more effective to his contemporaries because figures of Judas were known to cast the evil eye (Gombrich, p. 113).

The iconography of the evil eye, mainly restricted to talismans, appears in art only as a series of esoteric motifs. Although a popular hermeneutic tradition exists, only in discussions of the art of Etruria and Pompeii have scholars reached much consensus on this subject.

See also Bacchanalia/Orgy; Envy; Excess; Gaze; Masks/Personae

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Gorgon Pediment, from Temple of Artemis in Corfu, Greece
Tomb of the Bulls, fresco, sixth century B.C., Tarquinia, Italy

Tomb of Lionesses, fresco, sixth century B.C., Tarquinia, Italy
Hunchback, bronze statuette from Alexandria, Hellenistic Period, Hamburg, Germany, Museum für Kunst und Gewerbe Hamburg

Priapus as Schoolboy, terra-cotta, statuette from Herculaneum, before A.D. 79, Naples, Italy, Museo
 Archeologico Nazionale

Pair of Gladiator's Bronze Greaves, Pompeii, before A.D. 79, Naples, Italy, Museo Archeologico Nazionale

Pair of Silver Cups with Storks, from Boscoreale, before A.D.
 79, presently in Paris, Louvre

Wall Plaques with Phalli, terra-cotta reliefs, before A.D. 79,
 Pompeii, Italy

Ithyphallic Tintinnabula, bronze, before A.D. 79, Naples,
 Italy, Museo Archeologico Nazionale

The Evil Eye Attacked by Its Enemies, marble relief, Roman imperial period, circa 200, Woburn, England, Woburn Abbey

Torlonia Harbor Relief, marble from Portus, Roman Imperial period, Rome, Museo Torlonia

Renaissance

Mantegna, Andrea, Madonna della Vittoria, canvas, 1496,
 Paris, Louvre

Further Reading

Arditi, Michele, Il fascino e l'amuleto contro del fascino presso gli antichi: illustrazione di un antico basso-rilievo rinvenuto in un forno della città di Pompei, Naples, Italy:
 Dalla Stamperia reale, 1825

Bonfante, Larissa, "Nudity as Costume in Classical Art,"
American Journal of Archaeology 93 (1989)

Bonner, Campbell, *Studies in Magical Amulets, Chiefly Greco-
 Roman*, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1950

Deonna, Waldemar, Le symbolisme de l'oeil, Bern,
 Switzerland: Editions Francke, 1965

Di Stasi, Lawrence, Mal Occhio: The Underside of Vision,
 San Francisco, California: North Point Press, 1981

Dundes, Alan, The Evil Eye: A Folklore Casebook, New York: Garland, 1981

Dwyer, Eugene, "Pompeian Oscilla Collections," *Mitteilungen des deutschen archaologischen Instituts, Roemische
 Abteilung*, 88 (1981)

Elia, Olga, "Vasi magici e mani pantee a Pompei," *Rendiconti dell'Accademia di Archeologia, Lettere e Belle Arti di
 Napoli* XXXV (1960)

Elworthy, Frederic Thomas, The Evil Eye, London: J. Murray, 1895

Fowler, Barbara Hughs, The Hellenistic Aesthetic, Madison:
 University of Wisconsin Press, 1989

Gombrich, Ernst H., Art and Illusion, London: Phaidon, 1960; Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969

Guhl, Ernst Karl, and Wilhelm Koner, Leben der Griechen und Römer, Berlin: Weidmann, 1860; sixth edition, 1893

Holloway, R. Ross, "The Bulls in the Tomb of the Bulls at Tarquinia," American Journal of Archaeology 90 (1986)

- Kapossy, Brunnenfiguren der hellenistischen und römische Zeit, Zurich, Switzerland: Juris Verlag, 1969
- Lafaye, Georges, "Fascinum, Fascinus," in Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines, C. Daremberg and E. Saglio, eds., Paris: Hachette, 1896
- Legrand, A., "Nemesis," in Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines, C. Daremberg and E. Saglio, eds., Paris: Hachette, 1896
- Levi, D., "The Evil Eye and the Lucky Hunchback" in Antioch on the Orantes, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1941
- Maloney, Clarence, ed., The Evil Eye, New York: Columbia University Press, 1976
- Maximus, Valerius, Factorum dictorumque memorabilium, London: A. J. Valpy, 1823
- Meiggs, Russell, Roman Ostia, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1960
- Migliore, Sam, Mal'oucchiu: Ambiguity, Evil Eye, and the Language of Distress, Toronto, Ontario, Canada: University of Toronto Press, 1997
- Mulas, Antonia, Eros in Antiquity, New York: Erotic Art Book Society, 1978
- Perry, B. E., ed., Babrius and Phaedrus, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1965; London: W. Heinemann, 1965
- Pirzio, Lucia, and Biroli Stefanelli, et al., L'argento dei Romani: vasellame da tavola e d'apparto, Rome: L'Erma di Bretschneider, 1991
- Pompeii: Treasures From the National Archaeological Museum, Naples, and the Pompeii Antiquarium*, Boston: Museum of Fine Arts, 1978
- Saglio, Edmond, "Bulla" in Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines, C. Daremberg and E. Saglio, eds., Paris: Hachette, 1896
- Shapiro, Harvey Allen, "Notes on Greek Dwarfs," American Journal of Archaeology 88 (1984)
- Siebers, Tobin, The Mirror of Medusa, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983
- Stefaniak, Regina, "Correggio's Camera di San Paolo: An Archaeology of the Gaze," Art History 16 (1993)

EXCESS

Eugene Dwyer

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Excess:

ANCIENT

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH–NINETEENTH CENTURY

MODERN

Eugène Delacroix, The Death of Sardanapalus, 1827–1828, oil on canvas, Paris, Louvre.
(Courtesy of Giraudon/Art Resource, New York)

The iconographic category of excess includes the ancient Greek terms koros (superfluity), hybris (excessive pride), and hyperbole (exaggeration); particularly the Latin term luxuria (excess); the French outrance (excess); and others. The concept of excess is predicated on the concept of natural limit. In classical European thought, all forms of life, both plant and animal, are governed by strict laws to which they must conform. Humans alone have the ability to transgress natural limits or limits set by God. Thus, human offenses against natural limitation constitute moral or legal offenses. The dual standard that exists for humans as opposed to all other forms of life results in some strange linguistic conventions. For example, in Greek, the quality of hybris may be found in spirited horses or in a fast river but in humans only as a moral flaw. Similarly, in classical Roman thought, the concept of human moral excess (luxuria) is linked with the morally neutral concept of natural abundance, especially the abundance of vegetation. Luxuria is thus permitted to the realms of flora and fauna while it is denied to humans.

The Greeks and Romans thought that excess was characteristic not only of nature but also of the marginal peoples of the world, who often were portrayed as giants or as having more offspring than civilized peoples. These qualities were attributed to the Germanic peoples at various times before and after the fall of Rome, although Edward Gibbon sensed the real reason: "The innumerable swarms that issued, or seemed to issue, from the great storehouse of nations [Germany], were multiplied by the fears of the vanquished and by the credulity of succeeding ages" (The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, 1776, vol. I, p. 194).

The giants who sought to capture Olympus and overturn the order of the world embodied excessive violence. Their failed attempt, born of hybris, and their defeat by the Olympians, is the subject of the Gigantomachy, or the Battle of Gods and Giants, shown most notably in the metopes of the east facade of the Parthenon (circa 445 B.C.), on the interior surface of the shield of Athena Parthenos as sculpted by Phidias, and later in the sculpted frieze of the Altar of Zeus, at Pergamum (second century B.C.). In the earlier archaic representations of the Gigantomachy (e.g., the north frieze of the Siphnian Treasury at Delphi, Greece, circa 525 B.C.), the giants were depicted as an organized military force (i.e., combat à outrance). Later, with Phidias, they were shown as antirational, chthonic, terrestrial forces deployed against the heavens (Vian, pp. 149–150, passim). This change to a moral allegorical interpretation resulted in changes in the depictions of the giants. With Phidias, the giants begin to carry animal skins or fight entirely in the nude (Vian, p. 148). Judging from surviving monuments that reflect the shield of Athena Parthenos, the giants were arrayed within a lower circle (or sphere) against the Olympians in an upper or an outer circle. The giants fought with great stones, attempting either to hurl them or to pile them atop one another in an effort to reach the heavens. Thus, their defeat is, from the time of Phidias, characterized as the victory of order and rationality over disorder and excess.

Most related to the human concept of excess are the appetites for violence and sensual indulgence (seen as two extremes of human activity) in that sensual indulgence is thought to enervate. Ironically, the metaphor of oral consumption extends to both extremes, even to the sphere of violence, as in the "thirst for blood." Historically, the Greek poets Homer and Hesiod seem to have taken more notice of excesses of violence than those of sensuality. Later, with increasing attention to personal morality, poets like Callinus of Ephesus in Asia Minor (flourishing in the mid-seventh century B.C.) condemned sensual indulgence because it sapped the potential for war. Presumably addressing a group of idle young men of the city, he railed,

How long do you intend to lie about? Will you ever be of strong heart, young men? Are you not ashamed to lie so excessively [lian] idle before your neighbors? . . .
(Fragment 1, 1–3)

The term koros (surfeit) is used neutrally by Homer: "There is a limit [koros] for all things, even sleep and sex" (Iliad, XIII, 636). However, later moralists saw koros as an inherent evil and so personified it as a vice. Solon called koros the father of hybris (i.e., of "overweening pride") (Fragment 5, 9D). Pindar called hybris the mother of koros (Olympian, XIII, 10). Herodotus—or the seer Bacis, quoted by him in Book VIII of Histories—agreed, referring to the Persians' designs on Athens in the line "Hybris, the rough-spoken mother of koros." In fact, it is a recurring motif in Herodotus that the Persians are affected by hybris, as they are by koros: They are continually guilty of transgressing the moral limits set for human beings (i.e., Greeks) and thus resemble the giants.

Limits set for humans can be defined in terms of divinely ordained "human nature" or in terms of a mean between two extremes. The Greek adages "The mean is best" (metron ariston) and "Nothing in excess" (meden agan) provided classic ethical formulations of the concept of excess. These moral precepts were associated with Delphic Apollo, the god of prophecy, whence Apollo came to represent the principle of moderation and Dionysus, his alter ego, the principle of excess. Artistic expression of the "Delphic maxim" can be seen most notably in the sculpture of the west pediment of the Temple of Zeus at Olympia, Greece. Here, drunken centaurs are shown assaulting Lapith women and boys—an act of hybris punished by the heroes Theseus and Pirithous and by Apollo himself.

The concept of excess is also expressed in the form of mythical examples in ancient art. Those who during their lifetimes transgressed moral or natural limits (Ixion, Sisyphus, and Orion) and were punished in Hades for their sins were favorite subjects in the visual arts. Because the concept of excess (luxuria) is essentially a moral concept, it is most appropriately represented in allegorical or symbolic imagery, that is, imagery drawn from the imagination rather than from nature. As an allegory or personification, Excess (Latin Luxuria) may be represented as a vice (van de Waal, pp. 11–36).

Following Hesiod, fifth-century philosopher Prodicus (recalling the judgment of Paris) characterized the choice offered to the young Hercules between Virtue and Vice as the choice between two women, one natural and the other adorned (i.e., transgressing natural limits). By representing Vice as a wealthy temptress, Prodicus established the pattern for many subsequent depictions of the eroticized Excess (Xenophon, Memorabilia, 2.1.21). The first-century A.D. Pinax, falsely attributed to Cebes of Thebes, purported to be a description of a painting of an allegory of human life, including numerous temptresses in the fashion of Prodicus, Fortune being the most prominent. Like Prodicus's Vice, the pseudo-Cebes's Fortune is possessed of two natures, one good (to those who receive her gifts) and one bad (to those from whom she takes away). After Fortune, and allied with her, come Incontinence (Akrasia), Prodigality (Asotia), Greed (Aplestia), and Flattery (Kolakeia) to complete her work. All these specific vices were to be subsumed under the Roman concept of Excess (Luxuria).

The evils of excess notwithstanding, the Greeks also believed that moderation might be a cruel deity and that excess had its redeeming qualities. Where Socrates, in his moderation, was a victim sacrificed to Apollo by a populace given to excess, Alexander the Great was destroyed by his own excess, a victim to Dionysus. In reality, Alexander probably died of a fever brought on by excessive celebration, but in the romanticized biographical tradition that sprang up following his death, he became the model of the mortal ruler who probed and exceeded the limits set for humanity. He passed the physical limits of the world known to the Greeks by crossing the Indus River in the east, by ascending into the air in a chariot drawn by griffins, and by descending into the sea in a diving bell. Alexander's desires to exceed the known limits resulted in a personalized pothos (desire), or longing for immortality. In his portraits, this characteristic was expressed as an upward turn of the head, an elevation of the features, and a flamelike eruption of the hair (i.e., the anastole). Many Hellenistic monarchs subsequently imitated Alexander—and Dionysus.

Chief among the adherents of excess for reasons of religious statecraft were Ptolemy II, called Philadelphus because of his marriage to his sister Arsinoe II (incest being previously forbidden to humans despite its practice by the Olympians), and Mark Antony, who, as consort of Queen Cleopatra of Egypt, consciously stepped out of the role of Roman citizen and into the role of Dionysus. Ptolemy's Alexandrian excesses were memorably enacted and recorded in a procession (described by Athenaeus) that took place from the appearance of the morning star to that of the evening star—an astronomical impossibility. The same monarch competed in architectural excesses with legendary Eastern rulers such as Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus. Honors given to statesmen that rightly belonged only to the gods are the objects of Plutarch's diatribes in his lives of Demetrius and Antony. The excesses of Antony and Cleopatra were a favorite subject of Renaissance painters (e.g., Cecchino Salviati, Paolo Veronese, and others; see Reinach, p. 160).

Paul Veyne described the concept of excess in Roman culture (with Horace as the most eloquent spokesman) as a "philosophical anthropology . . . hinged on the notion of extravagance." According to Veyne, the most widespread form of excess is greed, the desire for wealth. The Greeks categorized very neatly three specific temptations to excess in the myth of the judgment of Paris. Of the three goddesses among whom Paris must choose, ancient allegorists saw Aphrodite, the goddess of love, representing erotic desire; Hera, the consort of Zeus, representing desire for wealth; and Athena, the goddess of wisdom, representing desire for knowledge. According to the ancients, no choice was correct because the offended goddesses would surely bring ruin on the hapless Paris. (A similar parable of excess is found in the legend of Faust.)

Although ancient moral philosophers developed the concept of personified excess (i.e., Koros, Luxuria), it was left for the Middle Ages and the Renaissance to develop an iconography of Excess per se. In the schematization of morals that characterized the medieval period, Excess (Luxuria) appeared as a specific vice (e.g., Prudentius, Psychomachia) and as one of the series of deadly sins. The representation of Luxuria by Pieter Bruegel the Elder incorporates the personification (a nude woman being fondled by an enthroned fiend) into a bizarre landscape filled with emblems of lechery inspired by Hieronymus Bosch. Included are objects suggestive of sexual organs (bottles, clamshells, hollow trees, and fountains) and reptilian humans engaged in various forms of sexual behavior. The Latin caption reads, "Excess saps the strength, effeminizes the limbs." The personification of luxury as a temptress also flourished in Italy. A remarkable drawing of Antonio Pisanello depicts Luxury as a nude in a pose of erotic provocation. Despite the lack of a caption, no one has ever had difficulty interpreting this figure as a personification of excess. She gives new meaning to the phrase "action in repose." Quite different is the Luxuria that has been recognized in the figure of Vulcan, the god of fire, in the frescoes by Cosimo Tura in the Sala dei Mesi of the Palazzo Schifanoia in Ferrara, Italy. The astrological program calls for a Triumph of Vulcan, but the figure that dominates the month of September (Libra) is anything but the familiar Olympian. To the left is the cave of the Cyclopes, who are at work on the net at their forge. To the right, Venus lies on a bed with Mars, apparently immobilized and under the eyes of the other Olympians. In the center, a grotesque and effeminate Vulcan, riding atop a car drawn by apes, points at his genitals (or at the agents of his dishonor?) with the index finger of his right hand. By an illogical but familiar transference, the cuckold has become the embodiment of his dishonor, the personification of excess.

Symbolic representations of excess may also take more topical forms through the use of exempla. Illustrative examples may be taken from traditional sources such as the Bible or classical literature. By the late Middle Ages, the subject of Aristotle and Phyllis had become a popular narrative example (fatto) of the moral concept of excess. Similar narrative subjects illustrating the power of women over men were often treated in series of engravings or woodcuts or were enacted in pageants. In addition to classical history and mythology, vulgar proverbs and suggestive objects also served as examples of excess.

Hieronymus Bosch's Garden of Earthly Delights looks like a Triumph of Excess without the personification. Mention has been made above of Bruegel's debt to Bosch for his numerous symbolic depictions of excess. Indeed, no artist has ever treated the subject more effectively than Bosch, who made clever use of natural creatures such as birds, mice, and insects and lush, natural settings as he exploited the paradoxes of human morality, adding bestiality to the sins of excess.

Like classical antiquity, the Renaissance recognized the embodiment of excess in Bacchus above all and even in Venus. Bacchic subjects abound from the end of the fifteenth century. Many, such as Andrea Mantegna's engravings Bacchanal with a Wine Vat (circa 1475) and Bacchanal with Silenus (1475–1480), show the results of drinking to excess. The tradition of such pictures includes Titian's Bacchanal of the Andrians (circa 1520) and finds contemporary expression in Diego Velázquez's The Drunkards (1628). Whereas François Rabelais attempted to find common cause with the ancients in the traditions of abundance and excess in his own country, Dutch painters such as Pieter Aertsen saw an opportunity to express the old ideas in the profuse display of food in their own crowded markets.

An oriental setting offered virtually unrestricted opportunities for the pictorial imagination. From Herodotus to Eugène Delacroix, one of the most important narrative examples of excess has been Sardanapalus, the last Assyrian monarch. In his lifetime, Sardanapalus had lived a paradigmatic life of sensuality. When told that his city, Nineveh, had fallen into the hands of his enemies, he chose to die by having himself burned with his concubines. His story was told and retold by ancient historians, beginning with Herodotus, from which sources it entered into Renaissance pictorial iconography. In the 1758–1760 Hertel edition of Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, the Ripan figure of Lust (Impudicitia, Lussuria) appears with a fatto (i.e., an exemplary scene) illustrating Sardanapalus bedded with his concubines and unmindful of his obligation to his kingdom. Inspired by George Gordon, Lord Byron's, play Sardanapalus (1821), Delacroix painted his monumental Death of Sardanapalus (Salon of 1827–1828) as a psychological study of the cruelty and sensuality embodied in the concept of excess. The oriental venue is consistent with the marginalized giants and barbarians, prodigious of limb and of sexual prowess, found in earlier iconography.

Perhaps the most widely known modern picture of excess is Thomas Couture's Romans of the Decadence (1847). Couture's picture is the visual expression of the Enlightenment historians Montesquieu (Considérations sur les causes de la grandeur des romains et de leur décadence [1734]) and Edward Gibbon (The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire [1776]). Montesquieu wrote,

I believe that the Epicurean sect, introduced into Rome at the end of the Republic, contributed much to the debasement of the heart and spirit of the Romans. (Chapter 10)

Here, all the familiar themes are transferred from the marginal barbarians to the Romans themselves: sensual excess in the form of drink and sex that saps the spirit for making war. The contrast with the rigid morality of earlier Romans is made through the abuse of the stately portraits by the tipsy crowd. The new manners weaken the vitality of the state and will bring on its downfall. The spirit of the Republic calls out for the rejection of this selfish excess.

See also Bacchanalia/Orgy; Choice/Choosing; Luxury; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

- Battle of Gods and Giants*, frieze of Siphnian Treasury, circa 525 B.C., Delphi, Greece
- Phidias, Battle of Gods and Giants, metopes of east facade of Parthenon, circa 445 B.C., Athens, Greece
- Phidias, Athena Parthenos, gold and ivory statue, circa 435 B.C., Athens, Parthenon (lost)
- Altar of Zeus, Pergamum, Greece, second century B.C., Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Renaissance

- Pisanello, Antonio, Luxuria, drawing, before 1455, Vienna, Austria, Albertina
- Tura, Cosimo, September, fresco, circa 1470, Ferrara, Italy, Palazzo Schifanoia, Sala dei Mesi
- Mantegna, Andrea, Bacchanal with a Wine Vat; Bacchanal with Silenus, engravings, circa 1475–1480
- Bosch, Hieronymus, Garden of Earthly Delights, oil on panel, circa 1500, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Titian, Bacchanal of the Andrians, oil on canvas, circa 1520, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Luxuria, engraving by Pieter van der Heyden, 1557

Seventeenth–Nineteenth Century

- Velázquez, Diego, The Drunkards, oil on canvas, 1628, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Ripa, Cesare, "Impudicitia," Iconologia, edited by J. G. Hertel, 1758–1760
- Delacroix, Eugène, The Death of Sardanapalus, oil on canvas, 1827–1828, Paris, Louvre
- Couture, Thomas, Romans of the Decadence, oil on canvas, 1847, Paris, Louvre

Modern

- Cadmus, Paul, The Seven Deadly Sins: Lust, egg tempera on pressed wood panel, 1945–1949, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Further Reading

- Beigbeder, Olivier, "Luxure," Lexique des Symboles, Saint-Leger-Vauban, France: Zodiaque, 1969

- Eliasoph, Philip, "Paul Cadmus at Ninety: The Virtues of Depicting Sin," American Arts Quarterly XII:2 (Spring 1995)
- Hamann, R., "The Girl and the Ram," Burlington Magazine 60:1 (1932)
- Katzenellenbogen, Adolf, Allegories of the Vices and Virtues in Medieval Art, London: Warburg Institute, 1939
- Kosmer, Ellen, "The 'noyous humoure of lecherie'," Art Bulletin 67 (1975)
- Leonardo da Vinci, Scritti scelti, edited by A. M. Brizio, Turin, Italy: Unione tipografica editrice torinese, 1952
- _____, Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci, edited by Jean Paul Richter, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1977
- Orso, Steven Norgaard, Velazquez, Los Borrachos, and Painting at the Court of Philip IV, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Panofsky, Erwin, Hercules am Scheidewege, und andere antike Bildstoffe in der neueren Kunst, Leipzig, Germany: B. G. Teubner, 1930
- Reinach, Salomon, "Essai sur la mythologie figurée et l'histoire profane dans la peinture italienne de la renaissance," Revue archéologique 5:1 (1915)
- Spector, Jack J., Delacroix: The Death of Sardanapalus, New York: Vikings Press, 1974; London: Allen Lane, 1974
- Stettiner, Richard, Die illustrierten Prudentiushandschriften, Berlin: J. S. Preuss, 1895
- van de Waal, Henri, Iconclass: An Iconographic Classification System, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: North Holland, 1973
- Veyne, Paul, From Pagan Rome to Byzantium, in A History of Private Life, edited by P. Ariés and Georges Duby, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap Press, 1987
- Vian, Francis, La guerre des géants: le mythe avant l'époque hellénistique, Paris: Librairie C. Klincksieck, 1952

EXPULSION

Sarah S. Gibson
Paul Grimley Kuntz

The following iconographic narratives and genres are covered in the discussion of the theme Expulsion:

DISCOVERY OF CALLISTO'S PREGNANCY

FALL OF THE REBEL ANGELS

EXPULSION FROM THE GARDEN OF EDEN

EXPULSION OF THE MONEY
CHANGERS

EXPULSION OF HELIODORUS

OTHER EXPULSIONS

GENRE: EXPULSION

GENRE: EMIGRATION

Ford Madox Brown, The Last of England, 1855, oil on canvas, Birmingham, England, Birmingham Museum and Art Gallery. (Courtesy of the Birmingham Museum and Art Gallery)

The act of removing people from their present location, their homes, or their homeland through force or threat of force, commonly called expulsion, occurs in several different contexts in mythology, religious narratives, and history. Many narratives of journeys begin with flight from threat or uncomfortable situations, such as Aeneas fleeing from Troy, the Holy Family embarking on their flight into Egypt, or emigrants leaving the old world for the new. (These narratives are also covered in the essay Journey/Flight.) This essay deals more directly with narratives that focus on the actual act of driving people out of their home or land and the events leading up to these expulsions or emigrations.

In the Christian tradition, the oldest expulsion is that of Satan, or Lucifer, who, with his followers, is expelled from heaven to the lower regions when they rebel against God and try to supplant Him. The story is alluded to in the Old Testament (Isaiah 14:12–21), and Jewish legends about this rebellion were adapted by Christian theologians in the apocryphal Book of Enoch, the New Testament (Revelation 12:7–9), and Jacobus de Voragine's The Golden Legend (circa 1296). The rebel angels are those who had sinned and whose prince, Lucifer, envying Adam, caused him to sin in turn. It was also believed that Adam and Eve had been created so that their offspring would fill the places left vacant by the fallen angels (Gibson, p. 54). Hieronymus Bosch shows the expulsion of Adam and Eve in conjunction with the fall of the rebel angels in two triptychs, the Last Judgment (circa 1485–1500) in the Akademie der Bildenden Künste in Vienna, Austria, and The Haywain (circa 1485–1500) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, thereby effectively linking the two episodes. The fall of the rebel angels seems to have been a favored topic in the sixteenth century as Raphael, Gerard David, Frans Floris, and Pieter Bruegel the Elder painted versions of the theme. Other artistic expressions include William Blake's illustrations to John Milton's Paradise Lost and versions by John Martin and Edward Burne-Jones.

The climax of God's creation of the world is the creation of Adam and Eve (Genesis 1–2). Their story, as depicted in art, is based on the second and third chapters of Genesis: the story in the Garden of Eden. Adam is to tend the Garden and live with the animals, which he names. How and why Adam is given Eve and how they lose paradise through disobedience, are expelled into a cursed world, and cursed with hard labor—man's labor and woman's labor—are stories painted, carved, and reproduced innumerable times. Although different aspects of the story have been symbolized over the centuries, the creation, temptation, fall, and expulsion are inextricably linked.

The expulsion from the Garden of Eden is a primary Christian image, one of the most powerful renditions of which is Masaccio's fresco (1427) in the Brancacci Chapel in Santa Maria del Carmine in Florence, Italy, in which the two protagonists are expelled by a sword-wielding angel. Michelangelo's Expulsion of Adam and Eve (1508–1512) in the Sistine Chapel's ceiling frescoes also eloquently portrays the grief of leaving Eden. Albrecht Dürer, in a woodcut (1510), endows his figures with similar power, and the sword-bearing angel is still present.

Even in medieval times, artists welcomed the opportunity the story offered: to paint, sculpt, or draw the human forms as beautifully as God created the first male and first female, naked and unashamed. We can see these forms in the marble bas-reliefs of the creation in the pilaster of the Cathedral of Orvieto, Italy. The serpent is coiled around the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. Although the serpent, with its long, forked tongue, is speaking to Eve, Adam, equally innocent, reaches out his hand to take the apple. Eve does not seem any more tempted than does Adam; they are equally disobedient. The four rivers of Eden are symbolized as four streams from a central octagonal pool. The boy and girl are caught and questioned by God, and only when the angel with a flaming sword pushes them out does Adam show, by his hand, that he is ashamed of his nakedness. The brutal clubbing to death of Abel, the first murder, seems to be true depravity. Adam and Eve disobeyed and evaded the honest truth, but Cain is the epitome of violence.

We may be tempted to generalize that northern European artists were less comfortable with Adam and Eve in full nakedness, because Hugo van der Goes pictured Adam standing with his hand concealing his genitals while Eve, talking with a human-faced tempter, holds a leafy branch to hide her private parts. Similarly, Dürer's Temptation (1504) has leaves artfully positioned to prevent immodesty. But such a generalization is only partly true of Lucas Cranach the Elder, who also did many temptingly erotic Eves similar to his Venuses. Was lust the fatal fruit? It is not uncommon for lusty men, such as Count Leo Tolstoy, to place the blame on women, who are accused of luring and trapping them.

Should Adam be painted as trying to resist the temptation of the serpent's invitation? Michelangelo's temptation scene in the Sistine Chapel seems to show Eve willingly accepting the fruit while Adam remonstrates. In the expulsion scene in the same fresco, both turn away from the avenging angel, and Eve hides her face in her hands.

In Michelangelo's temptation fresco, the serpent has the face of a woman. Who is she? An interesting account holds that she is the horror of married bliss, the "other woman." It may well be Lilith, the central female in Jewish demonology, sometimes also referred to as the Devil's Wife. According to folklore, she was the female made of clay (like Adam) on the sixth day of creation. But she was unwilling to forgo equality and even disputed the mode of intercourse. She flew off, pronouncing the ineffable name of God (YHWH), and angels had to protect Adam. She bore many evil offspring and tries even now to strangle babies, who, with their mothers, need protection (Sholem, "Lilith").

The Christian story of the expulsion has some precedents. In a painting from Muslim sources, the first man and woman according to Zoroastrian legend are called, respectively, Mesha and Meshyama. They had 50 years of bliss before the evil god Ahriman tempted them with a pomegranate. There is a similar decline from the Age of Gold (so called by Greeks, such as the poet Hesiod), to the ages of Silver and Bronze, and finally to the Age of Iron.

Why are paintings of the temptation and the expulsion so varied iconographically? Because the body language is so brilliantly imaginative. In Tintoretto's The Fall (1550–1553), Eve, holding the tree trunk, leans toward Adam, holding the apple out to him while he leans far back, as though shrinking from the poisoned fruit. In the background, tiny figures flee an angel of light. Probably the grimmest painting of the expulsion is that of Masaccio (1427). The bodies of Adam and Eve evoke a powerful sense of despair (the leaves around their loins were added by another hand).

Cranach painted a Last Judgment in a triptych in which the whole first scene, the left wing, consists of various stages of the story in the Garden of Eden leading to the expulsion. God the judge sits enthroned above. Thus, the fall can be read as a first judgment.

William Blake created a Temptation with several novelties. The tree is of fantastic thorny bark and jagged, exposed roots. Adam is studying the tree's branch while the serpent coils itself around Eve. She responds erotically by caressing the serpent, which, with its mouth, places the fruit in her mouth. Was original sin then a combination of Adam's diversion from the real scene into theory and Eve's fall into bestiality? Thomas Cole's Expulsion from the Garden of Eden (1825) shows how a landscapist of the Hudson River School pictures the contrast between a garden and wilderness.

Temptation and yielding to temptation can be anything but a pretty picture. Max Beckmann painted several versions of this scene. In Adam and Eve (1917), Adam is ungainly, skinny, awkwardly tall, and surly looking. Eve is misshapen, with a heavy body on disproportionately thin legs. Rather than holding out the forbidden fruit, she holds out a breast for the man.

Not all interpreters of the expulsion agree that the descendants of Adam and Eve were forever barred from reentering paradise. One of the great dreams of mystics was to reunite the human spark with the divine fire. For example, George Fox, founder of the Quakers, held out the hope of being in the state of "Adam before the fall." It is difficult to think of a return to innocence after experience, and this is one of the great themes explored in poems and visual art by Blake. Is there really for us a sequel to Paradise Lost, as in Milton's second epic, Paradise Regained?

In the eighteenth century, European disgust with civilization fed the hope of finding unspoiled noble savages. The saving example of trouble-free adolescence and guilt-free sexuality was Coming of Age in Samoa. Only recently has anthropology revealed that Margaret Mead was dreaming of a return to Eden in blissful Samoa (Freeman). Among painters, Paul Gauguin is most noted for presenting the unspoiled Eves of Tahiti. As an alternative to civilization that was driving him to suicide, he looked to his string of lovers to save him from despair.

Other expulsions related to biblical themes include that by Abraham of his concubine, Hagar, and their son, Ishmael, an inherently dramatic story. They are sent into the wilderness lest Ishmael share the inheritance of Isaac, Abraham's son by his jealous wife Sarah. Claude Lorrain, in his painting Departure of Hagar and Ishmael (1668), chose to show Hagar as resigned rather than despairing, as if she were embarking on a brief journey to a neighboring land. The scene of Hagar's expulsion has been interpreted as a foretype of Jesus Christ's driving the money changers from the temple.

Two other biblical expulsions are linked typologically: The expulsion of Heliόδorus from the temple was seen in the Middle Ages as a prefiguration of Christ's expulsion of the money changers from the temple, which in turn was seen by some in the Reformation to prefigure Martin Luther's condemnation of the sale of papal indulgences. Renaissance humanists also associated the mythical ancient Greek hero Hercules cleaning the Augean stables with these scenes. Christ, erupting in uncharacteristic anger, made a whip of bunched cords (a detail found only in the Gospel According to John), lashed out at the sacrificial animals being sold, overturned tables, scattered money, and cleared the temple precincts (Matthew 21:12; Mark 11:15, 17; Luke 19:45–46; John 2:14–16). Interestingly, Christ's objection to the changers was not that they were exploiting their customers or even that they were dishonest but that they carried on their business in the Court of the Gentiles, thereby thwarting Gentile worship of the God of Israel at the temple. Numerous examples of Christ's expulsion of the money changers from the temple can be found, among them Dürer's woodcut (1510) from The Little Passion series and a painting by Bernardo Cavallino (circa 1645). El Greco painted the expulsion of the money changers from the temple a number of times in different versions, starting before 1570 and extending to 1610–1614.

The Apocrypha relates the story of Heliόδorus, a high official of Syrian King Seleucus IV Philopater, who was dispatched on a journey by the king to confiscate the temple treasury at Jerusalem, a depository for widows and orphans. The plan was thwarted by divine intervention in the form of a horse whose rider wore golden armor and was accompanied by two strong young men. The horse attacked Heliόδorus with its hooves, and the youths scourged him (II Maccabees 3:7–14, 22–26). Revived by the prayers of the high priest Onias, Heliόδorus returned to Seleucus and testified to the power of the Supreme God.

Raphael's fresco of the Heliόδorus story (1511–1512) in the Stanza d'Eliodoro in the Vatican may also have incorporated the notions of the Roman Catholic Church's triumph over schismatics and of a continuous struggle to protect the Church from those who, like Heliόδorus, would despoil her treasures (Ettlinger, p. 182). Art historian John Shearman notes that when Pope Julius II commissioned the work in 1511, he was engaged in a dispute with secular powers about Church revenues. With this as background, the Heliodorus story may be seen as illustrating divine sanction for the Church's temporal possessions and as a metaphor of the papal position on the moral issue of licit and illicit treasure (Shearman, pp. 83–84). Raphael's painting is full of fire and drama and must surely have impressed all who were received by the pope in this particular room.

Expulsions were not only biblical but also historical. The Irish evictions were detailed in such accounts as the Illustrated London News report of December 16, 1848 (with accompanying engravings of the ejection of the Irish tenantry) and shown in paintings by Frederick Goodall, such as The Irish Eviction and Watching the Departure of the Emigrant Ships (both 1848), which are now lost. George Frederic Watts was moved by the accounts of the great Irish potato famine of 1845–1849 to paint The Irish Famine (1846–1850) in the Watts Gallery in Compton, England, which shows a displaced and starving Irish family in a bleak, monotone landscape. A painting by Walter Deverell, The Irish Vagrants (1853–1854), in the Johannesburg Art Gallery in the Republic of South Africa details the same plight. Other nineteenth-century artists took up the theme of expulsion based on the notorious Highland clearances in Scotland in 1782–1820 and 1840–1854. John Watson Nicol, in Lochaber No More (1883), shows a woman prostrate in despair, surrounded by her meager belongings on the deck of a ship and her dog in typical quasi-human Victorian pose trying to offer comfort while her husband gazes stoically, if bitterly, into the distance (whether looking ahead or behind is not clear). Similar sentiments of sorrow and despair are expressed in Thomas Faed's The Last of the Clan (1865), now in the Glasgow Art Gallery and Museum in Scotland, where an old crofter astride a pitifully small and tired Highland pony contemplates the eviction of his people (one of whom holds the seemingly requisite little dog). Unfortunately, the success that such sentimental pictures enjoyed in Victorian England did not help the Highlanders. It is not only the loss of a home that makes these works of art so poignant; it is also the fear of the unknown in the journey that lies ahead.

The theme of expulsion has at least one source in classical mythology. Callisto, one of the nymphs of Artemis (Diana), the moon goddess, had the misfortune to attract the attention of the king of the gods, Zeus (Jupiter), who, in the guise of Artemis, seduced and impregnated her. Callisto tried to hide her pregnancy, but one day when the nymphs were bathing, Artemis noticed her changing shape. The angry goddess of chastity drove the pregnant nymph from their midst. Callisto eventually gave birth to a son and was changed into a bear by the jealous goddess Hera (Juno), consort of Zeus. Later, Zeus transformed Callisto into the Great Bear (Ursa Major) constellation. Several paintings depict the moment when Artemis discovers Callisto's condition and expels her from the group of nymphs.

A few nineteenth-century paintings dealt with the theme of the expulsion of a family member from his or her own home, usually for some act offensive to the head of the family. Richard Redgrave's The Outcast (1851) in the Royal Academy of Arts in London is one of the most poignant of this genre. In the center of the scene, a stern and unforgiving paterfamilias opens the door of a modest cottage to show the snow drifted against it and a cold night waiting outside. He gestures toward the night with his hand, indicating the direction to a young woman (the dreaded fallen woman of Victorian society), who clutches a small baby to her breast. To the left of the painting, the rest of the family register their dismay at the father's action: A young woman, probably a sister, is on her knees at the father's feet, begging mercy for the young woman and child while another young woman beats her fists against the wall. A young man, probably her brother, buries his head in his hands and weeps while two other figures, an older woman and a young man, look on in dismay. A crumpled letter on the floor has apparently played its part in revealing the fate of the woman and precipitating her expulsion from the family home. Redgrave's painting elicits sympathy for the young mother but also presents a moral lesson for those who stray outside the bounds of Victorian morality.

During the nineteenth century in England, emigration became an important subject for artists, especially because of a series of emigrations connected with sentencing criminals to serve time in Australia, evicting peasants in Ireland followed by a series of potato crop failures, and discovering gold in Australia. Many genre paintings depicting this subject focused on the departure of the emigrants, some showing hope, some with a sense of great foreboding, but all with a sense that they might never see family and homeland again. In Richard Redgrave's The Emigrant's Last Sight of Home (1858) in the Tate Gallery in London, the emigrating family pauses on the crest of the hill that will block the sight of their old home. The husband turns for a last wave of farewell while his wife, with two small children clinging to her, looks close to tears.

Ford Madox Brown's well-known painting The Last of England (1852–1855) in the City Museum and Art Gallery in Birmingham, England (a version is also in the Fitzwilliam Museum in Cambridge, England), was inspired by the lack of economic opportunity in England and the plans of his friend Thomas Woolner to immigrate to Australia. Using self-portraits of himself and his wife and child on a ship outward bound from England, Brown imagines leaving England because of hard economic times. Whatever personal reasons may have underlain Brown's choice of theme, he spoke of it as a history painting and described in some detail what he intended to portray:

It treats of the great emigration movement which attained its culminating point in 1852. The educated are bound to their country by closer ties than the illiterate man, whose chief consideration is food and physical comfort. I have therefore in order to present the parting scene in its fullest tragic development, singled out a couple from the middle classes, high enough through education and refinement, to appreciate all they are now giving up, and yet depressed enough in means to have to put up with the discomforts and humiliations incident to a vessel "all one class." The husband broods bitterly over blighted hopes and severance from all he has been striving for. The young wife's grief is of a less cankerous sort, probably confined to the sorrow of parting with a few friends of early years. The circle of her love moves with her. (Newman and Watkinson, p. 89)

Although Brown is probably not accurate in saying that a couple from the middle classes suffers more than one from the lower classes, the picture itself is a severe indictment of a wealthy country forcing its people into exile. The sad irony is underscored by the name of the ship—Eldorado—inscribed on a lifeboat in the background. James Collinson's The Emigration Scheme (private collection) and Erskine Nicol's The Emigrant's Departure (1864) in the Tate Gallery in London are further examples of this genre. Occasionally, an artist will depict the landing of the immigrant, as in An Irish Immigrant Landing at Liverpool (1871) in the National Gallery of Scotland in Edinburgh, or even the return of the emigrant, as in George Bernard O'Neill's The Return from Australia.

In depicting expulsions, some artists, especially in the case of Adam and Eve, choose to dwell on the cause of the expulsion and make the temptation and fall an integral part of the treatment of it. Other artists, especially those depicting the money changers and Heliodorus, leave the cause unexplained and dwell on the violent flurry of activity involved in the action itself. Those treating the fall of the rebel angels usually show the immediate aftermath, the helter-skelter downward plummet of the falling angels. Still other artists, especially those treating the Irish and Scottish evictions, reveal more sympathy for the victims of expulsion. From being a cautionary tale about the grave results of disobedience, the theme of expulsion moves to a righteous display of anger and the depiction of the tragic results of ruthless economy and sexual irresponsibility.

See also Journey/Flight; Sin/Sinning; Temptation

Selected Works of Art

Discovery of Callisto's Pregnancy

Titian, Diana and Callisto, circa 1566, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Bril, Paul, Diana Discovers the Pregnancy of Callisto, before 1626, Paris, Louvre

Tassi, Agostino, Diana and Callisto, circa 1626, London, National Gallery

Clerck, Hendrick de, Diana Discovering the Pregnancy of Callisto, before 1629, Paris, Louvre

Fall of the Rebel Angels

Limbouurg Brothers, Fall of the Rebels Angels, illuminated manuscript, Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, 1413–1416, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé (Ms. 65, fol. 64v)

Bosch, Hieronymus, Fall of the Rebel Angels, from The Haywain triptych, painting, circa 1485–1500, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bosch, Hieronymus, Fall of the Rebel Angels, from Last Judgment triptych, painting, circa 1485–1500, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden Künste

Blake, William, Satan Arousing the Rebel Angels, pen and watercolor, 1808, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Blake, William, The Rout of the Rebel Angels, pen and watercolor, 1808, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Martin, John, The Fallen Angels Entering Pandemonium, circa 1840, London, Tate Gallery

Expulsion from the Garden of Eden

Jacopo della Quercia, Expulsion, marble panel on main portal, 1425–1438, Bologna, Italy, St. Petronio

Masaccio, The Expulsion, fresco, circa 1427, Florence, Italy, Sta. Maria del Carmine, Brancacci Chapel

Goes, Hugo van der, The Fall, late fifteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Mantegazza, Christoforo, Expulsion from the Garden, marble bas-relief, circa 1480, Pavia, Italy, Certosa

Bosch, Hieronymus, Expulsion of Adam and Eve, from The Haywain triptych, painting, circa 1485–1500, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bosch, Hieronymus, Expulsion of Adam and Eve, from Last Judgment triptych, painting, circa 1485–1500, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden Künste

Michelangelo, Expulsion of Adam and Eve, fresco, 1508–1512, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Dürer, Albrecht, The Expulsion from Paradise, from The Little Passion, woodcut, 1510

Dürer, Albrecht, The Fall, woodcut, 1511

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Adam and Eve, woodcut, 1526

Tintoretto, The Fall, oil on canvas, 1550–1553, Venice, Italy, Gallerie dell'Accademia

Merian, Matthäus, Adam and Eve Are Sent from the Garden of Eden, engravings from Merian-Bible, 1630

Blake, William, The Expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden, pen and watercolor, 1808, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Cole, Thomas, Expulsion from the Garden of Eden, oil, 1825, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Lanoue, Félix-Hippolyte, Adam and Eve Expelled from the Garden of Eden, painting, 1841, Paris, École des Beaux-Arts

Watts, George Frederic, Expulsion of Adam and Eve, oil on canvas, circa 1873–1898, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Fogg Art Museum

Strang, William, Expulsion of Adam and Eve, painting, 1901, private collection

Beckmann, Max, Adam and Eve, oil on canvas, 1917, private collection

Escher, Maurits Cornelis, The Fall of Man, engraving, 1927

Expulsion of the Money Changers

Ghiberti, Jesus Driving the Merchants from the Temple, relief on north door, 1405–1424, Florence, Italy, Baptistery

Pacher, Michael, Expulsion of the Moneychangers from the Temple, altarpiece of St. Wolfgang, painting, 1471–1481, Austria, Sankt Wolfgang am Ambersee

Christ Driving Out the Moneychangers, manuscript illumination, Book of Hours, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University Library

- Dürer, Albrecht, Christ Expelling the Moneychangers from the Temple, from The Little Passion, woodcut, 1510
- El Greco, Expulsion of the Money Changers from the Temple, oil, before 1570, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- El Greco, Expulsion of the Money Changers from the Temple, oil, circa 1572, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Art
- El Greco, Expulsion of the Money Changers from the Temple, oil, after 1600, New York, Frick Collection
- El Greco, Christ Driving the Money Changers from the Temple, oil, circa 1595–1600, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- El Greco, Christ Driving the Traders from the Temple, oil, circa 1604, London, National Gallery
- El Greco, Expulsion of the Money Changers from the Temple, oil, 1610–1614, Madrid, Spain, Várez-Fisa Collection
- Cavallino, Bernardo, Christ Driving the Merchants from the Temple, painting, circa 1645, London, National Gallery
- Jordaens, Jacob, Jesus Cleansing the Temple, 1684, Paris, Louvre

Expulsion of Heliodorus

- Raphael, The Expulsion of Heliodorus, fresco, 1511–1512, Vatican, Stanza d'Elidoro
- Cavallino, Bernardo, The Expulsion of Heliodorus from the Temple, painting, mid-seventeenth century, Moscow, Russia, State Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts

Other Expulsions

- Raphael, Expulsion of Attila, fresco, 1513–1514, Rome, Vatican, Stanza d'Elidoro
- Giordano, Luca, The Rejection of Hagar, painting, circa 1660, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
- Lorrain, Claude, Departure of Hagar and Ishmael, painting, 1668, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinacothek

Genre: Expulsion

- Watts, George Frederic, The Irish Famine, 1846–1850, Compton, England, Watts Gallery
- Goodall, Frederick, The Irish Eviction, painting, 1848 (lost)
- Goodall, Frederick, Watching the Departure of the Emigrant Ships, painting, 1848 (lost)
- Redgrave, Richard, The Outcast, 1851, London, Royal Academy
- Deverell, Walter, The Irish Vagrants, 1853–1854, Johannesburg, South Africa, Johannesburg Art Gallery
- Faed, Thomas, The Last of the Clan, painting, 1865, Glasgow, Scotland, Glasgow Art Gallery and Museum
- Nicol, John Watson, Lochaber No More, 1883, present location unknown

- Fletcher, William, Evicted, circa 1887, Queensland, Australia, Queensland Art Gallery
- Herdman, Robert, Landless and Homeless: Farewell to the Glen, painting, 1887, present location unknown

Genre: Emigration

- Brown, Ford Madox, The Last of England, oil on panel, 1852–1855, Birmingham, England, City Museum and Art Gallery
- Brown, Ford Madox, The Last of England, 1852–1855, Cambridge University, Fitzwilliam Museum
- Redgrave, Richard, The Emigrant's Last Sight of Home, oil, 1858, London, Tate Gallery
- Quidor, John, Embarkation from Communipaw, oil on canvas, 1861, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts
- Nicol, Erskine, The Emigrant's Departure, 1864, London, Tate Gallery

Further Reading

- Errington, Lindsay, Social and Religious Themes in English Art 1840–1860, New York and London: Garland, 1984
- Ettlinger, Helen Shahrokh, “Dominican Influences in the Stanza della Segnatura and the Stanza d'Elidoro,” Zeitschrift für Kunstgeschichte 46 (1983)
- Ferino-Pagden, Silvia, “Raphael's Heliodorus Vault and Michelangelo's Sistine Ceiling: An Old Controversy and a New Drawing,” Burlington Magazine 132 (1990)
- Freeman, Derek, Margaret Mead and Samoa: The Making and Unmaking of an Anthropologist, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983; Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1984
- Gibson, Walter S., Hieronymus Bosch, London: Thames and Hudson, 1973; New York: Oxford University Press, 1973
- Mead, Margaret, Coming of Age in Samoa: A Psychological Study of Primitive Youth for Western Civilization, New York: Blue Ribbon, 1928; London: Cape, 1929
- Newman, Teresa, and Roy Watkinson, Ford Madox Brown and the Pre-Raphaelite Circle, London: Chatto and Windus, 1991
- Prebble, John, The Highland Clearances, London: Secker and Warburg, 1963
- Shearman, John, “The Expulsion of Heliodorus,” in Raffaello a Roma: il Convegno del 1983, Rome: Edizioni dell'Elefante, 1986
- Sholem, Gershom, “Lilith,” in Encyclopedia Judaica, New York: Macmillan, 1971
- Traeger, Jörg, “Raffaels Stanza d'Elidoro und ihr Bildprogramm,” in Römisches Jahrbuch für Kunstgeschichte, 13 (1971)

FAME

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following are covered in the discussion of the theme Fame:

EMBLEMS

PAINTINGS: FAME

PAINTINGS, DRAWINGS, PRINTS: TRIUMPHS

PRINTS

SCULPTURE

ARCHITECTURE

CLASSICAL SOURCES

ALLEGORICAL PROGRAMS IN THE RENAISSANCE

NINETEENTH AND
TWENTIETH CENTURIES

Ex literarum studijs immortalitatem acquiri.

Neptuni tubicen, cuius pars ultima cetum,
Aequoreum facies indicat esse Deum:
Serpentis medio Triton comprehenditur orbe,
Qui caudam inserto mordicus cre tenet.
Fama viros animo insignes, praeclaraq; gesta
Prosequitur: toto mandat & orbe legi.

Andrea Alciati, Emblem 132, Ex literarum studiis immortalitatem acquiri (Immortality is achieved by literary studies), woodcut from Emblemata (Milan, 1531). (Courtesy of the author)

This essay discusses the classical sources for the personification of fame, describes the attributes and associated concepts, alludes to the appearance of Fame in death and triumph imagery, discusses the uomini famosi (famous men) and the donne famose (famous women), and makes a detailed comparison of the Renaissance use of the personification of fame in several decorative programs. This essay also comments on the role of fame in art since the Renaissance.

Classical Sources

Pheme is the Greek word for the goddess of fame, who was a messenger of the king of the gods, Zeus (Jupiter). She descended to Earth to announce the crimes and infamous actions of the gods in vindication of the death of the giants, her children, whom the gods destroyed. In the literature of ancient Rome, she personifies unverifiable rumor and an individual's reputation. Ovid describes her as a messenger of simultaneous and indistinguishable truth and falsehood and Virgil as a hideous creature with multiple, constantly blabbering mouths and tongues.

Fame is usually represented as winged because of her continuous flight both night and day. She brings both good and bad news, and she is identified as the good goddess or bad goddess, respectively, by the presence or absence of a flying bat as her attribute.

In ancient mythology, the thunderbolt (lightning) was a sign of Fame because no other sound was as powerful as thunder. Moreover, lightning represented a celestial fire and an active, dynamic force of creation, such as Zeus. According to Hellenistic legend, Olympia, the mother of Alexander the Great, claimed that on her wedding night she felt as if thunder had penetrated her, an allusion to the divine birth and future fame of her son. In his portrait of Alexander the Great, the painter Apelles placed a thunderbolt in one of the emperor's hands as a sign of his fame (Ronchetti, vol. I, p. 376).

The trumpet as an attribute of Fame appears to be a Roman invention. The Romans wanted to honor the achievements of Saturn, the god of agriculture; therefore, they portrayed tritons, demigods of the sea, with their tails hidden and blowing horns in front of his temple, alluding to the fact that before the accomplishments of Saturn, the Earth lay in darkness.

Fame's trumpet, an invariable attribute of Renaissance and later art, is long and straight and may have wings. Fame may hold a palm branch, the symbol of victory, for which she is generally the reward. She may, for the same reason, wear a crown. She sometimes sits on a globe, a sign of her ubiquity.

Good Fame is accompanied by such companions as Honor or Virtue (a figure holding a laurel crown), Scream (a figure with large, swollen eyes from yelling so hard), Noise (a figure with a sonorous, thunderous voice), and Glory (a triumphant figure granting honors). In contrast, bad Fame's companions are Calumny, Disgrace, Infamy, Reproach, and Blame.

Fame, like the messenger god Mercury, may be associated with the Five Arts, the Seven Liberal Arts, or the Muses, as when she leads them up Mount Olympus. In each case, the winged horse Pegasus occurs as another attribute of Fame. His poetic and victorious endeavors, such as his association with the Muses and his conquest of the Chimera, a mythical she-monster, earned him this association with Fame. After accomplishing his deeds, Pegasus flew to the heavens and was transported into the constellation bearing his name (Hyginus, Fables; Ovid, Metamorphoses, IV; Homer, Iliad, VI; Hesiod, Theogony).

When Mercury is identified with Fame, he employs some of her attributes, such as the trumpet, as seen in Andrea Mantegna's Mercury (1470s), a tarot card, where the god blows a trumpet and holds a caduceus. Another Mantegna tarot card, Judgment, shows an angelic figure blowing one or two trumpets. This is a reference to the angel of judgment or Michael the archangel, who on the Judgment Day will announce the good and evil deeds of humanity. During the Middle Ages, it was expected that at the end of the world Christ would appear in majesty on the clouds and call on Michael the archangel to sound the last trumpet, at which point the dead would rise from the graves to be judged.

The personification of Fame as female was well known in classical antiquity. She is found in the company of the illustrious dead and occasionally among the living, whom she bears away on her tireless wings (Horace, Odes 2, 2:7–8). This concept was assimilated by the emblematic tradition of the sixteenth century, where Fame is found in association with historical figures and is often seen on funerary sculpture. Andrea Alciati's Emblem 136 Strenuorum immortale nomen ("The fame of men of action is immortal") illustrates the nude sea goddess Thetis seated in a shell supported by a dolphin, floating toward the tomb of Achilles, her mortal son. She places an amaranth (wreath) on top of the tomb to honor the hero's death. Another representation of the power of Fame over death occurs in the depiction of the triumph of Fame, in which she overcomes death while riding in a car drawn by elephants.

The Roman triumph was a celebration that followed a military victory, clearly a moment imparting fame. Fourteenth-century humanists such as Dante and Petrarch assimilated this triumphal concept in their writings. Cantos 29–31 of Dante's The Divine Comedy, inspired by the Roman description of triumph and historical heroism, expanded this concept to the victory of Christianity over paganism. In Botticelli's illustration (1482) for canto 29 of The Divine Comedy, Beatrice appears in the triumphator's car accompanied by the apocalyptic beast, the 24 elders, and the Virtues. This religious concept of fame is later introduced into Christian art in pictures such as the triumph of Christianity or the Eucharist, in which the chariot bears a cross or a chalice instead of a human figure.

Fame is noted by Petrarch in his Trionfi series of allegorical victories, each succeeding victory overcoming the last. The triumph of Love is overcome by Chastity and the triumph of Chastity by Death. They are followed in turn by Fame, Time, and Eternity.

A series of triumphs, associated with months and the deities presiding over them, was depicted in the Salone dei Mesi (Hall of the Months) in the Schifanoia Palace in Ferrara, Italy. For example, in Francesco del Cossa's painting April (circa 1470), Venus, the presiding deity of that month, is seated on a triumphal barge drawn by swans. Mars—conquered, subdued, and chained to the barge by fetters of love—kneels before Venus, the goddess of love, while fashionably dressed couples engage in amorous dalliance on the banks. The god of war pays homage and subservience to the goddess of love.

Those whom Fame had rewarded were frequently depicted in works of art. It was common in ancient Rome to decorate a house with portraits of kinsfolk and notables. The Roman tradition of honoring one's lineage is illustrated in the sculpture A Roman Patrician with Busts of His Ancestors (circa 30 B.C.) at the Capitoline Museum in Rome. The interest of quattrocento artists in painting portraits of famous men derives from the Italian humanists Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, who in turn were influenced by the Roman writers, especially Cicero and Virgil. In their writings, these Romans emphasized that a good society depended on the achievements and virtues of its citizens. The artist illustrated these qualities of fame and virtue by painting portraits of illustrious people. Petrarch's De viris illustribus (On Famous Men), written after 1337, contains a series of biographies on Roman generals and statesmen. Between 1367 and 1379, Francesco Carrara the Elder, ruler of Padua and patron of Petrarch, commissioned the artist Guariento to paint a room in the ducal Paduan palace to illustrate Petrarch's uomini famosi of ancient Rome. All the frescoes in the room, called the Sala dei Giganti (Hall of the Giants) because the figures were larger than life size, have been nearly destroyed. Portraits of uomini famosi were painted on the walls of many secular and religious buildings, such as those in the Ducal Palace in Urbino, Italy, painted by Justus van Ghent and assistants, and those on the walls of S. Apollonia in Florence, Italy, painted by Andrea del Castagno (circa 1450).

The subjects of uomini famosi were drawn from the regular dramatis personae of the Bible, from history (ancient and medieval), and from legend. Other representations of uomini famosi are found in Andrea del Castagno's frescoes for the Villa Carducci (1445–1450) at Legnaia, Italy, now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence. This unusual group comprises three trios that include three heroines of antiquity (Queen Tomyris, the biblical Esther, and the Cumaean Sybil), three condottieri (mercenary captains famous in Florentine history as liberators of the city), and three literary humanists of Florence (Dante, Boccaccio, and Petrarch). This group of uomini famosi and donne famose was accompanied by Adam and the Virgin and Child. The whole program alluded to original sin and redemption, which ultimately was made possible by arete (virtue)—the highest achievements of human body and mind as exemplified by the Florentine humanists.

Antonio Averlino, known as Filarete, described an ideal city called Sforzinda in his architectural treatise of 1464 (Prinz, p. 10). In this city, an architect's house is decorated with wall paintings, architectural views, and portraits of inventors, heroes, and artists.

Allegorical Programs in the Renaissance

In the Chamber of Fame in the Casa Vasari at Arezzo, Italy, Giorgio Vasari continued the quattrocento and cinquecento tradition of the artist immortalizing his own house by painting allegories of the fine arts and portraits of famous artists. Vasari provided a general characterization of this ceiling in his autobiography:

I painted [on the ceiling] . . . all the Arts connected with design or dependent on design. In the middle, Fame, seated on a terrestrial globe, blows one golden trumpet and throws away another of fire, which represents slander. Around her are all the Arts, with their attributes. Not having time to finish, I left eight ovals for portraits of our leading artists. (Prinz; Winner)

When he eventually painted portraits of "our leading artists," he included himself among them.

Vasari described his depiction of Fame as "blowing a trumpet and discarding one of flames and seated on a globe" and as "a woman having two trumpets, one of gold the other of fire, seated on a globe with some cicadas close by" (del Vita). He further explained that the figure of Fame "sings and praises the deeds of the virtuous" (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. VII; Liana Cheney). In part, his conceit for the allegory draws on the traditional cinquecento depiction that represents Fame as winged, bare-breasted, seated or standing on a globe, and, most important, holding up two trumpets. This configuration of attributes can be seen in Caravaggio's Fame (1524) from the Salone of the Villa Lante (now in the Bibliotheca Hertziana in Rome); Domenico del Barbieri's Gloria (circa 1540); and Francesco Salviati's Fama (1544) from the fresco cycle of the Sala dei Fasti in the Palazzo Farnese in Rome (Iris Cheney). These elements combine in Vasari's painting to provide Fame's affirmation of success. The representation recalls Cesare Ripa, who noted that Fame, as well as Glory, holds a trumpet symbolizing "the loud sound universally dispersed for all humans to hear" (Ripa, 1603). And Fame's act of blowing is reminiscent of Andrea Alciati's Emblem 132, Ex literarum studiis immortalitatem acquiri ("Immortality is achieved by literary studies"). In this emblem, the sea god Neptune or Triton blows a conch. Alciati's composition is encircled by a snake. The epigram of this emblem further states, "Fame favors the complete persons of letters and makes known their situation which it causes to resound until the earth and sea are astonished at the glory of their reputation."

However, Vasari's deviation from this traditional depiction is as marked as his adherence to it. In addition to holding the trumpet, which affirms achievement, Vasari's Fame also casts away a flaming trumpet, a sign of the rejection of slander. The latter appears to be solely a Vasarian invention, as he explains in his autobiography. According to Ripa, the figure of Slander (Maledicenza) is portrayed as holding a flaming torch in each hand, symbolizing the fomentation of slander by hate.

Ripa has evidently drawn on Vasari's image, although Vasari substitutes a flaming trumpet for a flaming torch. On the west facade of the Cathedral of Modena in Italy, a relief, sculpted by Master Wiligelmus, shows a putto leaning on an inverted, burning torch in each scene. Perhaps Vasari knew of these representations and in his figure of Fame substituted a trumpet for the inverted flaming torch. The meaning of the inverted flaming torch is still unclear. According to Aurelius Prudentius's Psychomachia, the flaming torch is an attribute of Cupid, the god of erotic love, referring to his dual personification as amor carnalis (romantic love) or amor divinus (heavenly love) (Panofsky, pp. 94–95). Thus, Vasari's Fame takes on a dual role: the affirmation of Fame and Glory and the rejection of Slander. His concern with slander surely derived from the sort of reflections proffered by Virgil, with whom he was familiar. Virgil discussed the fickleness of Fame and the problem of overcoming it: Fame can as quickly depart or detract from one's life as it can enter and benefit one's life in the first place. One danger is the propensity of others to slander those who achieve Fame. If Fame is to be sustained, the threat of slander must be nullified (Ripa).

Each of the artists portrayed beneath the depiction of Fame managed to sustain the fame they achieved in their respective lives. In her affirmative role, the allegorical figure of Fame is blowing the golden trumpet in the direction of the allegorical figure of Painting. Assuming this not to be accidental, we may note that Vasari refers to his early success as a painter as due to his training with Michelangelo and Andrea del Sarto, whose portraits are included below Fame and adjacent to Painting.

Years later, Vasari again painted the iconographic motif of Fame in the Sala dei Cento Giorni (1546) in the Palazzo della Cancelleria in Rome. Here, the traditional depiction of Fame, not including the act of discarding a flaming trumpet, has been used, but Paolo Giovio, not Vasari, formulated the program for this room. Here, Fame blows her trumpet to note the achievement of the Farnese family, including their positions in the Roman Catholic Church and the contemporary political situation.

Vasari's decoration of his own house with portraits of ancestors and famous artists represents a fusion of Roman and quattrocento custom. Likewise, in the cinquecento, humanists such as Paolo Giovio provided in their programs portraits of ancient Romans and other famous people (Sala dei Cento Giorni) and decorated their homes with portraits of uomini famosi (Giovio Museum). Vasari's familiarity with Giovio's plans to decorate his house with portraits of humanists, princes, soldiers, and prelates must have had a strong influence on the artist's program for the Chamber of Fame, wherein Vasari painted portraits of well-known artists (Michelangelo and Andrea del Sarto). According to Vasari scholar Wolfram Prinz (pp. 8–10), Vasari had no knowledge of Filarete's treatise until around the time of the publication of the second edition of his Vite (Lives), where he first mentions it. However, perhaps Vasari was familiar with Filarete's ideas through other humanistic sources.

A comparison of the portraits and allegorical paintings of the Chamber of Fame in Vasari's Aretine house with those of his Florentine house reveals significant contrasts. The latter are found in the sala, the only painted room in the house in Florence, and were executed in 1561, about two decades after the completion of the Chamber of Fame. By the 1560s, Vasari's reputation as an artist was well established, as by then he had become court painter for Cosimo I, Duke of Tuscany.

The Fine Arts appear on a wall of the sala and frame narrative scenes dealing with the judgment of art. Unlike the allegories of the Casa Vasari in Arezzo, these are enclosed in separate niches performing their artistic roles. Also, all these figures are winged, emphasizing the allegorical, poetical, or metaphorical quality of their existence.

As in the Chamber of Fame, the sala contains portraits of artists, including Giotto, Perino del Vaga, Giulio Romano, Raphael, Fiorantino Rosso, and Cecchino Salviati. These portraits are presented to the viewer in an escutcheon format located in a decorative frieze above the niches and narrative stories. This stylistic elaboration of the sala reflects the unquestionable changes in Vasari's circumstances and the probable changes in his self-image after the execution of the Chamber of Fame. When Vasari painted the Chamber of Fame, he had just begun his career as a painter and had strong dependent attachments to the community of Arezzo. But by the time Vasari painted the Florentine sala, he had begun to paint the program for the Palazzo Vecchio. The Chamber of Fame is characterized by the simplicity, stylistic naïveté, and personal depiction of the famous. Vasari's organization of the program is unique. Many of his ideas about art and portraiture, originally presented in the Chamber of Fame, are restated more fancifully in the Florentine sala. The fancifulness sets the tone for Vasari's reference to his enhanced social position, which is conveyed through his quotation from the decorative style of the Roman Court. The type of ceiling decoration, the elaborate friezes, the large herms, and the simulated architectural design recall Vasari's early Roman work in Sala dei Cento Giorni, Perino del Vaga's Sala Paolina, and Francesco Salviati's Sala dei Fasti in the Palazzo Farnese.

Vasari's depiction of the Fine Arts in the Chamber of Fame expresses the cinquecento artist's sentiments concerning the aim, value, and status of the artist and the arts. Art is no longer considered a craft based on imitation and technique but rather a noble humanistic endeavor requiring, like poetry, invention. Likewise, the artist is to be regarded not as artisan but as a creative, educated being and a member of a humanist society. The artist who would fully pursue this enhanced status must endeavor to demonstrate the qualities and capacities outlined by Baldassare Castiglione in the Book of the Courtier. Castiglione notes that the touch of fame and glory on one's life establishes a reputation and immortality. Among the requirements that secure and enhance one's status as a gentleman are knowledge of the liberal arts (especially painting), the construction of a memorial (preferably in a painting) to one's achievements, and the possession of personal nobility achieved through one's ancestry, deeds, and personal attributes. In many respects, the Chamber of Fame is a testimony to this social and cultural upgrading of art and the artist and demonstrates that Vasari has heeded the counsel of Castiglione. Vasari provides evidence of his own nobility, as manifested by the fruits of his talent, by the homage to his ancestors Lazzaro Vasari and Luca Signorelli and by his self-portrait, which presents a handsome, elegant man surrounded by the established artists of Arezzo and Florence.

Displaying the new conception of art, the artist has set Fame among the arts and the artists. At the center of the ceiling, Fame blows her golden trumpet toward Painting, as if to acknowledge the importance of painting and of Vasari as a painter. In this context, it is important to recall that this room is the entrance to the house. The Chamber of Fame serves as a memorial to Vasari's activity and as a greeting hall for visitors and friends entering the new house.

In another representation of Fame (1560), in the decoration of the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence, Vasari paints her with wings and decorates her clothes with tongue motifs that allude to her ability to rise above mundane situations because of her good and heroic deeds. She also holds two trumpets—one of fire, a symbol of slander, and the other of gold, a symbol of honor and praises—while seated on a terrestrial globe. Vasari painted a tree trunk with two cicadas next to the globe and explained that these representations allude to the Italian proverb, “A persona di villaggio, tromba di legno” (For a peasant villager, a wooden trumpet). Thus, the Fame of Folly is represented by an old woman who blows a wooden trumpet, and the cicadas represent the common people who want success at someone else's expense (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. VII).

Cesare Ripa elaborates on Alciati's and Vasari's images in Emblem 149, thus focusing on the Fama Chiara (good Fame), which illustrates an image derived from a Roman medal of Antinous where a beautiful nude figure of Mercury, as Fame with winged helmet and ankles, holds a caduceus and runs with the winged horse Pegasus. This image refers to the ancient legend, Ripa states, that Jupiter honored Mercury with the task of being messenger of the gods by virtue of his eloquent rhetoric and efficacious voice, which would expand and broadcast to all the good and heroic manifestations. The wings on his helmet and ankles allude to the quick spread of the words, whereas Pegasus alludes to how quickly good Fame may be distributed throughout the universe.

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

By the nineteenth century, the use of allegory and personification had largely disappeared (with the exception of memorial sculptures). The many cast bronze sculptures of war heroes, statesmen, and literary figures that populate most cities and many towns sometimes included a winged female figure, usually found on the base of the sculpture. The iconography and attributes are often confused, and the figures may be called Fame or Victory or not named at all. Examples include Matthew Noble's Duke of Wellington Monument (1856) in Manchester, England, where four figures adorn the base. One female figure, with a wreath on her head and one in her hand, probably represents Fame. Examples, in fact, appear in just about every city and town. The fact that most people walk past these statues without even noticing them or knowing whom they commemorate is a comment about the lasting quality of Fame.

In the twentieth century, fame evolved into celebrity, with Andy Warhol the master depicter of celebrities. While decreeing that everyone deserved 15 minutes of fame, he proceeded to create silk-screen portraits of those he thought were most deserving. Marilyn Monroe and Elizabeth Taylor were two of his favorites, but his subjects also included Elvis Presley and Mao Zedong. In one version of these celebrity creations, Warhol replicated Marilyn Monroe's famous face 50 times in rows of images similar to a sheet of commemorative postage stamps (themselves an example of the twentieth-century validation of fame).

See also Fortune; Honor/Honoring; Misfortune; Virtue/Virtues

Selected Works of Art

Emblems

- Alciati, Andrea, Strenuorum immortale nomen (Emblem 136), woodcut, in Emblemata, 1531, Milan
- Alciati, Andrea, Ex literarum studiis immortalitatem acquiri (Emblem 132), woodcut in Emblemata, 1531, Milan
- Ripa, Cesare, Fama, engraving, from Iconologia, 1603

Paintings: Fame

- Firenze, Andrea da, Fame, fresco, 1366–1368, Florence, Italy, Santa Maria Novella, Spanish Chapel
- Mantegna, Andrea, Fame, fresco, 1454–1457, Padua, Italy, Museo Civici di Padova
- Dossi, Dosso, Fama, fresco, circa 1520, Trento, Italy, Sala del Tribunale
- Caravaggio, Fame, 1524, from the Salone of the Villa Lante, Bagnaia, present location Rome, Bibliotheca Hertziana
- Perino del Vaga, Fame, 1540, Rome, Castel Sant' Angelo, Sala Paolina
- Vasari, Giorgio, Fama, fresco, 1542, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
- Salviati, Francesco, Fama, fresco, 1544, Rome, Palazzo Farnese, Sala de Fasti
- Vasari, Giorgio, Fama, fresco, 1546, Rome, Palazzo della Cancelleria, Sala dei Cento Giorni
- Vasari, Giorgio, Fama, fresco, 1560, Florence, Italy, Casa Vasari
- Vasari, Giorgio, Fama, 1560, Florence, Italy, Museo de Palazzo Vecchio
- Carracci, Annibale, Mercury, fresco, 1595, Rome, Palazzo Farnese, Galleria Farnese
- Gentileschi, Artemisia, Fame, oil on canvas, 1632, New York, Wildenstein & Company
- Strozzi, Bernardo, A Personification of Fame, oil on canvas, 1635–1636, London, National Gallery
- Burne-Jones, Edward, Fame Overthrowing Fortune, second half of nineteenth century, Birmingham, City Art Museum and Gallery
- Klee, Paul, Fama, twentieth century, Bern, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum
- Warhol, Andy, Marilyn X 100, silk screen on synthetic paint on canvas, 1962, London, Saatchi Collection
- Warhol, Andy, Ten Lizes, silk screen on synthetic polymer paint on canvas, 1963, Paris, Musée d'Art Moderne, Centre Georges Pompidou

Warhol, Andy, Marilyn, diptych, acrylic on canvas, 1962, London, Tate Gallery

Warhol, Andy, Eighteen Multi-Colored Marilyns (Reverse Series), silk screen on synthetic paint on canvas, 1979–1986, Zürich, Switzerland, Galerie Bruno Bischofberger

Paintings, Drawings, Prints: Triumphs

Cossa, Francesco del, April Ruled by Venus, fresco, circa 1470, Ferrara, Italy, Schifanoia Palace, Salone dei Mesi

Piero della Francesca, Triumph of Federigo da Montefeltro; Triumph of Battista Sforza, panel, after 1474, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Botticelli, illustration for The Divine Comedy, drawings, 1482

Burgkmair, Hans, The Triumph of Maximilian I, engravings, 1517

Salviati, Francesco, Triumph of Camillus, fresco, mid-1540s, Florence, Italy, Museo di Palazzo Vecchio

Prints

Barbiere, Domenico del, Gloria, engraving, circa 1540

Mantegna, Andrea, Mercury, tarot card, 1470s

Mantegna, Andrea, Judgment, tarot card, 1470s

Sculpture

Pisano, Nicola, Relief, pulpit, 1260, Pisa, Italy, Baptistery

Giotto, Relief, 1310, from the Campanile, Florence, Italy

Pollaiuolo, Antonio del, Papal Tomb of Pope Sixtus IV, bronze, 1484–1493, Rome, Vatican Grottoes

Noble, Matthew, Duke of Wellington Monument, 1856, Manchester, England, Piccadilly

Architecture

Alberti, Leon Battista, Tempio Malatestiano, 1450, Rimini, Italy, St. Francesco

Further Reading

Alciati, Andrea, Emblemata, Paris: G. Rovillio, 1542

Cartari, Vincenzo, Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi, Vienna, Austria: Nicolo Pezzana, 1674

Cheney, Iris, Francesco Salviati (Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1963)

Cheney, Liana, The Paintings of Giorgio Vasari, New York: Garland, 1985

del Vita, Alessandro, ed., Lo Zibaldone di Giorgio Vasari, Rome: Istituto Archeologico e Storia d'Arte, 1938

Panofsky, Erwin, Renaissance and Renascences, New York: Harper, 1969

Prinz, Wolfram, "Vasari's Sammlung von Kunsterbildnissen," Mitteilungen des Kunsthistorischen Institute in Florenz 12 (1966)

Prudentius, Psychomachia, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1949

Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, London: B. Motte, 1709; New York: Garland, 1970

Ronchetti, Giuseppe, Dizionario illustrato dei simboli, Milan, Italy: Ulrico Hoepli, 1922

Vasari, Giorgio, Le vite dei piu eccellenti pittori, scultori, et architettori, edited by Gaetano Milanesi, Florence, Italy: G. C. Sansoni, 1970

Winner, M., Die Quellen den Pictura-Allegorien in gemalten Bildergalerien de 17 Jahnhunderts zu Antwerper (Ph.D. diss., University of Cologne, 1957)

FATAL WOMAN/FEMME FATALE

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following characters are covered in the discussion of the theme Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale:

SPHINX

SIREN

MERMAID

MEDUSA

CIRCE

MEDEA

DELILAH

JUDITH

SALOME

VIVIAN

MORGAN LE FAY

LA BELLE DAME SANS

MERCI

WAGNERIAN

OTHER FEMME FATALES

Edward Coley Burne-Jones, The Depths of the Sea, watercolor and gouache on paper mounted on panel, 1887, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums, Fogg Art Museum, bequest of Grenville L. Winthrop. (Courtesy of the Harvard University Art Museums, Cambridge, Massachusetts)

Two types of fatal woman, or femme fatale, exist: those who actually are fatal and those who are only perceived as fatal. The first type includes mythological beings such as the Sphinx, the Siren, and Medusa and the Gorgons; biblical figures such as Delilah, Salome, Jael, and Judith; historical figures such as Lucretia Borgia; and literary characters such as La Belle Dame Sans Merci and Morgan le Fay. The second type includes those who are seen as temptresses, such as Guinevere, Yseult, Venus (the goddess of love), or any number of odalisques. Another group often categorized as femmes fatales are often really femmes inspiratrices, or women as inspirers, such as Dante's Beatrice; Proserpina, the consort of the god Pluto in the underworld; Venus; and the legendary Helen of Troy.

It has been suggested that in some cases men project their own desires on women and then make the women into temptresses to excuse their own lustful feelings. Dante Gabriel Rossetti summarized this view poignantly in his poem about a prostitute, "Jenny":

Yet, Jenny, looking at you,
The woman almost fades from view:
A cipher of man's changeless sum
Of lust, past, present and to come. . . .

Another interpretation of the threatening, fatal woman is that by psychoanalyst Carl Jung, who sees her as a personification of all feminine psychological tendencies in a man's unconscious: a representation of the anima consciously repressed by the male. This may be seen to lead to a cultural suppression of women, with the femme fatale representing men's fears of women's power—more of a projection onto the female than a mirror of her reality.

One theory traces the femme fatale back to Paleolithic times, viewing the personification of woman-as-evil as a reaction to the power of the Great Mother. This divinity of a matriarchal society, antedating the patriarchal supremacy of Judaism and the classical age, elicited the desire to categorize the powerful woman as evil and deadly. In The Goddess Obscured, art historian Pamela Berger traces a specific case of the transformation of the Mother Goddess image from Tellus, or the Earth, in Roman art (on the breast plate of Augustus of Prima Porta figures) to her transmutation into Luxuria, or the symbol of sexual sin and one of the Seven Deadly Vices in the medieval period.

Classical cultures contributed a number of images of the fatal woman, one of which was the Sphinx, a female monster of Thebes with a woman's face (and often breasts), a bird's wings, and a lion's body who killed all who could not solve her riddle. Oedipus answered her riddle correctly, however, and the Sphinx threw herself from a cliff. An early representation of the subject is found on a fifth-century kylix in the Vatican Museum with Oedipus dressed as a traveler and the Sphinx perched on a pillar. In neoclassical representations by Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres (1808 and 1827), Oedipus is shown as the heroic nude, and the female characteristics of the Sphinx are emphasized. In a later representation by Gustave Moreau (1864) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, the conjunction of the two figures takes on a mystic aura, as if the young man is pondering the questions of life. During the 1890s, the Sphinx becomes sexualized into a mystic woman in Charles Ricketts's Oedipus and the Sphinx (1891) in the Carlisle Museum and Fernand Khnopff's The Caresses of the Sphinx (1896) in the Musées Royaux des Beaux Arts in Brussels, Belgium. In Franz von Stuck's The Sphinx, she appears as a nude woman, and in his Kiss of the Sphinx in the Museum of Fine Arts in Budapest, Hungary, she is not threatening but passionately kissing the nude and kneeling Oedipus.

Another classical fatal woman figure is that of the Siren, mentioned in book XII of Homer's Odyssey. The Sirens lured sailors to their destruction with their seductive singing. The legendary hero Odysseus, wanting to hear their song, blocked the ears of his rowers with wax so they would not be distracted and had himself tied to the mast so he could hear but not obey the Sirens. This story is represented as early as circa 330 B.C. on a bell krater from Paestum, Italy, now in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin-Dahlem. It is also represented on an Archaic vase from the first quarter of the fifth century in the British Museum in London, with the Sirens shown as birds with women's heads, much like the Harpies. In nineteenth-century art, Sirens become beguiling nude women, as in Frederick Leighton's The Fisherman and the Syren (1858) in the Bristol City Museum and Art Gallery in England; John William Waterhouse's Ulysses and the Sirens (1891) in the National Gallery of Victoria in Melbourne, Australia; and William Etty's The Sirens and Ulysses in Manchester, England.

Closely connected with the Siren is the figure of the mermaid, who, in Edward Coley Burne-Jones's watercolor The Depths of the Sea (1887) in the Harvard University Art Museums in Cambridge, Massachusetts, exultantly carries the body of a dead mariner to the bottom of the ocean. Insofar as this is a fatal encounter between the mermaid, nixie, or water sprite and her victim, she can be seen as a femme fatale, or deadly woman.

Another fatal woman of classical origin is Medusa, a Gorgon whose gaze turned men into stone. She appears in the story of Perseus, the son of the king of the gods, Zeus, and the mortal Danaë, who is sent on a quest by his foster father to bring back the head of Medusa. With the help of Athena, the goddess of wisdom who frequently aided heroes, he was able to cut off the head of Medusa without looking at it, and he even rescued Andromeda on the way home. Perseus is shown with the snaky-headed Medusa on a classical wine krater by the Amasis Painter in the British Museum in London and in sculptural relief on a metope of the sixth century B.C. temple C at Selinus, Sicily. On a hydria (circa 460 B.C.) in the British Museum, Perseus has already cut off her head and has it in a shoulder bag, ready to carry home. Benvenuto Cellini's sculpture of Perseus (1545–1554) in the Loggia dei Lanzi in Florence, Italy, shows him holding the head of Medusa in one hand and his sword in the other. Caravaggio's Head of Medusa (1597), terrifying in appropriate Baroque expressiveness, is on a shield in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence. When the theme appears in the nineteenth century, the image has been softened and feminized, as in Harriet Hosmer's neoclassical bust Medusa (1853–1854), whose source was either Ovid's Metamorphoses or Percy Bysshe Shelley's poem "On the Medusa of Leonardo da Vinci in the Florentine Gallery," first published by Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley in Posthumous Poems (1824). In a pre-Raphaelite version by Burne-Jones entitled The Baleful Head (1886–1887) in Stuttgart, Germany, Perseus shows Andromeda Medusa's head reflected in a pool of water. Fernand Khnopff produced a symbolist sculpture, Head of Medusa (1900), now in a private collection in Brussels. Gustav Klimt's grimacing Gorgon (1902) in the Vienna Historical Museum in Austria is more Viennese than Greek.

The Odyssey introduced several fatal women to obstruct Odysseus's return home; it is Circe, the enchantress who turned men into pigs on her magical island, who perhaps qualifies best as a fatal woman. She is portrayed on a red-figure krater (circa 450 B.C.), in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, fleeing Odysseus, who threatens her with a sword to force her to restore his men to their rightful shapes. A much later mannerist drawing by Parmigianino in the Albertina art museum in Vienna shows her as a beautiful sorceress surrounded by windblown draperies, whereas Burne-Jones's watercolor (1863–1869) The Wine of Circe shows her drugging the wine to transform men into swine.

Another fatal woman from classical myth was the sorceress Medea, who helped Jason capture the Golden Fleece and returned with him to Thessaly to be his wife. However, when Jason wanted to marry Creüsa and divorce Medea, she became a fatal woman indeed, sending a poisoned robe to Creüsa and killing her own children by Jason in revenge. This act is represented on a red-figure Greek vase in the Louvre in Paris and was also shown in two dramatic paintings by Eugène Delacroix, one painted in 1838, now in the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Lille, France, and the other in 1862, now in a private collection. The subject was taken from book VII of Ovid's Metamorphoses. Also in the nineteenth century, Frederick Sandys and Evelyn De Morgan showed Medea in her character as a working sorceress, complete with magic herbs. These paintings are now in England, at Birmingham and Birkenhead, respectively.

Proserpina, or the Greek Persephone, the bride of Hades or Pluto, is sometimes seen as a femme fatale but is more often portrayed as a victim carried off by Hades or Pluto to his dark kingdom, as in Gian Lorenzo Bernini's The Rape of Proserpine (1621) in the Borghese Gallery in Rome and in Rembrandt van Rijn's Abduction of Proserpine in the Staatliche Museen. Dante Gabriel Rossetti's sorrowful Proserpine (1874), in the Tate Gallery in London, is obviously a captive who is forced to spend part of the year with her dark spouse as a penalty for eating the seeds of the pomegranate, an obvious allegory of Earth's barrenness in winter and its renewal in spring when Proserpina rejoins her mother, Demeter, in the upper world.

The biblical tradition of femmes fatales produced Eve, Delilah, Jael, Judith, and Salome. Eve is included in the group because she yielded to the serpent's beguilement and brought death to humanity, a fact suggested in Lucien Lévy-Dhurmen's Eve (1896), in a private collection in Paris. Here, the serpent and Eve are shown cozily head to head. Delilah conquered her paramour Samson by cutting a lock of his hair, the source of his strength, in the story told in Judges 16. The story ends in the blinded Samson's death when he regains his strength and pulls the house down on his captors and himself. Delilah's power as a fatal woman is best shown in Rembrandt's painting The Blinding of Samson, or The Triumph of Delilah (1636), in the Staedel Institute in Frankfurt, Germany. This painting shows her holding aloft the shorn hair and scissors while the Philistines rush in to blind Samson. Delilah also plays a major role as temptress in John Milton's epic Samson Agonistes.

Judith, the Jewish heroine from the Book of Judith in the Apocrypha, saved her people by cutting off the head of Holofernes, the general besieging Israel. There are many representations of Judith and her maidservant with the head of Holofernes, such as that of Andrea Mantegna in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C.; Christofano Allori's in the Pitti Palace in Florence; Botticelli's in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence; Titian's in the Detroit Institute of Arts in Michigan; and Elisabetta Sirani's in the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore, Maryland. The most dramatic presentations of Judith in her role as fatal woman are by Artemisia Gentileschi. These show Judith actually cutting off Holofernes' head (versions in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence and the Capodimonte Museum in Naples, Italy). In the late nineteenth century, Judith was transformed from a courageous heroine into a gloating, nude femme fatale, sometimes even holding a phallic sword, by such artists as Gustav Klimt (Österreichische Galerie in Vienna) and Franz von Stuck (Staatliche Museum in Schwerin, Germany).

Salome, another biblical femme fatale, danced for her enamored stepfather, Herod, and asked for the head of John the Baptist as a reward. She is unique in that she did not directly entice her victim to his destruction. Instead, she danced erotically before her stepfather, arousing him until he promised to grant whatever she wished. For her reward, she followed the command of her mother, Herodias, wife of Herod, and asked for the head of the captive John the Baptist. Herodias had been condemned by John the Baptist for marrying Herod, her brother-in-law, and wished revenge. Against his own wish, Herod ordered the execution, presenting the head on a charger to Salome, who obediently passed it to her mother. The story is told in Mark 6:17–28. Salome, the agent of her mother's anger, has usually been depicted as the cause of John the Baptist's death. She is usually shown dancing before Herod or gloating over the charger containing the head. Nineteenth-century artists, especially Gustave Moreau and Aubrey Beardsley, ignored Herodias's role and turned Salome into one of the most erotic and perverse of femmes fatales.

Literary tradition, as we have already seen in classical representations, produced a multitude of fatal women. Arthurian legend, especially in Sir Thomas Malory's chivalric saga Morte d'Arthur and Alfred, Lord Tennyson's nineteenth-century version of that saga, The Idylls of the King, inspired many artists.

William Morris painted his fiancée Jane Burden as Guenevere, the wife of King Arthur, but also the innamorata of Lancelot, although the subject may have been Yseult, the wife of King Mark and the innamorata of Tristan. The painting is in the Tate Gallery in London. Jane was also the model for Dante Gabriel Rossetti's Sir Tristan, La Belle and Yseult Drinking the Love Potion in the Cecil Higgins Art Gallery in Bedford, England.

One of Burne-Jones's most famous paintings, The Beguiling of Merlin (1877) in the Lady Lever Art Gallery in Port Sunlight, England, shows Vivian as fatal woman, and Aubrey Beardsley drew a whole gallery of Arthurian temptresses in his illustrations for the Morte d'Arthur. Frederick Sandys contributed Morgen Le Fay (1864), now in the Birmingham Art Gallery in England, in the midst of a magic spell.

John Keats's poem "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" inspired a drawing and a watercolor by Rossetti (both in private collections) and a painting by John William Waterhouse in the Hessisches Landesmuseum in Darmstadt, Germany, in which the lady is capturing the knight in her long, flowing hair. Richard Wagner's operas not only contained a number of fatal women but also inspired artists such as Burne-Jones, whose Laus Veneris (1873–1878) in the Laing Art Gallery in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, was probably inspired by Tannhauser, and Henri Fantin-Latour, whose The Rhine Maidens in the Cabinet des Dessins at the Louvre in Paris drew on the Ring of the Nibelungen. Such depictions helped to renew interest in the theme of Tristan and Yseult.

The end of the nineteenth century and beginning of the twentieth century produced such predatory fatal women as Edvard Munch's Madonna (circa 1895) in the National Gallery in Oslo, Norway; The Vampire, a color lithograph and woodcut in the Munch Museum in Oslo; Ashes in the National Gallery in Oslo; and Pablo Picasso's Les Femmes d'Alger (O version O) in the Museum of Modern Art in New York. The Picasso work can be seen as fatal women in two senses. First, they are prostitutes in a bordello in Avignon Street who lure young men into paying for their services. Second, they could give their customers venereal disease. Today, they might even infect them fatally with AIDS. These fatal women have been supplanted by movie and television femmes fatales, such as Marlene Dietrich in Josef von Sternberg's The Blue Angel and vamps such as Theda Bara, Jean Harlow, Rita Hayworth, Marilyn Monroe, and Madonna.

See also Adultery; Bath/Bathing; Beheading/Decapitation; Betrayal; Dance/Dancers/Dancing; Sin/Sinning; Witchcraft/Sorcery

Selected Works of Art

Sphinx

Oedipus and the Sphinx, painted kylix, fifth century, Rome, Vatican Museum

Ingres, Jean-August-Dominique, Oedipus and the Sphinx, oil, 1808, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Moreau, Gustave, Oedipus and the Sphinx, oil, 1864, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Khnopff, Fernand, The Caresses of the Sphinx, oil, 1896, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique

Siren

Odysseus and the Sirens, bell krater from Paestum, circa 330 B.C., Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Leighton, Frederick, The Fisherman and the Syren, oil, 1858, Bristol, England, Bristol City Museum and Art Gallery

Waterhouse, John William, Ulysses and the Sirens, oil, 1891, Melbourne, Australia, National Gallery of Victoria

Mermaid

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Depths of the Sea, watercolor, 1887, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums

Waterhouse, John Williams, A Mermaid, oil, 1901, London, Royal Academy of Art

Medusa

Amasis Painter, Perseus with Medusa, wine krater, London, British Museum

Cellini, Benvenuto, Perseus with the Head of Medusa, bronze, 1545–1554, Florence, Italy, Loggia dei Lanzi

Caravaggio, The Head of Medusa, oil, circa 1597, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Hosmer, Harriet, Medusa, marble bust, 1853–1854, private collection

Circe

Circe Fleeing from Odysseus, red-figure krater, circa 450 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Wine of Circe, watercolor, 1863–1869, private collection

Medea

Medea in Her Dragon Chariot with Other Scenes, Lucanian red-figure krater, circa 400, Fort Worth, Texas, Kimball Art Museum

Delacroix, Eugène, Medea and Her Children, oil, 1838, Lille, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Sandys, Frederick, Medea, oil, 1868, Birmingham, England, Birmingham Museums and Art Gallery

De Morgan, Evelyn, Medea, oil, 1889, Birkenhead, England, England Art Gallery

Delilah

Rubens, Peter Paul, Samson and Delilah, oil, 1610–1613, London, National Gallery

Rembrandt van Rijn, The Triumph of Delilah (The Blinding of Samson), oil, 1636, Frankfurt, Germany, Staedel Institute

Judith

Mantegna, Andrea, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, oil on panel, circa 1495, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Botticelli, The Return of Judith, oil, 1469–1470, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith Cutting Off the Head of Holofernes, oil, circa 1620, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery; and Naples, Italy, Museo e Gallerie Nazionali di Capodimonte

Sirani, Elisabetta, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, oil, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery

Klimt, Gustav, Judith I, oil, 1901, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie Belvedere

Salome

Gozzoli, Benozzo, The Dance of Salome, oil, circa 1480, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Moreau, Gustave, The Dance of Salome (The Apparition), oil, 1876, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums

Moreau, Gustave, Salome Dancing Before Herod, oil, 1876, Paris, Musée Gustave Moreau

Klinger, Max, The Modern Salome, polychrome sculpture, 1893, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der Bildenden Künste

Beardsley, Aubrey, illustrations to Salome, by Oscar Wilde, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums

Lévy-Dhurmen, Lucien, Salome, pastel, 1896, Paris, private collection

Corinth, Lovis, Salome Receiving the Head of John the Baptist, oil, circa 1891, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Art Museums, Busch Reisinger Museum

Munch, Edvard, Salomé, black and white lithograph, 1903

Strauss, Richard, Salomé, opera, 1907

May, Ernst Wilhelm, Salomé, oil, 1940, Munich, Germany, private collection

Vivian

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Beguiling of Merlin, oil, 1877, Port Sunlight, England, Lady Lever Art Gallery

Morgan le Fay

Sandys, Frederick, Morgan Le Fay, oil, 1864, Birmingham, England, Birmingham Museums and Art Gallery

La Belle Dame Sans Merci

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, La Belle Dame Sans Merci, drawing, 1848, private collection

Waterhouse, John William, La Belle Dame Sans Merci, oil, 1893, Darmstadt, Germany, Hessisches Landesmuseum

Wagnerian

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Laus Veneris, oil, 1873–1878, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Laing Art Gallery

Fantin-Latour, Henri, The Rhine Maidens, drawing and lithograph, Paris, Louvre

Other Femme Fatales

Munch, Edvard, The Vampire, oil, 1893, Oslo, Norway, Munch Museum

Munch, Edvard, Red Headed Woman (Sin), color lithograph, 1901

Further Reading

Auerback, Nina, Woman and the Demon: The Life of a Victorian Myth, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982

Bade, Patrick, Femme Fatale, London: Ash and Grant, 1979; New York: Mayflower, 1979

Berger, Pamela, The Goddess Obscured, Boston: Beacon Press, 1985

Comini, Alessandra, Gustav Klimt, New York: G. Braziller, 1975

Dijkstra, Bram, Evil Sisters, New York: Knopf, 1996

_____, Idols of Perversity, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986

Harrison, Martin, and Bill Waters, Burne-Jones, London: Barrie and Jenkins, 1972; New York: Putnam, 1973

Jung, Carl Gustave, Man and His Symbols, London: Aldus, 1964; New York: Dell, 1971

Keats, John, La Belle Dame Sans Merci, London: Galliard, 1900; New York: Galaxy, 1900

Kuryluk, Ewa, Salome and Judas in the Cave of Sex, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1987

Lederer, Wolfgang, The Fear of Women, New York: Grune and Stratton, 1968

Mullins, Edwin, The Painted Witch: Female Body/Male Art: How Western Artists Have Viewed the Sexuality of Women, London: Secker and Warburg, 1985; New York: Carroll and Graf, 1985

Neumann, Erich, The Great Mother, London: Routledge and K. Paul, 1955; New York: Pantheon, 1955

Praz, Mario, The Romantic Agony, London: Oxford University Press, 1933; New York: Oxford University Press, 1951

Schechter, Harold, The New Gods: Psyche and Symbol in Popular Art, Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Press, 1980

Stang, Ragna, Edvard Munch, translated by Geoffrey Culverwell, New York: Abbeville Press, 1979; London: Fraser, 1979

Stott, Rebecca, The Fabrication of the Late-Victorian Femme Fatale, Houndsmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire: Macmillan, 1992

FEMALE BEAUTY AND ADORNMENT

Elise Goodman

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Female Beauty and Adornment:

ANCIENT

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

NINETEENTH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

François Boucher, Jeanne-Antoinette Poisson, La Marquise de Pompadour, 1758, oil on canvas, oval, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum, bequest of Charles E. Dunlap. (Courtesy of the Harvard University Art Museums)

The theme of female beauty and adornment was crystallized in sculptures, paintings, and prints depicting Venus (the goddess of love), a Venus-like woman, or a radiant mortal at the bath or at her toilette. The numerous works portraying these subjects, from their inception in late Classical Greece through the Venetian Renaissance and the French rococo to French impressionism, feature an idealized beauty involved in her ablutions or at her dressing table, admiring herself in a mirror, applying makeup, combing her hair, or simply displaying her abundant charms to the putative (usually male) beholder. In the toilette scenes, her beautiful form and its splendid reflection outshine her surroundings and the objects portrayed with her: jewelry, the mirror, a candle, and other accoutrements that enhance her allure. In most versions, an admirer (either present or implied) gazes at the woman, serves as an agent of her beautification, provides the stimulation for it, or acts as a masculine foil to her feminine pulchritude. This admirer is usually the surrogate for the artist or the patron, sometimes both. At any rate, his gaze controls the actions of the woman in the work of art.

The exceptions to the rule of the adulation of the female form occurred in seventeenth-century Holland, where artists and patrons, under the sway of rigorous Protestant morality, used the image of the lady at her toilette to censure didactically female beauty and the illicit love/lust that it allegedly engendered. In the oeuvre of Berthe Morisot, a morally constrained grandes bourgeoise and the only woman artist considered, the artist equivocated about her subjects, at once teasing the viewer with their sexuality but then subverting it.

The works generally devoted to the theme of the lady at her toilette were based in part on the custom of the woman's lever, the reception held on rising from bed, that in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century France attained the status of an institutionalized ritual. The images were rarely replications of reality, however; rather, they were often imbued with a metaphorical dimension that can best be understood in the light of an equally hallowed poetic tradition, that of Petrarchism and its seventeenth- and eighteenth-century descendants, Préciosité and Poésie du badinage. The themes, tropes, and conceits of this continuous literary strain are analogous to the iconography, imagery, and symbolism of the pictures. Generally, poet-lovers hyperbolically hymn the woman's charms and apostrophize her personal effects, which implement and heighten her attractiveness. A crucial component of these lyrics is the response that the mistress provokes in the versifier. Thus, from the outset, both lyric and painting were not merely designed to celebrate feminine beauty and adornment for their own sakes but were meant to privilege the masculine reaction to them.

In late Classical Greece, Praxiteles inaugurated the long tradition of the female nude at the bath with his Aphrodite of Knidos (circa 350 B.C.). A Roman copy of the original is in the Vatican Museums. The statue occupies a central position in ancient art as a paragon of female beauty that is ideal, sensuous, disciplined, and luminous. Accounts of the Knidian Aphrodite, written exclusively by men about a statue made by a male sculptor, privileged her alluring nudity, which to them signaled her divinity, fully revealed her beauty, and stimulated erotic responses. The literature implies that the Aphrodite of Knidos was less an inert statue than a living, fecund woman who embodied the timeless beauty and sexual power of the goddess. Her attribute, the hydria (water vessel), encodes her fertility and her eternal freshness and youth, and her gesture of modesty, the "Venus Pudica" pose, at once screens her pudendum and celebrates the divine power of her sexuality.

The Aphrodite of Knidos was enshrined as an exemplar of pulchritude and thus engendered numerous successors in antiquity and for centuries to come. Her most famous offspring are the Hellenistic Capitoline Aphrodite (Roman copy, second century A.D., Capitoline Museum in Rome) and the Medici Aphrodite (Roman copy at the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy), which, through the placement of their right arm near their breast and their left over their pubic area, declare their sexuality even more emphatically than their ancestor; their arms celebrate rather than conceal their beauty, and they are self-possessed, indifferent to any alleged male intruder.

In the Venetian Renaissance, Giovanni Bellini was the first artist to divest the theme of the woman admiring herself in a glass from its allegorical or moralizing trappings. Apparently untouched by classical influence (Clark, p. 112), his Young Woman at her Toilette (1515), which features a seductive nude attending to her hair with two mirrors, contains no references to vanity, pride, or prudence as do other contemporary pictures. The subject of the work is a beautiful, self-reflective woman and her alliance with the pastoral landscape behind her, which macrocosmically projects her ideal form.

About the same time, Titian took up the secular subject but recast it in The Young Woman at Her Toilette (circa 1515) in the Louvre in Paris. Here, an actual lover is an agent of the lady's beautification, gazing longingly at her as he holds one mirror in front of her and another behind. Dressed in alluring décolletage, with her finger provocatively touching a perfume bottle, the voluptuous woman is displayed for the viewer's delight; his painted surrogate is the ardent male beckoning her gaze.

The iconography of Titian's painting is paralleled by the major poetic theme of the suitor holding up a mirror to the woman so that she may admire her beauty. The model of this topos was Petrarch's Il mio avversario, in which the poet envies the lady's mirror because it, rather than he, is the object of her loving glance. The motif became canonical in Titian's lifetime. In Antonio Tebaldeo's sixteenth-century sonnet, the lover exhorts the lady to look away from her mirror and at him; he protests that he is the mirror of her “true” beauty, which is as great as his passion. Thus, both male poet and male lover-bewilderer bestow meaning on the female form.

In contrast to the warmly palpable Venetian protagonists, the women at their toilettes in three extant versions (circa 1590–1595) by the French School of Fontainebleau (in Dijon, France; Basel, Switzerland; and Worcester, Massachusetts) are cold icons of beauty. They are alabaster-like nudes at their dressing tables, which become a kind of secular altar bedecked with their personal effects so that the spectator is invited to adore the mannered elegance to which they are serviceable. He is beckoned to blazon their comeliness through the eyes of the painters, who in turn used a metaphorical language of beauty analogous to that of contemporaneous poets.

Like his contemporaries, the Pléiade poets, the artist of the Dijon variant assimilated the lady's complexion to the red and white flowers on her dressing table and her lips to the coral on her mirror. As in Pléiade odes, the woman's head is shaped like the pearls in her hair, in her ear, and on her mirror. Her blond hair outstrips her gold jewelry, and her gems are assumed to pale when likened to the human jewel who wears them.

In addition to embodying perfect poetic beauty, the Fontainebleau sitters project other personae: because of their blond physical type, which resembles that of mistresses at the French court, they may be idealized portraits of royal favorites. They may also be Venuses or Venus figures. Because the woman in the Dijon version, the personification of ideal beauty, is also associated with roses and pearls and is flanked by a mirror adorned with cupids and shells (all attributes of Venus), the lady can be thought to be an earthly incarnation of the goddess of love. In fact, the “Venuses” in the Fontainebleau pictures are relatives of Titian's mythological Venus at Her Toilette (circa 1550, now in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C.), who in turn is saluted by the Petrarchan painter with a poetic harmony of reds, whites, and golds, the color scale that conjures up the features of the perfect mistress. Thus, as mortal descendants of the goddess of love and beauty, the sitters of the Fontainebleau paintings announce a two-century lineage of portraits of French women as Venus.

One of these likenesses is Nicolas de Largillière's Portrait of a Woman as Venus (circa 1695–1700) in the St. Louis Art Museum in Missouri. Inspired by the Fontainebleau type, Largillière transformed his source by synthesizing the traditional allegorical portrayal with the new Baroque realistic bourgeois portrait. Dressed in the latest haute couture with her hair arranged in a modish style, this woman is reminiscent of the slightly earlier Précieuses (ladies of the literary salons) who garbed themselves at their toilette in satins, lace, ribbons, and jewelry. In this sense, Largillière's fashionable subject re-creates the ideal of womanhood admired by the Précieux and the Précieuses: she has “an imperious air, majestic carriage, corpulent neck, fleshy throat, [and] rounded and plump arms” (Goodman-Soellner, 1987, p. 46).

Another striking trait of the ideal woman in the seventeenth century was her fiery eyes, which glowed most brightly in front of her mirror at her toilette. In love lyrics of the period, the comeliness of the lady was said to transform an ordinary looking glass, in which she admired herself, into a burning mirror; to the luster of her gaze was attributed a power as radiant as the sun.

This conceit appeared most notably in Parisian allegorical prints of sight produced during the reign of Louis XIII. Their expository verses, which intone the “inflammatory gaze” metaphor, belong to the same genre as the verses of love and compliment. For example, the appended rhyme of Jean Humbelot's La Veüe (circa 1635–1642) describes the amazement of Lysis and her suitor at the reflected beams of her eyes, which ignite her looking glass and his passion. With a slightly different nuance, the coquette admiring herself in a mirror in Abraham Bosse's undated La Veüe miraculously, according to the accompanying stanzas, has a gaze capable of engendering love through the projected beams of her eyes, which strike and wound their victim's heart like Cupid's darts.

The only known painted example of this trope is Gerard Terborch's Lady at her Toilette (circa 1657) in the Wallace Collection in London, a Dutch picture probably influenced by French iconography. Terborch suggests the superior luminosity of female beauty over candlelight, as poetic conceits have it. The flame is extinguished in the candle behind the mirror, yet the light on the faces of the woman and her maid is brighter than any taper could engender. The radiance evidently emanates from the coquette's gaze into the glass, which becomes, as it were, a burning mirror.

In later seventeenth-century Holland, Terborch, together with Jan Vermeer, was the consummate painter of female elegance. Terborch's Lady at Her Toilette (circa 1660), in the Detroit Institute of Art in Michigan, revels in the depiction of a statuesque young woman garbed in silks and surrounded by opulent furnishings and the rich accoutrements of the toilette—the milieu of an haute bourgeoisie. A master of ambiguity, Terborch typically does not fully explain the absent-minded gesture of the woman fingering her ring and her accompanying pensive expression, both of which may signal the seriousness of a liaison or an upcoming marriage. If so, the dog, an age-old symbol of fidelity, and the silver-framed mirror, which in this context may symbolize self-knowledge or prudence, find their rightful places in this decorous boudoir. Later in the decade, much in the thrall of Terborch, Frans van Mieris executed at least three versions of richly attired young women at their toilettes (circa 1662, Berlin-Dahlem, Germany; 1667, Dresden, Germany; 1678, Paris, Louvre), which may also be infused with amorous content.

But Terborch's ode to comeliness and love was the exception to the rule in Dutch paintings of the Golden Age. Most pictures of the lady at her toilette, produced under the influence of Protestantism, censured female beauty and adornment as sinful and evil. With the aid of moralizing emblems and proverbs, painters cast the attractive woman at her mirror as a wanton courtesan (Caesar van Everdingen, Michael Sweerts, Jan Steen), a vessel of vanity (Paulus Moreelse; Terborch, Girl in front of a Mirror; Frans van Mieris, A Young Woman Standing Before a Mirror), and a cunning temptress (Gabriel Metsu, Hunter's Gift; Frans van Mieris, The Puppy).

A virtual catalog of the made-up-woman's wiles is Jan Miense Molenaer's Woman at Her Toilette—Lady World (1663) in the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio. The emblems of meretriciousness caution the would-be sinner: the ring and the mirror, symbols of personal conceit and falseness of appearance, respectively; jewels and trinkets, signs of wealth's temptations; a chained monkey pawing the woman's empty shoe, emblems of lust and eroticism; the skull under her foot and the bubbles, signifiers of life's transitory nature; musical instruments, emblems of worldly temptations; and the map behind the vain woman's head, a visual metaphor of "Lady World," the embodiment of all vice and lust. The painted admonitions continued unabated throughout the century.

In Terborch's more subtle yet equally somber Girl in Front of a Mirror (after 1650), now in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, the grave reflection of the girl's face bespeaks not beauty but death and deception. What Terborch and other painters of a young woman's fleeting beauty foretell, Bernardo Strozzi brutally but poignantly exposes in The Old Woman at Her Mirror (1635), in the Modiano Collection in Bologna, Italy. Strozzi depicts the ultimate affront: No jewels, flowers, makeup, or perfume can camouflage the ravages of wrinkles and sagging flesh. He adds insult to injury by having one of the aged woman's attendants gleefully plant an ostrich feather into her gray hair.

On a more ambivalent note, Gabriel Metsu's Young Lady at Her Toilette (1650s), now in the Norton Simon Foundation in Pasadena, California, portrays an artfully arranged boudoir scene that both attracts and warns the putative spectator. Clues to the painting's interpretation include the procuress-like maid combing the young girl's fragile blond hair, a visual counterpoint of age and fleeting youth; the empty shoe and the pillow, signs of lasciviousness; the inviting viola da gamba, waiting to intone sexual strains; and the mirror and the ostrich feather, signifying worldly vanity and futility. Metsu's The Intruder, painted in the next decade and now in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., makes plain what its precursor merely intimated: that the activities of the toilette are best served in a brothel. The bed, the uterine-like vessel, and the phallic candle implanted in a concave receptacle visually metaphorize the nature of the client's intrusion into the woman's chamber of beauty.

Although distilling the ingredients of Netherlandish brothel scenes like Metsu's (as well as those of French popular prints and Italian mythologies), Antoine Watteau, in Lady at Her Toilette (circa 1716–1717) in the Wallace Collection in London, ushered in a new era, the rococo, and with it a very different attitude toward female beauty. Created in the matrix of the French Enlightenment and its liberal social mores, Watteau's canvas revels in the unabashed sensuality of the female nude.

But Watteau's overtly erotic work was tangential to the eighteenth-century mainstream production of portraits of women of quality at their morning lever (Jacques-André-Joseph Aved, Mme de Bacquencourt at Her Toilette, 1739, and Jean-Marc Nattier, Mme Marsollier with Her Daughter at Her Toilette, 1749). Concurrently, lightly amorous genre paintings and prints reflecting the widespread custom of a gallant's attendance at his lady's toilette proliferated. For example, Jean Raoux's Lady at Her Toilette (1723) merely alludes to the reason for the young woman's beautification by showing her gazing into her cheval glass, which simultaneously reflects her lovely image and that of her military officer, who, as it were, stares at both reflections from his portrait on the wall. François de Troy's A Lady Showing a Bracelet Miniature to Her Suitor (1722–1727) in the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City, Missouri, meticulously re-creates the sumptuous accoutrements of a rococo boudoir, the perfect setting for tender courtship and love. In a more suggestive tenor, Nicolas Lancret's Morning in the National Gallery in London was described in 1739 thus: "This young person, with her bodice nonchalantly open and her dressing gown thrown back . . . pours tea into a cup that M. l'Abbé holds out to her with a distracted air; because he is attentive only to this beauty's disarray" (Holmes, p. 90).

François Boucher's masterly Jeanne-Antoinette Poisson, La Marquise de Pompadour (1758), in the Fogg Art Museum at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, reflects both the rococo portrait and the amorous genre traditions. It represents the Marquise applying makeup while wearing a bracelet adorned with a cameo image of Louis XV; the king, her erstwhile lover, is the stimulus for her application of maquillage (makeup), and thus Boucher's image attests to her dual role as legendary beauty and present official royal mistress.

The Fogg portrait and related paintings and prints reflect the elaborate and protracted ritual of the eighteenth-century woman's toilette, in which she spent an inordinate amount of time making up, en déshabillé (casually dressed), while simultaneously entertaining male admirers. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the complicated rite of maquillage lasted about an hour. After the coiffure was powdered, the woman's eyes were enlarged with black pencils, her face was dusted with powder and then covered with a thick coat of ceruse, and finally her cheeks were enlivened with several layers of rouge.

Maquillage, a symptom of an age that reveled in factitiousness, is a major theme of Boucher's 1758 image as well as his Woman Applying a Mouche (before 1770) and Le Matin—La Dame à sa toilette, etched by Gilles-Edmé Petit in 1734. All these works have antecedents in Parisian modish engravings devoted to the art of makeup and are relatives of Étienne Jeaurat's La Coquette (circa 1732), which in turn was informed by tracts and poems that instructed fashionable women on the methods to muster their charms at the toilette to engage and seduce a lover. This modish paragon, with "a florid complexion in miniature" that radiates a "marvelous luster" (Goodman-Soellner, 1987, p. 50), was also paradoxically exhorted in literature and on versified prints to eschew the artifices of the toilette for the natural. The age was schizophrenically drawn to and repelled by the cosmetics of the coquette.

What the rococo painters, contemporaneous theorists, and les Poètes badins (society poets) embraced, however, was an ideal of beauty that manifested itself from Nattier's aristocratic sitters to Boucher's portraits of Mme de Pompadour to the latter's seductive coquette (not courtesan) in Woman Fastening Her Garter, with Her Maid (1742) to the artist's myriad evocations of goddesses and shepherdesses and beyond. All these women are blessed with perfect oval faces; porcelain- or alabaster-like complexions; florid cheeks; curly hair; coral lips; boneless, malleable bodies; and sparkling eyes. The rococo paragon represented the apex of a French tradition of pulchritude that was charted by the School of Fontainebleau three centuries earlier.

In the nineteenth century, Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres's wanton Turkish Bath (Louvre, Paris; signed and dated 1862, completed 1863) stands for the age-old tradition of the objectification of the female nude by the male painter, who projects his desire and control on her pictured image. A veritable orgy of unabashed carnality, Turkish Bath rephrases Ingres's earlier essays of exotic bathers and nudes. The aged voyeur casts his baigneuses (bathers) in every titillating attitude possible: Hair is perfumed to the strains of a mandolin, sweets and coffee are ingested, breasts are caressed, and bodies are in supine abandon. The circular frame that constrains these languorous nudes is the primary signifier of the overarching theme of the painting: the female aperture, which the 82-year-old Ingres is denied in the real world.

Berthe Morisot both negotiates and subverts this pervasive masculine vision of the nude. In her seven toilette scenes (circa 1876–1880), she recognized, according to tradition, that the woman's body was supposed to be erotic; however, as a woman of haut bourgeois respectability (and inhibitions), "Morisot turned eroticism into an empty spectacle by refusing to provide the sexual content a viewer would expect" (Higonnet, p. 159). Her ambivalence and equivocation are most notable in Young Woman Seen from Behind at Her Toilette (1880, Art Institute of Chicago) and At the Psyché (1891, private collection), in which she entices the beholder with bare backs and naked shoulders but denies him a view of the delectable lower parts of the body (they are draped) and bared breasts. Instead, she deflects the sight of her models' sexuality by emphasizing painterly surfaces, opulent accouterments, and nebulous, sometimes opaque reflections. As a woman, Morisot is alienated from the masculine-gendered vision of the woman at her toilette.

The theme of the woman at her bath and at her toilette was perpetuated in numerous imaginative variations by other nineteenth-century painters (Pierre Bonnard, Mary Cassatt, Edgar Degas, Eugène Delacroix, Pierre August Renoir, and Georges Seurat) and those of the twentieth century. The fascination with female beauty and adornment, whether saluted unequivocally or ambivalently, has stimulated artists to devote some of their most provocative work to the subject.

See also Bath/Bathing; Mirror/Reflection; Toilet Scenes; Vanity/Vanitas

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

- Praxiteles, Aphrodite of Knidos, sculpture, original circa 350 B.C., Roman copy, Rome, Vatican Museums
Capitoline Aphrodite, sculpture, Roman copy of Hellenistic original, second century A.D., Rome, Capitoline Museum
Medici Aphrodite, sculpture, Roman copy of Hellenistic original, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Renaissance

- Bellini, Giovanni, Young Woman at Her Toilette, 1515, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Titian, The Young Woman at Her Toilette, circa 1515, Paris, Louvre

- Titian, Venus at Her Toilette, circa 1550, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 School of Fontainebleau, Lady at Her Toilette, circa 1590, Dijon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Seventeenth Century

- Moreelse, Paulus, A Young Woman with a Mirror, 1627, Cambridge, England, Fitzwilliam Museum
 Strozzi, Bernardo, The Old Woman at Her Mirror, circa 1635, Bologna, Italy, Modiano Collection; Moscow, Russia, State Pushkin Museum
 Humbelot, Jean, La Veüe, circa 1635–1642, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France
 Sweerts, Michael, A Courtesan at Her Toilette, circa 1645, Rome, Galleria dell'Accademia di San Luca
 Everdingen, Caesar van, A Courtesan at Her Toilette, mid-seventeenth century, The Hague, The Netherlands, Steengracht Collection
 Metsu, Gabriel, Young Lady at Her Toilette, 1650s, Pasadena, California, Norton Simon Foundation
 Terborch, Gerard, Girl in Front of a Mirror, after 1650, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Terborch, Gerard, Lady at Her Toilette, circa 1657, London, Wallace Collection
 Terborch, Gerard, Lady at Her Toilette, circa 1660, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Art
 Metsu, Gabriel, Hunter's Gift, 1660s, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Metsu, Gabriel, The Intruder, 1660s, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Mieris, Frans van, The Puppy, circa 1660, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Mieris, Frans van, A Woman Examining Herself in a Mirror, circa 1662, Berlin-Dahlem, Germany, Staatliche Museen
 Steen, Jan, The Morning Toilette, 1663, London, Buckingham Palace
 Molenaer, Jan Miense, Woman at Her Toilette—Lady World, 1663, Toledo, Ohio, The Toledo Museum of Art
 Mieris, Frans van, A Young Woman at Her Toilette, 1667, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Mieris, Frans van, A Young Woman Standing Before a Mirror, 1670 (?), Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Bosse, Abraham, La Veüe, before 1676, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France
 Mieris, Frans van, A Young Woman at Her Toilette, 1678, Paris, Louvre
 Largillière, Nicolas de, Portrait of a Woman as Venus, circa 1695–1700, St. Louis, Missouri, St. Louis Art Museum

Eighteenth Century

- Watteau, Antoine, Lady at Her Toilette, circa 1716–1717, London, Wallace Collection
 Troy, François de, A Lady Showing a Bracelet Miniature to Her Suitor, 1722–1727, Kansas City, Missouri, Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art
 Raoux, Jean, Lady at Her Toilette, 1723, London, Christie's sale

- Jeaurat, Étienne, La Coquette, circa 1732
 Petit, Gilles-Edmé, Le Matin—La Dame à sa Toilette, engraving, 1734, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France
 Aved, Jacques-André-Joseph, Mme de Bacquencourt at Her Toilette, 1739, Jerusalem, Israel Museum
 Lancrer, Nicolas, Morning, circa 1739, London, National Gallery
 Boucher, François, Woman Fastening Her Garter, with Her Maid, 1742, Lugano, Switzerland, Thussen-Bornemisza Collection
 Nattier, Jean-Marc, Mme Marsollier with Her Daughter at Her Toilette, 1749, New York, Metropolitan Museum
 Boucher, François, Portrait of Mme de Pompadour, circa 1750, Paris, Louvre
 Boucher, François, Portrait of Mme de Pompadour, circa 1756, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Boucher, François, Jeanne-Antoinette Poisson, La Marquise de Pompadour, 1758, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
 Boucher, François, Woman Applying a Mouche, before 1770

Nineteenth Century

- Ingres, Jean-August-Dominique, Turkish Bath, 1862–1863, Paris, Louvre
 Morisot, Berthe, Young Woman Seen from Behind at Her Toilette, 1880, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
 Morisot, Berthe, At the Psyché, 1891, private collection
 Beardsley, Aubrey, The Toilet of Helen, illustration to Under the Hill, The Savoy, 1896
 Beardsley, Aubrey, The Toilet, for The Rape of the Lock, by Alexander Pope, London, 1896

Further Reading

- Béguin, Sylvie, “La Dame à sa toilette,” in L'Ecole de Fontainebleau, Paris: Editions d'Art Gonthier-Seghers, 1960
 Clark, Kenneth, The Nude: A Study in Ideal Form, New York: Pantheon, 1956
 Eymard, Julien, Le Thème du miroir dans la poésie française, (Ph.D. diss., Université de Toulouse-Le Mirail III, 1975)
 Goodman-Soellner, Elise, “Poetic Interpretations of the Lady at her Toilette Theme in Sixteenth-Century Painting,” The Sixteenth Century Journal, 14:4 (1983)

- , “Nicolas Lancrer's Le Miroir ardent: An Emblematic Image of Love,” Simiolus 13 (1983)
 ———, “Boucher's Madame de Pompadour at her Toilette,” Simiolus 17 (1987)
 Havelock, Christine Mitchell, The Aphrodite of Knidos and Her Successors: A Historical Review of the Female Nude in Greek Art, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995
 Higonnet, Anne, Berthe Morisot's Images of Women, Cambridge, Massachusetts and London: Harvard University Press, 1992
 Holmes, Mary Tavener, Nicolas Lancrer, New York: Abrams, 1991 de Jongh, E. de, Zinne-en minnebeelden in de schilderkunst van de zeventiende eeuw, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Nederlandse Stichting Openbaar Kunstbezit en Openbaar Kunstbezit in Vlaanderen, 1967
 ———, “Vermommingen van Vrouw Wereld in de 17de eeuw,” in Album Amicorum J. G. van Gelder, The Hague, The Netherlands: Nijhoff, 1973
 ———, et al., Tot Lering en Vermaak, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Rijksmuseum, 1976
 Laing, Alastair, et al., François Boucher: 1703–1770, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1986
 Lind, Edward, Masters of Seventeenth-Century Dutch Genre Painting, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1984
 Mortari, Luisa, Bernardo Strozzi, Rome: De Luca Editore, 1966
 Naumann, Otto, Frans van Mieris The Elder, Doornspijk, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1981
 Posner, Donald, “The Duchesse de Velours and Her Daughter: A Masterpiece by Nattier and Its Historical Context,” The Metropolitan Museum Journal 31 (1996)
 ———, Watteau: A Lady at her Toilet, New York: Viking, 1973
 Robinson, Franklin Westcott, Gabriel Metsu (1629–1667): A Study of His Place in Dutch Genre Painting of the Golden Age, New York: Abner Schram, 1974
 Rosenblum, Robert, Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres, New York: Abrams, 1967
 Rosenfeld, Myra Nan, Largillierre and the Eighteenth-Century Portrait, Montreal, Quebec: Museum of Fine Arts, 1982

FOOLS/FOLLY

Margaret A. Sullivan

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Fools/Folly:

ANCIENT

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

MEDIEVAL

TWENTIETH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

De boni consilij contemptoribus.

17

Sebastian Brant, "De Boni confiln contemptoribus," page 17 from Stultitia navis (Basel, Switzerland, 1572).
(Courtesy of the Houghton Library, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts)

Fools are a constant in every culture. Irrational and showing no forethought, they behave as the antithesis of wisdom, prudence, and self-control as defined by the society in which they live. Fools may be aberrant by birth or accident (factors beyond their control) or may have the capacity for self-control but fail to exercise it: “He who sees the good and chooses the bad makes himself wittingly a fool,” says an old French proverb; or, folly may be counterfeited, and the role of fool might be adopted to amuse or to satirize. Whatever the cause or the motivation, fools are always deviant, their conduct unconventional, and their behavior abnormal and mad in relation to prevailing conceptions of normalcy and sanity.

In Western art and literature, two traditional strategies for representing the fool are present. The first is reductive: The fool is shown naked or wearing little clothing, and he often has bare feet and a shaved head. The second is additive: “something animal on the head, something variegated on the body, and something comical in the hand.” The fool wears a hood that emphasizes his kinship with the beasts, as in Quentin Massys’s Allegory of Folly, his portrait of a fool (circa 1510) in which the hood is decorated with the ears of an ass and the peak ends in the likeness of a rooster, or Lucas van Leyden’s print A Fool Kissing a Woman (1520) with its cockscorn running down the center seam of the eared hood. The variegated costume, or fool’s motley, with its multiple colors in odd arrangements, serves as an outward manifestation of his demented and disorganized mind. The bauble, or fool’s stick, that he carries is a frivolous plaything, a toy suitable for children rather than grown-ups and a parody of the king’s scepter, the traditional emblem of kingly wisdom and authority. When a bladder is substituted for the traditional bauble, as in Hans Sebald Beham’s small print (circa 1530) of a male fool seated on the ground next to a female fool, its phallic shape emphasizes his inability to control his sexual appetites, a failing that further associates the fool with animals. Grotesque features such as a big nose, large lips, crossed eyes, or some other deformity that is the antithesis of a desirable physiognomy also characterize the imagery of the fool and are used to mark the fool as a deviant.

Prior to the modern era, the principal function of the fool was didactic. For example, in a twelfth-century relief sculpture at Chartres Cathedral in France, the allegorical figure of Folly is paired with her opposite number, Prudence, in a cycle of virtues and vices. The fool was also used as a cover for criticism as a legitimate way to release feelings of frustration and anger and express views normally kept silent. The Feast of Fools (Festum stultorum or fatuorum), celebrated between Christmas and Epiphany during the medieval period, allowed the rituals and hierarchy of the Catholic Church to be turned upside down without fear of reprisal. The celebration of the divine office gave way to a veritable carnival in which the lower clergy mocked the celebration of the Mass, played cards and dice on the altar, smeared their faces with soot, wore grotesque masks, dressed as women or as fools with caps and bells, and, after electing some beggar as bishop or pope of fools, poured into the city streets parading their fraudulent leader, throwing excrement, dancing wildly, and singing obscenities.

In the same way it was permissible for the court fool or jester to voice criticisms of the ruler and other powerful people. The king’s jester could speak with impunity and say what was normally forbidden, and rulers could hear the truth, however unpleasant, without compromising their royal authority. Power insulates, and the court fool served as a counter to the flattery and deceit that surrounded the powerful. In addition, if he was a “natural” rather than a jester feigning folly, the court fool was a humbling reminder that divine selection works both ways. One person may be born a king, another an idiot. But even when given a privileged position, the fool remained subordinate and his survival provisional and problematic. The excesses of the Feast of Fools eventually caused it to be outlawed, and a royal jester who misjudged the limits of his freedom could be whipped or dismissed in disgrace.

The Fool in the Late Medieval Period

Although the sources for fool imagery are ancient and folly and madness still with us, the great period for the concept of folly and the fool is from the thirteenth through the sixteenth century. In religious art of the thirteenth century, in sculpture, stained-glass windows, and in manuscripts, Folly is an allegorical figure who is usually male, bare-headed, wearing a loose garment, holding a round object or placing it in his mouth, and carrying a club. The precise identity of the round object is not known—perhaps it is a cake, a loaf of bread, a stone, a ball, or even the host that is being desecrated—but the general meaning is clear: The fool is obsessed with material things and fails to believe in God.

Heresy is central to these medieval images, and when the fool is not alone, he is accompanied by the devil or by God, who looks down on the fool with displeasure. In manuscripts, he is positioned most frequently in the historiated initial that begins Psalm 53: “Dixit insipiens in corde suo non est Deus” (The Fool hath said in his heart, There is no God). The initial “D” for Psalm 53 from the Psalter of the Duc du Berry (1380–1385), probably by Jacquemart de Hesdin, shows the fool with his white robe draped loosely over his head; his feet are bare, he holds a club, and he bites a round object. Even later, when Hans Holbein the Younger illustrated Psalm 53 (before 1543), he shows a fool of this type with bare feet, thumb in his mouth, and a loose, revealing garment. From the perspective of the Roman Catholic Church, heresy and folly are equated, and the fool is a sinner. The prudent man believes in God, and the fool doubts.

The image of the stultus (the fool-as-sinner) that developed in the thirteenth century can be traced to Rome, Greece, and Egypt, suggesting a pattern of appropriation in which images from the pagan past reappeared in a Christian context. The scandalous Feast of Fools, with its irreverent parody of the sacred, is similar to the Roman Saturnalia celebrated in December and is known as the “Liberty of December.” The Saturnalia permitted obscene singing and dancing and a reversal of roles, with masters serving their slaves and men dressing as women. The bald head is characteristic of the stupidus of Roman mime. The Roman satirist Juvenal describes shaved heads (vertice raso) as an ancient comic device, and Nonius refers to the calvis mimicus, the bald-headed mime. A close-cropped head was characteristic of jongleurs (jugglers) and fools in the medieval period, and the line “He is shaved like a fool” occurs in a medieval mystery play.

An Italian example, Giotto’s allegorical figure of Stultitia (Folly) (circa 1304) in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy, is similar to the northern fool and serves a similar function. Giotto’s Stultitia has short hair, bare feet, and a large club and is coupled with the allegorical figure of Prudentia. In addition, the figure in Giotto’s Stultitia wears a feathered headdress, a short garment with ragged sleeves, and a scalloped hemline belted over an exaggerated, oversize belly. The huge belly recalls the heavily padded costume seen in ancient mime, and the feathered headdress is characteristic of late representations of the Egyptian divinity Bes. The possibility of Egyptian, as well as Greek and Roman, sources for the fool is suggested by Lucian’s satire The Carousal, or the Lapiths, in which a fool is ordered to come in and amuse the guests at a drunken banquet.

In came an ugly fellow with his head shaven except for a few hairs that stood up straight on his crown. First he danced, doubling himself up and twisting himself about to cut a more ridiculous figure, then he beat time and recited scurrilous verses in an Egyptian brogue and finally he began to poke fun at the guests.

The Fool in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries

The image of the bare-headed heretical fool holding a round object gradually disappeared during the late medieval period and was replaced by the second type, the eared fool dressed in motley and carrying a bauble. Fools decorate four playing cards from around 1453—two male “Narrs” and two female “Narreyn”—and although they all wear loose robes and have bare feet, only the males have the hood with ears and bells. In Breviary of Philip the Good (circa 1430–1440), the fool occupies his customary place in the historiated initial “D” that begins Psalm 53, but instead of a loose drape he wears a peaked hood with animal ears; bells circle his legs, he holds a bauble with his mirror image, and he is accompanied by the king rather than God or the devil. In another illumination from the same manuscript, the fool wears the ermine of the king and carries a sword instead of a bauble, and the banderole above his head reads, “Stultori infiniti est numerus” (The number of fools is infinite). This phrase foreshadows the expansion of Folly’s realm in the years around 1500.

Like the underdressed heretical fool, the fool in cap and bells has its origins in the theater, ceremonies, and customs of the ancient world. The Roman poet Martial (book VI, xxxix) refers to “the son of your fool Cyrtia,” who has a “sharp head and two long asses’ ears,” and an eared hood distinguishes a mask, perhaps Gaulish, of the Roman period. The fool in Roman mime, the stupidus, wore a long, pointed hat over his bald head and was dressed in a garment of mixed colors, or patchwork—Apuleius refers to this as the mimi centunculus (Apologia, xiii)—or, less frequently, an all-white costume. These ancient sources are reflected in a manuscript (circa 1478) of St. Augustine’s City of God in which the obscene games of the ancient Romans are illustrated with naked dancers, and the two males wear a hood with large animal ears and a cockscomb. In a woodcut illustrating a scene from Terence’s comedy The Eunuchus, published in Ulm, Germany (1486), Pythias is shown as a fool wearing the hood with ears and carrying a bauble. The white costume from mime even makes an occasional appearance, as in the outfit worn by the fool/jester in the Luxuria section of The Seven Deadly Sins, painted by Hieronymus Bosch (circa 1500).

Even the practice of including fools in a royal entourage was based on ancient precedent. The jester-mimus of a Roman emperor accompanied the funeral cortege of his master and diverted the crowd by imitating and ridiculing the bad habits of the departed (Dionysius, lib. VII). Although royal fools are recorded from the eleventh century, their popularity greatly increased in the fourteenth century—the first mention of a fool for the House of Bourgogne is in 1363, when Nicolas was employed to divert Philip the Hard—and by the middle of the fifteenth century, the custom of keeping domestic fools was firmly established throughout Europe with fools in every royal court and in the entourages of rich prelates. The fool Triboulet, one of the most celebrated of court fools, figures in the accounts of René d’Anjou from 1447, and his master had the court sculptor Francesco Laurana immortalize the fool with a medal engraved with his effigy. Triboulet—his name came from the verb tribouler, which could be translated cervelle branlante (a brain shaky and unsteady)—had a bizarrely shaped head that was pointed and scarcely bigger than a doll’s and that contrasted with his large, thick body; he is also shown carrying a bauble and wearing a small skullcap.

Examples of the fool in art and literature multiply in the years after 1500, moving from the church and court to the cities and from illuminated manuscripts and sculptural cycles to the printed book, panel paintings, woodcuts, and engravings. In the censorious, combative era of the Reformation, the fool in eared cap was an ideal weapon in the battle between different religious ideologies because it allowed people of every persuasion to label their enemies immediately and unambiguously. In Thomas Murner’s satire Of the Great Lutheran Fool, first published in 1522, the great fool wears the eared hood and conjures forth a quantity of little fools. When Cardinal Antoine Perrenot de Granvelle, infamous for his support of the Inquisition in the Low Countries, was attacked by his enemies in the 1560s, they satirized the extravagant livery of his servants by adopting for their own costume a tunic with a fool's head on the sleeves. The brutal Duke of Alba is named Le Capitaine des Folles in a circular engraving by Theodor de Bry, and when the innocuous portrait of the duke is turned around, he is revealed as a fool in cap and bells.

For Renaissance humanists, the fool satisfied the desire to combine their commitment to the Bible with their enthusiasm for the classical world, and they emphasized the parallels between Proverbs and Ecclesiastes—the biblical books in which the fool figures most prominently—and the works of classical writers such as Horace, Juvenal, Seneca, and Cicero. Desiderius Erasmus, in The Praise of Folly (1511), wrote, “how absolute is that commendation of Cicero’s, ‘Stultorum plena sunt omnia’” (Everything is full of fools) (Cicero, Ad famil. 9, 22, 4) and then refers to the biblical version of the same idea when he notes that “Stultori infiniti est numerus” (The number of fools is infinite) appears in Ecclesiastes. Sebastian Brant’s The Ship of Fools, first published in 1494, draws heavily on classical as well as biblical sources, and the image of a ship resembles the camus navialis (ship-cart) of the ancient world. Originally published as Das Narrenschiff, Brant’s satire was disseminated throughout Europe in Locher’s Latin version, Stultitia navis, and this compendium of fools established the cap and bells as an essential image in the humanist effort to educate in an entertaining, memorable way.

In moralizing paintings and even playing cards, the fool is given an amusing, admonitory role: His presence signals a satirical and moralizing intent. In Lucas van Leyden’s woodcut A Tavern Scene (1519), the fool directs the viewer’s attention to the didactic message by looking in at the window and pointing to the prostitutes fleeing a gullible customer. The inclusion of one fool in traditional costume alerted the viewer to the presence of more fools, even if it was only their behavior that gave them away. The playing cards designed by Erhard Schön (circa 1528) include a bagpipe-playing jester seated backward on a cow defecating coins to the delight of a crowd of greedy fools in ordinary, everyday dress. The hunchbacked jester with cap, bells, and bauble, seated in the tree/mast in Hieronymus Bosch’s painting Ship of Fools (circa 1495), draws attention to the others in the boat—the nuns in their habits and monks in their cassocks, carousing and drinking—who are violating their sacred vows with lustful, gluttonous behavior.

Men and women made foolish by their lust were an especially popular subject, and the moralists took advantage of the fool’s long-standing association with a lack of self-restraint. In Renaissance satires, sexual promiscuity replaces heresy as a principal target for attack. In Jost Amman’s pack of playing cards from 1588, a naked woman entices a fool into her bath, and in Quentin Massys’s Two Fools and a Woman (circa 1522), an old man, intent on the pursuit of sexual favors, is being robbed. The object of his lust, a beautiful young woman, is passing his moneybag to her accomplice—a fool in a parti-colored costume, with eared hood, crossed eyes, and tongue lolling from the corner of his mouth.

Increasingly theatricalized and secularized, often more witty than witless, the fool in motley became a fixture in civic ceremonies and dramatic presentations. Cities hired municipal fools to lead processions and amuse inhabitants during festivals and other public ceremonies. Richard Withington described a cortege led by a city fool in the characteristic costume. Lay societies, such as the Chambers of Rhetoric in the Low Countries, had their fools. In the painting Festival of the Archers by the Master of Frankfurt (1480s), two fools, one in a black and red costume and the other in yellow and black, square off in the middle of the festivities. “Numerus stultorum” (The number of fools is infinite) was the motto for the Enfants-sans-souci, a society of jesters that was created for entertainment and social criticism and active in France in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. La Mere Folle, a man in fool costume, ruled the fraternal group of fools created in 1552 in Dijon, France, and the Basoche in France, a society of lawyers, adopted the costume of the fool and his freedom to criticize. In Germany, in the Schembart Festival at Nürnberg in 1539, the procession included not only a “ship of fools” but also a big fool eating little fools on one wagon and a fool warning the couples in the Bower of Love against the dangers of lust on another. The fool even invaded the countryside. In the kermesse, or village festival of the Low Countries, young men on horseback met in a chosen place, formed a circle, and designated one of their members to play the fool.

In dramas such as the Shrovetide comedies, the person who introduced the play was sometimes called Narr, and there is the record of “a comedy played by fools in their characteristic costume” in Brussels, Belgium, in the mid-sixteenth century. The “sotties,” the French satires produced principally between 1440 and 1560, were short plays performed by groups of theatrical fools (sots) who wore the costume of the jester. Their fundamental purpose was to expose the folly of the world and attack the problems of the day by invoking the freedom of the fool to tell the truth.

Pieter Bruegel the Elder’s engraving Festival of Fools, published in the Low Countries around 1560, includes about 60 fools in an outdoor setting: a garden with structures appropriate for an improvisational dramatic performance. All have hoods with animal ears, although some have their hoods thrown back, revealing their bald heads. The troupe of fools dance wildly, grimace, contort their bodies, and make obscene gestures. One does a handstand, two fools grab each other by the nose, one fool distorts his face by pulling at the corners of his mouth, and another thumbs his nose and makes a “fig” (the thumb thrust between the middle and ring fingers of a fist, a gesture with sexual connotations in the sixteenth century). One fool holds eyeglasses but does not look through them, an owl sits on the hand of another fool, and balls are everywhere—a circular object like that held by the heretical fool in the medieval period but now a visual pun. The Flemish word sot means “fool,” and bol can mean either “ball” or “head.” Filled with foolish behavior of all kinds, the print was intended for an urban middle class that was ready to be amused at these antics and anxious to avoid appearing foolish and bad-mannered themselves.

Bruegel’s print has little to do with moral issues or a belief in God. The question of heresy had become more complex during the Reformation, and the Renaissance conception of proper behavior owed as much to secular, classical literature as it did to the precepts of Christian religion. In the sixteenth century, the allegorical gave way to the descriptive and the religious to the secular, and the difference between the representation of the fool at Chartres and the fools in Bruegel's engraving was a sign that the print shop in the city had become more important for generating fool imagery than had the cathedral, monastery, or court. Bruegel's print is not a feast of fools in the medieval tradition, as nothing indicates that the rites of the Roman Catholic Church were being satirized; and, although the fool was still imprudent in sixteenth-century art and literature, the judgment against him had lost some of its force, and his entertainment value outweighed his moral significance. The fools in Bruegel's print might have been ostracized by polite society, but they would not have been burned at the stake.

The Fool in the Modern Era

Folly and the fool—both concept and symbol—lost ground after the sixteenth century, becoming victims, in part, of their own popularity. The realm of folly was expanded to such an extent that the fool in his eared hood lost his satiric bite and his capacity to deliver trenchant criticism. When the term was applied anywhere to anyone who behaved without reason and forethought, the force of the label “fool” was dissipated. In Frans Hogenberg's Stultorum Chorea Der Sotten Dans (The Dance of the Fools, circa 1570), 15 fools in cap and bells dance in a ring around a central fool, who is blowing a trumpet. Their follies are clearly labeled, and whereas some, such as Avarus (Avarice), Luxuriosus (Lust), and Invidus (Envy), continue to justify the title “fool,” others, such as Ambitosus (Ambition) and Curiosus (Curiosity), seem less warranted. In Sebastian Brant's Ship of Fools, even the patient who does not follow the doctor's orders is placed on the fool ship. The eared hood continued to be used on occasion—in the seventeenth century, Rembrandt van Rijn placed the ears of an ass on his drawing of an art critic—but satirists came to rely on more powerful weapons. Francisco de Goya attacks madness and folly in Los Caprichos (1793–1798), but rather than giving the doctor who kills his patients an eared hood, he makes the transformation complete, and the doctor becomes an ass. When Goya depicts the fools victimized by women, the men become little plucked birds, their grotesque bodies whacked unmercifully by broom-wielding prostitutes.

Even more fundamental, the concept of folly was undermined by a lack of unanimity on what constituted wisdom and rationality. Folly is founded on opposition and requires a symmetrical relationship: society and its conventions on one side and the fool breaking those conventions on the other. When there is little agreement about the rational, folly trods on a slippery slope. The satire in Erasmus's The Praise of Folly turns finally on the discrepancy between social conventions and a truly Christian way of life. When a moral, upright Christian is accounted a fool in a society that calls itself Christian, the concept of folly is turned on its head. Shakespeare's wise fool of King Lear undercuts folly in a similar way, raising questions about who is really foolish and suggesting that only the person identified by society as a fool is in fact wise. The issue of folly became complicated in the sixteenth century, when its definition increasingly manifested as an individual rather than a societal judgment and complex viewpoints could not be compressed, or adequately comprehended, with a single symbol.

Instead of serving a symbolic function as the antithesis of wisdom in a unified and coherent value system, folly in the modern era has become a subject for medical, psychological, and philosophical investigation. Erasmus's The Praise of Folly reflects both the fragmented condition of the Roman Catholic Church in the Reformation and the tendency of Renaissance humanists to think independently. It is evidence, as well, of the increased interest in madness and folly as a psychological state, an individual condition. Humanists used ancient sources such as Galen and Seneca to describe mental aberrations and to explore their causes, and blanket condemnation gave way to curiosity about cause and effect. Bruegel, in his painting The Dulle Griet (Mad Meg, circa 1562), explores the causes of madness and folly in one of the last, and certainly most complex, attempts to treat these subjects as allegory. The portrait replaced allegorical and symbolic representations of the fool. In the sixteenth century, the royal fool in Anthonis Mor's painting does not wear the traditional cap and bells. His expression is sober and thoughtful, and the principal sign of his role as a fool is his deformed hand, in which he holds a playing card. In the seventeenth century, Diego Velázquez's portraits of the natural fools in the court of Philip IV, such as The Buffoon Called “Don Juan of Austria” (before 1660), equal his portraits of the king in their insight, individuality, and sympathy. In the nineteenth century, Théodore Géricault in La Folle, his portrait of a female fool, is presenting the psychological state of an individual rather than creating a societal symbol.

In the modern, post-Freudian, post-Jungian era, attitudes toward the fool are more complex, and the degree to which folly is culturally defined and susceptible to change is more appreciated. The energetic dancing in Bruegel's Festival of Fools is now considered good exercise, not folly, although the fool exposing his backside in public would still violate the norms of most Western societies. A negative image in one time and place, the natural or biological fool may be sympathetic in another. The reaction to the natural fool has varied from the derisive laughter and denigration characteristic in the sixteenth century to a more sympathetic and caring, albeit still superior, attitude in the modern era. In Western culture, the natural fool is no longer forbidden access to the church, as a modern writer on madness, Michel Foucault, says was the case at Nürnberg in 1420, but neither is the fool treated as an equal by those who consider themselves normal. On the other hand, in societies that value the irrational as a source of wisdom, the fool may be considered wise and clairvoyant. When the jester's costume has lived on, it is not as a potent weapon but as a relatively harmless image in playing cards, as a romanticized figure (e.g., Triboulet, the court fool as portrayed in the drama of Victor Hugo, or the fool in Giuseppe Verdi's opera Rigoletto), or as a melancholy, introspective figure who no longer cavorts for the amusement of his audience, as in Picasso's bronze bust The Jester (Paris, 1905). Picasso's jester retains the peaked cap of the jester, but the animal ears are gone. His features are normalized instead of being grotesque or distorted by a grimace, and his pensive expression makes him a close relation to the sad, sympathetic Harlequin figure, heir of the parti-colored costume that is so important in Picasso's art. There is nothing comic or derogatory about these fools. What is communicated is not how society feels about the fool but how the fool/jester feels about himself and his alienated state. The costume still conveys an internal state and a special social status, but the point of view is that of the wearer, not of the society that judges him.

See also Comic; Margins/Outsiders

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Roman Bronze of a Mime Dancer, circa A.D. 200, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton Art Museum

Medieval

Folly and Prudence, relief sculptures from a cycle of the Twelve Virtues and the Twelve Vices, thirteenth century, Chartres, France, Cathedral

Folly, rose window, stained glass, thirteenth century, Paris, Notre Dame

Renaissance

Giotto, Stultitia (Folly), fresco, circa 1304, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Jacquemart de Hesdin, Illumination of the Fool, from the Psalter of the Duc du Berry, 1380–1385, Bibliothèque Nationale de France (Ms. fr. 13091, fol. 106)

Historiated Initial D, Breviary of Philip the Good, manuscript illumination, circa 1430–1440, Brussels, Belgium, Bibliothèque Royale Albert 1er (No. 9511, fol. 287v and No. 9026, fol. 143v)

Fouquet, Jean, Portrait of the Jester Gonella, oil on wood, circa 1435, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Four Playing Cards with Fools, circa 1453–1457, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Laurana, Francesco, Engraved Medal with Effigy of Triboulet (The Fool of René d'Anjou), circa 1460, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France

Scene of the Pagan Theatre, illumination from St. Augustine's City of God, 1478, The Hague, The Netherlands, Museum van het Boek-Museum Meermanno-Westreenianum (MS. 11, fol. 36v)

Master of Frankfurt, Festival of the Archers, oil on panel, oil on wood, 1480s, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten

Fool, from Terence, Ennuchus, 1486, Ulm, Germany

Bosch, Hieronymus, Ship of Fools, painting, circa 1495, Paris, Louvre

Bosch, Hieronymus, Luxuria, from The Seven Deadly Sins, tabletop painting, oil on wood, circa 1500, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Massys, Quentin, Allegory of Folly, oil on wood, circa 1510, collection of Julius Held

Lucas van Leyden, A Tavern Scene, woodcut, 1519

Lucas van Leyden, A Fool Kissing a Woman, etching and engraving, 1520, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Beham, Hans Sebald, Fool and Woman, engraving, circa 1530, Vienna, Austria, Albertina

Holbein, Hans the Younger, The Fool, illustration for Psalm 53, before 1543, from marginal illustrations made in Erasmus's The Praise of Folly, 1515, Basel, Switzerland, Public Print Room

Holbein, Hans the Younger, The Fool and Death, woodcut from Simulachres and Histoires Faces de la Mort, 1545, Lyon, France

Mor, Anthonis, Portrait of a Court Jester (Pejeron), panel, circa 1560, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Festival of Fools, circa 1560, Brussels, Belgium, Bibliothèque Royale Albert 1er

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, The Dulle Griet (Mad Meg), circa 1562, Antwerp, Belgium, Museum Mayer van den Bergh

Hogenberg, Frans, Stultorum Choreia, Der Sotten Dans (The Dance of the Fools), circa 1570

Amman, Jost, pack of playing cards, 1588, Nürnberg, Germany

Seventeenth Century

Velázquez, Diego, The Buffoon Called "Don Juan of Austria," oil on canvas, before 1660, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Twentieth Century

Picasso, Pablo, The Jester, bronze sculpture, 1905, New York, collection of Mrs. Bertram Smith

Further Reading

Arden, Heather, Fools' Plays: A Study of Satires in the "Sottie," Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980

Billington, Sandra, A Social History of the Fool, Brighton, Sussex: Harvester, 1984; New York: St. Martin's, 1984

Brant, Sebastian, "The Ship of Fools" by Sebastian Brant, translated by E. H. Zeydel, New York: Columbia University Press, 1944

Chambers, Edmund Kerchever, The Medieval Stage, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1903

Folie et déraison a la Renaissance, Brussels, Belgium: Editions de l'Université libre de Bruxelles, 1976

Foucault, Michel, Folie et déraison: Histoire de la folie a l'age classique, Paris: Plon, 1961

Gifford, Douglas J., "Iconographical Notes Towards a Definition of the Medieval Fool," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 37 (1974)

Goedicke, Hans, "Seth as a Fool," Journal of Egyptian Archaeology XLVII (1961)

Konneker, Barbara, Wesen Und Wandlung der Narrenidee in Zeitalter des Humanismus: Brant, Murner, Erasmus, Wiesbaden, Germany: Steiner, 1966

Laharie, Muriel, La folie au Moyen Age, XI–XIII siècles, Paris: Leopard d'Or, 1991

Lefebvre, Joel, Les Fols et La Folie: Étude sur les genres du comique et la création littéraire en Allemagne pendant la Renaissance, Paris: Librairie C. Klincksieck, 1968

- Lever, Maurice, Le Sceptre et la Marotte: Histoire des Fous de Cour, Paris: Fayard, 1983
- Mâle, Émile, Religious Art in France, The Thirteenth Century: A Study of Medieval Iconography and Its Sources, London: J. M. Dent, 1984
- Meiss, Millard, French Painting in the Time of the Duke of Berry: The Limbours and Their Contemporaries, London: Phaidon, 1967; New York: G. Braziller, 1967
- Mellinkoff, Ruth, Outcasts: Signs of Otherness in Northern European Art of the Late Middle Ages, Berkeley, California, Los Angeles, and Oxford: University of California Press, 1993
- Michael, Erika, The Drawings of Hans Holbein the Younger for Erasmus' "Praise of Folly," New York and London: Garland, 1986
- Moxey, Keith P. F., "Pieter Bruegel and The Feast of Fools," Art Bulletin LXIV:4 (December 1982)
- Neale, R. A., "The Fool and His Loaf," Medium Aevum 54 (1985)
- Nicoll, Allardyce, Masks, Mimes and Miracles: Studies in the Popular Theatre, London and New York: Copper Square, 1963
- Sullivan, Margaret A., "Madness and Folly: Pieter Bruegel the Elder's Dulle Griet," Art Bulletin LIX:1 (March 1977)
- Sumberg, Samuel L., The Nuremberg Schembart Carnival, New York: Columbia University Press, 1941
- Swain, Barbara, Fools and Folly During the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, New York: Columbia University Press, 1932
- Tietze-Conrat, Erika, Dwarfs and Jesters in Art, London: Phaidon Press, 1957; New York: Garden City, 1957
- Welsford, Enid, The Fool, His Social and Literary History, New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1900; London: Faber and Faber, 1935

FORTUNE

THE GODDESS

Liana De Girolami Cheney

THE WHEEL

Paul Grimley Kuntz
Lee Braver

The following art forms are covered in the discussion of the theme Fortune:

EMBLEMS

SCULPTURE

ENGRAVINGS

PAINTINGS

DRAWINGS

Vincenzo Cartari, Fortuna (Occasione), woodcut, from Imagini delli Dei de gl'Antichi (Venice, Italy, 1557).
(Courtesy of the author)

The goddess Fortune, also known as Tyche or Agathodaemon in Greek mythology, is sometimes called the goddess of chance or luck—good or bad. Her symbol, a wheel, indicates her fickleness. The up and down, boom and bust, high hope and desolation of the wheel of Fortune made it an iconographic symbol with perennial appeal in the Middle Ages and Renaissance.

The Goddess

According to Hesiod's Theogony, Tyche, the goddess of fortune, was the daughter of Tethys and Oceanus and was one of the 3,000 Oceanids. For the poet Pindar, she was one of the Parcae, or Fates. She was honored as the tutelary deity of towns and as such had temples and statues in many populous cities of Greece and Asia Minor. In the course of time, however, the idea spread that Tyche, or Fortune, was the author of both evil and good fortune. In Roman mythology, Fortune, or Fortuna (the Latin word is derived from fors or ferre, which means "to bring"), was originally associated with fertility. She had an ancient temple in the Forum Borarium in Rome. Servius Tullius introduced her cult in Rome and erected a temple to her under the name of Fors Fortuna, making June 24 the common festival for the goddess. Indeed, it was a popular holiday, and large crowds, including slaves, flocked to her shrine near the Tiber River. Later, her worship became more extensive under very different surnames, some of which referred to the state as Fortuna populi Romani and others to every description of private affairs. Romans addressed her by a variety of epithets expressing either particular kinds of good luck or the kinds of people to whom she granted it. She was worshiped in Italy at Antium and at Praeneste, where she had an oracular shrine (Bonney, p. 100).

Ancient artists endowed the goddess Fortune with various attributes, the most important of which was the rudder, which she held in her hand as a symbol of her power to control the fortunes of people. She was also endowed with a scepter for the same reason and with a horn of plenty as the giver of good fortune. She is sometimes represented with the youthful Plutus, a god of wealth, in her arms. Her later conception as a martial goddess of fate is apparent in those works of art that depict her standing by a ball or wheel. Among the larger existing works is a copy of a Tyche by Eutychides of Sicyon, formerly exhibited in Antioch and now in the Vatican, in which the goddess wears a laurel crown on her head as the tutelary deity of towns and has a sheaf of corn in her right hand.

Besides Fortune, the Romans honored a deity called Felicitas (Bonus Eventus) as the goddess of positive good fortune. Lucullus is said to have erected a temple to her in Rome that was adorned with the works of art brought by Mummius from the spoils of Corinth. Even this did not satisfy the religious needs of the people, and the belief in personal, protecting deities, called daemones by the Greeks and genii by the Romans, grew rapidly among both civilizations. These deities were believed to be the invisible counselors of every individual, accompanying both men and women from birth to death, through all the states of life, with advice and comfort. Offerings of wine, cake, incense, and garlands were made to them, especially on individual birthdays (Seeman, pp. 98–100).

Fortune has two aspects in the modern world: (1) the inconstant goddess of antiquity, revived by the Renaissance, who bestows her favors at random, and (2) the medieval Dame Fortune turning her wheel. The first aspect of the goddess is depicted naked and usually winged. To Apuleius, she was blind and even eyeless because of the way she regards the unworthy or the positively wicked (Golden Ass, 7:2). Thus, she is sometimes blindfolded. Her most common attribute, a globe on which she stands or sits, originally indicated instability, but for the Renaissance it represented the world over which her sway extended. Fickleness suggests vice; thus, on her globe, Fortune sometimes stands in contrast with the personification of Virtue, who rests on a solid block or cube, the symbol of stability. The globe is also an attribute of opportunity, or chance, which might be defined as the workings of fortune. To Horace (Odes, 1:35), Fortune was the mistress of the sea whom those in ships feared. Thus, she may have a rudder or a billowing sail (a reminder of the wind's inconstancy) and ride on a shell or a dolphin or hold a model ship. Other less common attributes are a cornucopia (which she shares with many other personifications), a diadem, and a bridle. Although she is sometimes confused with Nemesis, whom she resembles, Nemesis is usually represented holding a bridle or a rope with which she binds human pride, and she may hold a vase as well, containing riches to reward the just. Thus, her signification is not with divination, as is Fortune's, as in Albrecht Dürer's engraving Nemesis (1501) (Bartsch, fig. 77).

Divination, or the prediction of fortune, was practiced widely by Near Eastern peoples and took many forms. Examples of these are from the Old Testament (prophets and sibyls), the interpretation of dreams (dream of Jacob's Ladder and dream of Joseph), and calling up the dead to seek their advice (witch of Endor). The practice of divination or augury in these ancient cultures owed much to the Etruscans, who were famous for their skill in reading omens in the flight of birds and, even more, in the livers of sacrificed animals: the art of haruspicy. In a formal processional rite, the priest held the liver in the left hand and his arm rested on his raised leg, as seen on the engraved mirror from Vulci (Haruspication Read by Calchas, 400 B.C., Vatican Museums).

During the Renaissance and later, divination, now more commonly called fortune-telling, used crystal balls, cards, dice, tea leaves, and other objects ordered by chance. Caravaggio's Fortune Teller (1600) in the Pinacoteca Capitolina in Rome (and in another version in the Louvre in Paris) treated the subject of a Gypsy telling the fortune of a young man. Caravaggio parallels the magic of the Gypsy with the magic of the artist. The theme selected by Caravaggio illustrates a skit of the commedia dell'arte. It seems significant that an analogous compositional scheme, derived from Caravaggio's work, was used by Georges de La Tour for his Fortune Teller (circa 1625), now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

A second aspect of fortune, the wheel, was also associated with fortune in classical antiquity. The poet Anacreon said of the inconstancy of fate that human life rolls along, shifting like the spoke of a wagon wheel, and the movement of the wheel of fortune soon compensates for the moments of excessive hardship. (For the medieval and modern view of the wheel of fortune, see below.)

As an emblem of divination, the wheel's signification, which originated in ancient times, continued in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, as illustrated in playing cards—the tarots (Cavendish, pp. 101–103). In the palco (ceiling) of the Chamber of Fortune in the Casa Vasari in Arezzo, Italy, Giorgio Vasari painted the goddess Fortuna in 1548 with all her symbolic ramifications as she interacts with Virtue and Envy. Vasari's depiction of Fortuna reflects the assimilation of Andrea Alciati's idea of opportunity, or In Occasionem, Emblem 122. The epigram from Alciati's Emblemata (1542) describes the emblem:

I am called the goddess Opportunity, Lysippus' hand made me thus. The round sphere makes me unstable, each wind takes my wings. The razor shows that I penetrate where I knock and nothing holds me. Because I have hair on my forehead, grasp me when I come. You seek me in vain, if you let me pass, for, I am bald behind. The master made me thus that everyone should consider my nature; and think whence comes his fortune, looking to his opportunity (Chance). (Daly, vol. 2)

Boethius, in De consolazione philosophiae (Of the Consolation of Philosophy) (1492), is the first writer to discuss the rotation of fortune caused by the wheel.

In the sixteenth century, this Ciceronian personification of chance and time in the occasio theme is assimilated into representations of fortune and virtue, with the motto Fortuna comes Virtutis or Virtutis comes Fortuna. Giorgio Vasari illustrates in the palco the combination of Alciati's Virtuti fortuna comes (Emblem 119) and Fortuna virtutem superans (Emblem 120) with Vincenzo Cartari's Fortune (Occasione) from the Imagini delli Dei de gl'Antichi (Daly, vol. 1) and reflects the assimilation of Alciati's emblem of opportunity. It has not previously been noticed that Vasari's iconographic associations relate to the emblematic tradition, nor has it been demonstrated that their significance impacted on the visual and literary tradition of the cinquecento. The epigram for the emblem Virtuti fortuna comes describes fortune as the comrade of excellence. A caduceus stands upright between the horns of Amalthea, suggesting a rich abundance (copia) of things and blessing men powerful in mind and skilled in speaking. The epigram for the emblem Fortuna virtutem superans discusses how fortune overcomes virtue when Brutus, wearing armor, plunges a dagger into his breast, uttering, "Miserable Virtue, caring only for words, why do you follow Fortune as the mistress in events?" Cartari's image of fortune (Occasione), from the Imagini delli Dei de gl'Antichi, illustrates the fusion of two of Alciati's emblems, In Occasionem and Virtuti fortuna comes (Henkel and Schöne, pp. 1551, 1796–1798).

Influenced by the emblematic tradition, aware of the dual concepts of fortune and virtue, and fascinated by the conflicting iconography, Giorgio Vasari, as well as many other artists, represented this theme. Examples include Jean Cousin's Virtue Conquering Fortune and Virtue as Companion to Fortune, engravings from Livre de Fortune (1540s), and Peter Vischer the Younger's print Fortune (1540). Although Cesare Ripa fused the emblematic and visual tradition of fortune, he focused on the aspect of chance and the vicissitudes of fortune (Ripa, Buscaroli edition, pp. 171–172).

This modern edition describes three types of fortune: (1) Fortuna Buona: A woman is seated, resting her right arm on a wheel and holding a globe and a cornucopia in her left, as in Cartari's image of good fortune from the Imagini delli Dei de gl'Antichi. (2) Fortuna Infelice: A woman navigates without a wheel and with broken sails. The boat is a symbol of human life, and the sails are symbols of unhappiness and bad luck, as in Peter Vischer the Younger's print Fortune. In the 1611 edition of Ripa's Iconologia, he states that the sail is a symbol of navigation and good fortune (on this interpretation of Fortuna, see also Alciati's emblem of Occasio velatica). (3) Fortuna: A woman is shown with a globe and a cornucopia. Vasari's interpretation established the concept of fortune as chance in the Chamber of Fortune.

The placement of Fortune between the figures of Virtue and Envy (Vice) is most meaningful because it exemplifies the cinquecento concept of challenge or contest between the creative and distinctive forces in nature. Cartari's image of Fortune standing between Virtue, Envy (Vice), and Favor in Imagini delli Dei de gl'Antichi clearly illustrates the significance of the interference of Vice in the endeavors of Fortune and demonstrates Vasari's source of inspiration for his palco scene. The Cartarian image seems to have been a source of inspiration for Vasari, as he included Envy in the contest between Fortune and Virtue. Niccolò Fiorentino's Virtue Subduing Love and Fortune (before 1471) is also of interest in this regard (Panofsky, Iconography, fig. 40).

As seen from one vantage point in the room, Virtue is above Envy and controls her power by stepping on her neck, causing her to fall down. Moreover, the imagery in the palco shows how the stars are favoring good fortune for Vasari because Virtue holds fast to the forelock of Fortune as she is passing with a full-blown sail and Envy is expelled from the realm of Chance. The Vasarian conceit of the full-blown sail dictates Ripa's description of the full-blown sail stimulating the willingness for the individual to move forward (Ripa, 1611, p. 549).

Vasari was aware that although good fortune was indispensable to an artist's success, this condition was not constant in the life of a person, so the ambiguity of the imagery of the palco, when one walks around the room, emphasizes the more classical view of fortune. Then, a rereading of Vasari's description of the chamber suggests that when walking around the room, one can see the imagery on the palco changing:

A circumstance that gave great pleasure then is that in going round the room Fortune at one place seems above Envy and Virtue, and at another Virtue is above Envy and Fortune, just as it is often the case in reality. (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. VII, p. 686)

Sometimes, one sees Fortune surmounting Virtue and Envy and at other times Virtue prevailing over Fortune and Envy. By so doing, Vasari created a visual rotating movement in the palco that imitates the turning of the wheel of fortune without explicitly painting it. Vasari's imaginary conceit is a typical example of his artistic invenzioni and the delight in teasing the viewer. This interpretation of Vasari's compositional elements with their emblematic impact seems to be original.

Following quattrocento and cinquecento stylistic and emblematic traditions, Vasari depicts Fortune as a bare-breasted female with a forelock and carrying a sail (Henkel and Schöne, pp. 1796–1798). As mentioned earlier in the interpretation of Occasio, the forelock is generally an attribute of this image.

Virtue is portrayed as a young, barefooted female, winged and crowned with laurel (Henkel and Schöne, p. 1816; Ripa, 1611, pp. 541–552). Vasari's image of Virtue is a prescription for Ripa's emblem. The symbolism of these figures is twofold. One manifests the idea that Virtue leads and controls the path of Fortune, as one sees in the palco, where Virtue pulls the forelock of Fortune. However, as the wheel of fortune turns, the contrary projection is seen, as Virtue holds a Herculean club, suggesting that sometimes Fortune can disrupt Virtue and so Virtue must punish or chastise Fortune (Wittkower, "Chance," pp. 319–320; Panofsky, "Herkules").

This disruption is caused by the intervention of Vice. By this second variation, Vasari has injected the idea of the psychomachia (the struggle between Virtue and Vice) by including the figure of Envy in the palco. Visually and iconographically, the figures of Virtue and Envy (Vice) are in contrast. Vasari's depiction of Envy, as an old woman with large, time-worn breasts and encircled by snakes, derives from a fusion of conventional canons from the quattrocento and cinquecento and from a fusion of Alciati's emblematic impact, as exemplified by his Invidia, Emblem 71, as well as Cartari's Invidia. In their writings, Alciati and Cartari describe Envy "as a squalid and ugly woman who feeds on viper's flesh and eats her own heart . . . she has snakes for hair . . . in her left hand she holds a snake" (Daly, vol. 2). Thus, in his portrayal of Envy, Vasari symbolizes human malice or envy by associating it with aging, which was one of the effects of the fall caused by the envious serpent (the arbiter of the fall) and woman (the agent of the fall). Thus, Virtue is able to prevent the fall of Fortune with Hercules' club (an iconographic attribute of Christ). In these two versions, then, Vasari combines both the classical and the biblical topoi of fortune. Later, Ripa, in the Iconologia, describes the emblem for Envy as the visual image of Vasari's Envy, as depicted in the palco (Ripa, 1611, pp. 261–263). Although Vasari emphasizes the physical portrayal of the figures—the old figure of Envy is vicious and ugly in contrast with the young and beautiful figures of Fortune and Virtue—his main interest is to narrate an intriguing story of the interaction and its consequences.

Obviously, Alciati, Cartari, and Ripa emphasize and depend on the literary sources for the explanation of their visual images and focus on the elaboration of text for their understanding of them. For Vasari, however, the aim is to create a new conceit by borrowing conceits from Alciati and Cartari for his imagery and then inventing in them a new visual image with even deeper, more sophisticated levels of meaning.

Ripa, in turn, grasps Vasari's intentions and expands the literary tradition by adding an extensive visual vocabulary already established in the cinquecento visual tradition. In their pursuit of composing and defining the image or emblem, Vasari and the iconographers continued to discuss the concept of ut pictura poesis, or image and text, thereby forming yet another link in the continuum between the visual and literary iconographic traditions (Lee; Mendelsohn; Panofsky, Idea; Gombrich; Mitchel; Burchmore; Mirollo). Vasari's importance in this continuum cannot be overstated and perhaps can be best demonstrated by the further decoding of the Chamber of Fortune.

Quattrocento and cinquecento philosophers or theorists such as Leon Battista Alberti, Marsilio Ficino, and Niccolò Machiavelli believed that fortune controlled most of one's actions. A person who acts promptly can grasp fortune quickly and boldly, whereas a person who is passive loses it. Philosopher Ernst Cassirer (pp. 73–77) discusses the concept of fortune as used not only in literature but also in philosophical books such as Giordano Bruno's Spazio della bestia trionfante (1584), in which Fortune appears before the planetary and the heavenly constellations to be judged. In the palco, Vasari created a planetary realm for fortune's trajectory (Pitkin, pp. 82, 129, 138–154, 167, 248, 252). For Alberti, fortune can be ruled by an active person (Cassirer, p. 77, n. 7). Ficino claimed that it is best for a person to adapt to the will of fortune to ensure one's safety (Ficino, pp. 110, 148, 152, 169, 171–172; Wind, pp. 491–496).

Like them, Vasari conflates the symbolism of Occasio with Fortune in the imagery of the palco. His program implies that, for himself as an artist, talent or virtuosity is not enough; good fortune is also necessary, as illustrated in the ceiling: Fortune has a flying forelock that is pulled by Virtue and holds up a wind-blown sail that moves in the direction of Virtue. At the same time that good fortune produces success, it also causes jealousy and envy among one's competitors; thus, Envy is depicted in the company of Fortune and Virtue. Perhaps Vasari alludes to such personal opponents as Benvenuto Cellini, whom he discussed in a letter to Paolo Giovio (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. VIII, Letters), or perhaps he alludes to the opposite philosophical position as it is stated by Pico della Mirandola. For example, Pico's In Astrologiam parallels the power of Fortune facing the power of Virtue with the destiny of a person who is confronted with will (book IV, p. 531). Thus, human destiny does not flow from the stars or planets but arises from one's inner self. An individual thus makes fortune rise to the heavens of one's will.

According to Cesare Ripa, the personification of fortune is a beautiful, nude, blindfolded, winged female who balances on one foot on a large ball or globe. The globe symbolizes the world, power, and wholeness, and the circle and the sphere signify eternity. She holds a cornucopia under each arm. Money, crowns, medals, scepters, and marshal's batons spill from the one on the left while pens, brushes, and scrolls spill from the one on the right. The winged figure of Father Time holding his scythe and admonishing Fortune floats above her head on the left. A sphere covered with stars is suspended above her head, and in her left hand she holds a staff topped by a wheel. The pedestal on which she stands is inscribed "Quisque sua Fortunae Faber" (Each person forges his own fortune). Around the base, the following figures reach up to grasp the bounty pouring out of Fortune's horns of plenty: a youth with his purse held open; the allegorical figure of Poverty with one winged hand outstretched and one dragged down by a stone chained to it but holding a scroll and compass; the allegorical figure of Commerce, who has Mercury's winged hat and caduceus; and a poorly dressed man holding a pruning knife (a farmer?) who admires a warrior's helmet.

Fortune is lovely, for she is desired by all. She is blind and does not favor one over the other. She balances on a globe; she is unstable and always shifting and changing. She dispenses all the riches and honors of this world, thus the two cornucopias. Time is present, for he has the only influence on Fortune: with time, Fortune changes. The celestial sphere above her head refers to the stars, which are in continual motion and in some unfathomable way influence the fortunes of people. Sometimes Fortune is depicted as bald with a long forelock, alluding to the amelioration of opportunity if the forelock is grasped. The wheel atop the staff she holds (itself a symbol of authority) refers to the age-old symbol of fortune, the turning wheel, with those on top soon to be on the bottom. The eager youth, Poverty, Commerce, and the peasant who dreams of military glory are those referred to by the motto because each of them, in his own way, must make his own fortune but always hopes for the bounty of good luck (Ripa, 1603, p. 169).

Ripa quotes St. Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologia (book 3, chapter 92) and Herodotus (III, 39–43) narrating the story of Polycrates of Samos, who had achieved great riches and became a tyrant. On the advice of Amasis, king of the Egyptians, Polycrates tries his luck by throwing a ring into the sea. Beyond all expectations, he finds it in the innards of a fish. Seeing this, Amasis dissolves the bonds of friendship in order not to have to bring him aid should he run into trouble. Thus, according to Herodotus, Amasis's desertion of Polycrates represents his fear of sharing the distress that was bound to overtake Polycrates as retribution for his unusual good fortune. Fortune and her vicissitudes depend on the dispositions of the planetary gods and the signs of the zodiac because they both control the destiny of individuals.

The Wheel

Human life is not merely day and night, seed time and harvest; it is also up and down, boom and bust, high hope and desolation. In the Middle Ages and Renaissance, the wheel of fortune is an iconographic symbol with perennial appeal.

Just as it seemed strange and even incoherent for Christians and Jews to adopt the zodiac into the symbols of their holy places, so we may wonder about a Roman goddess, Fortuna, appearing in so many Christian manuscripts and books. This has been explained in part as being due to the sixth-century philosopher Boethius, who, although very much a Christian by conviction and an important theologian, incorporated many of Aristotle's and Plato's ideas. Just as the zodiac reminds us of the constancy of heaven, so the wheel of fortune recalls us to the truth that Earth is material and subject to change. We live in time and are subject to chance, which was recognized by the Greeks as the principle of chance. Manuscripts of the Christian philosopher pictured in the zodiac called people's attention to the heavens, whereas the wheel of fortune directed attention to a material Earth that endures through time and change.

Even as originally created, and found "good," the created world could not be perfect, for then it would itself be God. A book of the Hebrew Bible, Ecclesiastes, ascribed to Solomon, observed human life in endlessly repeated cycles of rise and fall. "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong" (Ecclesiastes 9:11). Time and chance govern this world. Especially after the fall, human life is as defective as that of Cain, the first murderer. Abel had done nothing to merit or justify Cain's envy and anger. Even Adam and Eve were free to disobey, and Cain was even weaker and might have become the first patricide and matricide as well as the first fratricide. What has happened, is happening, and will happen is beyond human reason.

Few symbols are so closely tied to a single person's experience of life as the wheel of fortune. Boethius was one of the most brilliant writers of the divided Roman Empire. He had been a chief adviser of the Ostrogoth king Theodoric, a consul, and head of the government and court services. Yet he fell out of favor and was accused of treason and conspiracy against Theodoric. He was also charged with participating in magic and sacrilege and awaited execution. In prison during his last months, Boethius wrote Of the Consolation of Philosophy. In the work, Philosophy is a woman who converts the prisoner to the conviction that in spite of the injustice he suffered, the highest good controls and orders the cosmos. Philosophia, a lady constant and consoling, is contrasted with Fortuna, who, although giving material gifts, is as fickle as "Lady Luck," who gives only to take away. Providence reigns in the eternal realm, and true virtue can never go unrewarded. The prisoner is consoled. Beyond the death of his body is reparation and reward in heaven. Prose and poetry alternate throughout the five books of Consolation. There were several versions and translations into French, German, and other languages. Few books except the Vulgate (the Latin Bible) were read so widely for centuries.

Few symbols have been developed with such amazing flexibility as Fortuna. In some early versions, the philosopher is thinking about the material favors that Fortuna can give, and the ruler sits on his throne forewarned that the wheel turns. Some portray Fortuna in a gown, whereas later artists portray her naked. She is often blindfolded, sometimes winged, and often with a foot on a ball. The simplest presentation of Fortuna shows a lady seated with her wheel, much as a woman used a spinning wheel, engaged in conversation with a seated or standing philosopher, who is Boethius.

Examples from the twelfth century present the ambitious and aspiring youth riding the wheel up (the left side) while the successful ruler sits in robes on his throne, generally crowned and holding a scepter. On the way down (the right side), a former ruler falls (sometimes headlong), losing his crown and scepter. In one example accompanying Carmina Burana, Fortuna sits in the middle, turning two of the six spokes with her hands. Latin tenses mark the movement: regnabo (I will rule), regno (I rule), and regnavi (I have ruled).

One inventive artist, in addition to "regnabo, regno, regnavi," thought of the very bottom state and added "sum sine regno" ("I am without rule"). Another artist pictured the deposed ruler upside down. Others put the former king under the wheel. The king's misery was shown by depicting him in rags, for often the king was contrasted to a beggar. Even worse, he may appear in shameful nakedness, stripped of all power and raiment.

Sometimes, the king sits on a throne, reminded that someday he no longer will be powerful. Sometimes transcendence is brought home by picturing his death, sometimes with another taking his scepter. The wheel of life turns, as referred to in the biblical memento mori: "Dust thou art and to dust thou shalt return." If the wheel turns, can a ruler not regain power? Rarely does a ruler topple off the wheel and grasp for it or hope to rise up again. If he does, he grasps for the riches he has lost.

Fortune's power is greater than all the kings, and in one twelfth-century drawing, she is twice the size of any king and holds the sword while she cranks the wheel. The Alsatian abbess Herrad de Landsberg seated her giant Fortuna, turning what may have been a rotating spit used for roasting pigs (Hortus Deliciarum). Medieval artists showed her power by her size; in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries Fortuna Redux stands over a sunken ship in the harbor, and Albrecht Dürer pictured Fortuna as Nemesis high over the landscape. In these Fortuna is naked, a great winged goddess.

How else can artists show Fortune's power? One artist shows her with four arms, two pulling someone up the wheel and two pushing a king over the top, his crown flying off. Another depicts Fortune with six arms.

The essential point is Fortune's fickleness. In the twelfth century, Fortuna is depicted with two heads and standing on a wheel. She is unstable, inconstant, unfaithful, without loyalty, and not to be trusted. She is sometimes like Janus, two-faced and sometimes blindfolded. In one book she is shown petting a monkey on whose head she has placed a crown, and in another she elevates a dog to the top of the wheel.

Very few early wheels were solid, but after the four-spoked type, most became six-spoked. The early wheels have three or four figures, but later versions have six or more. The wheel can be crowded, with aspiring, greedy, arrogant people climbing over one another. Even the people themselves can be sections of the wheel. One unusual wheel of five spokes has aspirants coming to the top from both sides. Riding the wheel is precarious and dangerous. In addition to kings, popes can be seen riding over the top and losing their tiaras.

Does the wheel of fortune not carry scholars, doctors, lawyers, and women? In a late fifteenth-century woodblock, a prince holding a sun symbol rides up to an armored king with orb and sword. The doctor holds his caduceus, a young man holds lilies, and a landowner is shown with a scythe. A naked woman holds an arrow on her way up, and another naked woman, near the bottom, holds a crescent. The wheel is a hollow sphere of rods with a castle in the middle. Do the men hold phallic symbols, and are the women gaining power through satisfying them sexually? Do women gain power by charming and pleasing men until they fade and decline?

Fortuna Amoris, the Fortune of love, is commonly winged and naked, blowing her way by puffing into a sail. The love symbol may be male, as Cupid in Peter Vischer's work, balanced on a sphere.

The wheel of fortune is found in manuscripts in Renaissance engravings and tapestries. The scene is shown in an illuminated page of a twelfth-century German manuscript, Hortus Deliciarum. The symbolism of the wheel as a dynamic power of God the Father derived from Ezekiel's vision of the throne of God carried on flaming wheels adorned with eyes and wings (Ezekiel 1:1-28), alluding to the revelation of a divine message.

Not only in graphic arts do we see wheels of fortune. Gothic cathedrals have figures carved into the stones of rose windows. When the rose is also a wheel, one can sense the up and down movement of human life. Réau cites not only Beauvais and Amiens in France but five others in France, Switzerland, and Italy. These can have a profound religious message: Kingdoms rise and fall, but the kingdom of God abides forever. A French abbot in the twelfth century installed a wheel of fortune that was turned by machinery in his monastery, that "his monks might ever have before them the spectacle of human vicissitudes" (Mâle, p. 95n). The wheel is also an attribute of St. Catherine of Alexandria, who was tortured on a spiked wheel.

Boethius is one of a long line of philosophers who confronted the problem of fortune. Significantly different from Boethius and his trust that providence will set all in order and correct all the wrongs of this life in another life is Niccolò Machiavelli. For him, the individual must strengthen himself to defeat and overcome the enemy. Many Renaissance emblems also show ways of counteracting rather than submitting to fortune (see Kendall, pp. 335-340, and Cioffar, pp. 225-236).

The whole world rises and falls in infinite vicissitudes. In 1520, humanist Pietro Pomponazzi wrote,

He who before, at one time, was a beggar, at another time will be a king or a master. . . . Cities and countries which were large and powerful later become small and weak. . . . Thus it all seems to be a game of the gods (ludus deorum). For this reason Plato said that as man is a miracle of nature (miraculum in natura), he did not know whether God made him seriously or as a joke (ludo an serio).

This may extend our sympathy to all, and, as we contemplate the order of things, Pomponazzi concludes, "If then someone asks you, what kind of game is this? You would be well advised to reply, that it is the game of God" (De Fato, De Libero Arbitrio et De Praedestinatione).

See also Ascent/Descent; Fame; Misfortune

Selected Works of Art

Emblems

- Cartari, Vincenzo, Astrological Calendar; Invidia; Fortuna (Occasione); Abundance (Copia); Virtue, Envy (Vice), and Favor; Natura (Artemis of Ephesus); Felicity (Buon Evento), woodcuts from Imagini delli Dei de gl'Antichi, 1557, Venice, Italy
- Alciati, Andrea, In Occasionem; Virtuti fortuna comes; Fortuna virtutem superans; Invidia; Ars Natururam Adiuvans, woodcuts from Emblemata Libellus Cum Commentariis, 1531, Paris
- Ripa, Cesare, Fortune; Charity; Abundance; Felicity, woodcuts from Iconologia, 1601, Rome

Engravings

- Dürer, Albrecht, Nemesis, engraving, 1501
- Dürer, Albrecht, The Great Fortune, engraving, 1503
- Cousin, Jean, Virtue Conquering Fortune and Virtue as Companion of Fortune, engravings from Livre de Fortune, 1540s
- Vischer, Peter the Younger, Fortune, print, 1540

Drawings

- Honnecourt, Villard, Wheel of Fortune, drawing, circa 1240, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France
- Vasari, Giorgio, Charity, drawing, 1548, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale

Sculpture

- Eutychides of Sicyon, Tyche, copy, Rome, Vatican

Paintings

- Fiorentino, Niccolò, Virtue Subduing Love and Fortune, before 1471
- Titian, Cupid with the Wheel of Fortune, oil on canvas, circa 1520, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Vasari, Giorgio, Fortune, oil painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
- Vasari, Giorgio, Chamber of Fortune, fresco, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
- Vasari, Giorgio, Bons Eventus (Felicity), oil painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
- Caravaggio, Fortune Teller, 1600, Rome, Pinacoteca Capitolina
- La Tour, Georges de, The Fortune Teller, circa 1625, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Rosa, Salvator, Fortune, oil on canvas, 1659, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- Reynolds, Joshua, A Fortune Teller, oil canvas, 1777, England, National Trust, Waddesdon Manor
- Etty, William, Fortune: An Allegorical Figure After Veronese, before 1849, Carlisle, England, Art Gallery
- Burne-Jones, Edward, Wheel of Fortune, 1885, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
- Poynter, Edward John, The Fortune Teller, before 1919, London, Royal Academy
- Thomas, Hans, Fortuna, before 1924, Heidelberg, Germany, Kurpfälzischen Museum der Stadt Heidelberg

Further Reading

- Alciati, Andrea, Emblematum libellus cum commentariis, Paris, 1531, 1536, 1542
- Bartsch, Adam, Le Peintre Graveur, Vienna, Austria: J. V. Degen, 1808
- Boethius, De consolatione philosophia, Venice, Italy, 1492
- Bonnefoy, Yves, ed., Roman and European Mythologies, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992
- Bruno, Giordano, Spazio della bestia trionfante, London: John Charlewood, 1584
- Burchmore, David Wegner, ed., "Text and Image," Acta, vol. X, Binghamton, New York: Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, 1986
- Cartari, Vincenzo, Imagini delli Dei de gl'Antichi, Venice, Italy: Vincentio Valgrisi, 1557
- Cassirer, Ernst, The Individual and the Cosmos in Renaissance Philosophy, New York: Harper, 1963; Oxford: B. Blackwell, 1963
- Cavendish, Richard, The Tarot, New York: Crescent, 1975; London: M. Joseph, 1975
- Cioffar, Vincenzo, "Fortune, Fate, and Chance," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, edited by Philip P. Wiener, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Courcelle, Pierre, La Consolation de Philosophie dans la Tradition Littéraire: Antécédents et Postérité de Boèce, Paris: Études Augustiniennes, 1967
- Daly, Peter Maurice, Andreas Alciatus, Toronto, Ontario, and London: University of Toronto, 1990
- Ficino, Marsilio, The Book of Life, Irving, Texas: Spring, 1980
- Frakes, Jerold C., The Fate of Fortune in the Early Middle Ages: The Boethian Tradition, New York: E. S. Brill, 1988
- Gombrich, Ernst, Symbolic Images, London and New York: Phaidon, 1972
- Henkel, Arthur, and Albrecht Schöne, Emblemata: Handbuch zur Sinnbildkunst des XVI und XVII Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart, Germany: J. B. Metzlersche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1967
- Kendall, Maurice, "Chance," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, edited by Philip P. Wiener, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Kirschbaum, Englebert, Lexicon der Christlichen Ikonographie, Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder, 1968
- Lee, Rensselaer Wright, Ut pictura poesis: Humanist Theory of Painting, New York and London: Norton, 1967
- Mâle, Émile, Gothic Image, New York: Harper, 1962
- Mendelsohn, L., Paragone: Benedetto Varchi Due Lezioni and Cinquecento Art Theory, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1982
- Mirollo, James V., Mannerism and Renaissance Poetry: Concept, Mode, Inner Design, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1984
- Mitchel, W. J. Thomas, Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986
- Panofsky, Erwin, "Herkules am Scheidewege und andere antike Bildstoffe in der neueren Kunst," Studien der bibliothek Warburg XVIII (1944)

- _____, The Iconography of Correggio's Camera di San Paolo, London: Warburg Institute, 1945
- _____, Idea: A Concept in Art Theory, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1968
- Patch, Howard R., The Goddess Fortuna in the Medieval Literature, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1927
- Pickering, Frederick P., Literature and Art in the Middle Ages, Coral Gables, Florida: University of Miami Press, 1970; London: Macmillan, 1970
- Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni, In Astrologiam, book IV, Bononiae, Italy: Benedictus Hectoris, 1498
- Pitkin, Hanna Fenichel, Fortune Is a Woman: Gender and Politics in the Thought of Niccolo Machiavelli, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984
- Réau, Louis, "Le Symbolisme Humain, Occupations des Mois," in Iconographie de l'art chrétien, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1955
- Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, Rome, 1603; Padua, 1611, 1618
- _____, Iconologia, edited by Piero Buscaroli, Turin, 1986
- Tervarent, Guy de, "Veritas and Justitia Triumphant," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 7 (1944)
- Tuve, R., "Notes on the Virtues and Vices," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 26 (1963)
- Seeman, O., The Mythology of Greece and Rome with Special Reference to Its Use in Art, London: Marcus Ward, 1877
- Vasari, Giorgio, Le vite dei piu eccellenti pittori, scultori, et architettori, edited by Gaetano Milanesi, Florence, Italy: G. C. Sansoni, 1970
- Wind, Edgar, "Platonic Tyranny and the Renaissance Fortuna," Essays in Honor of Erwin Panofsky, New York and London: New York University Press, 1960
- Wittkower, Rudolf, "Chance, Time and Virtue," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 1 (1937)
- _____, "Eagle and Serpent," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 2 (1938)

FUNERAL/BURIAL

Stephen Lamia

The following periods and iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Funeral/Burial:

ANCIENT EGYPT

GREECE AND ROME

ENTOMBMENT OF CHRIST

TOMBEAU DE GRANDE
CÉRÉMONIE

SPANISH GOTHIC

SAINTS

OFFICE OF THE DEAD

ROYALTY AND DIGNITARIES

CLASSICAL HISTORY AND MYTHOLOGY

ROMANTIC

REALIST

Jean Fouquet, Office of the Dead: Funeral, from the Hours of Étienne Chevalier, circa 1453, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé.
(Courtesy of Giraudon/Art Resources,
New York)

The ubiquity of the general theme of funeral or burial attests to its fundamental importance and interest to a variety of cultures and eras. Whether we analyze the visual arts of remote civilizations such as ancient Egypt or works from today, the subjects are indeed quite prevalent. Of course, the content, context, and significance of the images are a response to customs of a given time and place, but this ritualistic aspect also affords us keen and often unique insight into the thanatopsis, or view of death, of a particular society.

It can be securely argued that the Egyptians “invented” the so-called cult of the dead and its serialized pictorialization. A rich tradition of images that documents the stages of this most important passage to the next world has survived. The actual funeral took place after the meticulous process of washing, embalming, and mummifying the remains of the body. An example of this can be seen in a wall painting from the tomb of Nekhtamun in Thebes. The procession usually consisted of the family and friends of the deceased as well as priests and servants bearing all kinds of food offerings, beverages, clothing, weaponry, jewelry, furniture, tools, and games. Sometimes even professional mourners, musicians, and dancers accompanied the entourage. Occasionally, the sarcophagus was borne aloft, as in the funeral procession depicted in the tomb of the Vizier Ramose in Thebes, but most often it was placed on a bark-shaped vehicle pulled by a team of oxen and assisted by slaves. Examples of this can be seen in a wall painting in the tomb of May the Scribe and in the papyrus rolls of Pakerer and that of Queen Makara. This last item also includes a representation of the jackal-headed god Anubis, a chief divinity in Egyptian thanatology, standing inside the shiplike sled with his hands on the lid of the royal coffin. The significance of the nautical shape of the bier refers to an otherworldly activity in which the deceased may now participate: the journey of the sun god Ra, accompanied by the defunct, on his daily trek around the Earth by boat.

Once the coffin and cortege arrived at the tomb, the Ceremony of the Opening of the Mouth took place. This entailed a special priest, designated the Sem, who was distinguished from the others by wearing a panther skin. The Sem priest would stand before the sarcophagus, which was held upright by Anubis, and touch its mouth part with the severed left foreleg of a freshly sacrificed ox. The purpose of this ceremony was to revivify the body that had been rendered inanimate by death, embalming, and mummification. “I have opened your mouth with the leg,” the priest would recite, “. . . you live . . . again and forever.” Images of this ceremony can be seen in wall paintings from the tomb of Tutankhamen in Thebes, the tomb of Nebamon and Ipoudy (a pair of royal sculptors), and in the Book of the Dead of Hunefer. Once the life spirit of the mummy was reinstated, the family and friends assembled for the customary funerary banquet, at which, it was believed, the defunct was present. Again, the papyrus scroll of Queen Makara may be cited in this regard. The final ceremony in Egyptian funerary ritual was the Sealing of the Tomb, which underscored the concept of separation and the new status accorded to the deceased. This rite was also performed by a priest, as seen in the tomb of Sennedjem, architect to the pharaohs Seti I and Ramses II.

The obsequies paid to the aristocracy of ancient Egypt, as seen in their art, indicate the access to meaningful ritual enjoyed by the privileged few in this highly class-structured society; but this is not the case with ancient Greece. In fact, although there are visible borrowings from Egypt, the individuals who are lauded in the art displaying their funeral ceremonies are not historically as prominent.

The largest group of mainland Greek objects that may be categorized as funerary in function is composed of Geometric period vases decorated with scenes of prothesis (the deceased lying on a bier) and ekphora (the procession to the grave). More than 50 examples exist in various states of preservation.

The prothesis, the more common of the two, pictorializes the ancient equivalent of a modern wake for the dead. The remains were viewed, and an adjustment period for surviving family and friends ensued, providing an emotional release. The body of the deceased was the focus, and this entire event is shown schematically, in keeping with the prevailing mode of expression in vessels dated approximately to the eighth century B.C. The main element in a scene of prothesis includes the defunct lying in state with the head always in a rightward direction. It should be mentioned that both male and female corpses are found on these vases. The body is placed on a horizontal slab supported on legs, sometimes with accompanying objects such as spears or shields floating above the bed. Other figures, differing in number from vase to vase, flank the funerary bier, and these are interpreted as family members, friends, mourners, and dancers. There may also be filler motifs in the form of pure geometric decoration as well as “extension” scenes—processions and games—of chariots, warriors, and even the occasional nautical event. Two Dipylon vases, one at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and the other in the National Archaeological Museum of Athens, display salient, somewhat varied elements common to a prothesis.

Less frequently represented is the scene of ekphora, the best-preserved example of which is on a krater in Athens. It depicts the funeral procession, including mourners, guards of honor, and other figures riding in chariots behind the body, which is brought to the grave on a horse-drawn cart.

Other than this early period of explicit and overt funerary imagery, thanatopsis during the classical period is wistful and poignant but decidedly less concerned with the ritual of funeral and the act of burial. The typical grave stela shows the deceased waving good-bye to earthly life or engaged in some mundane activity—themes that fall outside the scope of this essay.

Similarly, Roman art, with few notable exceptions, does not often depict ceremonies and rituals concerned with death. Many of the images carved on sarcophagi focus on a Dionysiac reaffirmation of life rather than on a musing on the passing of the deceased into another realm. Although the metaphoric equivalent of death in the form of the sleeping Endymion (a mythological king) does appear often, mythological reliefs, including frolicking putti, occur with the same frequency. Lush garlands of fruit and vegetation also abound. However, a significant exception is a relief from the Mausoleum of the Haterii showing the deceased reclining on a bier around which relatives and mourners have gathered. An effort to indicate an indoor environment is suggested by delineations of architectural detail. Key items that will appear in post-Roman funerary iconography are readily apparent in this example: smoking, lit torches (funalis) at each end of the defunct's bier. The torch was employed as a safeguard to keep evil spirits away from the dead, thus ensuring eternal peace.

A rich trove of funerary imagery from the realm of Christianity also emphasizes belief in an afterlife. Most representations of this theme date to the Middle Ages, but it should be noted that certain images persist well into the Baroque era.

Undoubtedly, the most often represented—indeed the paradigmatic—theme is the burial of Jesus Christ. Countless examples exist in Byzantine and Latin Western art. The Khludov Psalter shows the Orthodox formula, which consists of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea carrying the tightly swathed body horizontally into a rock-hewn tomb. The earliest known Western image may be found in the Codex Egberti, produced during the Ottonian era; it typifies the Latin approach: Nicodemus and Joseph lowering the shrouded corpus into a sarcophagus. The theme approached international scale by the Romanesque period. Examples of these works include Sant' Angelo in Formis, Albani Psalter, Gospel Book of Henry the Lion, and Nicholas of Verdun's Klosterneuberg Antependium.

The entombment of Christ, by now firmly established in the repertory of medieval imagery, became even more numerous—and more embellished with conflated episodes—in Gothic Europe. Although the straightforward type persisted in a variety of media such as stained glass (as in Passion Window in the Ste. Chapelle in Paris), manuscript illumination (as in the Bible Moralisée in Oxford, England), and ivory carving (as in a plaque in the Vatican Library in Rome), one now finds the burial combined with the anointing of the body (as in the capital sculpture over the south door on the west facade of Chartres Cathedral in France) or with the Lamentation (as in Book of Hours of Queen Jeanne d'Evereux and Parement de Narbonne). The theme of the entombment was also favored by Tuscan artists, usually in one of the apron panels flanking the vertical beam of large, painted crucifixes, such as Cross No. 20 in the Pinacoteca in Pisa, Italy.

The emotional content latent in these images rises to the fore in Renaissance works, where again the scope is geographically far-reaching. Italian and northern European artists, such as Andrea Mantegna, Michelangelo, Titian, Tintoretto, Robert Campin, Rogier van der Weyden, Hans Memling, and Albrecht

Dürer, employ the motif of Christ's burial. A special word must be reserved for French entombments of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. These are monumental sculpture groups, akin to a tableaux vivants. The "major players" include the dead body of Christ, Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus in their customary roles, the Virgin Mary, St. John the Evangelist, and a trio of holy women as mourning figures. Many of these sculpted works are scattered throughout various regions. A sample includes Lorraine (St.-Maurice, Epinal), Champagne (St.-Jean Baptiste, Chaource), Burgundy (Hôpital de Notre-Dame des Fontenilles, Tonnère), central France (Abbatiale de St.-Pierre et St. Paul, Solesmes), southwestern France (St.-Marie, Auch), Normandy (St.-Laurent, Eu), and Picardy (St. Germain l'Ecosais, Amiens). Most of these entombment groups were commissioned by private donors and were placed in large, vaulted niches called enfeus in chapels of churches, hospitals, or cemeteries. They were employed in services for the dead and were made objects of veneration, especially during Holy Week.

Although in general Counter-Reformation imagery more often emphasized the victorious Resurrection over the lugubrious interment, the iconography of the burial of Christ is retained nonetheless. Caravaggio's version of this episode remains the most celebrated image in the seventeenth century. Surprisingly, even the less religiously minded twentieth century witnessed the same iconography in the early bimorphic phase of Mark Rothko's career, although compositionally the work appears to have greater affinity with scenes of the Pietà.

In addition to depictions of the burial of Christ, two categories of lay and ecclesiastical tombs develop in the medieval period that utilize portions of the actual sarcophagus and adjoining enfeu to represent a real funeral. The first, which manifests itself in late twelfth-century France and continues in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, is designated the tombeau de grande cérémonie. This type consists of one or more parts of a five-part iconographic scheme: an effigy of the deceased, the elevation of the soul, the image of Christ, a priest performing funerary rites, and secular mourners. One of the earliest instances may be found on the tomb of St. Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers. Among other examples are the tomb of the Abbot Suger of St.-Denis, preserved in a line drawing in the Collection Gaignières. It shows church officials—a bishop holding a book; two deacons or priests, one of whom carries a processional cross and the other a stitula; and acolytes bearing candles—carved beneath arcades around the perimeter of the coffin. The gisant (the recumbent statue of the deceased) in low relief rests on top. One of the more elaborate examples of this set, the tomb of Presbyter Bruno at Hildesheim Cathedral in Germany, includes most of the qualifying elements. The lower zone contains the shrouded effigy of the deceased, his head supported by two tonsured clerics. Above that, his soul, in the familiar form of a naked child, is borne aloft by two angels. In the third zone, the figure of Christ in half-length is visible. He makes the gesture of benediction and holds a book with the words "Venite benedicti patris mei." The presence of four beggars and cripples seen at the feet of the body is explained by an inscription that surrounds the entire scene: "To Bruno, whose likeness this stone displays and who gave what he had to the poor, grant everlasting joy, O Lord." This reference to the charitable virtues of the deceased appears in other instances of funerary iconography with similar intention.

The second category of carved tomb sculpture is indigenous to Gothic Spain and may have developed in part as a response to the tombeau de grande cérémonie. In this set of examples, although the effigy lying atop the sarcophagus is the largest sculpted element, the carving of the funeral is given emphasis by the sheer number of figures and wealth of detail. Clerics and acolytes, dressed in a variety of ecclesiastical garments (dalmatics, chasubles, and copes) that specify their roles in the solemn ritual, carry their appropriate liturgical implements (palls, books, censers, candles, situlas, and incense boats). Family members, friends, mourners, knights, and subordinates from the estates of the deceased are also represented in all manner of dress as befits their class. These elaborate scenes often appear around the sides of the coffin, as in the tomb of Doña Elena at Salamanca Cathedral and the tomb of Bishop Gonzalo de Hinojosa at Burgos Cathedral, but are even more prominently displayed on the rear wall above the gisant in the tomb of Ermengol VII, Count of Urgel, in The Cloisters at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. One especially vivid example of this latter type, the tomb of Bishop Martin at Leon Cathedral, continues the scene on the sarcophagus, where the distribution of food to the poor underscores the charitable deeds of the deceased.

Medieval representations of funerals and burials of saints emphasize the body and the ritual and generally follow formulas already established in the iconography of the entombment of Christ or the tombeau de grande cérémonie. A brief overview includes the burial of St. Benedict from the Vita Benedicti, a Cassinese manuscript of the Romanesque period; the burial of St. Adalbert, a bronze relief from the doors of Gniezo Cathedral; the burial of St. Thomas Becket in a stained-glass window in the ambulatory of Sens Cathedral in France; the burial of St. Stephen in an ambulatory window at Chartres Cathedral; the burial of Edward the Confessor from the English Gothic manuscript The History of Edward the Confessor; and Giotto's fresco of the funeral of St. Francis of Assisi in the Bardi Chapel in Florence, Italy.

One image especially rich in anecdotal material is the funeral procession of the Virgin from The Visconti Hours. The illuminator, following the text of The Golden Legend, depicts the Apostles carrying Mary's body with John leading the procession. Christ is present in the sky above holding his mother's soul and accompanied by angels. As disbelievers attempt to overturn the bier, their hands wither. Around the middle of the fifteenth century, Jean Fouquet repeats this theme, although with considerable compositional differences, in the Hours of Étienne Chevalier. In the Baroque era, Caravaggio's Burial of St. Lucy and Guercino's Burial of St. Petronilla represent distinct polarities of visual expression. In the former instance, the grave diggers busily delve into a tract of dirt in a subterranean chamber while the body of the saint lies unceremoniously on the ground; all the action and figures are concentrated in the lower half of the painting. Guercino, by contrast, presents a full-blown drama on two levels. In the bottom center of the canvas, Petronilla's body is slowly lowered by cloths into her grave; the upper portion shows the grand reception of the saint into heaven.

One of the most abundant sources for funerary iconography is found in manuscript illuminations of the Office of the Dead, a staple in many Books of Hours, themselves popular as private devotional prayer books in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. These miniatures are usually generic rather than particular in type; that is, no specific individual is identified with the image of the funeral. Instead, the pictures, which are connected intimately with the text, serve to remind the user of the power and effectiveness of prayers for the dead and for the soul in the hereafter. Two discrete versions are noted. One selects the funeral service as the opening illustration; the other employs the burial scene. In both instances, the artist furnishes informative details. An illumination from the Hours of the Maréchal de Boucicaut shows activities such as mourners filing into the church and clergy consulting books in preparation for a funeral. The coffin, draped in black, is prominently displayed at the center and placed beneath an elaborate catafalque, a kind of canopy made of wood or iron bedecked with lit tapers. An actual funeral service is graphically illustrated in The Book of Hours of Catherine of Cleves. The requiem is conducted by three clerics, one holding a processional cross, another carrying a book and sprinkling holy water from an aspergillum onto the coffin, and another filling a censer. Mourners dressed in black robes with white patterns approach the scene. The coffin itself is covered with a black pall and two gold ribbons forming a cross. Three candlesticks with lit tapers are placed on top of the sarcophagus.

The Brussels Hours by Jacquemart de Hesdin and Jean Colombe's miniature from the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry are only two of many other manuscripts depicting funeral services in the Office of the Dead. Examples of burial scenes in conjunction with these same prayers document both indoor and outdoor interment. In a Book of Hours in the Bodleian Library in Oxford, England, a burial, presumably that of a cleric, occurs directly into the floor of a church. In another manuscript, today in the Pierpont Morgan Library in New York, the disposal of the shrouded corpse, being lifted into an open coffin, takes place in a churchyard that already contains several other graves marked by gabled crosses. Sometimes, the illustration to the Office of the Dead combines the funeral service as the main theme and the burial as a bas-de-page motif. The Turin-Milan Hours by a follower of Jan van Eyck and the Grimani Breviary have such a combination. The surge in funerary iconography during this period has been explained as an outgrowth of the bubonic plague, when hasty and careless interments, due to the sheer volume of deaths, were the expedient norm. A representation of this practice may be seen in the Annales of Gilles le Muisit. It has been argued also that the need to reinstate the earlier, more formalized rituals for both social and religious purposes in the wake of this great calamity was reinforced by images from the Office of the Dead.

The vainglorious age of monarchical Europe ushered in the event of the state funeral, which was pictorialized in sculpture, painting, and graphics. Although under the operative influence of Christianity, the royal funeral is decidedly concerned with the display of power and the continuity of sovereign reign, even in the face of death and widespread mourning. The ostentatious aspects of this occasion make their appearance in the late Middle Ages, although the Renaissance and Baroque periods witnessed their heyday.

At first, probably because of advancements in embalming techniques, the corpse was placed on display, but as triumph and succession in rule became emphasized and the waking period became prolonged, the body was replaced with a royal likeness in the form of a wooden effigy. In all likelihood, the tomb of Louis de France (died 1249), son of Louis IX, is the first instance of the display of a French royal's body during the solemn procession. The gisant betrays a surprisingly animated appearance: The head of the young prince gazes upward, his hands are folded in prayer, and one of his knees is slightly raised. On the short and long sides of the sarcophagus, the funeral procession is carved. The body, carried in an open litter by four pallbearers, is visible. The cortege of mourners, led by two officiating priests, includes the sons of King Henry III of England. The funeral, attended by dignitaries, is given an air of pomp commingled with mourning, and this set a precedent for successive examples, such as the splendid Burgundian tomb of Duke Philip the Bold by Claus Sluter and workshop and the even more dramatic monument to the Grand Seneschal, Philippe Pot.

From the late fourteenth century onward, there is increasing pictorial evidence on the disposition of the body and burgeoning participation by government officials at state funerals. The transparent, wax-encased body of King John the Good of France (died 1364) being carried to the west portal of St.-Denis is depicted in an illumination in Jean Froissart's Grandes Chroniques de France. The crucial role played by the members of the Parlement de Paris in royal funerals is conveyed in an illumination of the funeral procession of Jeanne de Bourbon, Queen of France (died 1378). These officials held the privilege of carrying the edges of the pall that draped the litter, thus maintaining closest proximity to the royal corpse. Moreover, these men were exempt from wearing black mourning robes but were permitted to wear their customary crimson attire, as the ideals of justice did not cease with the death of a monarch.

There is an even more fascinating element to royal funerals documented visually in two illuminations from Martial d'Auvergne's Vigilles de la mort de Charles VII. In the funeral procession of Charles VI and that of his successor, whose name appears in the title of this manuscript, pairs of feet are visible beneath the hem of the funerary pall. These appendages belong to the hanouars, a special class of royal officials who were the salt-carriers of the city of Paris. They were bestowed with this honorary role for two reasons. First, they possessed the herculean strength that was needed to support the bier, which included the body encased in lead, the coffin, the wooden litter, the heavy cloth of the pall, and the wooden effigy; hanouars, after all, were accustomed to carrying heavy sacks of salt through the streets. Second, salt was a royal monopoly, so hanouars were considered government officials. These men are also visible in the scene of the arrival of the funeral procession of Anne of Brittany at Notre Dame in Paris, from the illuminated manuscript Funerailles de Anne de Bretagne, wherein the crowned and sceptered effigy of the queen is prominently displayed. The visibility and importance of the effigy increased, especially when it became physically separated from the corpse. At this juncture, the royal funeral assumes a triumphal aspect: fame of the ruler and the semblance of life conquering death. One especially illustrative image may be found in an engraving of the funeral procession of King Henry IV (died 1610) from the Pompe funerali fatte in Parigi nella morte dell' invitissimo Henrico IV, Re de Francia et Navarra by Francesco Vallegio and Caterin Doini. The detailed engraving discloses an elaborate and lengthy procession of prelates, court officials, and family members and the effigy in a horse-drawn hearse and the body in its own vehicle at separate places in the cortege.

Not to be outdone by their neighbors across the Channel, England too maintained a grand spectacle of its royal obsequies. The Funeral of Queen Elizabeth I (1603), an engraving in the Vetusta Monumenta, is among the earliest surviving visual records of a display of English funerary pomp. A horse-drawn chariot containing the velvet-draped coffin, atop which lies the effigy, is surmounted by a canopy held by six knights. A dozen noblemen bear banners with the coat of arms of Elizabeth's royal ancestors. A much more grandiose event was planned for the funeral of Queen Mary II (died 1694). The Dutch engraver Romeyn de Hooe recorded the proceedings in Westminster Abbey. In the center of the print is the elaborate catafalque, and beneath it the coffin, covered with an extended pall, may be seen. The pallbearers are dressed in long capes whose trains are carried aloft by pages. The abbey is densely crowded with attendees on the ground level and in the upper galleries. The quantity of black cloth ordered to transform the appearance of the abbey was sufficient to envelop the interior from the west door to the altar and in the choir from the arcade to the vaults above the clerestory. Newspaper accounts detailed the stages of the spectacle as more information was disclosed. To accommodate and control the throng of spectators, by the late Georgian period the length of time for lying in state had to increase, and admission had to be regulated by ticket. Printmakers such as de Hooe profited from the moment. They produced prints of the deathbed scene, the funeral procession, and the ceremony itself. These items were popular as collectibles and mementos by the late seventeenth century, especially for those individuals unable to secure a place at the pageant.

In the eighteenth century, the imagery in these prints was standardized and came with an alphabetical key so that the buyer could readily identify the major elements and personages in the scene. The ephemeral aspect of the decorations commissioned for state funerals was yet another reason for the popularity of these broadsheets. Jacques Callot's engraving Obsequies of the Emperor Matthias in Florence shows in great detail how the interior of the Church of San Lorenzo was outfitted with appropriate but temporary funeral decor. A curtain shields the apse from view, and before it a huge floor-to-ceiling pyramid holding candles was erected. This blazing object formed a dramatic backdrop for the multitiered catafalque, which stood at the crossing of the nave and transept. The nave arcades were festooned in drapery, and visible in the upper reaches of the church are painted cartouches and statues in the form of skeletons wielding scythes, unfurling scrolls, or dancing (la danse macabre). One can only surmise how many of these provisional decorations have been lost. The written accounts of the funeral for the artist Michelangelo have been preserved, but unfortunately no one thought to record it visually for posterity.

The burial of royalty also displayed a flair for ostentation and special ritual. The De exequiis regalibus, an illustrated

English manuscript dated to around the third quarter of the fourteenth century, provides instructions on embalming and dressing a royal corpse for the funeral. The burial of King Charles VII of France at St.-Denis depicted in Vigilles de la mort de Charles VII illustrates the deposition of staffs into the grave with the body. The significance of this act—sometimes the staffs were actually broken before being placed in the ground—underscores the state of disarray and disruption in the royal household. Probably the most flamboyant and melodramatic of all aristocratic burials is that of the Count of Orgaz, painted by El Greco. The simultaneous episodes of the Spanish nobleman's miraculous interment by St. Augustine and St. Stephen and the assumption and reception of his soul into heaven depicted in this work are unparalleled for their bravura in funerary iconography.

Classical history and mythology provide surprisingly few representations of this theme. As noted earlier, this neutrality, if not disinterest, may be linked to a lack of emphasis on life in the hereafter. For example, Nicolas Poussin's Landscape with the Burial of Phocion sets the nearly minuscule bearing of the body of the Athenian general on its litter into a grandly conceived landscape, the dominant motif of this painting. Although not strictly a representation of a funeral procession, Benjamin West's Agrippina Landing at Brindisium with the Ashes of Germanicus possesses all the mournful atmosphere of a ritualistic interment. A more emotionally charged and more overtly funereal image is that of Jacques-Louis David's The Funeral of Patroclus, a subject previously depicted by the Darius Painter on a red-figure vase from ancient Greece but now treated with a swarm of humanity converging toward a blazing pyre.

Despite the profound and radical changes that have occurred in industrialized, modern society, the themes of funeral and burial survive in the visual arts. Modern artists of the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries have embraced the inescapability of death and the efforts to deal with its finality through ritual. Generally, their approaches have followed two distinct trends: one a romantic, symbolic thanatopsis and the other a more frankly realist interpretation, sometimes sprinkled with political overtones.

To the first approach belong such poetic images as the English neoclassical Monument to Lieutenant-General Sir John Moore by John Bacon. Here, the fallen officer is in the act of being lifted by allegorical figures into his grave. Another is the somewhat sentimental Entombment of Atala by Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson. The dreamy, melancholic, desolate funeral processions set in crumbling Gothic ruins by Caspar David Friedrich, such as Abbey in the Oakwood and Monastery Graveyard in the Snow, are sublime visual expressions of the romantic spirit. Pablo Picasso takes us into the twentieth century with his Blue Period canvas Evocation: The Burial of Casagemas, a symbolic tribute to his friend, a poet who had committed suicide. Max Beckmann presents a haunting allegory entitled Death, which is prescient of the cold-blooded annihilation of humanity in Germany under the Third Reich. The image actually conflates the moment of death with a kind of otherworldly wake. Although the setting implied through detail is a hospital, the body is already lying in its coffin surrounded by candles, a wreath, and spectral beings, including an angel flying upside down and a disfigured choir of triple-headed men, all of whom appear to be participating in some sort of memorial service for the recently deceased. Later in the century, Allan Kaprow, famous for staging a number of happenings, mounted an event entitled Service for the Dead (X).

The other modern vein of the theme is firmly rooted in the nineteenth-century realist movement, whose chief exponent, Gustave Courbet, produced that vivid hallmark of funeral images, A Burial at Ornans, fully described in detail in so many standard art history texts. Almost simultaneously in Germany, Adolf von Menzel was completing works of similar thematic content: Funeral Ceremony of the Fallen and A Burial. Several twentieth-century artists have used the occasion of an actual funeral to make a pictorial statement infused with political commentary. Carlo Carrà's Funeral of the Anarchist, Galli, George Grosz's Funeral Procession Dedicated to Oskar Panizza, and Ben Shahn's The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti demonstrate this attitude. Jack Levine's Gangster Funeral makes no hidden claim to romanticize the wake of an unnamed criminal but rather presents a visual indictment of human corruption and greed embodied in the figures of gaudily bejeweled dowagers and gluttonous tycoons-cum-gangsters.

The modern treatment of funeral and burial themes does not necessarily individualize the imagery more than the formulaic iconography did in ancient, medieval, and Old Master works. Underlying all these examples are the fundamental notions of separation, closure, and the passage of the body to another realm.

The death of an individual is a moment of personal confusion for the survivors, and the funeral is a way of restructuring that sense of disorientation. Everyone has a role to play in the dramatic ritual—even the defunct, who, although the most inanimate, is the featured player. Facilitators in the form of priests and government officials and mourners in the capacity of family and friends are all in some way assistants to the initiation of the dead into the next, unknown phase. The pictorialization of funerals and burials—the last episodes in one's earthly existence—is an effort on the part of the artist and spectator to come to terms with grief and sorrow and to attempt to comprehend the inexplicable shadow of whatever may await us after death.

See also Death; Grieving/Lamentation; Hanging; Plague/Pestilence; Widowhood

Selected Works of Art

Ancient Egypt

Funerary Procession, tomb painting, seventeenth dynasty,

Thebes, Egypt, tomb of the Vizier Ramose

Ceremony of the Opening of the Mouth, tomb painting, eighteenth dynasty, Thebes, Egypt, tomb of Tutankhamen

Anubis Embalming the Deceased, tomb painting, nineteenth dynasty, Thebes, Egypt, tomb of Nekhtamun

Funeral Procession and Funerary Banquet, from Papyrus of Queen Makara, twenty-first dynasty, Cairo, Egypt, Museum of Antiquities

Greece and Rome

- Prothesis and Funeral Procession*, Dipylon vase, eighth century B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Ekphora*, krater, eighth century B.C., Athens, Greece, National Art Gallery and Alexander Soutzos Museum
- Men and Women Mourning a Dead Man on His Couch*, Attic black-figure plaque, sixth century B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Mourners and Dead Man with Chin Strap*, Attic black-figure, early fifth century B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Mausoleum of the Haterii*, relief, late first century, Rome, Lateran Museum

Entombment of Christ

- Khludov Psalter*, second half of ninth century, Moscow, Russia, State Historical Museum (Ms. 129, fol.87)
- Codex Egberti*, circa 980, Trier, Germany, Stadtbibliothek (Cod. 24, fol.85)
- Albani Psalter*, circa 1120–1125, Hildesheim, Germany, Library of St. Godehard, p. 48
- Nicholas of Verdun, Klosterneuberg Antependium, enamel plaque, 1181, Klosterneuberg Monastery Church
- Pucelle, Jean, Books of Hours Queen Jeanne d'Evreux, 1325–1328, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Cloisters (fol.82v)
- Campin, Robert, triptych, circa 1415–1420, London, Courtauld Institute Galleries
- Michel, Jean, and Georges de la Sonnette, Entombment Group, 1451–1454, Tonnérre, France, Hôpital de Notre-Dame des Fontenilles
- Caravaggio, Entombment of Christ, 1603–1604, Rome, Pinacoteca Vaticana
- Rothko, Mark, Entombment I, 1946, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art

Tombeau de Grande Cérémonie

- Tomb of St. Hilary*, late twelfth century, Poitiers, France, Church of St. Hilaire
- Tomb of Presbyter Bruno*, circa 1194, Hildesheim, Germany, Cathedral

Spanish Gothic

- Tomb of Doña Elena*, circa 1270, Salamanca, Spain, Salamanca Cathedral
- Tomb of Ermengol VII, Count of Urgel*, circa mid-fourteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, The Cloisters

Saints

- Vita Benedicti*, manuscript, eleventh century, Rome, Vatican Library (MS. lat., 1202, fol.80)
- Scenes from the Life of Saint Stephen*, ambulatory chapel window, circa 1205–1210, Chartres, France, Cathedral
- La Estorie de Seint Aedward Le Rei (The Burial of Saint Edward the Confessor)*, manuscript, circa 1250–1260, Cambridge, England, Cambridge University Library (Ms. Ec3 59, fol.29v)

- Obsequies of the Virgin, The Visconti Hours*, late fourteenth or early fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale (LF. fol.40v)
- Guercino, Burial of St. Petronilla, 1621, Rome, Capitoline Museum

Office of the Dead

- Book of Hours of the Maréchal de Boucicaut*, circa 1408–1410, Paris, Musée Jacquemart-André (fol. 142v)
- Book of Hours of Catherine of Clèves*, circa 1435, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (Guennol MS., fol. 169)
- Fouquet, Jean, Hours of Étienne Chevalier, circa 1453, Chantilly, France (fol. 46)
- Grimani Breviary*, 1480–1520, Venice, Italy, Biblioteca Nazionale Marciana

Royalty and Dignitaries

- Tomb of Saint Louis de France*, 1263–1264, St. Denis, France, Abbey of Church of St. Denis
- Sluter, Claus, and workshop, Tomb of Philip the Bold, 1414, Dijon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Vigilles de la mort de Charles VII*, manuscript illumination, circa 1461, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale de France (MS fr. 5054, fols. 27v, 1, and 289)
- El Greco, The Burial of the Count of Orgaz, 1586, Toledo, Spain, Santa Tomé

Classical History and Mythology

- Poussin, Nicolas, Landscape with the Burial of Phocion, 1648, Paris, Louvre
- West, Benjamin, Agrippina Landing at Brindisium with the Ashes of Germanicus, 1768, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery
- David, Jacques-Louis, The Funeral of Patroclus, 1779, Dublin, Ireland, National Gallery of Ireland

Romantic

- Girodet-Trioson, Anne-Louis, The Entombment of Atala, 1808, Paris, Louvre
- Friedrich, Caspar David, Abbey in the Oakwood, 1809–1810, Berlin, Verwaltung der Staatlichen Schlösser und Gärten West Berlin
- Bacon, John, Monument to Lieutenant-General Sir John Moore, 1810–1815, London, St. Paul's Cathedral
- Hunt, William Holman, The Sleeping City, Pera, watercolor and bodycolor, 1856–1888, Oxford, Ashmolean Museum
- Picasso, Pablo, Evocation: The Burial of Casagemas, 1901, Paris, Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris
- Beckmann, Max, Death, 1938, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Realist

- Menzel, Adolf von, Funeral Ceremony of the Fallen, 1848, Hamburg, Germany, Hamburger Kunsthalle
- Courbet, Gustave, Burial at Ornans, 1849–1850, Paris, Louvre
- Manet, Édouard, The Funeral, 1867–1870, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Carrà, Carlo, The Funeral of the Anarchist, Galli, 1911, New York, Museum of Modern Art

- Grosz, George, Funeral Procession Dedicated to Oskar Panizza, 1917–1918, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie Stuttgart
- Shahn, Ben, The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti, 1931–1932, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art
- Levine, Jack, Gangster Funeral, 1952–1953, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art

Further Reading

- Adhemar, Jean, “Les tombeaux de la collection Gaignières,” Gazette des Beaux-Arts 6:84 (1974)
- Ahlberg, Gudrun, Prothesis and Ekphora in Greek Geometric Vases: Studies in Mediterranean Archaeology, Göteborg, Sweden: P. Astrom, 1971
- Boase, Thomas Sherrer Ross, Death in the Middle Ages: Mortality, Judgment and Remembrance, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972; London: Thames and Hudson, 1972
- Budge, E. A. Wallis, The Mummy: A Handbook of Egyptian Funerary Archaeology, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1925
- Fiero, Gloria, “Death Ritual in Fifteenth-Century Manuscript Illumination,” Journal of Medieval History 10 (1984)
- Forsyth, William H., The Entombment of Christ: French Sculptures of the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and London: Harvard University Press, 1970
- Fritz, Paul S., “The Trade in Death: The Royal Funerals in England, 1685–1830,” Eighteenth Century Studies 15:3 (Spring 1982)
- Giesey, Ralph E., The Royal Funeral Ceremony in Renaissance France, Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 1960
- Harrah, Barbara K., Funeral Services: A Bibliography on Its Past, Present and Future, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1976
- Heusinger von Waldsee, Joachim, “George Grosz Liechenbegangnis. Widmung an Oskar Panizza: Gesellschaftskritische Allegorie als Selbstprojektion,” Pantheon XLIV (1986)
- Jacob, Henriette Eugénie, Idealism and Realism: A Study of Sepulchral Symbolism, Leiden, Germany: E. J. Brill, 1954
- Korshak, Yvonne, “Courbet’s Burial at Ornans—the ‘Passion’ of an Idea,” Pantheon XL (1982)
- Nicolich, Robert N., “Les décors des pompes funèbres de Louis XIV à Saint-Denis et les services à Notre-Dame et à la Sainte-Chapelle,” Bulletin de la Société de l’histoire de l’art français (1975)
- Panofsky, Erwin, Tomb Sculpture, New York: Abrams, 1964; London: Thames and Hudson, 1964
- Philipp, Franz, “El Greco’s Entombment of the Count of Orgaz and Spanish Medieval Tomb Art,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes (1981)
- Puckle, Bertram S., Funeral Customs: Their Origin and Development, London: T. W. Laurie, 1926; New York: F. A. Stokes, 1926
- Rorimer, James, “A Fourteenth-Century Catalan Tomb at the Cloisters and Related Monuments,” Art Bulletin 13 (1931)
- Vermeule, Emily, Aspects of Death in Early Greek Art and Poetry, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979
- Wallis, Charles, The Funeral Encyclopedia, New York: Harper, 1953
- Whaley, Joachim, ed., Mirrors of Mortality: Studies in the Social History of Death, New York and London: St. Martin’s, 1982
- Zuccari, Alessandro, “La pala di Siracusa e il tema della sepoltura in Caravaggio, l’Ultimo Caravaggio e la cultura artistica di Napoli in Sicilia e a Malta,” Syracuse, Italy, 1987

GAZE

Eugene Dwyer

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Gaze:

ANCIENT BUDDHIST
BYZANTINE
RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES
NINETEENTH AND
TWENTIETH CENTURIES

Penthesilea Painter, Greek Killing Amazon (Achilles and Penthesilea), circa 455 B.C., Greek red-figure cup, Munich, Germany, Museum antiker Kleinkunst. (Courtesy of Hirmer Verlag, Munich)

Eye contact is a fundamental means of establishing relationships of equality among humans and among many animal species. Consequently, directional looking has important social consequences. “A cat may look at a king,” says the proverb, but the implication is that it might be harmful for someone else to do the same. Where hierarchy and power are concerned, eye contact must be strictly regulated lest aggressive motives be imputed to the one caught staring. Thus, the gaze is often privileged and may signal social inequalities (Mulvey).

In many societies, both past and present, the eyes have been thought to project visual rays and to communicate enchantments through this power. By a similar transference, the heavenly lights—the sun and the moon—could be characterized by ancient civilizations as divine eyes (e.g., the sun as the all-seeing Shamash, the moon as the eye of Horus, and so on). Such power is also commonly believed to be present in the eyes of images. The alabaster image of the god Abu from Tell Asmar has enormous eyes of a bituminous material that distinguish him from the other votive figures found with him. Another object from Mesopotamia, the bronze head of “Sargon” from Nineveh, shows grievous damage to the eyes, once certainly the seat of its power. Because of the magical properties believed inherent in eyes, a number of taboos have been applied to the representation of eyes in works of art. Art historian Ernst Gombrich noted that “in Byzantium and Ethiopia, evil figures such as Judas are never shown looking out of the picture for fear their evil eye may harm the onlooker” (Gombrich, p. 113).

Eyes that “follow” the viewer are a particular topos in the history of art and are found in anecdotes and descriptions of both sculpture and painting. “A recent painter was Amulius [or “Famulus”]. . . . He painted a Minerva that gazed back at the viewer from whatever position she was viewed” (Pliny, Natural History, XXXV 37, 120). Lucian wrote of a statue of the Syrian goddess that followed visitors to her temple with her eyes (De Syria dea, 32). The most famous portrait of this kind in post-antiquity is a self-portrait of Rogier van der Weyden in the town hall at Arras, France. A minor figure in a larger composition, and traditionally thought to be the painter himself, he was placed there to offer mediating eye contact with viewers. Gombrich has treated this phenomenon at some length (Gombrich, pp. 113, 276, 276n.).

Greek art has a number of iconographic subjects that are paradigmatic with regard to the gaze. Some, such as the myth of Actaeon and the tale of Candaules, involve voyeurism. Others, such as the myth of Narcissus, in love with his own reflection, defy classification. Since the formation of Greek classical art, pictorial representations of the gaze have been dichotomized according to the binary opposition “classical” versus “primitive.” In classical art, the artist may employ eye contact between figures (i.e., actors) in the construction of a self-contained dramatic meaning or action. Orpheus and Eurydice are united in a fateful momentary gaze in a relief in Naples, Italy. Against the command of the gods, Orpheus has just turned back to gaze at his wife, Eurydice, whom he leads from Hades. As Orpheus draws aside her veil to stare into her eyes, Hermes grasps Eurydice by the wrist to lead her back to the underworld. A pathos-working mutual gaze unites victor and vanquished in the classical relief in the Villa Albani (Helbig, p. 3257). A similar union of victor and vanquished can be found in the scenes of Achilles and Penthesilea and Apollo Killing Tityus in the respective interiors of two red-figure cups by the Penthesilea Painter in Munich, Germany (Arias and Hirmer, figs. 168–171). According to the same classicizing criteria, Hammurabi and the god Shamash share a meaningful mutual gaze on a stela in the Louvre in Paris, thanks to the artist’s use of high relief. Henri Frankfort described this scene as conveying “not only a sense of confrontation, but of communication between the lord of justice and the law-giver” (Frankfort, p. 59). An Etruscan sarcophagus lid in Boston shows a married couple frozen in mutual gaze as they lie wrapped in each other’s arms. Here, however, the nonclassical (i.e., symbolic) nature of the work is indicated by the extended context: The sarcophagus itself contradicts the fact that the couple is alive, transforming the image of momentary intimacy into a (distinctly unclassical) symbol of eternity.

The frontal face is an anomaly in the classical art of Greece. Where it appears, it is designed to avert evil, like the Gorgon, or is meant to have comic (i.e., shocking) effect, like an occasional satyr. Figures in otherwise classical works who direct their gaze beyond the frame also invite symbolic interpretation. The self-immolating Gaul in the colossal sculptural group in the Ludovisi Collection has often been seen as glancing toward his hypothetical antagonists: an example of the Hellenistic sculptor’s willingness to extend the spatial context of the work (Helbig, p. 2337). In an often-repeated cult image of the Roman Imperial period, Mithras, the Indo-Iranian god of light, directs his gaze away from his sacrificial victim, denoting his relationship with the absent sun god and extending the setting of his action beyond the immediate frame of the work. (Gordon has suggested that Mithras looks toward the viewer.)

The Egyptian funerary cult of the Old Kingdom maintained that the inhabitant of the tomb was ever watchful through his or her image (Groenewegen-Frankfort). Consequently, the depiction of a superior or omniscient gaze was achieved by the earliest Egyptian monumental sculptors. In the funerary complex of King Zoser (circa 2750 B.C.) at Saqqara, a large seated statue of the deceased commanded a view of the entrance to the mortuary temple from within a small enclosure (or serdab) pierced by two eyeholes (Vandier, vol. I, ii, p. 937). The statue represented the deceased (or his ka) as he watched over his visitors. In Old Kingdom funerary relief, the dead person was portrayed as an overseer of unnatural size in the midst of servants. He appeared to look omnisciently but without actually participating in the action of those who surrounded him (Groenewegen-Frankfort).

With the exception of cult images and Gorgons, Greek artists normally avoided depictions of the omniscient (or even mediating) gaze. Praxiteles' hallmark, evident in his statues of Aphrodite, was the diffused (or suffused) gaze, which was both erotic and elusive (Brunn, vol. I, p. 347). After the frontal statues of the Archaic period, sculptors made the direction of a statue's gaze a conscious component of its dramatic action and the viewer's station a component of the aesthetic ensemble. Larger-than-life-size gods and goddesses could look ahead or down without compromising their dignity. Athletes or smaller images of deities could simply look away or be inwardly preoccupied in their own impenetrable dramatic context. Alexander the Great and his successors, however, required the symbolism of apotheosis in their portraits. Thus, a new formula was devised by which an upward glance, accompanied by an elevation of the brow, signified the affinity of the portrayed with the superior powers. This new device also avoided engaging the gaze of the beholder as much as it suggested the mediating role of the ruler between his human subjects and the gods. The "heavenward gaze" was adopted for Roman Imperial portraits, beginning with Galienus (L'Orange, 1947).

The process by which images of the Roman emperor acting within a given pictorial context attained iconographic self-sufficiency (i.e., symbolic status) has been correctly identified as the end of the classical style in Roman art. The effect is complete by the third century A.D., although the transformation began in the preceding century. By the time of the colossal portrait of Emperor Constantine I (now in the Capitoline Museum in Rome), "the eyes express more clearly than ever the transcendence of the ruler's personality; in his Gaze he travels far beyond his physical surroundings and attains his goal in a higher sphere, in contact and identity with the governing powers" (L'Orange, 1965, adapted).

Constantine's portraits maintained the iconographic trait of the heavenward gaze. A real-life equivalent of this convention may be deduced from Ammianus Marcellinus's description of Constantius II (son of Constantine) during his visit to the Romans: "He looked so stiffly ahead as if he had an iron band about his neck and he turned his face neither to the right nor to the left; he was not as a living person, but as an image" (quoted in L'Orange, 1965). Both the actor and the historian were aware of the irony of life imitating art. This strange, uncomfortable behavior was the consequence of several centuries of attempting to make the Roman emperor divine, with "gaze blank and pitiless as the sun" (William Butler Yeats). It was also the logical consequence of the complete acceptance by Constantius and his contemporaries of the projective theory of vision. His intent was clearly that the rays thought to emanate from his eyes would not encounter those emanating from the eyes of his inferiors and thus inadvertently bestow his grace on them. As an image of the emperor, Constantius belonged more to the world of ideas than to the world of material reality.

Later emperors, such as Justinian the Great, found a new formula for the gaze in their iconography if not in their public lives. By the end of the fourth century, Christians had finally put to rest the idea of a divine emperor, as they had given new dignity and meaning to the frontal gaze. By Justinian's time, the frontal face, offering direct eye contact to the beholder (as in the sanctuary mosaic in St. Vitale in Ravenna, Italy), had come to signify mediation between the viewer and God. The equation of the frontal face (offering eye contact with the viewer) with mediation or intercession is clearly presented in an icon of the seventh century from Mount Sinai, The Virgin and Child with Saint Theodore and Saint George (Weitzmann, no. B.3, pp. 18ff., and pls. IV–VI, XLIII–XLVI), where the direct gaze of the saintly intercessors contrasts markedly with the averted gaze of the Virgin and Child. By means of the gazes, the icon conveys the information that the approach to the deity should be through intermediaries.

While frontality was taking on a new form in the Mediterranean world through the images of the Roman emperors, it was also finding new outlets in the art of India in the image of the Buddha. Unlike the glyptic and pictorial arts of Greece and China, the corresponding sculptures of Sanchi and Bharhut in India (second–first century B.C.) display human figures with frontal faces throughout and with profiles only at the borders of the composition (Zimmer, p. 325). The normal multifigured picture of this period thus appears as a multitude of figures peering out at the viewer. Art historian Heinrich Zimmer, describing one such relief, Adoration of the Holy Seat of the Buddha from the Bharhut Stupa, wrote of the devotees, "As though on a stage, facing the onlooker, they invite him to partake of their rapture and thus are addressing themselves to a sphere outside the field of the composition" (Zimmer, p. 337). In fact, the Indian preference for the frontal face and figure is explained in the Indian practice of bhakti, or union of the worshiper with the divinity through its image. As soon as social attitudes permitted, it was only natural that the earliest Indian images of the Buddha himself (first century B.C.?) would take the form of frontal images. From India, the frontal image of a compassionate divinity spread to China, first as the Queen Mother and later the Buddha himself (Wu, p. 133). The importance of Indian frontal images for the art of the medieval West is a vexing question.

With the revival in the fifteenth century of classical conventions of picturing dramatic action, painters found new possibilities of meaning in the gaze. Jan van Eyck may have painted his own self-portrait in A Man in a Red Turban. The painter's use of eye contact (to be expected in a self-portrait produced with the aid of a mirror) shows a new awareness of the viewer's subjectivity. Rogier van der Weyden's self-portrait in the town hall of Arras, France, painted at about the same time as Jan van Eyck's, inspired Nicolas Cusanus to think of the eye of God as it followed the beholder about the room (Panofsky). As such painted figures establish their own relationships with viewers, they must necessarily stand apart from any dramatic action in which they are included. Thus, biographers and guides have invariably labeled them artist's self-portraits that in larger compositions are included as signatures. The most complex picture of this kind is certainly Diego Velázquez's Maids of Honor. The inherent conflict between self-representation with subjective eye contact and representation of figures in an objective dramatic context clearly demarcates the genres of portraiture and classical history or narrative painting. The latter tradition may be represented by Jan Steen's The Drawing Lesson, as explicated by Leo Steinberg.

Albrecht Dürer was especially interested in the use of eye contact among figures in a composition as a means of expressing dramatic and symbolic coherence. In two early prints, Men's Bath and Four Witches, he used mutual gazes to enforce the narrative (and allegorical) relationships between the figures. The power (for erotic effect) of eye contact between the viewer and the figures in a composition is shown in his drawings Nude Girl and Women Bathing. The element of narcissism prevails in his own self-portraits of 1498 in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, and of 1500 in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany. In a later work, the engraving entitled Melancholia I, the autobiographical subject gazes intensely not at the viewer but into the void. In his Four Apostles and in the portraits of Hieronymus Holzschuher and Jacob Muffel, Dürer returned to the expressive power of the eyes, creating the most powerfully expressive eyes in the history of painting. Whereas the erotic meaning of the eyes is clear in Dürer's early works, as well as in the narcissism of the youthful self-portraits, these later works require a different explanation. St. Paul, the militant defender of the faith, and the two magistrates of Nürnberg, Germany (probably intended, like the saint, for public display), were intentionally depicted as apotropaic forces eternally watchful over the city.

Art historian Regina Stefaniak has argued that gazing figures depicted in Correggio's Camera di San Paolo were intended to perform an apotropaic function, namely, to protect the convent and its abbess against the envious designs of its enemies by invoking evil-eye magic. Although Stefaniak's thesis must remain conjectural, it may cast a valuable light on artists' portraits of direct gazing in the Renaissance. With the considerable importance given to the theme of envy in artists' biographies of the period, their subject-painters may have intended such portraits for self-protection.

The classical convention, revived in the Renaissance, of placing a nude before the viewer's gaze demanded that the subject be unaware of the viewer's presence. Francisco de Goya's Naked Maja maintained traditional decorum by presenting the model, the Duchess of Alba, in a fictional identity, but it broke with convention in posing the eroticized figure gazing lovingly at the viewer. The work was naturally received as a private communication between the painter and his mistress and was deemed unsuitable for public display. Édouard Manet achieved a succès de scandale mainly through the power of the gaze, which his model, Victorine Meurent, directs at viewers in Déjeuner sur l'Herbe and Olympia. Where the gaze of the nude bather in the first picture is disconcerting in its candor, Olympia's gaze, positively devoid of expression, is meant to transfix.

The end of the nineteenth century saw a renewed interest in frontality and the gaze. Dante Gabriel Rossetti had already reintroduced suggestions of the medieval formal style in his portraits. The disturbed, laudanum-induced gazes of his female subjects convey both eroticism and spirituality. Contemporary interest in mesmerism or hypnotism undoubtedly fueled the notoriety of such "dangerous" works. Edvard Munch made extensive use of frontality for its psychological potential. In lithographs such as Jealousy and Sphinx, he employed frontal faces and figures in the foreground, developing the traditional mediating role of such images into the principal subjects of his pictures. Munch and his contemporaries thus consciously recovered principles of "primitive" art in their criticism of contemporary artists of the same time who practiced a tired and discrete classicism.

Modern art historians also contributed to the interest in the mediating gaze with works on art forms once considered unworthy of study. Of particular importance is Alois Riegl's 1902 study of the sixteenth–seventeenth century Dutch group portrait, a form notorious for assaulting the classical tradition (and the unity of the artwork) by means of a disconcerting multiplication of individuals who all make eye contact with the viewer (Olin, 1989).

The comparatively newer art forms of still photography and cinema have contributed new artistic and critical awareness to the problem of the gaze and subjective meaning. Film critic and historian Laura Mulvey considers the implied gaze (i.e., the subjective gaze independent of direct solicitation by eye contact) a disruption and preclusion of objective narrative content in cinema, much the way subjective intrusions have traditionally been considered hostile to classical narrative. From its very beginning, however, the medium of photography has been a relatively subjective medium. Candid photographs, in which the subjects are unaware of the presence of the camera, significantly postdate the more subjective kind. Indeed, the sixteenth-century Netherlandish group portraits are more directly related to early portrait photographs than any other genre.

The power of the gaze and its ability to harm or control is an idea discussed by contemporary theorists of the visual. To Walter Benjamin, an overexposure to the ogling of the crowd will rob a work of art of its "aura." Norman Bryson speaks of the "probing gaze" and its ability to "consume" what it sees. Martin Jay is the most explicit: "Now the gaze was tied not only to the psychological lures of the Imaginary and the interpersonal dialectics of the Look, but also to the social institutions of surveillance and the spectacle, . . . [becoming] the ruling metaphor of social control and political oppression at its most insidious" (Jay, pp. 377–378). The implications of power relationships deriving from the various ramifications of the gaze have been explored by such feminists as Janet Wolff, Griselda Pollack, and Carol Armstrong, among others.

See also Apotheosis/Deification; Envy; Evil Eye; Female Beauty and Adornment; Voyeurism

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Seated Statue of King Zoser, circa 2750 B.C., Saqqara, Egypt

Statue of God Abu, circa 2700–2500 B.C., Baghdad, Iraq Museum

Stele Inscribed with the Law Code of Hammurabi, circa 1760 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Penthesilea Painter, Greek Killing Amazon (Achilles and Penthesilea), Apollo Killing Tityus, circa 455 B.C., interiors of two red-figure cups, Munich, Germany, Museum antiker Kleinkunst

Warrior Vanquishing Foe (Albani Relief), marble relief, fifth century B.C., Rome, Villa Albani
Orpheus and Eurydice, marble relief, fifth century B.C., Naples, Italy, National Archaeological Museum

Buddhist

Adoration of the Holy Seat of the Buddha, relief from the Bharhut Stupa, first century B.C.

Byzantine

The Virgin and Child with Saint Theodore and Saint George, encaustic icon, seventh century, Mount Sinai, Egypt, Monastery of St. Catherine

Renaissance

Eyck, Jan van, A Man in a Red Turban, oil on panel, 1433, London, National Gallery
 Correggio, Camera di San Paolo, fresco, 1518, Parma, Italy
 Dürer, Albrecht, Nude Girl, drawing, 1493
 Dürer, Albrecht, Men's Bath, woodcut, 1496
 Dürer, Albrecht, Women Bathing, drawing, 1497
 Dürer, Albrecht, Four Witches, engraving, 1497
 Dürer, Albrecht, Melancholia I, engraving 1514
 Dürer, Albrecht, Four Apostles, oil on panel, 1526, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Dürer, Albrecht, Portrait of Hieronymus Holzschuher, oil on panel, 1526, Berlin, Staatliche Museen
 Dürer, Albrecht, Jacob Muffel, oil on panel, 1526, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Velázquez, Diego, Toilet of Venus (The Rokeby Venus), oil on canvas, 1648–1651, London, National Gallery
 Velázquez, Diego, Maids of Honor, 1656, oil on canvas, Madrid, Prado
 Steen, Jan, The Drawing Lesson, circa 1660, oil on canvas, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
 Goya, Francisco de, Naked Maja, 1795, oil on canvas, Madrid, Prado

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Manet, Édouard, Déjeuner sur l'Herbe, oil on canvas, 1863, Paris, Louvre
 Manet, Édouard, Olympia, oil on canvas, 1865, Paris, Louvre
 Munch, Edvard, Jealousy, lithograph, 1896
 Munch, Edvard, Sphinx, lithograph, 1899
 Close, Chuck, Self-Portrait, acrylic on canvas, 1968, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Walker Art Center

Further Reading

Arias, Paolo, and Max Hirmer, A History of 1000 Years of Greek Vase Painting, translated by B. Shefton, New York: Abrams, 1961
 Berger, Harry, Jr., "Fictions of the Pose: Facing the Gaze of Early Modern Portraiture," Representations 46 (Spring, 1994)

Brunn, Heinrich, Geschichte der griechischen Künstler, Stuttgart, Germany: Ebner and Seibert, 1857
 Frankfort, Henri, The Art and Architecture of the Ancient Orient, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1958
 Gombrich, Ernst, Art and Illusion: A Study in the Psychology of Pictorial Representation, 2nd ed., New York: Pantheon, 1961
 Gordon, Richard, "Iconographical Notes on the Projejena Reliefs," Journal of Mithraic Studies 2 (1977)
 Groenewegen-Frankfort, Henriette, Arrest and Movement, London: Faber, 1951
 Helbig, Wolfgang, Führer durch die öffentlichen Sammlungen klassischer Altertümer in Rom, Tübingen, Germany: East Wasmuth, 1963
 L'Orange, Hans Peter, Apotheosis in Ancient Portraiture, Oslo, Norway, 1947
 ———, Art Forms and Civic Life in the Late Roman Empire, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1965
 Mathew, Gervase, Byzantine Aesthetics, New York: Viking, 1964
 Mulvey, Laura, "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema," in Art After Modernism: Rethinking Representation, edited by Brian Wallis, New York: Museum of Contemporary Art, 1984
 Olin, Margaret, "Forms of Respect: Alois Riegl's Concept of Attentiveness," The Art Bulletin 71 (1989)
 ———, "'It is not going to be easy to look into their eyes': Privilege of Perception in Let Us Now Praise Famous Men," Art History 14 (1991)
 Panofsky, Erwin, "Facies illa Rogeri maximi pictoris," in Late Classical and Medieval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1954
 Reiss, A., "The Power of Eye in Nature, Nurture, and Culture," The Psychoanalytic Study of the Child 43 (1988)
 Riegl, Alois, Das Holländische Gruppenporträt, edited by K. M. Swoboda, Vienna, Austria: Österreichische Staatsdr., 1931
 Simons, Patricia, "Women in Frames: the Gaze, the Eye, the Profile in Renaissance Portraiture," History Workshop 25 (1988)
 Stefaniak, Regina, "Correggio's Camera di San Paolo: An Archaeology of the Gaze," Art History 16 (1993)
 Steinberg, Leo, "Steen's Female Gaze and Other Ironies," Artibus et Historiae 22 (1990)
 Vandier, Jacques, Manuel d'archéologie égyptienne, Paris: Picard, 1952
 Weitzmann, Kurt, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai: The Icons, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1976
 Wu, Hung, The Wu Liang Shrine: The Ideology of Early Chinese Pictorial Art, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1989
 Zimmer, Heinrich, The Art of Indian Asia: Its Mythology and Transformations, New York: Pantheon, 1955

GRIEVING/LAMENTATION

Dimitri Hazzikostas

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Grieving/Lamentation:

ANCIENT AND CLASSICAL
EARLY CHRISTIAN AND
MEDIEVAL
RENAISSANCE

EIGHTEENTH AND NINETEENTH CENTURIES
TWENTIETH CENTURY

Giotto, Lamentation, 1305, fresco, Padua, Italy, Capella degli Scrovegni (Arena Chapel).
(Courtesy of Scala/Art Resource, New York)

The terms lamentation and grieving describe the formal, sometimes forceful demonstrations of grief that are part of the burial procedures and rites of death practiced in most societies. The sense of personal loss often underlying such expressions of sorrow stems from the instinctive reluctance of humans to accept the finality of death and the bitter awareness of mortality. Another definition relates to the emotional suffering caused by the unexplained tragedies that disrupt the course of life; the lament for this type of suffering, either personal or collective, is most common as a literary genre but also gains significance in the visual arts of the twentieth century.

Although grieving in art and literature often shares many features that attest to the universality of the theme, diverse religious or societal beliefs and experiences usually condition its meaning. The ancient Greeks, for example, tended to relegate excessive emotions of sorrow to a private sphere, whereas publicly, especially when the dead were either outstanding citizens or warriors killed in battle, they mitigated the fear of death by emphasizing “earthly immortality”—the importance of a legacy of fame and honor.

The Old Testament also focuses on the physical aspects of death, but, as voiced in Ecclesiastes, there is an underlying sense of futility and submission to divine purpose. Suffering, inflicted not only on the guilty sinner but also sometimes on the blameless and upright, is endowed with mysterious instructive value. Grieving in the Old Testament is manifested in acts of fasting, the donning of sackcloth, the performing of dirges, and other ritualized forms of pious humility characterized by reflection on individual responsibility and self-worth (Genesis 37:34; II Samuel 3:31; Amos 8:10). The emphasis on redemption and immortality presented in the New Testament (Matthew 8:22; Romans 8:13) alters attitudes of grieving by linking it with grace. In Europe of the late Middle Ages, the intense preoccupation with death fostered by war, adversity, and decimation from plagues is channeled into the salutary promise of salvation and spiritual afterlife embodied in portrayals of Jesus Christ’s Passion and Resurrection.

Mourning in Antiquity

In antiquity, ritualized mourning varied in duration and served several purposes. In a religious sense, ceremonies assisted the deceased’s passage to the next world. As a matter of practical behavior, the period of observance determined the status of the deceased, assuaged fear, strengthened the ties of family and clan, and ensured confirmation of death (as opposed to another form of unconsciousness). Generally, the ritual actions followed norms fixed by social convention, enabling, as the Greek rhetorician Lucian observed, those present at the funeral to “simply commit their grief into the charge of custom and habit” (Lucian, On Funerals, 1).

Although evidence of ceremonial activities for the dead can be traced to prehistoric contexts, a systematic textual and visual record of mourning and mortuary customs is first encountered in ancient Egypt. The grieving in the home of the deceased was the initial episode of funeral rites that included the crossing of the Nile on the funerary bark, the procession to the necropolis, the purification of the dead during the Opening the Mouth ceremony before burial, and the funerary banquet. Tomb paintings regularly depict male and female relatives as mourners in attitudes that range from a reserved bid of farewell with one or both hands raised to the more intensely dramatic gesticulations meant to convey the uncontrolled grief experienced by women from the immediate family (Michalowski, fig. 574).

Some of the conventional, often eloquent gestures of lamentation include beating the head and chest, thrusting the arms forward or heavenward, and tearing at the hair with both hands. It is noteworthy that, in almost every instance, women are the ones who moan and wail, most typically during the funeral procession or near the funerary bark. In the tomb of Nebamun and Ipuky, dated in the beginning of the XIXth Dynasty, the widow with one breast bared in bereavement, haggard and weeping, crouches before the coffin and raises her hand to pour dust on her hair (Mekhitarian, 128). In the same painting, a younger woman dressed in gray has tears streaming down her face and is beating her forehead with her left hand; her right hand reaches out as if to signal her desperate wish to stop the procession to the grave (Mekhitarian, 122).

Such genuine expressions of grief were often juxtaposed with the feigned distress of professional mourners employed as a matter of custom in the funerals of great nobles. Through conspicuous display, these ceremonies were meant to accentuate the importance of the deceased and to underscore family solidarity. In the tomb of Min Nahkt, dated in the reign of Tuthmose III (circa 1504–1450 B.C.), a group of females, uniformly dressed in white, beat their heads and chests while moving their arms to a rhythm seemingly set by their leader on the left who, with added emphasis, stoops forward as she “conducts” their lamentation (Michalowski, figs. 109, 402). The tomb of Nebamun and Ipuky cited above also includes a group of paid female performers in attendance at the funerary bark; with open mouths, they sing a dirge and accompany their lament with hysterical gesturing (Mekhitarian, 130).

Similar mourning rituals no doubt existed in other parts of the ancient world, but the importance attached to them varies significantly from one culture to another. For example, in spite of evidence of elaborate burial customs among the Hittites and the empires of ancient Mesopotamia, only a scant visual record exists of how the inhabitants of those lands mourned their dead. Only lamentations for the dead (sometimes for a god or a captured city) in a literary form have survived, some of which are echoed in parts of the Old Testament (e.g., the lamentation of David for Saul and Jonathan, II Samuel 1:17–27; Rachel's weeping for her children, Jeremiah 31:15 and Matthew 2:18; or the laments for the desolation of Jerusalem by the Hebrew exiles in Babylon, Lamentations). Other references in the Bible concerning the duration of mourning as a measure of the status of the deceased (Genesis 50:10; Deuteronomy 34:8; I Chronicles 7:22), the role of women in mourning rituals (Jeremiah 9:20, 31:15; Luke 23:27), and the singing of dirges, or qînoôt in Hebrew (II Chronicles 35:25), suggest that similar customs for grieving the dead were shared by many different peoples in the Mediterranean world.

Next to Egypt, Greece offers the most complete picture of an almost continuous and well-documented tradition of mourning rituals that extend from the Late Bronze Age to the Roman period. The earliest representations are Mycenaean (Late Helladic IIIB) terra-cotta statuettes of female mourners and a group of painted larnakes (sarcophagi) from Tanagra in Boeotia. The larnakes bear rich decorations that include processions of women and funeral scenes and competitive events such as chariot racing, hunting, and in one instance bull leaping, an acrobatic performance that was very common in Minoan Crete. The depictions clearly emphasize the traditional role of women as mourners in funerary iconography and juxtapose it with the chariot races and other prize contests held by men in the dead man's honor.

The memory of funerary customs, such as those recorded on the Tanagra larnakes, survives in Greek epic poetry. Homer gives a detailed description of the funeral games organized by Achilles for Patroclus (Iliad, 23.257–897). Here also, women are cast in the major role as mourners for the dead, such as Achilles' concubine Briseis, who, in her grief for the dead Patroclus, "shrieked aloud, and with her hands she tore her breast and tender neck and beautiful face" (Iliad, 19.284–285), or Hecuba and Andromache, who "wailed and tore at their hair," lamenting the loss of Hector before the gates of Troy (Iliad, 24.710–714). Similar customs are found in the funeral games of the Etruscans and the Romans. However, these rituals in honor of the heroic dead sometimes included human sacrifice and bloodshed and presumably were intended to revitalize the departed spirit.

Depictions of grieving gain greater consistency in the Greek Geometric vase painting of the mid-eighth century B.C., becoming integrated in the theme of the prothesis (wake). The prothesis and the equally popular ekphora (funeral procession) are the standard decorative motifs of large funerary vases—amphoras, kraters, and hydrias—from the Kerameikos Cemetery in Athens. The iconographic structure of the Geometric prothesis shows the deceased lying in state at the center attended by mourners who stand, kneel, or sit near the bier with their hands raised to their heads in the familiar gesture of tearing the hair (Schweitzer, pls. 30–31). The abstract silhouette drawing allows for minimal realistic detail, but the participants' genders are often emphasized by means of attributes—swords at waist level for men and long skirts and oblique strokes marking the breasts for women (Schweitzer, pl. 40). Children (recognizable by their diminutive size or their position on their mothers' laps) are also present occasionally near the deceased, adding a touch of domesticity (Schweitzer, pl. 41). The iconographic components of the Geometric prothesis scenes—the high bier on delicately turned legs extending to shoulder height, the bier cloth decorated with a checkered pattern and suspended in the field above the deceased, and the great number of mourners formally arrayed in single or superimposed tiers—reveal a degree of ostentation or perhaps a conscious emulation of the sumptuous obsequies of Achilles (Odyssey, 24.43–84) and Hector (Iliad, 24.719–804) described in Homer.

The basic composition of the prothesis survives into the Archaic and classical periods, but the depictions on black- and red-figure vases, although freer and nearer to nature, show a much reduced number of participants. To some extent, this development simply reflects the changes in the vase shapes. Whereas the spacious zones and panels of the Geometric kraters and amphoras naturally accommodate multifigured compositions, the tall and narrow shape of later funerary vases, such as the lekythos and loutrophoros, favor an intimate scene with only a few figures. In one example on a red-figure loutrophoros in Paris, dated 490–480 B.C., the artist compensates for the narrow girth of the vase by splitting the prothesis into separate but complementary episodes: women mourners on the neck with the main lamentation scene below on the body of the vessel. Lower yet, a third zone of diminutive horsemen recalls the ekphora motif on Geometric vases and identifies the social status of the deceased as one of the equestrian class (Fantham et al., fig. 1.16).

The iconographic changes in sixth-century prothesis scenes may also be symptomatic of legislative efforts within the Greek city-states to reform traditional aspects of daily life, including funerals, as part of a democratization process. In Athens, for example, we are told that Solon's legislation prohibited ostentatious funerals and determined that the body was to be laid out for the last greetings from family and friends (prothesis) within the house (Demosthenes, Against Macartatus, 43.62). The same laws forbade women to indulge publicly in excessive displays of sorrow (Plutarch, Lives, Solon 21.5) and limited even their participation in the prothesis according to age and kinship (Demosthenes, Against Macartatus, 43.62). Late Archaic funeral plaques that were sometimes affixed to the tomb as decorations seem to confirm the continuing adherence to such regulations. One such plaque in Paris, circa 530 B.C. (Fantham et al., fig. 1.13), places the prothesis unequivocally inside the house (indicated by the porch column on the left) and depicts the deceased (a young beardless man) surrounded by members of his immediate family. Each family member has an inscription identifying a family relation (mother, father, sister, aunt) as if to prove that all of them were within the prescribed limits.

Archaic and early classical representations of the prothesis are more explicit in distinguishing male and female roles in the mourning of the dead. The women appear closest to the corpse and often display violent outbursts of grief (now in the home, not in public), gesturing with both hands. Their principal role at the prothesis is to sing the ritualized lament that ranged in form from the most personal goos, an improvised lament sung by a female relative or close friend, to the formal threnos, which was sung in chorus (Vermeule, pp. 14–17). In the funeral plaque in Paris cited above, the dead man's mother (inscribed meter) affectionately supports her son's head, recalling Homer's description of "Andromache [who] led the Lamentation of the women, and held in her arms the head of manslaughtering Hector" (Iliad, 24.723–724).

In art and literature, the woman's role as mother, wife, and caregiver is time and again alluded to and seems to come full circle in the ritual of death. In addition to societal attitudes that more readily regarded the display of emotion as a feminine attribute was an underlying belief that women were less likely to be affected by contact with a corpse and ritual pollution (miasma), especially those women who had given birth. By contrast, male mourners usually stand farther away from the bier or near the entryway that implicitly links them to the outside world. In Greek art, men also perform the ritual gesture of kopetos (beating the head), but only with one hand raised to the head and in a reserved manner that seems intended more as a sign of greeting for the dead.

Such canonical mourning scenes become rare in the classical period (Robertson, pl. 147). The new idealized style favors a new type of funerary subject, namely, the representation of the dead (depicted as if alive) alone or in the company of living relatives in scenes of farewell or reunion, which are indicated by the handshake (dexiosis) with the departed (Lullies and Hirmer, pls. 200, 204). The primary medium for these melancholy encounters between the living and the dead is grave reliefs; the secondary medium is white-ground lekythoi (Boardman, pp. 53–55, 154–157, 159; Robertson, plates on pp. 144–145). In all these examples, a mood of quiet introspection may result from a concerted effort in all spheres of art to emulate the timeless quality of public monuments, although this does not necessarily reflect a fundamental change in funeral practice. Emotional outbursts of grief are likely to have continued in funerals among the people, at least with enough regularity to cause concern among the philosophers. Plato recommends procedures so that "funeral ceremonies are conducted with propriety and moderation" and thinks it should be forbidden "to utter dirges over the dead or to let the noise of the mourning be audible outside the house" (Laws, 12.959e). A classical decorum also permeates fourth-century funerary monuments, including some sumptuously sculptured sarcophagi found at Sidon in Asia Minor. For example, Sarcophagus of the Mourning Women in Istanbul, Turkey, is fashioned like an architect's model of an Ionic peristyle and shelters, in the spaces between the columns, single female figures expressing grief in various shades from deep dejection to quiet meditation (Lullies, pls. 207–209).

Traditional expressions of grieving and lamentation for the dead survive more or less unchanged into the Roman period and beyond. In the second century A.D., Lucian complains of the excesses he sees at funerals—"the cries of distress, the wailing of women, [their] tears, beaten breasts, torn hair, and bloody cheeks"—and with cynical wit he contrasts the convulsed mourners with the peaceful dead who "lies high, crowned with ornamental wreaths, exalted and made up as though for a procession" (On Funerals, 12). The ceremonial lament, or concla- matio, and the funeral cortege appear occasionally in the rich repertory of mostly allegorical subjects that decorate Etruscan cinerary urns and Roman sarcophagi, but the few examples that survive seem to follow Greek iconographic precedents (Panofsky, fig. 80; Prieur, illustration on p. 19).

Grieving and Lamentation as Religious Themes

The theme of grieving, ingrained in the funerary customs of pagan antiquity and of the early Middle Ages, was readily adapted in later medieval art to the iconography of the Passion of Christ. The motif's development is characterized by a crescendo of emotional intensity, beginning with the Crucifixion, continuing with the deposition (descent from the cross), and culminating in the scene before the entombment, which formally comes to be known as the lamentation.

The Crucifixion, from the earliest representations in fifth–sixth century A.D. ivories and manuscripts (Snyder, figs. 102, 106), almost always includes the presence of the Virgin Mary and St. John the Evangelist, in accordance with the passage in John's Gospel (19:25–27), in which Christ entrusts his mother to the care of his loved disciple John. Standing together on one side, or separate in their more canonical position on either side of the Cross, Mary and John act as witnesses and, from the eleventh century onward, also as the major mourners in the scene. Given the number of the participants and the manner in which they are depicted, two versions emerge. In the first, well exemplified by the Byzantine mosaic of the Crucifixion at Daphni (circa 1100), the Virgin Mary and St. John, partly turning toward the viewer, express their sorrow with a formal restraint that helps to underscore the dogma of the incarnation and the promise of salvation. This quiet "iconic" type of Crucifixion, devotional in nature, is favored by Italian and Northern Renaissance painters during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, later becoming more rare (e.g., Hartt, pp. 80, 157, 279, 379). The second version, also drawn from the Gospels (Matthew 27:33–56; Mark 15:22–41; Luke 23:33–49; John 19:17–37) and with precedents in sixth-century manuscript illuminations (e.g., fol. 13, Rabbula Gospels, Snyder, fig. 102), places a much greater emphasis on the narrative aspects of the theme, incorporating the three Marys and a variety of other participants who visibly react to Christ's fate.

In Giotto's Crucifixion in the Arena Chapel (Scrovegni Chapel) in Padua, Italy (Hartt, Fig. 66), Mary's overwhelming grief and the compassionate sorrow of the holy women who support her are contrasted with the cold indifference of the group of soldiers on the right who divide up the clothes of Christ. Duccio's scene on the Maestà Altarpiece shows an even more dramatic complexity (Hartt, fig. 93). Mary swoons below the Cross, sinking into the arms of the holy women, while a crowd of bystanders opposite gesture and look upward toward Christ, projecting their diverse reactions and feelings.

Although fully formulated in the late Middle Ages, this narrative version's intricate and dramatic character continues to have strong appeal to artists of later periods such as Jacopo Tintoretto and Peter Paul Rubens, who painted some overpowering renditions of the Crucifixion. Sometimes elements from both versions appear intermingled, as in Matthias Grünewald's Crucifixion from the Isenheim Altarpiece (Janson, fig. 710), which combines iconic symmetry (through the addition of St. John the Baptist and the lamb on the right) with descriptive realism (evident in the tortured Christ and the anguished grief of the Virgin, John, and Mary Magdalene on the right).

Sorrow intensifies in scenes of the deposition, the episode of the removal of Christ's body from the Cross by Joseph of Arimathea mentioned in all four gospels (Matthew 27:57–58; Mark 15:42–46; Luke 23:50–54; John 19:38–40) and in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus. The motif, which originated in Byzantine art during the ninth century (Schiller, fig. 548) and was almost immediately adopted in the West in a variety of media (Schiller, figs. 543–558), is iconographically a derivative from the earlier theme of the Crucifixion. The Virgin and St. John occupy their traditional positions while Joseph takes Christ's body down from the Cross, usually assisted by Nicodemus. The grieving of those present shares an equal focus with the arduous effort involved in lowering the body. Mary's grief, however, seems more poignant now because of her close proximity to the dead Christ. With bowed head, she holds her son's hand, pressing it to her cheek, or she actively supports his torso, leaning her head tenderly against his. This joining of faces becomes a recurrent schema in scenes of the lamentation and reappears much later as a salient feature in Michelangelo's final statue, the standing Rondanini Pietà (De Tolnay, figs. 195–196).

By the end of the fourteenth century, scenes of the deposition show an increased number of participants that further accentuate the dramatic action. In Pietro Lorenzetti's fresco Descent from the Cross in Assisi, Italy, painted in the 1320s (Hartt, fig. 102), the gaunt figure of the dead Christ is tightly encircled by all seven figures mentioned in the Gospels, each one relating to him in a personal way. Their emotions range from the melancholy meditation of Joseph of Arimathea, who holds Christ's torso, to the anguished expression of St. John and the pained expression of one of the Marys, who is shown holding her cheeks with both hands. The greatest pathos is again concentrated in the Virgin Mary's tearful countenance juxtaposed with her son's lifeless face. In another example, Rogier van der Weyden's Descent from the Cross (Janson, fig. 555), the action is stilled and the narrative imbued with theological meanings to suit the devotional function of the painting. The swooning Virgin Mary, supported by St. John, seems as inanimate as the dead Christ and shares with him almost the same pose—creating a physical parallel that underscores her role as the Coredemptrix. The other mourners also seem oddly self-absorbed in their grief, as if poised in a staged ritual of meditative piety. Devotional spirituality and dramatic narrative, religious symbolism, and realism become eventually fused in the Baroque compositions of Jusepe de Ribera, Rubens, Rembrandt van Rijn, and Giovanni Battista Tiepolo.

The emotional content of the Passion peaks in the scene from the lamentation in which Christ, shown outstretched on a cloth at the foot of the Cross or on the anointing stone (sometimes made to look like a bed, a tomb, or an altar), is tenderly embraced by the Virgin Mary and surrounded by the other mourners. Joseph and Nicodemus usually appear kneeling at Christ's feet in the attitude of reverence (the Greek proskyne- sis), whereas St. John and the three Marys generally have no fixed positions; weeping angels sometimes hover above in the sky. In eleventh-century Byzantine illuminations and ivory reliefs, the lamentation takes place at the foot of the Cross (Schiller, figs. 594–595). Subsequently, the theme appears with the entombment, from which it is sometimes indistinguishable (Schiller, figs. 575–578), but more often it is integrated as an independent subject in the narrative of the bearing of the body to the sepulcher. Although the Gospels do not explicitly mention the lamentation after the deposition (their only reference is to the anointment of the body and the entombment), the motif's incorporation in religious art is a fitting complement to the biblical narrative and serves as a visual reminder of Jesus' prediction to the Apostles at the end of the Last Supper: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, That ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy" (John 16:20).

This redemptive aspect of tears shed for another's suffering finds parallels in the imagery of non-Western religions as well. In Buddhism, Avalokiteshvara-Padamapani, an embodiment of the Mahayana Buddha, responds to the universal lament he hears by forfeiting his entry to Nirvana until all other beings can first achieve the same perfect state. The tears that emanate from his eyes are in the form of Tara, the personification of divine compassion.

Even in the absence of a specific iconography defined by the Scriptures, the lamentation theme was central to the liturgy of the Passion, inspiring a great variety of pictorial compositions ranging from the late Gothic period to the nineteenth century (Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson, Eugène Delacroix, Vincent van Gogh). As a monumental subject on church altarpieces and wall paintings, the lamentation possesses qualities essential for a devotional image. The faithful are enjoined through contemplative absorption to identify spiritually with the mourners around the dead Christ and share in their grieving. In Giotto's Lamentation (1305) in the Arena Chapel, the artist emphasizes this communion with the image by placing two seated figures in the foreground facing inward toward Christ and the Virgin. In this "shared view" position, with their backs to the viewer, these anonymous mourners become, in effect, surrogate worshippers witnessing the events at close range.

Ultimately, however, it is the intensely passionate image of the Virgin embracing her dead son that most powerfully arouses feelings of empathy and inspires meditation. Tenth-century theologian Simeon Metaphrastes describes Mary holding the dead Christ on her lap as if he were an infant, a simile that is repeated in a passage from a sermon (Millet, Migne Patrologia 100, col. 1480) citing Mary's lament: "As a child thou hast often slept and dreamed on my lap, now thou liest here in the sleep of death." In a twelfth-century Byzantine fresco in the Serbian church of Nerezi, the Virgin Mary holds the dead Christ in her lap, accentuating their special relationship by pressing her son's face against her cheek (Grabar, p. 143). This motif of tenderness, with certain universal appeal, seems intentionally evocative of the late Byzantine image of the Madonna and Child, the type known as Eleousa (Merciful), in which the baby Jesus looks at his mother and leans his cheek against hers. Giotto also draws the same analogy in the Arena Chapel; in the Lamentation scene, the viewer is painfully reminded of the Virgin, who holds her infant son in the scene of the Nativity of the same fresco cycle.

In the West, the mystery of Christ's incarnation and his sacrificial death are more succinctly expressed in the sculptural image of the Pietà, a creation probably independent from the paintings of the lamentation that first came into existence in Germany around 1300 and gained subsequent favor in other parts of Europe. The image of the Pietà (its Italian name meaning both piety and pity), also called a Vespersbild (because it was venerated during Vespers), is a moving synthesis of the aged and grieving Virgin Mary holding her son's tormented body in a manner that evokes, once again, the traditional theme of the Madonna and Child. Some provincial versions naively reduce the scale of Christ's figure to allude to the infant Jesus and the beginning of his incarnation. Christ usually sits across Mary's knees in such a way that his head, wearing the crown of thorns, is to his mother's right; sometimes his head falls back, heightening the sensation of death. In keeping with the devotional function of the image, Mary's attitude gradually shifts away from the expression of uncontrollable grief to a more restrained sorrow mixed with calm reflection. The medieval image of the Pietà, adopted in Italy after 1400 and transformed by the classical idiom of the Renaissance, culminates in Michelangelo's harmoniously balanced marble sculpture of his youthful period (1498–1499) in St. Peter's (De Tolnay, fig. 90) that "shuns distortion and ugliness in favor of beauty and idealism, even in death."

The Pietà becomes a pictorial theme in the late fourteenth century, often integrated in the broader iconography of the lamentation; only the degree of demonstrativeness and the suppression of narrative detail provide a qualifying distinction. The Avignon Pietà by Enguerrand Quarton (circa 1460) in the Louvre in Paris (Janson, fig. 564) exemplifies the transformation. Mary no longer throws herself on the dead Christ; rather, she sits against the gold background in silent meditation with her eyes closed and her hands joined in prayer. John, who carefully removes the crown of thorns, and Mary Magdalene, who weeps uncontrollably at Christ's feet, are the active mourners in this scene. Some examples are more ambivalent. In Botticelli's Lamentation (circa 1500) in Munich, Germany, the central group of the Virgin Mary with the dead Christ across her lap qualifies as a Pietà in form but not in attitude. Her swooning visually signals that she is overcome by sorrow—traditionally a narrative feature of the lamentation (Hartt, fig. 354).

In the sixteenth century, the Pietà appears rarely as an independent subject and becomes conflated with the deposition or the entombment. This change is seen in Michelangelo's late Pietàs in Florence, Italy, and Milan, Italy (De Tolnay, figs. 190, 195). In Jacopo da Pontormo's ambiguous Deposition (1525–1528) in Santa Felicità in Florence (Hartt, pl. 108), the figures of the Virgin and the dead Christ, although just separated, also conjure the image of the Pietà in their relationship. Mary's role as a cooperant in her son's sacrifice is suggested by her rapturous expression and the yielding gesture of her arms extended toward the dead Christ being taken away to the tomb. An exception, Annibale Carracci's Lamentation (circa 1604) in London, preserves the motif of the swooning Virgin

Mary, and most late Renaissance and Baroque compositions of the Passion emphasize Mary's cognizance and her acquiescence to divine will.

Grieving is also linked to the cycle of stories concerning the death and Assumption of the Virgin Mary, as recorded in the apocryphal writings of the early Church and retold in the detailed account of the Golden Legend. The main episode of the death, or dormition, of the Virgin is by far the most widely depicted and has its probable origin in pre-iconoclastic Byzantium well into the Baroque era. In the Byzantine versions, the Virgin's body is outstretched on a couch or bier that is flanked right and left by the Apostles (miraculously borne on a cloud to her deathbed) and by types representative of fledgling Christianity—patriarchs, martyrs, and holy virgins. Christ, centrally placed behind the bier, holds the tiny effigy of Mary's soul. This is a visual duplication of the apocryphal text: "and in the morning the soul issued out of the body and fled up in the arms of her Son." In the space above, angels descend from heaven to assist in the soul's ascent. The dormition meaningfully combines in a single scene the sorrow for earthly mortality and the hope of spiritual resurrection; the redemption of the Virgin anticipates the state promised to the rest of humanity.

In the West, this Byzantine motif is gradually replaced by the new themes of the Assumption and the coronation of the Virgin that specifically emphasize Mary's bodily as well as spiritual resurrection and glorification in heaven. Although not a common subject after the sixteenth century, the continuing appeal of the dormition is confirmed by some late interpretations, including Caravaggio's moving picture in the Louvre, which all but eliminates any reference to a supernatural event. Key iconographic features of the dormition—the domestic interior used as a setting, the bier, and the gestural poses of the mourners—are also found in related scenes of funerals of saints, as seen in Giotto's Funeral of St. Francis fresco in Santa Croce in Florence.

Modern Interpretations

Reflecting the secular concerns and the new realities engendered by the Enlightenment and the Industrial Revolution, artists from the eighteenth century onward increasingly enlist images, made familiar through religion, in themes whose purpose is to edify or to arouse the viewer on behalf of political and social causes. For example, Jacques-Louis David's Andromache Mourning Hector (1783) portrays the Trojan hero outstretched on a bier in a manner that recalls the figure of the dead Christ in certain Lamentation scenes (e.g., Schiller, fig. 615). Gestural attitudes of sorrow culled from the deposition/lamentation iconography or from antique sources are also commonly used in Baroque and neoclassical works that deal with the subject of death. A theme inspired by the Roman historian Tacitus, The Death of Germanicus (treated by Nicolas Poussin, Thomas Banks, Benjamin West, and others), is a case in point. Conceptually, David's Death of Marat (1793) may also be cited here. The dramatically illuminated slumped body of the dead patriot appears Christlike. Although no other figures are present that qualify the work as a scene of lamentation, the wooden crate in the foreground with Marat's name inscribed (akin to a symbolic tombstone) and the intimate proximity to the slain martyr enlist the viewer to assume the role of mourner.

Romanticized depictions of mourning that evoke religious imagery continue in secular works such as The Entombment of Atala (1808) by David's pupil Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson, who had earlier painted The Dead Christ Mourned by the Virgin (1789), now in the Church of Montesquieu-Volvestre in Paris. By contrast, the realist painter Gustave Courbet desensitizes the portrayal of death and mourning in his sprawling composition Funeral at Ornans (1849–1850) in the Louvre. Bearing life-size portraits of townspeople, the work records the authentic ritual of a Catholic burial, with the priest, his acolytes, and other mourners gathered around an empty open grave; a dog watches while women in black (including the artist's mother and sisters) weep into their handkerchiefs. Courbet's painting, which may have been intended to create a counterpoint to El Greco's Burial of the Count of Orgaz (1586), seems to contain no metaphysical message—only the quiet event of a small-town funeral.

Reacting to despotism and the cruelty of war, artists voice their criticism of political abuses and social inequities in works that often borrow from the iconography of mourning and lamentation. The allegorical figure of Greece in Eugène Delacroix's painting Greece Expiring on the Ruins of Messolonghi (1826) stands grieving with outstretched arms in an attitude that anticipates his later Pietà (1850), now in Oslo, Norway. Francisco Goya's series of etchings Los Desastres de la Guerra (The Ravages of War), created between 1809 and 1813, also uses variants of the lamentation theme to convey the suffering of those victimized by armed violence. Similarly, Honoré Daumier's lithograph Horried by the Heritage (1871) personifies France as a shrouded woman grieving over the field of corpses left to the embattled New Republic. Her cloaked form recalls mourning figures of late Gothic sculpture (e.g., the Mourning Virgin in Berlin, circa 1450, or the hooded pleureurs [mourners] of tomb monuments). This type of indignant art coincides with the invention of photography, which, from its inception, was a powerful tool used to document the devastation of war.

Twentieth-century artists also adapted religious imagery culled from the motif of Christ's Passion to a variety of secular subjects that deal with human suffering as both a personal and a universal experience. In Pablo Picasso's early works that introduce his Blue Period, the artist creates a synthesis of the sacred and profane in drawings and paintings based on the suicide of his close friend Casagemas. In his study The Mourners (1901), Picasso evokes traditional scenes of the deposition of Christ. Then, in his larger composition The Burial of Casagemas (1901), he clearly draws on El Greco's Burial of the Count of Orgaz and, by expanding the number of mourners to suggest the participation of a whole community, includes a reference to Courbet's Burial at Ornans. In both pictures, Picasso deliberately places a mother and a child within the group as an effective reminder of maternal love and woman's dual role in the life cycle.

The ravages of war and man's inhumanity to man continue to dominate many of the modern themes derived from the iconography of lamentation and grieving, often inspiring powerful depictions of endurance in the face of great suffering.

Picasso's apocalyptic Guernica (1937) derives important meaning from its iconographic association with the Pietà. Drawing attention to the left side of the monumental composition, a mother lifts her head heavenward and cries out in anguish as she holds her dead child; she is surrounded by disjointed figures who writhe in open-mouthed horror. Käthe Kollwitz also uses the Pietà motif in her sculpture Mother and Child (1917) in memory of her son who was killed in World War I and as her personal indictment of the senselessness of war. A similar degree of pathos is evident in one of W. Eugene Smith's photo-essays, Tomoko in Her Bath (1971), which shows a mother bathing her deformed child, the hapless victim of mercury pollution in the Japanese fishing village of Minamata (Janson, fig. 1145). The gaunt figure of the girl, cradled lovingly in her mother's arms and illuminated from above, has the aura of a modern day Pietà.

In many instances, only isolated magnified elements from the themes of lamentation and grieving are substituted for the whole, creating succinct images that mimic the traditional in their ability to elicit instant recognition. Other kinds of grief, more personal ones such as the anxiety of unrequited love, are expressed by the shedding of tears. In his Weeping Woman series (1937), Picasso identifies a fragmented, tearful woman who clutches at a handkerchief; her jarring masklike presence helps to convey an overwhelming sorrow. Roy Lichtenstein's Drowning Girl (1963) restates the motif in a pop art version, eschewing tradition in favor of an oversized benday dot comic strip portrait that humorously enshrines the preoccupations and stereotypes of contemporary culture. More recently, Elizabeth Holzer restores the link between lamentation and death in her installations entitled Laments (1990) at the Guggenheim Museum in New York and the Dia Art Foundation in Bridgehampton, New York.

Even in abstract expressionist works, such as Barnett Newman's black-and-white series Stations of the Cross (1958–1966), the title introduces hidden meaning into the formal structure of areas and narrow stripes, or "zips," of Newman's color-field painting. The title also acts to affirm the artist's often-stated belief that subject matter, in a nonliteral sense, is important to painting. In Stations of the Cross, Newman explores nuances of Christ's Passion without resorting to anecdote or sentimental illustrations, lending strength to his idea that the abstract shape can become a vehicle for thought. Similarly, in Jasper Johns's Weeping Woman (1975), subtle references to traditional scenes of lamentation are achieved by the tight, linear "tweed" pattern created by his strokes of paint and modified into evocations of tears; the triptych construction of the canvas, akin to a medieval altarpiece; and the faint image of a cross in the central panel. A reliance on form to convey meaning is also the underlying principle in Maya Lin's Vietnam Veterans Memorial (1981–1983), designed for the Mall in Washington, D.C. The two long walls of polished black granite bear the names of soldiers in the order in which they died in Vietnam and engage the visitor in silent communion with their information and symbolism.

For the modern existentialist, the catharsis and healing associated with grieving and lamentation in the collective mourning rituals and in the reenactment of Christ's Passion often become supplanted by weariness and a sense of Weltschmerz (world-weariness). The crying newborn in David Siqueiros's Ethnography, or Echo of a Cry (1937) is a haunting image of the abandoned child, a universal victim of indifference. In Edvard Munch's intensely personal painting The Scream (1893) in Oslo, the terror and psychic anguish experienced by the single foreground figure reverberates in the wavy streaks of red, yellow, and green that form the barren landscape and sky. Erupting emotions are met with only solitude and a sense of helplessness in the face of a complex and uncaring world.

See also Crucifixion; Death; Funeral/Burial; Widowhood

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Classical

Female Mourners, relief, circa 1500–1450 B.C., Thebes, Egypt, Tomb of Min Nakht

Female Mourners, relief, circa 1411–1375 B.C., Thebes, Egypt, Tomb of Ramose

Female Mourners, relief, circa 1340–1301, Thebes, Egypt, Tomb of Nebamun and Ipuky

Mourning Figure, Philistine terra-cotta figurine, circa eleventh century B.C., Jerusalem, Israel, Israel Museum

Women Mourning the Dead in His Coffin, Mycenaean larnax, circa 1300–1250 B.C., Boeotia, Greece, Archaeological Museum

Mourning Women and Funeral Games, Mycenaean larnax, circa 1300–1250 B.C., Boeotia, Greece, Archaeological Museum

Funeral Scene (Prothesis), Geometric amphora, from Kerameikos Cemetery, circa 750 B.C., Athens, Greece, National Museum

Funeral Scene (Prothesis) and Procession (Ekphora), Geometric krater, from Kerameikos Cemetery, circa 750 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Damos Painter, Nereids Mourning over the Body of Achilles, Corinthian hydria, from Caere, circa 550 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Funeral Scene, red-figure loutrophoros, 490–480 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Sappho Painter, Funeral Scene with Mourners, black-figure terra-cotta plaque, circa 530 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Grave Relief of Timarista and Krito, marble, fifth century B.C., Rhodes, Greece, Archaeological Museum

Mourning Women Sarcophagus, from the Royal Cemetery at Sidon, circa 360 B.C., Istanbul, Turkey, Archaeological Museum

Ilissos Stele, marble, circa 340 B.C., Athens, Greece, National Museum

Roman Relief Showing a Funeral Cortège, second half of first century B.C., L'Aquila, Italy, Museo Nazionale d'Abruzzo

Early Christian and Medieval

Crucifixion, Syrian illuminated manuscript, Rabbula Gospels, circa 586, Florence, Italy, Biblioteca Laurentiana (MS Plut. I,56, fol. 13)

Lamentation, fresco, circa 1164, Nerezi, Bosnia-Herzegovina, St. Pantaleimon

Vladimir Madonna, painted wood, twelfth century, Moscow, Russia, State Historical Museum

Renaissance

Giotto, Crucifixion, fresco, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Giotto, Lamentation, fresco, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Giotto, Funeral of St. Francis, fresco, circa 1320, Florence, Italy, Santa Croce, Bardi Chapel

Duccio, Crucifixion, from the Maestà Altarpiece 1308–1311, Siena, Italy, Museo dell'Opera del Duomo

Lorenzetti, Pietro, Descent from the Cross, fresco, 1320–1330, Assisi, Italy, St. Francesco, Lower Church

Weyden, Rogier van der, Descent from the Cross, panel, circa 1435, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Pietà (Vespersbild), wood, early fourteenth century, Bonn, Germany, Provinzialmuseum

Mourning Virgin, marble, circa 1450, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Pleureurs, Tomb Monument of Philippe Pot, marble, circa 1480, Paris, Louvre

Quarton, Enguerrand, Avignon Pietà, oil on panel, circa 1460, Paris, Louvre

Botticelli, Lamentation, tempera on panel, circa 1500, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Grünwald, Matthias, Crucifixion, Isenheim Altarpiece, oil on panel, 1510–1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden

Pontormo, Jacopo de, Deposition, oil on canvas, 1525–1528, Florence, Italy, Santa Felicità, Capponi Chapel

Tintoretto, Crucifixion, oil on canvas, 1565, Venice, Italy, Scuola Grande di San Rocco

El Greco, The Burial of the Count of Orgaz, oil on canvas, 1586, Toledo, Spain, Santo Tomé

Caravaggio, Death of the Virgin, oil on canvas, 1605–1606, Paris, Louvre

Poussin, Nicolas, Death of Germanicus, oil on canvas, 1627, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Art

Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries

Banks, Thomas, The Death of Germanicus, marble sculpture, 1774, Norfolk, England, Holkham Hall

David, Jacques-Louis, Andromache Mourning Hector, oil on canvas, 1783, Paris, École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux-Arts

David, Jacques-Louis, The Death of Marat, oil on canvas, 1793, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux

West, Benjamin, Death of a Pale Horse, oil on canvas, 1796, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts

Canova, Antonio, Tomb of the Archduchess Maria Christina, sculpture, 1798–1805, Vienna, Austria, Church of Augustinians

Girodet-Trioson, Anne-Louis, The Entombment of Atala, oil on canvas, 1808, Paris, Louvre

Courbet, Gustave, Funeral at Ornans, oil on canvas, 1849–1850, Paris, Louvre

- Goya, Francisco, Los Desastres de la Guerra (The Ravages of War), etchings, 1809–1813
- Delacroix, Eugène, Greece Expiring on the Ruins of Messolonghi, oil on canvas, 1826, Bordeaux, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Delacroix, Eugène, Pietà, oil on canvas, 1850, Oslo, Norway, National Gallery
- Daumier, Honoré, Horried by the Heritage, lithograph, 1871
- Munch, Edvard, The Scream, oil and tempera on board, 1893, Oslo, Norway, National Gallery
- Munch, Edvard, The Death Chamber, oil on canvas, circa 1894, Oslo, Norway, National Gallery

Twentieth Century

- Picasso, Pablo, The Mourners, ink on paper, 1901, New York, Collection Walter P. Chrysler Jr.
- Picasso, Pablo, The Burial of Casagemas, oil on canvas, 1901, New York, Knoedler Gallery
- Picasso, Pablo, Weeping Woman, oil on canvas, 1937, London, Collection Roland Penrose
- Picasso, Pablo, Guernica, oil on canvas, 1937, Madrid, Reina Sofía
- Kollwitz, Käthe, Mother and Child, bronze, 1917, Washington, D.C., Hirshhorn Museum of Sculpture
- Siqueiros, David, Ethnography (Echo of a Cry), duco on board, 1937, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Newman, Barnett, Stations of the Cross, oil on canvas, 1958–1966, collection of the artist
- Johns, Jasper, Weeping Woman, encaustic on canvas, 1975, Belmont, Massachusetts, private collection
- Smith, W. Eugene, Tomoko in her Bath, gelatin-silver print, 1971, private collection
- Lin, Maya, Vietnam Veterans Memorial, marble, 1981–1983, Washington, D.C.
- Holzer, Elizabeth, Laments, 1990, New York, Guggenheim Museum, and Bridgehampton, New York, Dia Art Foundation

Further Reading

- Ariès, Philippe, Western Attitudes Toward Death, Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974
- Barash, Moshe, Gestures of Despair, New York: New York University Press, 1976
- Boardman, John, Greek Sculpture: The Classical Period, New York and London: Thames and Hudson, 1985
- Danto, Arthur, critical review in The Nation (February 12, 1990)
- , Embodied Meanings, New York: Farrar Straus, 1994
- De Tolnay, Charles, Michelangelo, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1974
- Eitner, Lorenz, Nineteenth Century European Painting, New York: Harper, 1992; London: Thames and Hudson, 1992
- Fantham, Elaine, et. al., Women in the Classical World, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1994
- Garland, Robert, The Greek Way of Death, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1985
- Grabar, André, Byzantine Painting, Geneva, Switzerland: Skira, 1979
- Hartt, Frederick, Italian Renaissance Art, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, and New York: Prentice Hall, 1994
- Hibbard, Howard, Caravaggio, London: Thames and Hudson, 1983; New York: Harper, 1985
- Humphreys, Sarah, The Family, Women, and Death, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993
- Janson, Horst Woldemar, History of Art, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1991; London: Thames and Hudson, 1991
- Katzenellenbogen, Adolf Edward Max, The Sculptural Programs of Chartres Cathedral, New York: Norton, 1964
- Lissarrague, François, “Figures of Women,” in A History of Women in the West, Cambridge, Massachusetts and London: Harvard University Press, 1992
- Lucian, On Funerals
- Lullies, Reinhard, and Max Hirmer, Greek Sculpture, New York: Abrams, 1957; London: Thames and Hudson, 1957
- Mekhitarian, A., Egyptian Painting, New York: Rizzoli, 1978; London: Macmillan, 1978
- Michalowski, Kenneth., Art of Ancient Egypt, New York: Abrams, 1969; London: Thames and Hudson, 1969
- Panofsky, Erwin, Tomb Sculpture, New York: Abrams, 1992; London: Thames and Hudson, 1992
- Prieur, J., La mort dans l'antiquité romaine, Paris: La Guerche-de-Bretagne, 1986
- Robertson, Martin, Greek Painting, Geneva, Switzerland: Skira, 1979
- Schapiro, H. A., “The Iconography of Mourning in Athenian Art,” American Journal of Archaeology 95:4 (1991)
- Schiller, Gertrud, Iconography of Christian Art, Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic Society, 1971; London: Lund Humphries, 1971
- , Ikongraphie der Kristlichen Kunst, Gutersich, Germany: Verlaghaus Gerd Mohn, 1971
- Schuhmacher, Stephen, and Gert Woerner, editors, Encyclopedia of Eastern Philosophy and Religion, Boston: Shambala, 1989; London: Rider, 1989
- Schweitzer, Bernhard, Greek Geometric Art, London: Phaidon, 1969
- Snyder, James, Medieval Art, New York: Abrams, 1989
- Vermeule, Emily, Aspects of Death in Early Greek Art and Poetry, Berkeley, California and London: University of California Press, 1978

HAIR/HAIRCUTTING

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following iconographic narratives, motifs, and periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Hair/Haircutting:

HAIR AS SNAKES
SAMSON AND DELILAH
ABSALOM

WASHING AND DRYING
CHRIST'S FEET
HAIR AS PENITENCE
HAIR AS MODESTY

WOMENS' HAIR IN THE
NINETEENTH CENTURY
TWENTIETH CENTURY

Lucas van Leyden, Delilah Cutting Samson's Hair, 1508, engraving, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts, Harvey D. Parker Collection. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

Many meanings have become attached to hair and hair-cutting throughout the ages. It was, and is, an important symbol in a number of cultures, ancient to modern. At times these symbols are similar in different cultures; at other times they express differences in the cultures. Hair has often been seen as a symbol of life, strength, and even a surrogate for the self. The significance of haircutting has a range of meanings, from a loss of strength and power to the cherished bestowal of a lock of hair to a lover. In the Victorian era, the custom of giving a lock of hair as a love token implied a giving of one's self, the part substituting for the whole. Hair also served as a memorial in the nineteenth century, with the creation of hair jewelry, especially rings and brooches encasing strands of hair, often that of a deceased person. Possessing a cherished one's hair (of either sex) was highly prized, as can be seen in Alexander Pope's mock-heroic poem The Rape of the Lock and Aubrey Beardsley's illustrations for it. The custom of bestowing a tress is also shown in John Everett Millais's painting Only a Lock of Hair (circa 1857–1858) in the Manchester Art Gallery in England, which shows a thoughtful young lady about to cut off such a token.

In ancient times, hair was associated with the sun god as a corona radiate, or crown of sun rays. This was represented in art with Apollo identified as the sun god, with the sun's rays in the form of spikes coming out of his head, as in a second-century B.C. bust from the Temple of Mithras, now in the Church of St. Clement in Rome.

Hair was also seen as sacred, and in certain cultures (e.g., Aztec) the hair of priests could never be cut. Hair was also seen as a sign of power and strength in the Masai people of Africa, whose priests could not cut or shave their beards or they would lose their power. This same idea was manifested in biblical tradition in the story of Samson. Egyptians embarking on a journey left their hair uncut until they returned home safely, perhaps fearing that by cutting it they would lose the strength needed to complete the journey. Sometimes a vow of vengeance or another type of vow would be accompanied by not cutting one's hair until the vow was fulfilled. This custom evidently existed in Renaissance times, because the sixteenth-century Pope Julius II vowed not to cut his beard until he had reconquered papal territory. Modern-day athletes still occasionally adopt this practice.

In classical myth, Medusa and the Erinyes (or Furies) had snaky locks of hair, symbolizing, according to one authority, the baleful and frightening aspect of feminine power. Medusa, a Gorgon who was proud of her abundant tresses, was punished by Athena (or Minerva in Roman mythology), the virgin goddess of art, crafts, and war, for having been seduced by Poseidon (Neptune), god of the sea, in Athena's temple. The punishment consisted of having Medusa's hair turn into snakes.

The sight of the Medusa would turn all who looked at her into stone. Perseus, with the aid of Athena, cut off Medusa's head, and after using it to turn several enemies into stone gave it to Athena to wear on her aegis. Athena is shown with the Medusa head on her aegis in an Archaic sculpture from Herculaneum in the National Museum in Naples, Italy, among other representations. Later art changed Medusa from a fearsome monster into a beautiful and sad woman, as seen in Medusa-Rondanini, a Roman copy of an earlier Greek mask in the Glyptothek in Munich, Germany. Athena is described wearing the head as the mentor of Odysseus in Homer's Odyssey (book XIII), the origin of the modern reference to being under the aegis of one's mentor.

The Erinyes, or Furies (also called Eumenides), were born of the blood of the castrated Uranus, god of the sky, and were avengers of matricide and the rights of the mother. In Greek art, they are often shown winged with snaky locks, as in a Paestan red-figure amphora (circa 340 B.C.) in the Getty Museum in Los Angeles, California. In this amphora depicting the Death of Clytemnestra, the Erinyes look on threateningly as Orestes kills his mother to avenge his father's death. A similar red-figure amphora (circa 320 B.C.) in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, Massachusetts, shows two snaky-headed Furies above Orestes and Electra meeting at their father's grave. In this representation, Electra's hair is cut short, a sign of mourning.

In classical times, it was also the custom of girls in Troezen (the Greek city known as Argolis at that time) to offer tresses of their hair to the mythological character Hippolytus before their wedding. Youths also sheared their hair and possibly their first beards. Plutarch recounted that boys at puberty went to offer their hair to Apollo at Delphi. Before marriage, Argive women gave tresses to Athena or Artemis, the virgin goddess of childbirth and wild animals, a custom that may be traced back to Phoenician women giving locks to Astarte, a goddess of the ancient Near East.

Hair is used in an allegorical or a metaphoric sense in the phrase "to let your hair down," which means to be informal, gossipy, and so on. The custom is especially prevalent among women, following the custom of unpinning one's hair and letting it down after it is arranged for customary wear and social duties. To a man, the same gesture of letting down one's hair has a different meaning: It is seen as a gesture of sexual intimacy, as women take down their hair when they go to bed. "Putting up your hair" is a symbol that a girl is now a young woman and can no longer wear the flowing hair of childhood.

In art, Christian reference to flowing hair had several meanings. It was shown on unmarried women and female saints to denote virginity. An opposite interpretation was expressed by loose, flowing hair, which signified penitence. In Renaissance art, the penitential aspect is dramatically shown in the Donatello sculpture of a haggard, fasting Mary Magdalen (1450s) in the Baptistery Museum in Florence, Italy. Modesty is another function of long hair that appears in legends of the saints. Pietro Cavallini, in Scenes from the Life of St. Agnes, depicts Agnes's hair growing miraculously down to her feet to hide her nakedness. Haircutting in the legends of saints usually is a sign of renunciation of the world and its pleasures. This meaning is shown in Annibale Carracci's Cutting the Hair of St. Claire, in which St. Francis cuts Claire's hair before she takes orders as a nun. Similarly, the tonsure on monks signifies that they have given up worldly vanity and values.

In the Old Testament, the most dramatic reference to hair is the story of the death of King David's son, Absalom, who was in revolt against his father: "And Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth; and the mule that was under him went away" (II Samuel 18:9). Joab, the king's general, sent three darts into Absalom's heart, and Joab's ten armor bearers finished the job. David, who had said not to touch Absalom, was heartbroken, crying, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" (II Samuel 18:33). The death of Absalom is shown in Michelangelo's fresco medallions (1512–1518) in the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican and in Francesco Pesellino's Death of Absalom (mid-fifteenth century) in the Museum of Art in Le Mans, France.

In the New Testament, there are two stories about women wiping the feet of Jesus with their hair. These are often conflated into one, but they may concern two very different women, at different times in Christ's ministry, and with very different meanings and messages. The first story, told in the Gospel of Luke (7:37–50), happens near the beginning of Christ's ministry. It tells of a woman who was a sinner. Knowing that Jesus was eating in the house of Simon the Pharisee, she came with an alabaster box of ointment and stood weeping behind Jesus. She washed his feet with her tears, wiped them with her hair, and anointed them with ointment. The Pharisee thought to himself that if Jesus were truly a prophet, he would know that the woman touching him was a sinner. Jesus asked the Pharisee, if a man forgave the debts of two debtors, one owing 50 pence and one owing 500 pence, who would love him more? The Pharisee said the greater debtor. Jesus answered that the woman whose many sins were forgiven would love in proportion to the number forgiven, and then he forgave the woman for her sins, saying that her faith had saved her. The scene of the woman sinner washing Christ's feet with her tears and wiping them with her hair is shown in a number of paintings, such as Francesco Bassano the Younger's Christ in the House of the Pharisees (sixteenth century), Santi di Tito's Supper of the Pharisees (circa 1574) in the Church of SS. Annunziata in Florence, and Paolo Veronese's The Feast at the House of Simon (1573) in the Louvre in Paris.

The second reference, in the Gospel of John (11:2, 12:1–8), tells of Jesus coming to the house of Lazarus of Bethany near the end of his ministry. Lazarus's sister Mary anointed Christ's feet with a pound of the ointment of spikenard and wiped his feet with her hair. Christ's disciple Judas Iscariot, later to betray him, objected, saying that they could have sold the ointment for 300 pence and given it to the poor. Jesus answered that the woman was anointing him for burial (a reference to the Crucifixion shortly to take place) and said, "For the poor always ye have with you; but me ye have not always" (John 12:8). Here the woman is not a weeping sinner but a friend of Jesus, and the significance of her act is not forgiveness but a loving gesture of appreciation for the man soon to die, a man who had brought her brother back from the dead.

Several artists have followed a tradition of mistakenly identifying Mary of Bethany with Mary Magdalen, two totally different characters. Both Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese painted representations of Mary Magdalen Anointing the Feet of Christ (1546–1547 and sixteenth century, respectively), as did the thirteenth-century Magdalen Master in a painting in the Academia in Florence. Presumably, Mary Magdalen was a more glamorous character with better hair than Mary of Bethany, Lazarus's sister.

The hairs on one's head are referred to in the Book of Psalms as a number more than can be counted: "For innumerable evils have compassed me about: mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up; they are more than the hairs of mine head: therefore my heart faileth me" (Psalm 40:12), and similarly, "They that hate me without a cause are more than the hairs of mine head . . ." (Psalm 69:4).

St. Paul refers to the seductiveness of women's hair in I Corinthians 11:5–6 in the injunction for women praying or prophesying to cover their hair or else cut it short, implying that it is too distracting for men to see women unveiled in church. The custom of women wearing hats or veils in church harks back to this injunction.

In the Bible, cutting one's hair signifies a loss of power and strength, as in the story of Samson, or it can signify mourning and repentance: "Cut off thine hair, O Jerusalem, and cast it away, and take up a lamentation on high places; for the Lord hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath" (Jeremiah 7:29). Hair that was cut or shaved off was also a sign of disgrace, as in shaving the hair of criminals or shaving the hair of women who had consorted with Nazis during World War II.

Cut or "bobbed" hair for women was a symbol of emancipation in the 1920s and 1930s. It represented a departure from the arduous routine of caring for long hair and was a sign of equality with men.

Perhaps the greatest haircutting reference occurs in the Old Testament (Judges 13–16) in the story of Samson and Delilah. Samson's strength came from his hair, which was dedicated to God and had never been cut. The Philistine temptress Delilah finally discovered the source of Samson's power and, in the account of Judges 16:19, cut off his hair or had the Philistines shear him as he lay asleep. Lucas van Leyden shows the very moment of Delilah's snipping in his engraving Delilah Cutting Samson's Hair (sixteenth century). Here, the participants are fully dressed, whereas in some representations they are either partially dressed or nude. In this and many other representations is a strong suggestion of what a twentieth-century viewer might categorize as castration anxiety. The Philistines are waiting nearby to complete the shearing and to blind the helpless Samson.

Representations of Samson and Delilah often do not show the cutting climax, only Samson asleep in Delilah's lap, as in

Peter Paul Rubens's Samson and Delilah (1610–1613) in the National Gallery in London and in Eugène Delacroix's painting of the same subject in a private collection. The actual shearing of Samson is shown by Anthony Van Dyck, Tintoretto, Artemisia Gentileschi, and Andrea Mantegna, among others. A modern version of the scene is shown in Elihu Vedder's Samson and Delilah (circa 1886) in the National Academy of Design in New York. Here, the nude figure of Delilah, just risen from bed, with Samson sleeping beside her, passes a lock of hair to an accomplice at the door while she holds the open scissors. This rendition's message is so graphically portrayed that it certainly might arouse men's worst fears of castration and female power. In literature, the story is given its full drama in John Milton's Samson Agonistes, which emphasizes not only the guilefulness of women but also the consequences of disobedience to God.

In secular usage, the convenience of long hair is suggested in the folktale of Rapunzel. In the story, Rapunzel lets down her long hair to let her lover climb up to her room in a tower (probably a metaphor to tell us that the hair is not the only thing that is let down).

Conversely, long hair is associated with modesty and covering the body, as in Sandro Botticelli's Birth of Venus (circa 1482) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence and the story of the ride of Lady Godiva in which she rode nude, covered only with her hair, retold in a poem by Alfred, Lord Tennyson in the nineteenth century. Hair has the opposite function in its association with earthiness. For example, classical and academic nudes have no pubic hair, whereas contemporary nudes are both more realistic and hairy. In the sculpture Artist and Model, John De Andrea included real pubic hair for verisimilitude.

In popular parlance, "long hair" applied to men implies artistic, musical, or intellectual pursuits; long hair on young men may also indicate a rebellion against parental standards of neatness and conformity. This latter usage was evident in the musical Hair of the 1970s. Facial hair on men, especially the beard, has had a strong resurgence in the twentieth century. After the magnificent cultivation of the beard in the nineteenth century, especially among academics and artists, male facial hair went into a decline in the first part of the twentieth century, possibly in reaction to the almost biblical adornment of most Victorian sages and fathers. In the late 1960s and especially in the 1970s, beards made a comeback, mainly among younger men and perhaps to repudiate the clean-shaven look of their fathers. The bearded look, combined with long hair, gave many American college students and young men a look reminiscent of depictions of Christ or of their own ancestors in the Civil War era.

In the nineteenth century, women's hair was a symbol of ultimate beauty and seductiveness. This was especially evident in the works of the young English Pre-Raphaelite artists, who were once described as "hair mad." This can be seen in the symbolic use of unbound hair to represent a woman of loose morals in William Holman Hunt's The Awakening Conscience (1854) and in Spencer Stanhope's Thoughts of the Past (1859), in which a young woman clutches her unbound hair, regretting her past. The Pre-Raphaelites were criticized for their depiction of red hair in particular, as the prevailing Victorian culture pronounced it ugly. But the Pre-Raphaelite artists reveled in it, as can be seen in Dante Gabriel Rossetti's Ecce Ancilla Domini (1850), in which the young Virgin is given red hair. John Everett Millais was castigated specifically for showing Mary with red hair in his Christ in the House of His Parents when it was exhibited in 1850. One of the reasons that red hair appeared so frequently in Pre-Raphaelite paintings of the 1850s is that their favorite model, Elizabeth Siddal (who later became an artist herself and the wife of Dante Gabriel Rossetti), was endowed with glorious, rippling auburn hair. It is she who appears in William Holman Hunt's A Converted British Family Sheltering a Christian Priest (1850), John Everett Millais's Ophelia (1852), and Dante Gabriel Rossetti's Beata Beatrice (1864–1867). Red hair became a prized feature in its own right, however, appearing in the paintings of second- and third-generation Pre-Raphaelite artists such as Henry Holiday's Dante and Beatrice (1883) and John William Waterhouse's The Lady of Shalott (1888). It even appeared as late as 1926 in Frank Cadogan Cowper's La Belle Dame Sans Merci.

The entrapment element of hair also appears in Pre-Raphaelite paintings, perhaps most notably in Dante Gabriel Rossetti's oil painting Lady Lilith (1868; repainted 1872–1873) in the Delaware Art Museum. Here, the first seductress is combing her flowing, abundant hair. On the back of a watercolor rendition of the painting (1867) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, Rossetti reveals the source of his inspiration, a poem by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe:

Beware of her hair, for she excels
All women in the magic of her locks
And when she twines them around a young man's neck
She will not ever set him free again.

Another vivid example of this theme appears in Waterhouse's La Belle Dame Sans Merci (1893), which portrays John Keats's heroine literally winding her hair around the knight's neck and shoulders.

A final climax to the drama of Pre-Raphaelite hair fixation comes in William Holman Hunt's Lady of Shalott (1886–1905). The painting is dominated by the mass of the lady's wind-tossed hair as the web of her weaving breaks and the mirror shatters because she has dared to look at real life.

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the artist who represented the seductive and dangerous qualities of hair most consistently was the Norwegian painter Edvard Munch. His oil Madonna (1894–1895) shows a nude woman with swirling dark hair moving toward the viewer to fulfill what Munch considered woman's main destiny: creating another life. In his lithograph Lovers in the Waves (1896), the woman's hair fills the space, overwhelming the lover; in Separation (1896), another Munch lithograph, although the woman is turned away from the man, her hair clings to his shoulder. Munch's ultimate fear of women is shown in his woodcut Man's Head in Woman's Hair (1896), in which the disembodied head hangs in the long hair of a woman, possibly a reference to Oscar Wilde's play Salomé (1893), in which the artist becomes the beheaded John the Baptist. In another use of the theme, Munch, in a painting and a print called The Vampire (both 1893), shows a man clinging to a seated woman, his head in her lap, as her long reddish hair encircles and entwines him.

A notable and poignant twentieth-century example of hair-cutting can be found in Frida Kahlo's Self-Portrait with Cropped Hair (1940), in which the artist appears in a man's suit with closely cropped hair. Around her on the floor are her shorn locks, and above her (translated from Spanish) is the inscription "You see, if I loved you, it was for your hair—now that you've cut it off, I don't love you anymore." Here, Kahlo comments on the double bind of the woman artist: To be recognized, she must appear male, but to do this she forfeits her feminine identity and the love of men, as symbolized by her hair.

Hair as a memorial of a deceased person was used as an object of veneration in reliquaries of the saints. In the nineteenth century, hair of the deceased was woven into mourning brooches and rings. Hair has also been associated with a more primitive stage in the evolutionary process when humans were covered with hair. This is commented on by art historian H. W. Janson in Apes and Ape Lore in the Middle Ages and Renaissance (1952) and in Eugene O'Neill's play The Hairy Ape (1922).

See also Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale; Penitence/Repentance

Selected Works of Art

Hair as Snakes

- Amasis Painter, Perseus with Medusa, wine krater, 560–515 B.C., London, British Museum
- Death of Clytemnestra*, Paestan red-figure amphora, circa 340 B.C., Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- Orestes, Electra and the Furies*, red-figure amphora, circa 320 B.C., Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
- Medusa-Rondanini*, Roman copy of Greek mask, Munich, Germany, Glyptothek
- Cellini, Benvenuto, Perseus with the Head of Medusa, bronze, 1545–1554, Florence, Italy, Loggia dei Lanzi
- Caravaggio, The Head of Medusa, oil, circa 1597, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Hosmer, Harriet, Medusa, marble bust, 1853–1854, private collection

Samson and Delilah

- Lucas van Leyden, Delilah Cutting Samson's Hair, engraving, sixteenth century, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
- Rubens, Peter Paul, Samson and Delilah, oil, 1610–1613, London, National Gallery
- Rembrandt van Rijn, The Blinding of Samson, oil, 1636, Frankfurt, Germany, Städel Institut
- Vedder, Elihu, Samson and Delilah, circa 1886, New York, National Academy of Design

Absalom

- Pesellino, Francesco, Death of Absalom, oil, mid-fifteenth century, Le Mans, France, Museum of Art
- Michelangelo, Fresco Medallions, 1512–1518, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Washing and Drying Christ's Feet

- Magdalen Master, Saint Magdalen Washing Christ's Feet, thirteenth century, Florence, Italy, Academia
- Romanino, Washing the Feet, fresco, early sixteenth century, Brescia, Italy, Pinacoteca
- Bassano, Francesco, Christ in the House of the Pharisees, sixteenth century, Greenville, North Carolina, Bob Jones University Collection
- Santi di Tito, Supper of the Pharisees, circa 1574, Florence, Italy, Church of SS. Annunziata
- Tintoretto, Mary Magdalen Anointing the Feet of Christ, 1546–1547
- Veronese, Paolo, Mary Magdalen Anointing the Feet of Christ, sixteenth century, Turin, Italy, Pinacoteca
- Veronese, Paolo, The Feast at the House of Simon, 1573, Paris, Louvre

Hair as Penitence

- Donatello, Mary Magdalen, wood sculpture, 1450s, Florence, Italy, Baptistry Museum

Hair as Modesty

- Botticelli, Sandro, The Birth of Venus, oil, circa 1482, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Women's Hair in the Nineteenth Century

- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Ecce Ancilla Domini, 1850, London, Tate Gallery
- Millais, John Everett, Christ in the House of His Parents, 1850, London, Tate Gallery
- Hunt, William Holman, A Converted British Family Sheltering a Christian Priest, 1850, London, Tate Gallery
- Millais, John Everett, Ophelia, 1852, London, Tate Gallery
- Hunt, William Holman, The Awakening Conscience, 1854, London, Tate Gallery
- Millais, John Everett, Only a Lock of Hair, circa 1857–1858, Manchester, England, Manchester Art Gallery
- Stanhope, Spencer, Thoughts of the Past, 1859, London, Tate Gallery
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Beata Beatrix, 1864–1867, London, Tate Gallery
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Lady Lilith, watercolor, 1867, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Lady Lilith, oil, 1868, repainted 1872–1873, Wilmington, Delaware Art Museum
- Holiday, Henry, Dante and Beatrice, 1883, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery
- Hunt, William Holman, The Lady of Shalott, 1886–1905, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Athenaeum
- Waterhouse, John William, The Lady of Shalott, 1888, London, Tate Gallery
- Waterhouse, John William, La Belle Dame Sans Merci, 1893, Darmstadt, Germany, Hessisches Landesmuseum
- Munch, Edvard, The Vampire, oil on canvas, 1893
- Munch, Edvard, The Vampire, lithograph, 1893
- Munch, Edvard, Madonna, oil, 1894–1895, Oslo, Norway, National Gallery
- Munch, Edvard, Lovers in the Waves, lithograph, 1896
- Munch, Edvard, Separation, lithograph, 1896

- Munch, Edvard, Man's Head in Woman's Hair, woodcut, 1896
 Munch, Edvard, Man's Head in Woman's Hair, lithograph, 1896
 Munch, Edvard, Self-Portrait/Salome Paraphrase, watercolor, circa 1898, Oslo, Norway, Munch Museum

Twentieth Century

- Picasso, Pablo, The Coiffure, oil, 1906, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Sloan, John, Hairdresser's Window, oil on canvas, 1907, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Athenaeum
 Sloan, John, Women Drying Their Hair, oil on canvas, 1912, Andover, Massachusetts, Phillips Academy, Addison Gallery of American Art
 Cowper, Frank Cadogan, La Belle Dame Sans Merci, 1926, London, private collection
 Marsh, Reginald, Tatto and Haircut, tempera on canvas, 1932, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
 Robus, Hugo, Girl Washing Her Hair, marble, 1933, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Matisse, Henri, Woman Doing Her Hair, linocut, 1938
 Kahlo, Frida, Self-Portrait with Cropped Hair, oil, 1940, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Further Reading

- Bade, Patrick, Femme Fatale, London: Ash and Grand, 1979
 Carpenter, Thomas, Art and Myth in Ancient Greece, London: Thames and Hudson, 1978
 Cooper, Wendy, Hair, Sex, Society, Symbolism, London: Stein and Day, 1971
 De Zemer, Charles, Once Over Lightly: The Story of Man and His Hair, New York: 1939
 Dijkstra, Bram, Idols of Perversity: Fantasies of Feminine Evil in Fin-de-Siècle Culture, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986
 Dorson, Richard, Fashions in Hair, New York: Hastings House, 1965
 Faxon, Alicia, "Munch and the Symbolism of Hair," in Spectrum of the Fantastic, edited by Donald Palumbo, London: Greenwood, 1988
 Fishman, Diana, and Marcia Powell, Vidal Sassoon: Fifty Years Ahead, New York: Rizzoli, 1993
 Frazer, Sir James George, The Golden Bough, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1966
 Furlong, Iris, Divine Headdresses of Mesopotamia in the Early Dynastic Period, Oxford: B. A. R., 1987
Hair, a catalog of an exhibition held at the Cooper-Hewitt Museum, the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of Design, New York: Smithsonian, 1980
Hair, a catalog of an exhibition held at the John Michael Kohler Arts Center, December 6, 1992, Sheboygan, Wisconsin: John Michael Kohler Arts Center, 1993
 Heller, Reinhold, Munch: His Life and Work, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991
 Janson, Horst Woldemar, Apes and Ape Lore in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, London: Warburg Institute, 1952
 Jedding-Gesterling, Marie, editor, Hairstyles: A Cultural History of Fashions in Hair from Antiquity up to the Present Day, Hamburg, Germany: H. Schwarzkopf, 1988
 Jones, Dylan, Haircuts: Fifty Years of Styles and Cuts, New York: Thames and Hudson, 1990
 Kahn, Madlyn Millner, "Delilah," in Feminism and Art History: Questioning the Litany, edited by Norma Broude and Mary D. Garrard, New York: Harper, 1982
 Milton, John, Samson Agonistes, London, 1671, and in Complete Poetical Works, edited by Douglas Bush, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1965
 Minnicelli, Emilio, Le Construzione dell'acconciatura dell'evoluzione storica, Bologna, Italy: Ponte Nuovo, 1988
 Murthy, K. Krishna, Hair Styles in Ancient Indian Art, Delhi, India: Sundeep, 1981
 Obeyesekere, Gananath, Medusa's Hair: An Essay on Personal Symbols and Religious Experience, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981
 Palchoudhuri, Ila, Ancient Hair Styles of India, Calcutta, India: Rupa, 1974
 Pope, Alexander, The Rape of the Lock, with illustrations by Aubrey Beardsley, London: L. Smithers, 1896; New York: Dover, 1966
 Sagay, Esi, African Hairstyles: Styles of Yesterday and Today, Oxford: Heinemann Educational Books, 1983
 Vidal Sassoon: Art, Coiffure et Liberté, Paris: Plume, 1992
 Schmidt, Carolyn Woodford, Bodhisattva Headdresses and Hair Styles in the Buddhist Art of Gandhara and Related Regions of Swat and Afghanistan (Ph.D. diss., Ohio State University, 1990)
 Segraves, Daniel, Hair Length in the Bible, Hazelwood, Missouri: Word Aflame Press, 1989
The Shape of Chic: Fashions and Hairstyles in the Floating World, a catalog of an exhibition, March 16, 1986, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Art Gallery, 1986
 Williams, Charles Allyn, The German Legends of the Hairy Anchorite, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1935

HANGING

Janice McCulloch

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Hanging:

MEDIEVAL

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

NINETEENTH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Albert Bloch, Suicide, 1911, ink drawing,
Lawrence, Kansas, Collection of Anna
Francis Bloch. (Courtesy of Anna Francis Bloch)

Hanging, as it is discussed here, is limited to depictions of the human figure, generally hanged by the neck. Representations are drawn from narrative, allegorical, and criminal justice or injustice contexts. The imagery is associated most often with issues of punishment or propaganda and incorporates meanings related to law, war, suicide, and lynching. To look on the hanged figure is a brutal remembrance of death and generally evokes a response of horror. The viewer's confrontation with death is a sobering reminder of a final submission to an ultimate political or psychological power. The representation may record a brutal reality, but, surpassing that, the image carries a strong associative effect that is often designed to function as a warning or a retribution.

Greek mythology includes many stories involving a hanging. Jocasta, wife and mother of Oedipus, recognizes their relationship and rushes to her bedchamber to commit suicide. Oedipus discovers her "hanged in a noose, still swinging back and forth" (Sophocles). Ovid tells the story of Arachne, who challenged Minerva, the goddess of arts and crafts, to a weaving contest. When the young maiden's weaving skills proved equal to the skills of the goddess, Minerva was so angered that she destroyed Arachne's work and hit her. Arachne hanged herself in disgrace. Minerva repented, lifted the body from the noose, and changed Arachne into a spider, allowing her to keep her weaving skill. Apollo, the god of youth, music, prophecy, and healing, after a flute competition punished Marsyas, who also dared to challenge a deity. Marsyas was hanged (often shown upside down) and flayed. Although more commonly represented, his story as a flayed figure does not belong to the restricted definition of the hanging theme.

Throughout antiquity in Latin and Germanic Europe, capital punishment was performed outdoors so that all the gods could see. Hanging was connected with offerings to the gods, and in the Nordic tradition hanged men belonged to the one-eyed Odin, the god of the wind. Primitive cultures had sacrificial rituals in which the divine king killed himself for the benefit of his people. The ritual became symbolic, and criminals were substituted for the king (Wind, p. 243). Another form of substitution evolved in effigy hangings. Execution in effigy was recognized within the official legal framework as a doctrine of law in some areas of Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

In Christian iconography, the hanged figure also appears in the stories and martyrdom of numerous figures. Haman, the persecutor of the Jews, is represented from medieval miniatures to the seventeenth century as hanging from a tree or gallows. "So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai" (Esther 7:10). The most notorious crime, the betrayal of Christ, was followed by the remorse of Judas and his suicide by hanging. The death of Judas by hanging from a tree is depicted in Renaissance paintings, such as the fresco by Giovanni Canavesio in Notre-Dame-des-Fontaines in La Brigue, France. In this fifteenth-century work, the artist combines the two versions of Judas's death: one from the Gospel of Matthew (27:3-5) and one from Acts (1:18). The figure is both hanged and shown with "all his bowels gushed out" (Wenick, pp. 36-37).

The hanged man is enigma number 12 of the tarot. The figure, hanging upside down by one foot, dates from the fourteenth century. He is tied to a crossbar that is supported by two leafless trees.

The interpretation is that the hanged Man does not live the ordinary life of this earth, but lives in a dream of mystical idealism. Thus it is said that the hanged Man hangs from his own doctrine, to which he is attached to such an extent that his entire being hangs upon it. . . . His arms are tied together, and hold half-opened bags out of which gold coins are tumbling, this being an allegory of the spiritual treasures to be found in the being who performs this self-sacrifice. (Cirlot, pp. 138-139)

The tarot brings a new, although related, meaning to the topic and a second pose that can be found in other works that are discussed here. The inversion is a symbol of purification: It inverts the natural order. The hanged man may imply this more mystical symbolism. This may occur in works as late as Paul Cézanne's, in which possible reference is made to the tarot (Rousseau, pp. 29-35).

An allegorical interpretation of the hanging figure can be seen in the figure of Despair in Giotto's Arena Chapel frescoes in Padua, Italy. On the west end of the north wall, a female figure is represented dangling from a noose. She is linked by placement and visual parallels to the hell scene of the Last Judgment on the west wall. In hell, presided over by Satan, numerous figures are hanged by purses and other attributes of sins. Despair is paired with a winged Hope, thereby establishing, through contrast and composition, an association of gravity and downward movement with the surrender to despair. In hanging, gravity literally kills (Davis, p. 150). Images such as Giotto's indicate a popular belief that a parallel existed between temporal and eternal justice. Painters of the period borrowed from local images of public execution for representations of the hell scenes of the Last Judgment.

The gallows and a hanged criminal appear in another context in Ambrogio Lorenzetti's fresco Good Government in the Country (1337-1339) in the Palazzo Pubblico in Siena, Italy. The allegorical figure of Security holds a scaffold and a banner proclaiming, Without fear, let each man freely walk . . .

And working let everyone sow,
While such a commune

This lady will keep under her rule
Because she has removed all power from the guilty.

The proclamation is a warning, and the gallows is a visual insurance to citizens and an example to foreigners, that no one would be allowed to disturb the fragile security of the walled community.

Occasionally, images of hanged figures are found in the background of paintings by other painters of the early Italian Renaissance, such as Paolo Uccello, Domenico Veneziano, Jacopo Bellini, and Antonio Pisanello. Pisanello prepared for St. George and the Princess (circa 1433) by drawing sketches of actual hanged men. The drawings are now in the British Museum in London and the Frick Collection in New York (Edgerton, p. 150). Although they seem to refer to punishment, the sketches are interpreted by Giovanni Paccagnini as reflecting an influence of tarot cards and the French court, which inspired a new taste for the exotic among upper-class patrons. The subject is not interpreted as having as serious a meaning as the hanging subjects found in the works of Giotto or Ambrogio Lorenzetti (Edgerton, p. 150).

There is evidence that by the late Middle Ages in Europe, the meaning of the image of the hanged figure had magical associations. The implication is that a hostile action perpetrated in an image is meant literally to harm the person represented. Many humans share the belief on some level. This power is called "image magic" by anthropologists. The medieval belief held that three-dimensional effigies might have greater magical power than two-dimensional pictures. Torture performed on the image of an individual was a method of defamation. Hostility in representation would harm people by dishonoring them.

The Renaissance looked on paintings of hanged individuals as a form of punishment. In his excellent account of pittura infamante in northern Italy, Samuel Edgerton Jr. examined the importance and power of a tradition that inspired many hanging images. In Florence and Siena, the three most common forms of execution were beheading (reserved for those of high office), hanging, and burning. After the fourteenth century, "hanging remained a punishment designed for criminals of lower status or for crimes of particular repugnance" (Edgerton, p. 135). Pittura infamante were designed to function primarily as public humiliation and do not take their power from the image magic of some effigy executions. The victims of pittura infamanti were not symbolically killed but were punished by public degradation because their likenesses were seen in the act of suffering. To paint a figure on the gallows was a supreme insult, and to paint the figure upside down was a double indignity. In Florence, pittura infamanti functioned as a method of punishment for criminals who fled the city in contempt of court.

In Lives (1550), Giorgio Vasari designated Andrea del Castagno as Andrea of the Hanged Men. In 1440, an important pittura infamanti series depicted eight Albizzi traitors to Florence "in infamy and perpetual ignominy" on the Palace of the Lord Podestà (now the Bargello). Although Vasari's attribution is inaccurate, the importance of commissions for this form of public degradation is firmly established. Records also document a later commission by Lorenzo de' Medici of the traitors responsible for the killing of Giuliano de' Medici in the cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore. Lorenzo de' Medici captured and hanged the Pazzi conspirators from the Palazzo Vecchio. Then, in an unprecedented act of infamy, he dishonored the deceased through a second vengeance: Their images were also "hung," painted in 1478, on the facade of the Palace of the Captain of the People and adjacent the palace. Vasari described the paintings as "portraits of more than natural size, and hung by the feet in strange attitudes and all different and most beautiful." Reexamination of documents suggests that these images were actually painted by Sandro Botticelli (Edgerton, pp. 101–105).

A year after these original pittura infamati, the archenemy of Lorenzo was captured and hanged on December 29, 1479. Called by Lorenzo the "new Judas," his execution was recorded by Leonardo da Vinci in a pen drawing. The actual murderer of Giuliano de' Medici, Bernardo di Bandino Baroncelli, is represented with the descriptive note about Baroncelli's clothing on his portrait by Leonardo: "Small tawny cap/black satin doublet/black lined gown/lined dark blue jacket/with fox ruff and the jacket collar lined with black and red velvet/bernardo di bandino/baroncigli/black shoes."

Andrea del Sarto completed seven drawings as studies for a later commission. Drawings from 1529 to 1530, now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence and the Duke of Devonshire Collection in Chatsworth, England, may represent the end of the tradition of "defaming portraits." Edgerton suggests that the tradition may have lost its effect in part because of the aesthetic beauty of such images. The figures in varied poses, all upside down and hanging by one foot, are carefully modeled and almost graceful. The beauty of the figures obscures the purpose of insult.

The savagery of war was recorded in such brutal scenes as Urs Graf's Battlefield (1521). In the foreground, ravaged bodies of dead soldiers contrast with the explosive activity of warring combat in the distance. The bodies of two lifeless peasants dangle limply from trees before a peaceful lake on the right while a strong, well-armed soldier stands drinking from a flask on the left.

In the seventeenth century in France, Jacques Callot etched two print series on the subject of the miseries of war. An earlier series, in a smaller format, consists of six prints. The Great Miseries of War (1633) includes 18 prints and expands the subject of pillaging, plundering, and tortures. In The Great Miseries, "The Hanging" focuses directly on this subject, although hangings can be found in the backgrounds of other late works by the artist. Thematic sources for the scenes have been traced to Flemish prints, which in the seventeenth century were published as broadsheets with a similar format of image and text but generally with a more obvious propaganda function designed to inflame passions during the Thirty Years' War. Callot's series shows a more objective record of Vita del Soldato (Life of the Soldier), a title by which it was also known. It includes a distant view of a tree in the setting of an army camp with 21 hanging corpses and another man who stands on the ladder, accompanied by a priest, next in line to meet his end. The image is accompanied by the verse attributed to Michel de Marolles, Abbé de Villeloin:

Finally these ignoble and abandoned thieves, hanging from this tree like ominous fruit, show that crime (horrible and black spawn) is itself the instrument of shame and vengeance, and that it is the fate of vice-ridden men to experience the justice of Heaven sooner or later.

Separated by nearly two centuries, the visions seen by Callot and Goya must have been frighteningly similar. Francisco Goya, as a master of propaganda, often depicted forms of punishment. Goya's unforgettable images Los Desastres de la Guerra (The Ravages of War) document the Napoleonic invasions of Spain and include three etchings of hanged figures. One print shows three barren tree stumps in progression from deep space to the foreground; a limp body dangles from each. In the right foreground, a soldier looks on the hanged man with detached disregard. The power of Goya's image derives in part from the fact that a viewer is included. We are also viewers, and we are doubly repulsed, first by the sight of the corpses and then by the soldier's dispassionate observation of them.

Another dual identification occurs in the context of a capriccio by Giovanni Domenico Tiepolo. In his last years, Tiepolo represented, in a series of 104 drawings, Scenes from the Life of Pulcinella, a fool figure from the Italian comedy. This theatrical character is represented in many guises (including that of a painter), and the series includes The Hanging. Pulcinella becomes an everyman, a clown who in this scene is both the executed and the executioner. The word capriccio is traced to capricciare, which means to shudder, and when we view The Hanging, it strikes a combination of fear and ironic humor that makes "our hair stand on end" (Fehl, p. 781). However, in theatrical scripts it was said that it was impossible to hang Pulcinella. In numerous incidents, he contrived at the last moment to hang the hangman with the noose intended for him.

Separate from images of criminal justice are representations of suicide. Attitudes toward suicide are culturally established, and interpretations range from cowardly to heroic and from criminal to justified. In today's world of accessible firearms and drugs, suicide by hanging seems a cruel or especially desperate form of self-destruction. In Dante's Inferno, the Seventh Circle was for those who were "violent against themselves":

Here shall we drag them and in this mournful glade
our bodies will dangle to the end of time, each on the thorns of its tormented shade. (Inferno)

The romantic imagination was fascinated with suicide. In Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's The Sorrows of Werther, young, lovesick Werther became the model for the alienated youth who seeks refuge in death. Werther shot himself but inspired a generation. Like the rejected lover, the romantic artist's position was that of outcast and overly sensitive individual; this inspired Ludwig Ferdinand von Rayski's Suicide in the Artist's Studio (circa 1840).

In the twentieth century, suicide and a modern descendent of PUNCHINELLO, now called Pierrot, combine in the drawing Suicide (1911), by the American Albert Bloch, that was exhibited at the Second Blaue Reiter Exhibit. The clown's limp body hangs encircled by the curving lines of a bare tree. This scene of death is strangely animated, as if the grasses and "moons," the hill and the wind, felt the tragedy of this death. The lifeless Pierrot seems weightless; gravity has little power over the body as it sways gently through space. The image almost seems to recall that in Norse mythology it was essential that the body of the victim who died on the gallows swing in the wind. The hanged belonged to Odin, who himself was "hanging in the tree." Visual artists from the time of Antoine Watteau had often identified with the sensitive and otherworldly clown Pierrot. By the early twentieth century, the suicide represented by Bloch suggests that the artist had finally succumbed to escape from a cruel, unfeeling world.

The most likely source for Bloch's conception of the hanged Pierrot is from the poetry of Albert Giraud published in 1884 under the title Pierrot Lunaire. Among German poet Otto Erich Hartleben's poems is Pierrot's "Song of the Gallows." Hartleben's poems also became the text for Arnold Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire, a musical "melodrama" first performed in Berlin in 1912.

In the drawing The Hanged Man (Ecce Lex, in Behold the Law, 1854), Victor Hugo visually expressed the horror he felt having witnessed public executions. In 1828, he had published Le Dernier Jour d'un condamné, a genre noir novel. Almost 40 years later, another visual record represented a childhood memory of the Smuggler's Bridge (El Puente de los Contrabandistas, 1854):

I saw it in the Pyrenees when I was a child. The Smuggler's Bridge was terrifying. The smugglers used it as a bridge and the authorities as a scaffold. The smugglers were hanged from the beams. It still didn't stop them using it as a bridge. It was also called, "They walk above, And dance below." I'm sending you this gloomy dance. Forgive me. It is hideous, but useful. We must rub the executioners' noses in their own work. So, let us show these past horrors. (Georgel, cat. 71)

German artist Max Beckmann expressed his horror at modern man's inhumanity to man in The Night (1918–1919) and other works in which the hanged figure is one character in the drama of a world gone mad. Perhaps the most remarkable is his painting Galleria Umberto, a scene representing the death of Benito Mussolini. On April 29, 1945, Mussolini was hanged upside down by his feet from a roof on Piazzale Loreto in Milan, Italy. The event suggests the enduring power of the hanging tradition in Italian culture. Max Beckmann painted the scene, but, astonishingly, he painted it in 1925, 20 years before the actual event. Erhard Güpel recorded Beckmann's "clairvoyant" vision:

When, in 1925, he promenaded through the Galleria Umberto in Naples, he saw the flood of fascism rising, he saw carabinieri saving drowning people and a body hung upside down by ropes. He saw this in broad daylight. When Mussolini's fall was reported, he fetched the painting from the closet and showed it in his studio. He considered it a vision even before he knew that he had also foreseen the manner of the dictator's end—hanging head down. (Lackner, p. 94)

In Beckmann's painting, a figure and a crystal ball hang from the ceiling.

In England, hanging was a common form of execution. In his book Shadow of the Gallows (1954), Justin Atholl opens the text on the history of judicial hangings in the British Commonwealth with a record of the wanderings of travelers of the late sixteenth century who catch sight of a gallows and record the comfort they feel at discovering such a "proof that Christian people had been there before.” The figure hanged from the gibbet was evidence of the presence of law and order. When France preferred the guillotine during its Revolution, England retained hanging as the primary means of execution, as it was considered more humane. By the eighteenth century, hangings were a familiar aspect of English life, and the deterrent effect they were meant to have was based on their visibility. Popular prints recorded famous hangings, such as that of Earl Ferrers, “the last peer to be hanged as a felon on the gallows at Tyburn, May 5th 1760, England’s most splendid hanging.” Such a recording of the event expanded the meaning of what was, until the mid-nineteenth century, the main purpose of the execution, that is, a warning to everyone who witnessed it. Recent controversy over the televising of executions would suggest that attitudes have changed, but a traditional English hanging was a public spectacle that was considered edifying and educational—worthy of a school holiday for the moral lesson it brought to children who viewed the bad end that came to those who broke the law.

The first gallows were trees, and “The Fatal Tree” remained a cliché for the gallows long after sawn beams, usually painted black, were used to construct them. Sailors called the slipknot that was used for the rope the “knot that stops the wind” (Atholl, p. 98). By the mid-nineteenth century, Charles Dickens recorded his revulsion not only at the execution but also at the audience:

I believe that a sight so inconceivably awful as the wickedness and levity of the immense crowd collected at the execution this morning could be imagined by no man. . . . The horrors of the gibbet, and of the crime which brought the wretched murderers to it, faded in my mind before the atrocious bearing, looks and language of the assembled spectators. (The Times, 1851)

In 1868, English laws on capital punishment were changed. Hangings no longer were a matter of public presence but were performed in an execution “shed” or “chamber” at the prison.

The tradition of hanging in the United States must be seen against this background. In the United States, hanging remains a lawful although uncommon and controversial form of execution, no doubt because it is no longer seen as painless but as an especially cruel death and because it became especially associated with lynching. When the law was perceived as too slow to execute justice, mobs would take their own action and perform unauthorized, on-the-spot retribution for alleged crimes. Such punishment without legal trial, although not limited to hanging, was the most common form of “mob justice.” Lynchings, often an expression of racial prejudice, became the most horrific chapter in the history of injustices suffered by African Americans in the United States. Between 1882 and 1900, the annual number of recorded lynchings in the South never fell below 100 and reached a peak of 235 in 1892 (White). Lynch law was justified in the United States by rationalizations based on respect for the rule of the people (especially in a frontier setting) and on a belief in racial superiority. The purpose and the sensationalism surrounding lynch law were seen as deterrents to crime and warnings that African Americans remember their place.

Numerous works represent lynching as a uniquely American phenomenon. In Things American (1925), German artist Gerdt Arntz represented in pictorial symbols a lynched figure, a chorus line, and a mass-produced row of automobiles. The image can be seen as various levels of victimization in a mechanized society (Tower). Isamu Noguchi created Death (Lynched Figure), which he associated with his awareness of being an American. After Noguchi saw a photograph, he began the work, exhibited at the Marie Harriman Gallery in February 1935, to “protest man’s inhumanity to man.”

Also in February 1935, a protest exhibition, An Art Commentary on Lynching, was held in New York. Scheduled to open at the Jacques Seligmann Galleries, it was canceled because of protests. The show, sponsored by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was quickly transferred to the space offered by the Arthur U. Newton Galleries on East 57th Street. About 50 works of varied media by some 30 artists were exhibited. From February 15 to March 2, more than 2,000 saw this educational effort against lynching. Pearl S. Buck spoke at the preview. The exhibit included George Bellows’s The Law Is Too Slow, John Stuart Curry’s The Fugitive, and Reginald Marsh’s This Is Her First Lynching, which shows a mother holding her child up over the crowd to watch. Sherwood Anderson and Erskind Caldwell wrote forewords to the catalog. The World-Telegram reported that this was “an exhibition which tears the heart and chills the blood.” Thomas Hart Benton’s painting A Lynching was to have been in the show, but it was damaged and, although reproduced, was not in the exhibition (Zangrando, p. 254).

Thirty-five years later, Larry Rivers created a work for an exhibition called Some American History. The work Caucasian Woman Sprawled on a Bed and Figures of Hanged Men was to reflect on the condition of African Americans. “The idea was a blockbuster,” he stated. “It grew out of a picture I had seen showing a lynching and a lot of white guys standing around smiling. . . .” Often, African Americans were lynched for allegedly attacking white women, so when the writer James Haskins said of the figures, “I thought there would be a white chick on the reverse side,” Rivers added the reclining figure. Each hanged figure is based on a photograph, and the sketches bear inscriptions indicating the state in which the lynching occurred (Schiff, p. 111).

Leonard Baskin created a work in which the hanged man becomes everyman, or a comment on society at large. Poet Ted Hughes called The Hanged Man (1954) Baskin’s “first fully mature piece” and “the herald of everything he had done since.” The image of the hanged figure reveals an inner structure suggesting that he has been flayed. “The biggest wood engraving ever made up to that point in the history of Western art, is the portrait of a total wound—head to foot one wound” (Fern and O’Sullivan, p. 21). Beautiful and frightening, The Hanged Man becomes a microcosm of world pain.

A final contemporary work takes on added meaning in the context of this iconographic outline. Bruce Nauman’s Hanged Man (1985) is a neon work and thereby declares itself a public image. According to the artist, it is derived from the game of hangman, the childhood guessing game in which blanks for each letter of a word must be filled in before each wrong guess adds a body part to the figure. If you lose, you “hang” the man.

The “lines” flash on and off in a programmed sequence. Once the figure is complete, the whole picture starts over again . . . then I added the bit about having an erection or ejaculation when you're hanged. I really don't know if it's a myth or not. (Nauman, in Simon, p. 147)

Emotionally distanced by the stick figure and associations of play, Hanged Man still projects the frightening moment of the ultimate light and dark, the on and off of life. The moment of death confronts us again.

The consistent element in this overview of artists' representations of hanged figures is the horror one experiences looking at the subject. Even when recorded with extraordinary objectivity, the hanged man is a scene of frightening power. (And it is almost always a man who is represented. Rembrandt van Rijn's Woman Hanging to a Gibbet [before 1669] is a rare exception and perhaps is especially noted because it was far less common for a woman to be displayed on the gibbet; see Naish.) Perhaps more than any other subject, the image of the hanged man has functioned as an advertisement against itself. To identify with the figure suspended between heaven and Earth is to dangle at the precipice of the unknown. In stepping back and viewing the scene, we recognize, as Arthur Koestler did, that "the gallows is not merely a machine of death, but the oldest and most obscene symbol of that tendency in mankind which drives it towards moral self-destruction." Perhaps Andy Warhol's Electric Chair or photographs of the mushroom-shaped cloud have somewhat usurped the image of the hanged man in the contemporary imagination. Yet, the image of the hanging figure has a kinesthetic and symbolic authority that unites the opposites of the perpetual force of gravity and the infinite release from it. It represents the conviction of one's beliefs and condemnation for them.

See also Beheading / Decapitation; Death; Upside Down

Selected Works of Art

Medieval

Hanging Judas, capital, circa 1130, Autun, France, St. Lazare
Hanging Judas, west tympanum relief from Last Judgment, twelfth century, Conques, France, St. Foy

Renaissance

Giotto, Despair; Last Judgment, frescoes, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
 Lorenzetti, Ambrogio, Good Government in the Country, 1337–1339, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico
 Pisanello, Antonio, Hanged Men and Two Portraits, pen over metalpoint, circa 1433, London, British Museum
 Pisanello, Antonio, St. George and the Princess, fresco, circa 1433, Verona, Italy, Museo Civico
 Leonardo da Vinci, Barnardo di Bandino Baroncelli, pen on white paper, 1479, Bayonne, France, Léon Bonnat Museum
 Canavesio, Giovanni, Death of Judas, fresco cycle, late fifteenth century, La Brigue, France, Notre-Dame-des-Fontaines
 Huber, Wolf, Calvary, drawing, 1511, Berlin, Kupferstichkabinett
 Graf, Urs, Battlefield, pen drawing, 1521, Basel, Switzerland, Kupferstichkabinett de Affentlichen Kunstsammlung

Andrea del Sarto, Nude Youth Hanging Upside Down, drawings, 1530, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, The Magpie on the Gallows, oil on panel, 1567, Darmstadt, Germany, Landesmuseum
 Caracci, Annibale, A Hanging, circa 1599, Berkshire, England, Royal Library, Windsor Castle

Seventeenth Century

Callot, Jacques, Hangman's Tree, etching from Great Miseries of War Prints, 1633
 Rosa, Salvator, Scene of Witches, oil on canvas, circa 1646, Althorp House, collection of Earl of Spencer
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Woman Hanging to a Gibbet, pen, wash, and bistre, before 1669, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, H. O. Havemeyer Collection

Eighteenth Century

Blake, William, A Negro Hung Alive by the Ribs to a Gallows, line engraving from Narrative of a Five Years Exhibition Against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam, by Gabriel Stedman, 1792
 Tiepolo, Giovanni Domenico, The Hanging, pen, brown ink, brown wash over black chalk drawing for Scenes from the Life of Pulcinella, Palo Alto, California, Stanford University Art Museum

Nineteenth Century

Goya, Francisco, Fuerte cosa es!; Por qué?; Tampoco, etchings for Los Desastres de la Guerra (The Ravages of War), circa 1809–1813, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Rosenwald Collection
 Géricault, Théodore, Public Hanging in London, drawing, 1820–1821, Rouen, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Heath, William, Merry England, colored etching, London, British Museum
 Rayski, Ludwig Ferdinand von, Suicide in the Artist's Studio, circa 1840, Dresden, Germany, Kupferstichkabinett, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
 Hugo, Victor, The Hanged Man, drawing, 1854, Paris, Maison de Victor Hugo
 Hugo, Victor, El Puente de los Contrabandistas (Smuggler's Bridge), drawing, 1854, Paris, Maison de Victor Hugo
 Rops, Félicien, The Hanged Man, etching, circa 1865
 Cézanne, Paul, Guillaumin au Pendu, etching, summer 1873, Auvers, France
 Ensor, James, Skeletons Fighting for the Body of a Hanged Man, oil on canvas, late nineteenth century, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten

Twentieth Century

Bloch, Albert, Suicide, drawing, 1911, Lawrence, Kansas, collection of Anna Francis Bloch
 Beckmann, Max, The Night, oil on canvas, 1918–1919, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen
 Arntz, Gerdt, Things American, hand-colored woodcut, 1925, Arnhem, The Netherlands, Collection Kees Broos
 Beckmann, Max, Galleria Umberto, oil on canvas, 1925, Campione, Switzerland, Ketterer Collection

- Kollwitz, Käthe, The Last Resort, woodcut, 1925, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Heartfield, John, lithographed endpapers for Im Lande der Rekordzahlen, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Beckmann, Max, Meeting in the Night, pastel on black paper, 1928
- Guston, Philip, study for Conspirators, graphite, ink, colored pencil, and crayon on paper, 1930, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art
- Smith, André, Even A Long Rope Has Two Ends, watercolor, before 1936, private collection
- Burra, Edward, Le Bal des Pendus, watercolor and pencil, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Ripper, Rudolph von, 500,000!, etching from Ecrasez l'Infime, 1938, collection of Gert Schiff
- Carrington, Leonora, Tiburón, india ink and gouache, circa 1942, private collection
- Manzù, Giacomo, Variations on the Theme: Christ in Our Humanity, bronze panels, 1947–1957
- Noguchi, Isamu, Death (Lynched Figure), metal, wood, metal and rope armature, before 1935, collection of artist
- Baskin, Leonard, The Hanged Man, wood engraving, 1954, Lincoln, Nebraska, Sheldon Gallery; F. M. Collection of University of Nebraska-Lincoln
- Wunderlich, Paul, July 20, 1944, oil, 1954, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Busch-Reisinger Museum
- Zenil, Nahum, Suicidas, mixed media on board, private collection
- Warhol, Andy, White Burning Car II, 1963, Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany, Museum für Moderne Kunst
- Cremer, Fritz, Buchenwald, lithograph, 1964
- Segal, George, The Execution, plaster, rope, metal, and wood, 1967, Vancouver, British Columbia, The Vancouver Art Gallery
- Hirsch, Joseph, Hanging Man, pastel and ink drawing, 1968, New York, Forum Gallery
- Rattner, Abraham, They Will Not Be Forgotten, oil on canvas, from Baghdad Hangings series, 1969, Tel Aviv, Israel, Tel Aviv Museum
- Rivers, Larry, Figures of Hanged Men on Four Rectangular Boxes, 1970, Houston, Texas, Menil Foundation Collection
- Music, Zoran, Wir sin nicht die Letzten, etchings, 1970, collection of the artist
- Nauman, Bruce, Hanged Man, neon tubing, 1985, New York, Leo Castelli Collection
- Atholl, Justin, Shadow of the Gallows, London: John Long, 1954
- Cirlot, Juan Eduardo, A Dictionary of Symbols, New York: Philosophical Library, 1962
- Davis, Howard, “Gravity in the Paintings of Giotto,” in Giotto in Perspective, edited by Laurie Schneider, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1974
- Edgerton, Samuel, Jr., Pictures and Punishment: Art and Criminal Prosecution During the Florentine Renaissance, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1985
- Fehl, Philipp, “Farewell to Jokes: The Last Capricci of Giovanni Domenico Tiepolo and the Tradition of Irony in Venetian Painting,” Critical Inquiry 5:4 (1979)
- Fern, Alan, and Judith O’Sullivan, editors, The Complete Prints of Leonard Baskin: A Catalogue Raisonné 1948–1983, New York: New York Graphic Society, 1984
- Gealt, Adelheid, Domenico Tiepolo: The Punchinello Drawings, New York: George Brazillier, 1986
- Georgel, Pierre, Drawings by Victor Hugo, London: Victoria and Albert Museum, 1974
- Howard, Daniel, editor, Callot’s Etchings, New York: Dover, 1974
- Koestler, Arthur, Reflections on Hanging, New York and London: Macmillan, 1957
- Lackner, Stephen, Max Beckmann, New York: Abrams, 1977; London: Thames and Hudson, 1977
- Naish, Camille, Death Comes to the Maiden: Sex and Execution 1431–1933, London and New York: Routledge, 1991
- Paccignini, Giovanni, Pisanello, London: Phaidon Press, 1973
- Rousseau, Claudia, “Cezanne, Dr. Gachet, and the Hanged Man,” Notes in the History of Art 6:1 (Fall 1986)
- Schiff, Gert, Images of Horror and Fantasy, New York: Abrams, 1978; London: Thames and Hudson, 1978
- Simon, Joan, “Breaking the Silence: An Interview with Bruce Nauman,” Art in America 76:9 (September 1988)
- Sophocles, Three Theban Plays: Oedipus the King, translated by Theodore Howard Banks, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1956
- Tower, Beek Sell, Envisioning America, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Busch-Reisinger Museum, Harvard University, 1990
- Vasari, Giorgio, Le vite de’più eccellenti pittori scultori ed architettori, edited by Gaetano Milanesi, Florence, Italy, 1878
- Wenick, Robert, “Medieval Church Offers Dramatic Frescoes of Passion,” Smithsonian 5:1 (April 1974)
- White, Walter, Rope and Faggot, New York: Arno Press and The New York Times, 1969
- Wind, Edgar, “Criminal God,” Journal of the Warburg Institute 1 (1937)
- Zangrando, Robert, The NAACP Crusade Against Lynching, 1909–1950, Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1980

Further Reading

- Alighieri, Dante, The Inferno: Dante’s Immortal Drama of a Journey through Hell, translated by John Ciardi, New York: Mentor, 1954
- Athanassoglou-Kallmyer, Nina, “Gericault’s Severed Heads and Limbs: The Politics and Aesthetics of the Scaffold,” Art Bulletin LXXIV:4 (December 1992)

HARVESTING

Brucia Witthoft

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Harvesting:

ANCIENT

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND

EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Limbourg Brothers, June: Fenaïson (Hay Harvest), Palais, S. Chapelle de Paris, from Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, before 1415, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé. (Courtesy of Giraudon/Art Resource, New York)

Since the Neolithic revolution, the survival of human societies has depended on the annual harvest. The year became a cycle in which planting, cultivating, harvesting, and storing the fruits of the harvest defined the passage of time. Early agricultural societies must have experienced an obsessive concern with the success of the year's crop. Thus, the harvest accumulated a wealth of symbolic as well as real significance in such societies. It was a metaphor for the history of the past and future (Matthew 13:3–8), the success or failure of that past and future, and a measure of God's pleasure or anger (I Samuel 6:13). It was accompanied by festivals (Exodus 23:15–16) and feasts of thanksgiving. In more recent epochs, the harvest was depicted as an example of the romantic cult of nature and illustrated the nineteenth-century radicals' concept of the dignity of labor. In America, it symbolized the Jacksonian agrarian ideal.

Harvesters gathering grain appear in Egyptian tomb paintings, where their function is a straightforward example of magical imagery: The painted figures gathering the painted grain can feed the soul of the departed. Largely absent from classical art, except in the personification of the Greek Demeter or the Roman Ceres, the goddesses of corn and the fertility of the Earth, the harvest reappears in medieval art at an early date. The most frequent image of the harvest is the Labors of the Months, a series of relief sculptures or calendar illuminations that support the vision of God's creation as a fixed system that rotates endlessly in accordance with Genesis 8:22: "While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." The wheat harvester is typically shown cutting and bundling grain with the aid of a sickle, as in a relief quatrefoil representing July from the west facade at Amiens Cathedral in France (circa 1220). Hay is cut with the scythe in the adjacent depiction of June. All the activities of the agricultural year appear as bas-de-pages in the early fourteenth-century Luttrell Psalter; for the harvest, two women bend over to sickle the grain while a man follows them to tie it into bundles. On the next page, the sheaves are stacked, and on the third page the haywain is pulled around the corner and up the margin by three laboring horses.

Abundant biblical references gave medieval illuminators frequent opportunity to depict the harvest. The stories of Joseph and Ruth require illustrations that depict grainfields. Proverbs draws on the harvest for moral reflections, and New Testament parables paint vivid pictures for a rural medieval society. Even the story of Cain and Abel depends on the fruits of the harvest. A capital from Moutier-St. Jean depicts Cain's bundled wheat—interspersed with tares—on the altar. Harvesting as an allegorical image could be adapted to seemingly unrelated topics. A twelfth-century Speculum Virginum in the Rheinisches Landesmuseum in Bonn, Germany (one of three detached folios), depicts three stages in the harvest: cutting and gathering the wheat, carrying it to the barn (at the left is a figure reseeded the field), and tying the bundles (at the left is a man turning the earth). These scenes serve as allegories of the three honorable states of womanhood: virginity, marriage, and widowhood.

In fourteenth-century Italian and French works, the harvest scene retains its allegorical force but appears in increasingly naturalistic renditions. It partakes of the "discovery of man and nature" so aptly used to define the great social changes that characterized the transition from medieval to early modern Europe. Ambrogio Lorenzetti's frescoes Effects of Good Government in the Countryside (circa 1338) are the first extensive landscapes in postclassical art. They depict a well-ordered state that included fields of grain, stubble fields, and threshers at work. In the same room, the harvest season is also personified. A decorative roundel frames a handsome youth crowned with wheat sheaves. For the next two centuries, two modes of depiction competed: the classically inspired personification and the naturalistic landscape. Both modes appear together in the late fourteenth century in an illuminated north Italian Tacuinum, a representation of Estas (summer). The Wheat Boy stands at the left side of a field, crowned and garbed with grain, while two peasants harvest the crop at his right.

Fourteenth-century Horae gradually expanded the cycle of the months from small pictures at the bottom of the calendar to full-page illustrations. Perhaps the best known, and certainly among the most beautiful, of all harvest scenes are the months of June and July in the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, illuminated before 1415 by the Limbourg brothers. The Limbourgs drew on a number of sources, northern and Italian, especially the illuminations of Jean Pucelle and his followers, Sienese painting, and manuscripts such as the Tacuinum mentioned above. The illustration for June portrays the hay harvest. On the grounds of Berry's Hôtel de Nesle outside Paris, three men use scythes with long, straight handles to cut ripe hay. Two women in the foreground rake up the cut grass. The scythe, more labor efficient than the sickle (which requires grasping and bundling stalks in the free hand before cutting), is also more wasteful. It was employed earlier in the hayfields than in the cutting of wheat, where every grain was precious. In the same manuscript, the illustration for July depicts wheat harvesters using sickles.

Hours of Rohan (circa 1425) repeated the familiar distinction between June's hay harvest and July's wheat. The expressive artist who adapted Limbourg and others for his imagery shows a straight-handled scythe with no handgrip that is held at an angle dangerously likely to amputate the harvester's foot. The wheat harvest for July is juxtaposed with a crucifixion, emphasizing its eucharistic overtones. Other than calendar illuminations, however, harvesting seems to have held no interest for either Italian or Flemish fifteenth-century painters despite the expanding interest in landscape settings.

Although at first glance Hieronymus Bosch's Haywain (circa 1500–1505) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, appears to revive the harvest as subject, Bosch utilizes the familiar image of the harvest to present a complex allegorical scheme not closely related to the medieval cycles. The Haywain triptych represents the history of the world. Eden is depicted on the left wing, the Last Judgment on the right, and, by inference, all of human history in between. The haywain is surrounded by a diverse population, human and monstrous. Like Bosch's Garden of Earthly Delights, the imagery has been shown to draw on alchemical terminology. Its scriptural basis reflects passages such as Matthew 13:37–39: "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but tares are the children of the wicked one; the enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels."

Pieter Bruegel the Elder's harvest scenes, often discussed as late examples of the Labors of the Months or Seasons cycles, combine that tradition with illustration of biblical proverbs. Hay Harvest (circa 1565), in the National Gallery in Prague, Czech Republic, and Wheat Harvest (1565), in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, certainly correspond to the Labors for June and July. Their mimetic value—as mirrors of a real and familiar world—is as immediate today as it was 400 years ago. As depictions of agricultural practice, they are of great interest for the history of technology. Bruegel's contemporaries would have understood them in terms of both their didactic and their allegorical content. For Bruegel, the peasant, closest to the earth, represented the essence of humanity.

In Hay Harvest, the actual harvesting takes place in the middle ground. A busy road stretches across the foreground, where foot traffic moves to and fro. A huddled figure in the corner sharpens a scythe. The sinister implication this act conveys in allegories of death may well be intended. In Wheat Harvest, Bruegel accurately paints the process of cutting, gathering, and binding the grain (from left to right). He shows those who work, those who pause to eat, and the apparently exhausted laborer asleep on the ground. The image is both a depiction of a Labor and an allegory based on Proverbs 10:5: "He that gathereth in the summer is a wise son; but he that sleepeth in harvest is a son that causeth shame." It is noteworthy that wheat is cut with a scythe, the curved snath (handle) and hand-grips testifying to a more modern instrument. Apparently, the ability to cover larger areas in less time compensated for the loss of some grain.

Motifs from Bruegel's harvest scenes reappear with quite different import in later centuries. Baroque artists tended to draw on the drama of nature rather than the domesticated landscape, but in the Netherlands and Germany, Seasons series continued to be popular. One variant is isolated motifs, such as Peter Paul Rubens's appropriation of Bruegel's peasant women from Hay Harvest for use in a mythological landscape (Odysseus on the Island of the Feaci, before 1630–1635, in the Pitti Palace in Florence, Italy). Seventeenth-century Dutch painters developed their own variants on the Labors of the Months. They painted icy landscapes for January (rather than feasting or warming at the fireplace), thus localizing the subject matter and loosening ties to medieval precedent. Jan van de Velde designed a series of prints on the theme, doubtless profiting from the acquisitive collecting instinct of his bourgeois audience. His July (1616) is an extensive landscape with a group of harvesters relaxing in the foreground (Freedberg, pl. 29). Several series of drawings from the 1650s and 1660s by Allart van Everdingen (in the University of Kansas Museum of Art and other museums) illustrate the months and are sometimes labeled as such by the artist. Many of them are difficult to identify with specific months because van Everdingen chose a generalized genre scene to illustrate a canonical subject. Thus, the Kansas August (so labeled by the artist) is a boating scene, and July is represented by a huntsman in a marsh. On the other hand, July in the Brussels set (Grez Collection, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts) is a harvest scene. In the foreground, a load of loose grain is loaded on a small boat for transport. Stacks fill the field, and a hay wagon is in the distance. This is the hay harvest (the seasons being delayed a month in the northern climate). August in the same set shows wheat harvesters at work. Cornelis Dusart's July turns the harvest into a sexual comedy. A woman leans against the haystack and registers mock alarm as a young man threatens to bury her in an armload of hay.

Harvesting acquired new meanings in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries in response to the Industrial Revolution. The cult of nature, expressed in poetry by writers such as William Wordsworth and Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, celebrated a dying way of life. The sunlit field, the evocation of color and odor, and the self-sufficient yeoman all acquired a nostalgic glamour in contrast to the noise and dirt of the urban factory. English and Dutch painters turned to the harvest as a celebration of that idealized life, especially in the newly popular transparent medium of watercolor, with its immediacy and sense of transience. John Constable's Cornfield (circa 1826) in the National Gallery in London allows the viewer to peer through a gap in a wooded brookside to the fields beyond. Watercolors by Peter De Wint and John Robertson Reid in the Paul Mellon Collection and the Victoria and Albert Museum in London are among many examples showing harvesters at work or at rest.

Harvesters also become exemplars of the dignity of work and the value of labor. Jean-François Millet and Vincent van Gogh portray them as monumental figures. Millet's Buckwheat Harvest (1868–1874), in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, emphasizes the dignity and universality of the women who gather the grain and the men who thresh it. For nineteenth-century progressive thinkers, the peasants who retain ties to the natural world and fill the basic human need for food replace saints as objects of veneration. In pose and gesture, Millet's figures may echo the ancestors of Christ, prophets, and sibyls portrayed in Michelangelo's Sistine Chapel frescoes. Millet's approach reappeared, with rather less sincerity, in twentieth-century Socialist Realism.

The American variant depicts the harvest as the fruits of the agrarian democracy prevailing in the Jacksonian era and throughout most of the nineteenth century. William Sidney Mount's Farmer's Nooning (1836) is an echo of Bruegel's resting figures from Wheat Harvest. The black laborer sleeping against the haystack is an American note: Mount dispassionately chronicles racial elements in American life. The farmer's son tickles the black man's ear with a straw, a liberty he probably would not have taken with a white employee.

George Inness's Peace and Plenty (1865), in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, makes explicit the connection between the "civilized landscape" (Inness's words) controlled by human efforts and the social conditions offered as an ideal to a country newly reunited after the fighting of the Civil War. The harvest as a symbol of that fulfillment was immensely popular, appearing in Winslow Homer's wood engravings for Harper's Weekly, farm scenes printed by Currier and Ives, and many oil paintings. In none of these works is the incipient mechanization of farming even implied.

Modern farming is an industrial process. Cyrus McCormick's mechanical reaper, invented in the 1830s and mass-produced in his Chicago factory after 1847, broke the intimate bond between the harvester and the soil he worked. Today, irrigation systems cover mile-wide circles visible from airplanes, and massive combines collect the ripe grain. But the peasant-harvester appears daily in television commercials for cereals and dairy products that exploit the nostalgic ideology associated with this figure, who survives in the popular imagination as a symbol of a supposedly more natural harmony between people and nature.

See also Abundance; Death; Labor/Trades/Occupations; Months; Peasantry; Seasons

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Sennedjem and His Wife Working in the Fields of Ialu, wall painting, XIX Dynasty, Deir El Medineh, Egypt, Tomb of Sennedjem

Demeter, marble sculpture from Cnidus, circa 340–330 B.C., London, British Museum

Medieval

Speculum Virginum, one of three detached folios, twelfth century, Bonn, Germany, Rheinisches Landesmuseum
Labors of the Months, circa 1220, Amiens, France, Cathedral
Luttrell Psalter, manuscript, early fourteenth century, London, British Museum (Add.Ms. 42130)

Specchio Umano, circa 1330, Florence, Italy, Biblioteca Laurenziana

Belleville Breviary, calendar, July, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms.Lat. 10483–4)

Lorenzetti, Ambrogio, Effects of Good Government in the Countryside, circa 1338, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico

Renaissance

Limbouurg Brothers, June, July in Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, before 1415, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé

June, July, in Hours of Rohan, circa 1425, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms.Lat. 9471)

Bosch, Hieronymus, Haywain, circa 1500–1505, Madrid, Prado

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Hay Harvest, circa 1565, Prague, Czech Republic, National Gallery

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Wheat Harvest, 1565, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Velde, Jan van de, July, intaglio, 1616

Rubens, Peter Paul, Odysseus on the Island of the Feaci, before 1630–1635, Florence, Italy, Pitti Palace

Everdingen, Allart van, July, drawing, before 1675

Stubbs, George, The Reapers, 1784, private collection

Stubbs, George, The Haymakers, 1785, private collection

Nineteenth Century

Constable, John, Cornfield, circa 1826, London, National Gallery

Mount, William Sidney, Farmer's Nooning, 1836, Stoney Brook, New York, Museum

De Wint, Peter, Harvesters, watercolor, before 1849, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Mellon Collection

Herring, John Fredrick, Harvesting, 1857, oil on canvas, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University, Yale Centre for British Art

Inness, George, Peace and Plenty, 1865, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Millet, Jean-François, Buckwheat Harvest, 1868–1874, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Palmer, Fanny, and Cameron, J., Haying Time—The Last Load, lithograph, 1868, for Currier and Ives

Homer, Winslow, The Last Days of Harvest, wood engraving for Harper's Weekly, December 6, 1873

Morgan, Frederick, The Gleaners, oil on canvas, 1880, Los Angeles, California, Los Angeles Museum of Art

Twentieth Century

Spencer, Stanley, Apple Gatherers, oil on canvas, 1912–1913, London, Tate Gallery

Benton, Thomas Hart, Threshing Wheat, egg tempera and oil on canvas mounted on panel, 1938–1939, Terre-Haute, Indiana, Sheldon Swope Art Museum

Wood, Grant, Haying, 1939, private collection

Benton, Thomas Hart, July Hay, egg tempera and oil on masonite, 1943, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Benton, Thomas Hart, Wheat, oil on panel, 1967, Mr. and Mrs. James Mitchell Collection

Further Reading

Backhouse, Janet, The Luttrell Psalter, London: British Library, 1989

Cazelles, Raymond, and Johannes Rathofer, Les Très Riches Heures de Duc de Berry, Lucern, Switzerland: Verlag, 1984

Cikovsky, Nicolai, Jr., and Michael Quick, George Inness, New York: Harper, 1985

Cogliati Arano, Luisa, Tacuinum Sanitatis, Milan, Italy: Electra Editrice, 1973

- Davies, Alice I., "Allart van Everdingen's Drawings of the Twelve Months," The Register of the Museum of Art, University of Kansas 4:9 (Winter 1972)
- Dixon, Laurinda, "Bosch's Garden of Delights Triptych: Remnants of a Fossil Science," Art Bulletin LXIII:1 (March 1981)
- Freedberg, David, Dutch Landscape Prints of the Seventeenth Century, London: British Museum, 1980
- Hardie, Martin, Watercolour Painting in Britain: The Romantic Period, London: Batsford, 1967
- , Watercolour Painting in Britain: The Victorian Period, London: Batsford, 1968
- Jaffé, Michael, Catalogo Completo Rubens, translated by Germano Mulazzani, Milan, Italy: Rizzoli, 1989
- Meiss, Millard, and Marcel Thomas, The Rohan Hours: A Book of Hours, New York: G. Brazillier, 1973
- Murphy, Alexandra R., Jean-François Millet, Boston: Museum of Fine Arts, 1984
- Partsch, Susanna, Profane Buchmalerie der bürgerlichen Gesellschaft im spätmittelalterlichen Florenz Der 'Specchio Umano' des Getreidehändlers Domenico Lenzi, Worms, Germany: Werner'sche Verlagsgesellschaft, 1981
- Smith, William Stevenson, The Art and Architecture of Ancient Egypt, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1965
- Steensberg, Axel, Ancient Harvesting Implements: A Study in Archaeology and Human Geography, Copenhagen, Denmark: Nordisk Forlag, 1943
- Tolnay, Charles de, Hieronymus Bosch, New York: Reynal, 1966
- Webster, James C., The Labors of the Months in Antique and Medieval Art to the End of the Twelfth Century, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1938
- White, Lynn, Jr., Medieval Technology and Social Change, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962

HERMAPHRODITE/ ANDROGYNE

M. Ann Simmons

The following periods and styles are covered in the discussion of the theme Hermaphrodite/Androgyne:

CLASSICAL AND
NON-WESTERN

ALCHEMY, MAGIC, AND
RENAISSANCE

SYMBOLISM AND FIN-DE-SIÈCLE

SURREALISM AND
TWENTIETH CENTURY

Aubrey Beardsley, Hermaphrodite Among Roses, chapter heading, book XX, chapter ix, p. 582, from Thomas Malory, Morte D'Arthur, London, 1909. (Courtesy of the Dartmouth College Library)

Many cultures, both Eastern and Western, have explained their place in nature by means of a cosmology based on the opposition between male and female elements. This often antagonistic relationship between the passive female reproductive component and the dynamic male generative element has dominated many cultures' conceptions of nature, human relationships, and social institutions. Yet this antagonism between "fundamental" oppositions has been challenged periodically. In fact, the same cosmologies that advance the opposition between male and female often refer to a primal past in which all elements of the cosmos were united in harmony before a cataclysmic rupture split the primary matter into disparate pieces, causing universal unhappiness and strife. The artistic reconciliation of the two opposites frequently takes the form of the hermaphrodite or androgyne.

The natural hermaphrodite is a person born with both male and female reproductive organs or characteristics. In classical Greek and Roman mythology, the bisexual hermaphrodite was the offspring of Hermes, herald and messenger of the gods, and Aphrodite, goddess of erotic love (thus the name Hermaphrodite). The androgyne, the combination of the Greek roots aner (man) and gyne (woman), is a purely imaginative representation of this meshing of sexual difference.

Hermaphroditic iconography pervades any account of the origin of human life. Child psychoanalyst Melanie Klein has noted many examples of children who picture a "phallic mother" who combines masculine and feminine traits. When philosophical and religious systems try to account for the differences between men and women, they often invoke a myth of original unity preceding sexual difference. Aristophanes recounted such a tale in Plato's Symposium (ll. 189e–193a), and the Roman writer Ovid described the birth of Hermaphrodite in Metamorphosis 4 (ll. 285–388) as the union of the originally male child and the nymph Salmacis. The Berlin Hermaphrodite in the Pergamon Museum in Berlin, a Roman copy of an earlier Greek statue of 400 B.C., is the most well known and typical of the classical artistic depictions. The statue shows a slightly fleshy figure with male genitals and female breasts. The hair is elaborately styled, and the draped veil at the Hermaphrodite's side has been interpreted as a symbol of either femininity or fertility. Early Hellenistic marble plaques in the Delos Museum in Greece depict the standing Hermaphrodite, as do many Roman statues, such as one of the first century A.D. in the Palazzo Valentini in Rome. Also abundant are the Hermaphroditus anasyromenos, which are seen formally lifting the veil to reveal the erect male genitals.

Jewish and Christian traditions also allude to an original unity of man and woman: Adam was essentially two individuals in one body before Eve was created from one of Adam's ribs (Genesis 2:21–24). Unlike classical myths, the Christian themes suggest that sexuality is ultimately based on Eve's disobedience.

Sexuality is a result of the fundamental separation between individuals. The conflict between female sensuality and male spirituality underlies many images and pictorial representations of the androgyne: In an eleventh-century manuscript, the single body of Adam splits in two, as Eve, growing from his ribs, eats the apple. The devil watches their unhappiness.

In artistic representations, the androgyne usually represents not a perversion of nature but a more perfect and harmonious existence preceding sexual difference. African and Indian mythologies abound with images of hermaphroditism, invoking a universal order in which the split between the sexes is seen as an inevitable natural phenomenon but secondary to a primal union between the sexes. In Indian myth and religion, the original inseparability of the masculine and feminine elements is represented, for example, by the Ardhararishvara statues (the gods Shiva and Shakti). A typical statue of the third century A.D. shows the hermaphrodite's sexual union vertically, not horizontally, as is the Western custom: the right side of the figure is male, with erect phallus, and the right side is female, with breast and broad hips. African mythology refers to a "dream" time of a bygone past when the two sexes were harmoniously united. Numerous carved wooden statuettes show a bisexual figure with male genitals and female breasts. Many have baskets on their heads, further showing their feminine gender. The placement of the hands on the breasts is typical.

Whereas many cultures dreamt of a lost unity between male and female, the medieval practitioners of alchemy, the "science" of transformation, tried to instantiate it by combining disparate elements. The methods behind the alchemical transformation were multiple (numerology, mathematics, and so on), but their objective was the same: the union of opposites—male and female, square and circle, sun and moon, red and white, spirit and material. In alchemical iconography, the hermaphrodite symbolizes the fusion of opposites. Treatises containing etchings of androgyny in late Reformation books, such as Rosarium Philosophorum (1550) and Symbola aureae mensae dudodecium nationum by Michael Maier (1617), proliferated in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. In Symbola, a double-headed naked figure is represented with male and female genitals. The male/right side holds a large letter "Y" in his hand, which symbolizes both unity and separation in one simple element. The woman makes an ε (epsilon) with her hand, a secret sign of the adept that signifies the same unity. The figure itself imitates the separation/union literally as the two heads join to form one lower body. "Analogy of the Alchemic Microcosm to the Macrocosm" (1620) shows the entire universe as dually structured, with a masculine sun side and a feminine moon side and a hermaphrodite standing at the center of the two realms.

The earlier Renaissance painters also used symbols of androgyny to portray a perfected human personality whose external traits stemmed from inner characteristics. The standards for many idealizations of inner beauty, such as virtue and grace, were “feminine” and were transposed onto male figures. Feminized androgynes are prominent in the religious paintings of Jesus Christ (e.g., the hermaphroditic Christ-child in the wooden statue Maria mit dem Kind in einer Nische sitzend in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria, or Bernardino Luini’s feminine Christ Disputing in the National Gallery in London). The representational emphasis shifted at this time from a depiction of purely sexual difference to a more psychological one. Perugino’s Saint Magdalene in the Galleria Palatina of the Palazzo Pitti in Florence, Italy, and Raphael’s Saint Sebastian in the Accademia Carrara in Bergamo, Italy, portray psychological features usually associated with the opposite gender. Both are three-quarter side portraits with the eyes looking down and left. Mary Magdalene seems “masculine” in her self-possession and austerity, but the expression of Raphael’s Sebastian is much milder with softer facial features and long, sinuous fingers. The best examples of Leonardo da Vinci’s androgynous portraits are Mona Lisa (1503) in the Louvre in Paris (long the subject of much playful androgynous caricature, such as surrealist Marcel Duchamp’s 1919 depiction of a mustached and shaved Mona Lisa, by “L.H.O.O.Q.” 1939/1965) and Saint John the Baptist. The latter possesses a somewhat fleshy, youthful body, similar to the classical depictions of hermaphrodites. The Renaissance androgyne epitomizes a fully developed character, or a “perfected” personality, linking the creative human to the divine, as in Albrecht Dürer’s Self-Portrait (circa 1500) in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany.

The obsession with human perfectibility becomes especially evident in the much later paintings and writings of the so-called decadents and the schools and movements surrounding them. From the middle to the late nineteenth century, the artists of the avant-garde—the British Pre-Raphaelites, the French symbolists, and the German Fin-de-siècle—were preoccupied with depicting a new individual for the approaching twentieth century. For the decadent, sexuality was a means to transform one’s life into a spiritual reality; in the androgyne, sexuality was “transcended.” The Pre-Raphaelites, including Dante Gabriel Rossetti and his later followers (Simeon Solomon and Edward Coley Burne-Jones), painted beautiful, ambiguously asexual creatures who epitomized love as a spiritual exercise based on Platonic ideals. Jean Delville’s infamous Plato’s Academy (1898) in the Cabinet des Estampes of the Bibliothek Royale in Brussels, Belgium, shows a bearded Plato seated under a thorn-like tree at the center of a group of young pupils. The devotees surrounding the teacher are fully androgynous. The left group is made up of rounded figures who are clearly feminine, although male genitals are also visible; other figures embrace or are attentive to the speaking Plato. The facial features and long hair obscure real sexual identification. Male and female figures look alike, as if beauty were static.

Artists used the androgynous figure to symbolize a spiritual intellectuality removed from the sordidness and decay of the modern world. The androgyne promised a perfection that would overcome the polarity between the sexes and point to a utopian future devoid of emotion, sexuality, and women. At this time, the femme fatale was also a popular artistic motif; in spite of the promises of androgyny, the woman still was seen as the embodiment of a morbid sexuality that could corrupt the male desire for spiritual purification. Gustave Moreau and Gustav Klimt’s figures are exemplary in this regard. Other painters began to defeminize the androgyne, who takes on a boyish look. The figure becomes “sanitized” of anything but adolescent masculinity. The function of the androgynous representation again shifts from a fusion of sexual opposites to the repudiation of one: the feminine. Indeed, in the early modern period, the underlying hostility toward women and sexuality, which is one basis of the androgynous ideal, becomes evident: Women are “androgynized” into purely masculine figures. At the same time, the androgyne becomes increasingly sterile and self-reflexive. It could be any sex; self-propagating, it is beautiful but sterile. Androgyny becomes synonymous with identity, and solipsism, a self isolated from the world, becomes the new ideal of perfection.

The self-conscious use of the androgyne was perhaps carried furthest by the surrealists in the twentieth century. André Breton, Paul Eluard, and Max Ernst used the androgyne to symbolize the perfect relationship between the “fleshy” and spiritual qualities of love and art. Breton consciously reevoked Plato’s Symposium to explain the desire between the sexes and the dynamic force that produces art. Art, like a child, was the creative product of male and female elements, as represented in Thomas Cooper Gotch’s painting The Child Enthroned (circa 1894). The feminine element, vital and associated with nature and dreams, was the goal toward which the male principle strove. André Masson painted many pictures with androgynous themes, including Androgynous Hourglass and a portrait of Breton (1941) depicting him with an androgynous Janus head, one side awake and conscious and the other side sleeping and dreaming. Man Ray’s photographs of Marcel Duchamp as the fictional Rose Sélavy (1921), Paul Delvaux’s dreamscapes populated with hermaphrodites, and Jean Delville’s paintings, such as The Red City (1943–1944), combine androgyny, femininity, and artistic productivity. Yet Hans Bellmer’s Doll photomontages illustrate that the feminine aspect of androgyny was also the subject of misogynistic brutality in many surrealist depictions.

More recently, the androgyne has been visible in performance art and in literature parodying social customs, gender roles, and the limits of social acceptability. Public figures, such as performers David Bowie and Grace Jones, openly flaunt the roles of gender they are trying to subvert. Performance artists such as “Salome,” Frank Dornseif, or Sergio Sermidi in Hermaphrodite (1983–1984) believe that the hermaphroditic/androgynous image best represents not only modern art but also modern life because it alludes to many things.

The ideal of androgyny represents an impulse to clarify the differences between the sexes and to render artistically both the discord and the reconciliation between the spiritual and material worlds of experience. The androgyne points to a knowledge of human alienation, especially between the sexes, and its depiction illustrates the need to overcome this radical separation. The hermaphrodite, with its physical union of sexual characteristics, provides the basis for the androgyne, an ideal that dreams of overcoming the rupture between the sexes and that imagines a world of harmony without loss or suffering.

See also Comic; Evil Eye; Margins/Outsiders; Virgin/Virginity

Selected Works of Art

Classical and Non-Western

- Berlin Hermaphrodite*, statue, Roman copy of Greek original, 400 B.C., Berlin, Pergamon Museum
Standing Hermaphrodite, first century A.D., Roman statue, Rome, Palazzo Valentini

Alchemy, Magic, and Renaissance

- Rosarium Philosophorum*, alchemical treatise, 1550, Frankfurt, Germany
 Maier, Michael, Symbola aureae mensae dudodecium nationum, alchemical treatise, 1617, Frankfurt, Germany
 "Analogy of the Alchemic Microcosm to the Macrocosm," from Mylius, Chymica: Basilica Philosophica, 1620, Frankfurt, Germany
Maria mit dem Kind in einer Nische sitzend, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Perugino, Saint Magdalene, Florence, Italy, Galleria Palatina, Palazzo Pitti
 Raphael, Saint Sebastian, Bergamo, Italy, Accademia Carrara
 Luini, Bernardino, Christ Disputing, London, National Gallery
 Leonardo da Vinci, Mona Lisa, 1503, Paris, Louvre
 Leonardo da Vinci, Saint John the Baptist
 Dürer, Albrecht, Self-Portrait, circa 1500, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Gossaert, Jan, The Metamorphosis of Hermaphroditus and the Spring-Nymph Salmacis, 1516–1517, Rotterdam, Holland, Museum Boymans-van-Beuningen
 Peruzzi, Baldassare, Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, design for fresco, 1521–1523, Rome, Villa Madama
 Spranger, Bartholomaeus, Hermaphroditus and the Nymph Salmacis, circa 1581, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Carracci, Annibale, Salmacis and Hermaphroditus Transformed into a Single Person, engraving for Ovid's Metamorphoses, circa 1615, London, British Museum
 Goltzius, Hendrick, Salmacis and Hermaphroditus Transformed into a Single Person, from Ovid's Metamorphoses, circa 1615, engraving, London, British Museum
 Albani, Francesco, Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, before 1660, Paris, Louvre

Symbolism and Fin-de-Siècle

- Beardsley, Aubrey, Hermaphrodite Among Roses, chapter heading for Le Morte D'Arthur, 1909
 Gotch, Thomas Cooper, The Child Enthroned, circa 1894, private collection
 Delville, Jean, Plato's Academy, 1898, Brussels, Belgium, Cabinet des Estampes, Bibliothek Royale

Surrealism and Twentieth Century

- Nadelman, Elie, Hermaphrodite, bronze statuette, circa 1906, New York, Robert Schoelkopf Gallery
 Zadkine, Ossip, Hermaphroditus, bronze sculpture, 1920, Brussels, Belgium, private collection
 Höch, Hanna, The Tamer, collage on paper, 1930, Chicago, Illinois, collection of Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Bergman

- Ernst, Max, Hermaphrodite, circa 1934, private collection
 Merrild, Knud, Hermaphrodite, circa 1935, private collection
 Duchamp, Marcel, Mona Lisa, 1919, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art
 Masson, André, Androgynous Hourglass, twentieth century
 Paolini, Giulio, Hermaphroditus, photomontage with antique statue of Hermaphroditus, 1982

Further Reading

- Baumann, Hermann, Das doppelte Geschlecht: Ethnologische Studien zur Bisexualität in Ritus und Mythos, Berlin: D. Reimer, 1955
 Beguin, Albert, "L'androgynie," Minotaure 11 (1938)
 Biedermann, Hans, Handlexikon der magischen Künste, Graz, Germany: Akademische Druck, 1973
 Boenders, Franz, Une Mascarade: A propos de Ferdinand Knopff, Paris and Brussels, Belgium: Ministère de la Commune Française de Belgique, 1979
Buch der Heiligen Dreifaltigkeit: Codex Germanicus Monacensis, Munich, Germany Staatsbibliothek
 Campbell, Joseph, The Hero with a Thousand Faces, New York: Pantheon, 1949
 Chadwick, Whitney, Myth in Surrealist Painting (Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan, 1980)
 Chassé, Charles, Le mouvement symboliste dans l'art du XIXe siècle, Paris: Librairie Fleury, 1947
 Delcourt, Marie, Hermaphrodites, mythes et rites de la Bisexualité dans l'antique classique, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1958
 Delville, Jean, La mission de l'art, Brussels, Belgium: George Balat, 1900
 Dreger, Alice Domurat, "Doubtful Sex: The Fate of the Hermaphrodite in Victorian Medicine," Victorian Studies 38:3 (Spring 1995)
 Fogg Art Museum, Paintings and Drawings of the Pre-Raphaelites and Their Circle, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1946 de Givry, Grillot, Witchcraft, Magic and Alchemy, translated by J. Courtenay Locke, New York: Dover, 1971
 Griaute, Marcel, Schwarze Genesis: Ein Afrikanischer Schöpfungsbericht, Frankfurt, Germany, 1948
 Herter, Hans, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, Stuttgart, Germany: A. Hiersemann, 1959
Lexikon Iconographicum Mythologiae Classicae, Zürich, Switzerland: Artemis Verlag, 1981
 Maier, Michael, Symbola aureae mensae dudodecium nationum, Frankfurt, Germany: Anton Hummig, 1617
 Moreas, Jean, Les premières armes de l'art, Paris: L. Vanier, 1889
 Panofsky, Erwin, The Life and Art of Albrecht Durer, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1955
 Pauly, August F., Der kleine Pauly: Lexikon der Antike auf der Grundlage von Pauly's Realencyclopedia der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, Stuttgart, Germany: Druckenmüller, 1964
 Pierrot, Jean, L'imagination decadent, 1800–1900, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1977

Popham, A. E., Catalog of the Drawings of Parmigiano, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1971
 Prinz, Ursula, Sehnsuch nach Vollkommenheit, Berlin, Germany: Neuer Berliner, 1987
 Schuber, Ursula, and Kurt Schuber, Jüdische Buchkunst, Graz, Germany: Akademische Druck, 1983

Schwarz, Arturo, "Alchemy, Androgyny and the Visual Artists," Leonardo 13 (1980)
 Williams, Charles Alfred Speed, Encyclopedia of Chinese Symbolism and Art Motives, New York: Julian Press, 1960
 Wind, Edgar, Heidnische Mysterien in der Renaissance, Frankfurt, Germany: Suhrkamp, 1981

HONOR/HONORING

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following topics are covered in the discussion of the theme Honor/Honoring:

ALLEGORICAL
PERSONIFICATIONS

RELIGIOUS REPRESENTATIONS

SECULAR PORTRAITS AND COMMEMORATIVE IMAGES INCLUDING TOMBS

CLASSICAL AND MYTHOLOGICAL REPRESENTATIONS IN TRIUMPH IMAGERY

Andrea Sacchi, Marcantonio Pasqualini Crowned by Apollo, circa 1640, oil on canvas, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, Enid A. Hapt Gift, Gwynne Andrews Fund, and Purchase, 1871, by exchange, 1981. (Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York)

Honor or honoring means to regard or treat with respect, to pay homage, to live up to expectations, to fulfill the terms established, to accept and pay with gifts what is due, or to salute with a bow or deferential gesture.

Personifications of Honor allude to fame, death, time, and eternity, and many attributes are appended to them, such as trumpets, crowns of flowers, laurel, gold, palms, fronds, wings, hourglasses, skulls, skeletons, chariots, thrones, putti, festoons, trophies, banners, and festive processions. Art depicting honor or honoring consists of two kinds: religious and secular. In religious art, this theme is subdivided in two categories related to the Bible in Old Testament stories and New Testament stories (legends of saints' lives). Secular, like religious honoring, may refer to an individual (usually a humanist or ruler) or group (often in a military parade or feast celebration). The individual or group may be honored in statues, tombs, or commemorative paintings. The imagery of the triumph honoring the individual's achievement is represented in both classical and modern form and in both religious and secular scenes.

Personifications of Honor

The most significant attributes symbolizing honor and honoring are the crown, palm, scepter, books, globe, shield, victory figure, cornucopia, and riches. In emblem books, such as Andrea Alciati's Emblematum libellus cum commentariis (1531) and Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1603), the personification of Honor is depicted as a woman who wears and holds laurel crowns and represents the virtuous and honest person. The laurel is an evergreen plant, and a crown made of laurel is a symbol of nobility, immortality, and fame. The palm is a symbol of victory, as seen in Alciati's Emblemata 182, Eternal Honor from Difficult Deeds. The epigram explains the pictura (image): A work that is to endure in honor in the world for many years requires much time and labor. As the seer Calchas told the Greeks, they would besiege Troy for 10 years before they would be successful. As a test he used a dragon, which devoured a sparrow and its nine young.

Elaborating on the personification, or figurazione, of Honor, Ripa describes it as a woman robed in purple and wearing a crown. She stands holding a statue of victory in one hand and pointing to a tall obelisk behind her decorated with palm fronds and laurels and topped with a winged trumpet. At her feet a cornucopia spills out wreaths of palm, laurel, and oak leaves. On her right, a globe of the world lies near an open book with writing on its pages. Honor is the esteem and praise enjoyed by the successful person, be it for achievements in war, government, works of the mind, or great wealth. Because honor is the noblest reward one can receive from one's fellows, its personification is dressed in purple, a color reserved for royalty and the highest in the land. The crown also symbolizes greatness and lofty estate. Honor holds a statue of victory in her hand, for honor is the child of victory, deriving from it in every field of endeavor. The obelisk is the tangible evidence of honor, a monument celebrating achievement. The palm and the laurel are the plants used to make the wreaths that once were the rewards of victors. The wreaths in the cornucopia represent the plentiful rewards, tangible and visible, that honor brings. The winged trumpet atop the obelisk is the symbol of fame. The globe indicates that the greatest honor is universal and is known all over the world. The book is the record of victories and achievement that was written for posterity.

The concept of honor is associated also with the classical virtue (Latin virtus, for manliness), parallel with excellence (Greek arete), an ethical signification implying strength, courage, and excellence. An honorable individual is a virtuous person who lives in accord with certain moral standards and who acts with power, efficacy, and success.

According to Giorgio Vasari in his Lo Zibaldone (notebooks), the personification of Honor should be portrayed as a young man wearing ancient armor and holding a crown of laurel and palms. The figure of Honor in the Chamber of Fortune of the Casa Vasari in Arezzo, Italy, a fresco painted in 1548, has suffered great physical changes, and it is difficult to ascertain the figure's attributes. Honor appears to be a female crowned with laurel and holding a crown of laurel and palms. Laurel is a symbol of eternity, victory, and triumph, as well as peace and truce, because it is an evergreen. During the Roman period, victors were given a laurel crown because it was a symbol of virtue and was sacred to the vestal virgins of Rome. In antiquity, the laurel was sacred to Apollo, Dionysus, Juno, Diana, and Silvanus. Laurel also represented the nymph Daphne, who was changed into a laurel. The palm branches shared with the laurel the allusion to victory, glory, and triumph; however, during the early Christian period, the palm began to symbolize the resurrection from death, and saints and martyrs were identified with this attribute.

A basket of flowers is located next to the Vasarian figure of Honor. Perhaps this basket suggests another attribute of Honor—the cornucopia, a symbol of richness. Honor probably had a very important meaning for Vasari. The image of Honor relates to recognition in reward for a person's actions. The praise for these virtues and noble endeavors distinguishes a person (Vasari as an artist) from his peers (other contemporary artists). These awards and honors bestow on a person fame and immortality as celebrated in his house.

Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun, in Allegory of Honor (1787) in the Gemäldegalerie in Berlin, depicts a young winged cupid in a pastoral landscape dropping his bows in order to hold a crown of laurel that he has chosen. Cupid's actions allude to the preference for eternal fame and honor instead of the immediate and ephemeral pursuit of love. The specific features of this cupid may suggest a portrait of Prinz Heinrich Ludomirski, personified as Honor.

Religious Imagery of Honoring

In religious art depicting stories from the Old Testament, representations of honor focus on David. For example, Nicolas Poussin's The Triumph of David (1628–1629) in the Prado Museum in Madrid, Spain, depicts David proudly contemplating his trophy—the severed head of Goliath. The subject is an Old Testament theme from I Samuel 18:6–7: David, crowned by Victory, displays the head of Goliath. In Poussin's painting, the Victory presents him with a wreath of glory and a golden royal crown. Putti or cupids play with David's lyre; as one plays the instrument, the other is moved by its music and cries with joy. This joyous group is contrasted with the opposite side of the painting, which displays the pile of Goliath's arms and weapons around his severed head. With this compositional arrangement and iconographic implications, Poussin also makes David a symbol of peace and harmony. Although two crowns, one of gold and the other of laurel, are presented to David, he is crowned only with a wreath of laurel. The crown of gold withheld by Honor and reached for by one of the putti alludes to the fact that the golden crown will not be granted to David because of his indiscretions with Bathsheba (II Samuel 11:2–17). However, David's moral conduct did not discourage the medieval church from drawing a typological parallel between him as a prefigured Jesus Christ and Bathsheba as the church (Hall, p. 93).

Poussin completed another version of this painting in 1630, also entitled The Triumph of David. Unfinished and damaged, it is now in the Dulwich College Picture Gallery in London (Wright, pp. 166, 168). Again, Poussin illustrates a theme from the Old Testament (I Samuel 18:6–7): The head of Goliath is carried in triumph into Jerusalem by David. In the painting, David, on foot, triumphantly parades his trophy, the head of Goliath, through the main avenue of an old Jerusalem. The parade consists of trumpeters resounding hymns of glory, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands," followed by a cortege of horsemen and festive people singing and dancing. A cheering crowd has gathered along the street and inside porticos and colonnaded courtyards to greet and honor David's heroic deed. This biblical episode was seen as a prefiguration of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem.

The New Testament depiction of individual honoring can be best seen in the paintings of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem (Matthew 21:1–21; Mark 11:1–10; Luke 19:29–38; John 12:12–15). In the Passion cycle, this story is part of the first scene. It is found in early Christian art of the fourth century on sarcophagi from the Roman catacombs and in illuminated manuscripts; stained-glass windows; enameled altars such as Nicholas of Verdun's altar Entry into Jerusalem (1181) in Klosterneuburg, Austria; wall paintings such as the Entry into Jerusalem (circa 1100) by the Cassinese School in S. Angelo in Formis; the twelfth-century Entry into Jerusalem in the church of Vicq-sur-Saint-Chartier in France; and stone reliefs of Gothic cathedrals, such as the twelfth-century Entry to Jerusalem, a stone relief in the tympanum of the church at Pompiere, France. The subject became less popular in Renaissance art, but examples include Duccio di Buoninsegna's Entry into Jerusalem (1308–1311) and the back panel from his Maestà Altarpiece, now in the Cathedral Museum in Siena, Italy (Schiller, pp. 18–19).

The four Evangelists recount how Christ visited Jerusalem for the last time. Riding sidesaddle on a donkey, in the Eastern tradition rather than astride in the Roman manner, the enthroned Christ entered his beloved city in tears. In contrast, the citizens of Jerusalem greeted him with cheers and joy, spreading their garments and carrying "palm or olive branches in their hand" (apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus) and chanting, "Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest" (Matthew 21:9). The spreading of garments in the entryway is a gesture to honor the anointed king. The olive branches refer to the scene taking place on the Mount of Olives when Christ descended the mount and was praised as king by the multitude. The symbolism of the palm alludes to ancient symbols of victory as well as peace. Furthermore, this commemoration of entry continued in Christian times as a procession of palms during the festival on the Sunday before Easter, called Palm Sunday (Hall, p. 114).

The Junius Bassus sarcophagus of A.D. 359 in the Vatican represents in registry format several stories about the Bible; one of them in the center of the lower registry illustrates in a reduced manner the story of Christ's entry into Jerusalem (Malbon). The beardless Hellenistic-type Christ rides in Roman fashion (astride) on the donkey. He raises his right hand in a princely manner and holds the reins with his left while receiving two children who hold olive branches. The sarcophagus of Adelpia (A.D. 340) in Syracuse, Sicily, expands the narrative scene carved in the Junius Bassus sarcophagus by representing children spreading their garments to honor the blessing Christ, depicted here in the form of a Roman-type emperor. Some illuminated manuscripts illustrate the scene of Christ's entry into Jerusalem with more elaboration and depict a bearded Byzantine-type Christ. These include the sixth-century Codex Purpureus Rossanensis in Rossano, Italy, illuminated in Constantinople or Antioch; the Echternach Golden Gospel (circa 1020–1030) in Nuremberg, Germany; and the Winchester Cotton Psalter (circa 1050) in London. Other attributes selected in the depictions include the use of the palm as a greeting symbol in lieu of the olive branch. Numerous figures populate the scene as onlookers and as celebrants and rejoice at seeing Christ riding triumphantly while blessing his subjects.

The visual representation of the entry into Jerusalem derives from Roman ceremonial entries for emperors (adventus) (Schiller, p. 19). The Christianization of the pagan event reinforces the imperial power of Christ on Earth as well as in heaven. Christ's entry into the city represents his triumph over death won for the faithful, a redemption from sin and death, a gift of love to humanity.

In Christian iconography, Christ's victory over death became the measure by which martyrs and saints viewed themselves not only as mentors for humankind but also as followers of Christ. For humans, victory over death is related to the concept of immortality of the soul (the belief in an afterlife) and salvation with God's gift of a residence in a celestial world (paradise). One of the most significant rewards and symbols for martyrdom was the palm. In ancient times, the palm was associated with the goddess of victory, who granted a branch, frond, or palm to the conqueror; thus, the palm is an attribute of victory as well as fame. Religious triumph expanded to the representations of the four Evangelists (The Apocalyptic Beasts), the Seven Sacraments (The Triumph of the Eucharist), and saints' martyrdoms.

As a result of the Counter-Reformation, the Baroque period in the Catholic countries—Belgium, France, Italy, and Spain—was unique in the proliferation of martyrdom representations. The Roman Catholic Church encouraged artists to paint monumental scenes of religious sacrifices to immortalize holy figures and honor their martyrdom, thus creating for the viewer a spectacle of empathy and an image of fervor and emulation. Artists responded enthusiastically. Orazio Riminaldi's The Martyrdom of St. Cecilia, now in the Pitti Palace in Florence, Italy, was painted in the 1620s for the monks at Santa Maria della Rotonda in Rome. It was transferred to Pisa and installed in the Church of Santa Catherina, from which it was taken in 1697 by Ferdinand de' Medici for his collection at the Pitti Palace. St. Cecilia is a Christian saint and virgin martyr who lived in the second or third century. According to the accounts of her life, she is known as the patron saint of musicians because on her wedding day she heard the sound of musical instruments (cantatibus organis) and requested God to keep her soul and body chaste. The painting illustrates the moment of St. Cecilia's beheading. She kneels in front of her attributes—an open musical book and a stringed instrument (perhaps a type of viola) with a bow (the latter two objects form a cross). A flying angel appears from the heavens to honor her with a crown of white and red roses and a palm. The reception of these divine gifts alludes to God's reward of eternal salvation for her martyrdom.

Ludovico Gigoli's Martyrdom of St. Stephen, signed and dated "Lod Gig. F. 1597," in the Pitti Palace, was commissioned for the church of the Franciscan monastery of Santa Maria di Montedomini in Florence. St. Stephen, a protomartyr, was stoned to death after arousing anger in the Jewish legislative council in Jerusalem by pointing out a vision in the sky during his sermon: "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God" (Acts 7:56). As a painter of the Counter-Reformation, Gigoli closely follows the written account of this martyrdom. In the painting, the torture takes place in a landscape with classical ruins; an atmospheric background shows an ancient cityscape. In the foreground, an angry crowd violently stones St. Stephen because he points out the vision of the Trinity in the sky. To facilitate their cruel actions, the executioners have disrobed, leaving their garments with a witness named Saul (later known as St. Paul), seen on the lower left of the painting. As one of the seven deacons ordained by St. Peter, the young, beardless St. Stephen wears the deacon's dalmatic. Bleeding profusely from a head wound, St. Stephen, before collapsing on the ground, sees two angels with divine gifts (a palm and a golden, noble crown) and extends his hands in orant position to receive them. He knows his martyrdom has been honored by the Trinity.

In Anthony van Dyck's Mystical Marriage of St. Catherine, signed "A VAN DYCK 1630," in the Picture Gallery of Buckingham Palace in London (Wheelock, p. 224), divine authority, the Virgin, holds the honorific gift, a crown of flowers, for Catherine's martyrdom and marriage with her Son. Christ holds the saint's hand to place a ring, symbol of their celestial marriage as well as a gift of love, on her finger. Holding the attributes of her martyrdom (the spiked, broken wheel and frond), St. Catherine receives these heavenly gifts with humility. Van Dyck depicts an intimate scene, in contrast to some of his other painted versions on this theme in the Prado Museum in Madrid and the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. The legend of St. Catherine of Alexandria states that she was a saint of beauty and noble birth who lived during the third century. Her punishment of being bound to a spiked wheel came about when she converted the emperor's wife to Christianity. Miraculously, the wheel was destroyed by a lightning bolt, saving her from this ordeal; however, she was then beheaded with a sword (Ferguson, p. 66).

Bartholomaeus Spranger's St. Catherine (circa 1595–1600) in the Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz in Berlin (Bock) portrays the saint as a heroine—an icon of moral praise. The noble crown decorates her head, alluding to her honorable birth, whereas the palm and sword she holds in her right hand relate to her triumph over her martyrdom. It is not accidental that Spranger painted the sword in the shape of a cross. St. Catherine gazes at it and the palm with pride and satisfaction. She holds a book with her left hand, alluding to her Christian teaching. The spiked wheel, instrument of her martyrdom, is also on the left side of the painting, as is the book held by the saint. Spranger's intentional association alerts the viewer to the cause of her martyrdom, that is, teaching Christianity to the wife of the emperor. Other works based on this theme are Pietro Lorenzetti's St. Catherina (circa 1335) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and Paolo Veronese's The Mystic Marriage of Saint Catherine with Musical Angels (circa 1575) in the Accademia in Venice, Italy.

By contrast, Annibale Carracci's Coronation of the Virgin (1595) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York represents not an intimate scene but a celestial feast at which all the heavenly court has reunited to honor and praise the Mother of God and all Christendom. She is recognized for her numerous heroic deeds and as a chaste woman and mater dolorosa (mother of sorrow). The Virgin is glorified by the Trinity with a celestial crown, making her Regina coeli (Queen of Heaven). In the heavens, a choir of angels surrounds this most holy group, seated on clouds playing musical instruments, while on Earth people chant following the heavenly music. The theme of the Coronation of the Virgin developed in the thirteenth century in the sculptured portals of French cathedrals. In the fourteenth century it is most commonly seen in churches of monastic orders dedicated to the Virgin. Annibale Carracci's unusual depiction of this theme is focused on a heavenly celebration in a highly aesthetic coloristic manner in which the holy protagonists and musical angels are separated from the celestial and natural realms and enveloped by silver clouds (Hibbard, p. 294).

Secular Commemorative Imagery

During Roman antiquity, artists and the public were especially fond of portrait busts. This formal type survived during the Middle Ages in religious art only, especially in relics. In the classical revival of the Renaissance, however, the portrait bust was identified with civic humanism, for example, Desiderio da Settignano's bust of Niccolò da Uzzano (circa 1460) in the Bargello in Florence. The portrait of this notable figure is inspired by the death mask; like the ancient Romans, the Italians of the Renaissance commissioned such masks to be hung in their dwellings as memorials honoring the deceased. Other examples of this type include Andrea del Verrocchio's bust Lorenzo de Medici (1475), Antonio Rossellino's Matteo Palmieri (1468), Michelangelo's Brutus (1537), and Gian Marco Cavalli's Bust of Mantegna (1480), honoring the Mantuan painter.

Honor was also paid to the condottieri (mercenary captains) who victoriously defended the honor of their patrons' states. To honor these personages, equestrian statues were built in their memory, as in the case of Donatello's Equestrian Monument of Gattamelata (1445–1453) in Padua, Italy, and Andrea del Verrocchio's Equestrian Monument of Bartolommeo Colleoni del (1481–1496) in Venice. Condottieri were honored in painting as well as in sculpture, as in Paolo Uccello's Sir John Hawkwood (1436) and Andrea del Castagno's Niccolò da Tolentino (1456), both in the Cathedral in Florence.

Commemorative art can also be seen in humanistic Florentine wall tombs, such as Bernardo Rossellino's Tomb of Leonardo Bruni (circa 1445) in Santa Croce in Florence or Desiderio da Settignano's Tomb of Carlo Marsuppini (after 1453), also in Santa Croce. Leonardo Bruni was a Florentine secretary of state as well as a historian. When he died, Carlo Marsuppini replaced him. The iconography of Bruni's tomb is a combination of Roman and Christian attributes. Eagles of his victories uphold his bier while angels, posed like winged victories, hold a tablet inscribed with the lament of the Muses over his death. The realistically carved figure of Bruni holds one of his own books, and a laurel crowns his brow. Above the bier, the Madonna and Child are flanked by praying angels while at the apex of the composition winged youths hold a medallion with the lion of the Florentine Republic. The Marsuppini tomb also includes putti and angels, but it is lighter in feeling. These Florentine humanistic tombs create the prototype of commemorative art honoring a deceased humanist hero. The structure of the wall tomb is typically framed with a triumphal arch, and allegories or personifications depict the virtues of the deceased.

Representations of honoring extended to medals and coins. Enthroned spiritual and temporal rulers or coats of arms had been depicted in ancient and medieval medals and coins. These graven images were emblems of the authority responsible for the victories, or failures, of their government. As an honorific vehicle, the medal was a most creative invention of the Renaissance. The university town of Padua was ruled by Francesco II Novello da Carrara, who, after winning back his illegitimate authority, had two display coins of markedly different characters struck. These bore accurate likenesses in profile of the Paduan despot and his father. The portraits were modeled after old Roman coins, specifically the sesterces bearing profiles of the Roman emperors. Among the famous medalists of the Renaissance, Antonio Pisanello excelled, as seen in the artistry of the Medal of Alfonso V of Aragon (circa 1449) in the Bargello in Florence.

Other types of secular representations honoring famous individuals include Andrea Sacchi's painting Marcantonio Pasqualini Crowned by Apollo (circa 1640) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. This allegorical portrait with classical allusions refers to Pasqualini's triumph acknowledged by the beautiful Apollo, who crowns him with a laurel wreath. Pasqualini's triumph is in contrast to the fall of the bound and ugly satyr Marsyas, who is punished for his pride in thinking he is a better musician than Apollo. Marcantonio Pasqualini was a castrato singer in the choirs of San Luigi dei Francesi and the Sistine Chapel. He sang in many operas composed by Giulio Rospigliosi (Pope Clement IX) and performed in the Barberini theater. The painting praises Pasqualini's talents as an opera singer and musician, as he achieves supreme recognition in being crowned by the god of music, Apollo; whereas Marsyas represents the opposite: the failure of recognition. Furthermore, the portrait suggests that reward and praise come to those who foster their own talent and intellect and control their passions and vanity, unlike Marsyas in his musical contest with Apollo; therefore, virtue triumphs over vice (Harris, pp. 82–83).

Triumphal Imagery

Representations of honor or honoring are often associated with the triumph (the honoring ceremony following a victory) or the triumphator (the person being honored). Triumphal imagery in paintings and sculptures includes ceremonial processions or feasts, equestrian monuments, commemorative portraits, and funerary monuments. During Roman times, the senate honored its victorious generals, rulers, or emperors with a grand procession through the streets of Rome. Emperor Trajan, for example, was victorious in the Dacian wars. Each time he reported his success to the senate, he was honored with a procession for the victor (or triumphator), as seen in the reliefs of the Column of Trajan. The Roman triumphal procession consisted of members of the senate, followed by musicians, the spoils and trophies of war, white steers for sacrifice, prisoners, magistrates, and finally the victorious commander riding in a gilded chariot drawn by four white horses. The streets were decorated, and the procession passed beneath garlanded archways that had been specially erected for the occasion. It proceeded to the Temple of Jupiter on the Capitoline Hill, where the triumphator offered sacrifices to absolve himself from the vota (promise) he had entered into before the campaign.

Such a procession is also depicted on the Arch of Titus (A.D. 81). Emperor Titus, after the capture of Jerusalem, brings back the booty from the temple and is honored with a triumphal procession in which he, as the triumphator, rides in his quadriga. The triumphator was accompanied in the chariot by a slave or a Nike (Victory) figure whose task was to hold steady the heavy golden crown or his crown of laurel while the emperor held a scepter and an olive branch.

The triumphal procession passing through the streets remained a popular public spectacle in the Middle Ages, when the pagan celebrations were replaced by the major feast days of the church. The Renaissance assimilated the old concept of procession, expanding it into elaborate spectacles and ceremonial entries for princes and military leaders and glorification for the pagan gods, heroes, and poets of antiquity. This concept of triumph culminated in the narrative stories of Petrarch's Trionfi, in which allegorical figures of Virtues (e.g., Chastity, Fame, Love, Time, and Eternity) or Liberal Arts ride in cars or chariots with their corresponding attributes. These processions were depicted on cassoni (bridal chests). Such a cassone was made for Caterina Strozzi by Marco del Buono Giamberti and Apollonio di Giovanni di Tommaso and is pictured in a scene in Conquest of Trebizond (circa 1460), now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. Trebizond was a Greek port on the Black Sea and the last Christian stronghold in the East to fall to the Turks.

The triumph was used as a vehicle for allegory, personification, and religious and profane events, as in Andrea Mantegna's Triumph of Caesar, which honored the successes of the Gonzaga family, thus showing how the glories of ancient Rome shed their luster on the rulers of Mantua. Mantegna, influenced by ancient Roman art and especially by the reliefs of the Arch of Titus that he saw when visiting Rome in 1488, worked on the commission by Francesco Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, from 1478 to 1494. The elaborate procession consists of nine large canvasses that were originally intended as decorations for a theater or an open courtyard. Unfortunately, these canvases were badly damaged when they were moved from place to place. Purchased by Charles I of England, acting on the advice of Inigo Jones, they were transported from Mantua to Hampton Court near London. Their misfortune continued, however, as they were repainted twice, once in the seventeenth century by Louis Laguerre and again in the twentieth century, in part by Paul Nash under the direction of Roger Fry (Clark, p. 135). Presently, they are located in London, although some drawings can be seen in the Print Room of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. Mantegna's ambition was to incorporate his archaeological and antique knowledge in these works. They represent Mantegna's understanding of Roman gravitas (grandeur) and the ideals of republican Rome and Renaissance humanism. In a friezelike composition fused with foreshortening and illusionistic perspective, Mantegna alludes to an classical military procession, reconstructing a heroic vision of antiquity. He has created a pageant of victory for a Renaissance ruler, with banners, trophies, spoils, military standards, exotic animals, carts with antique statues, and soldiers on foot or riding astride on horses, all alluding to imperial power. Mantegna's sources are Appian's account of the triumph of Scipio and Seutonius's Triumph of Caesar.

Even weddings were used to celebrate triumphs. Decorations for the Medici wedding of 1589 were executed by many artists, including Giambologna, Alessandro Allori, Ludovico Cigoli, and Andrea Boscoli, to honor the political triumph of the Medici family through the marriage of the Grand Duke Ferdinando de' Medici and the French princess Christine of Lorraine (Saslow). The literature and fine arts of the Renaissance used classical myths of the triumph of the gods to parallel stories of contemporary personages. One such work is Raphael's Triumph of Galatea (1514) in the Villa Farnesina in Rome. The villa was commissioned by Agostino Chigi, a Siennese banker, to enshrine Imperia and, when she died, Andreosia, two of his celebrated courtesans. The ceiling in the Sala di Galatea reproduces the heavenly configurations of the night of December 1, 1466 (Agostino Chigi's birth date), and the ceiling panels represent his horoscope, thus surrounding him with the promises of greatness.

During the Renaissance, Mantegna's Triumph of Caesar cycle had immortalized ancient Rome. In the Baroque period, under Mantegna's influence, Peter Paul Rubens executed two splendid commemorative cycles, one of these being the cycle decoration honoring Henry IV, commissioned in 1627 by Marie de Médicis, Queen of France, now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence. The second was another collection of paintings for Marie de Médicis (1623–1625). Rubens paid homage to a female monarch and to the seventeenth-century doctrine of divine right in a splendid painted cycle for the Luxembourg Palace in Paris. Of course, this concept of monarchical apotheosis culminated at Versailles with the splendor of Louis XIV as the Sun King.

The act of honoring through mythological paintings focuses attention on gods and goddesses as well as famous people, poets, or philosophers, as in Jean-August-Dominique Ingres's Apotheosis of Homer (1827) in the Louvre in Paris. In a grandiose courtyard in front of an Ionic temple, Homer, the great ancient poet and philosopher, is rewarded with a frond, a lyre, and gifts and is crowned by Poetry. The ancient poet, seated on a throne, is surrounded by ancient and contemporary literati—poets, philosophers, and artists, including Nicolas Poussin, Ingres's artistic mentor—who pay homage to him.

In the seventeenth century, Poussin, the poet/painter/philosopher, had designed numerous images for frontispieces and paintings paying homage and crowning poetic inspiration. Claude Mellan, after Poussin, engraved the frontispiece for Horace's Works (1642). Here, in a landscape filled with laurel trees, Poetry, or the Muse of History, masks, or unmask, the humanist while a putto crowns him. Other representations by Poussin, such as Inspiration of the Epic Poet (1640) in the Louvre and Inspiration of the Lyric Poet (1640) in the Niedersächsische Landesgalerie in Hanover, Germany, attest to the significance of recognition and praise in the arts. Poussin's honorific fervor had extended to the triumphs of the pagan gods (not common in ancient art but frequently depicted in Renaissance art), mythological feasts, banquets, and bacchanals, such as the series of bacchanals executed for Cardinal Richelieu for his castle at Pauton (1634–1637). These luxurious and exuberant festivals, designed to appear as decorative tapestries, take place in aquatic fantasies or pastoral landscapes and include the Triumph of Neptune and Amphitrite in the Philadelphia Museum of Art in Pennsylvania, the Triumph of Pan in the National Gallery in London, the Triumph of Bacchus in the Nelson Gallery in Kansas City, Missouri, and the Triumph of Silenus in the National Gallery. In this last composition, the triumph of life is expressed to its fullest, with merrymaking, drinking, eating, and dancing. The passivity encountered in paintings honoring a hero, humanist, or ruler, in which the concepts of fame and immortality dominate, is nonexistent in these bacchanals. Evocation of the zest for life and the moment of joy is pursued. This type of mythological painting pays homage to life itself.

See also Apotheosis/Deification; Fame; Funeral/Burial; Grieving/Lamentation; Offering

Selected Works of Art

Allegorical Personifications

- Alciati, Andrea, Honor, engraving, from Emblemata, 1546
 Vasari, Giorgio, Honor, fresco, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
 Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, The World Pays Homage to Spain, oil on canvas, 1762, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Allegory of Honor, 1787, Berlin, Gemäldegalerie

Religious Representations

- Julius Bassus Sarcophagus, sculpture, A.D. 359, Vatican, St. Peter, Treasury Museum
 Nicholas of Verdun, Entry into Jerusalem, metalwork, altarpiece, 1181, Klosterneuburg, Austria, Stiftsmuseum
 Cassinese School, Entry into Jerusalem, wall painting, circa 1100, S. Angelo in Formis
Entry into Jerusalem, wall painting, twelfth century, Vicq-sur-Saint-Chartier, France
Entry to Jerusalem, stone relief, twelfth century, tympanum at Pompierre, France
 Duccio di Buoninsegna, Entry into Jerusalem, back panel, Maestà Altarpiece, 1308–1311, Siena, Italy, Cathedral Museum
Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, illuminated manuscript, Codex Purpureus Rossanensis, sixth century, Rossano, Italy
Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, illuminated manuscript, Echternach Golden Gospel, circa 1020–1030, Nürnberg, Germany
Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, illuminated manuscript, Winchester Cotton Psalter, circa 1050, London
 Spranger, Bartholomaeus, St. Catherine, oil on canvas, circa 1595–1600, Berlin, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz
 Riminaldi, Orazio, The Martyrdom of St. Cecilia, oil on canvas, 1620s, Florence, Italy, Pitti Palace
 Gigoli, Ludovico, Martyrdom of St. Stephen, oil on canvas, 1597, Florence, Italy, Pitti Palace
 Poussin, Nicolas, The Triumph of David, oil on canvas, 1628–1629, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Poussin, Nicolas, The Triumph of David, oil on canvas, 1630, London, Dulwich College Picture Gallery

- Van Dyck, Anthony, Mystical Marriage of St. Catherine, oil on canvas, 1630, London, Buckingham Palace Picture Gallery
 Lorenzetti, Pietro, St. Catherina, panel, circa 1335, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Veronese, Paolo, The Mystic Marriage of Saint Catherine with Musical Angels, oil on canvas, circa 1575, Venice, Italy, Accademia
 Carracci, Annibale, Coronation of the Virgin, oil on canvas, 1595, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Secular Portraits and Commemorative

Images Including Tombs

- Equestrian Statue of Marcus Aurelius*, bronze, circa A.D. 165–180, Rome, Capitoline Hill, Piazza del Campidoglio
 Uccello, Paolo, Sir John Hawkwood, fresco transferred to canvas, 1436, Florence, Italy, Cathedral
 Rossellino, Bernardo, Tomb of Leonardo Bruni, white and colored marbles, circa 1445, Florence, Italy, Santa Croce
 Donatello, Equestrian Monument of Gattamelata, bronze statue, 1445–1453, Padua, Italy, Piazza del Santo
 Pisanello, Antonio, Medal of Alfonso V of Aragon, medal, circa 1449, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Desiderio da Settignano, Tomb of Carlo Marsuppini, white and colored marbles, after 1453, Florence, Italy, Santa Croce
 Andrea del Castagno, Niccolò da Tolentino, fresco transferred to canvas, 1456, Florence, Italy, Cathedral
 Desiderio da Settignano, Niccolò da Uzzano, portrait bust, circa 1460, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Rossellino, Antonio, Matteo Palmieri, portrait bust, 1468, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Verrocchio, Andrea del, Lorenzo de Medici, portrait bust, 1475, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Verrocchio, Andrea del, completed by Alessandro Leopardi, Equestrian Monument of Bartolommeo Colleoni, bronze statue, circa 1481–1496, Venice, Italy, Campo SS. Giovanni e Paolo
 Cavalli, Gian Marco, Bust of Mantegna, 1480, Mantua, Italy, San Andrea Michelangelo, Brutus, sculpture, 1537, Florence, Italy, Bargello

Classical and Mythological Representations in Triumph Imagery

- Triumph of Titus*, relief from Arch of Titus, A.D. 80, Rome, Forum
 Apollodorus of Damascus, Column of Trajan, marble, A.D. 106–113, Rome
Arch of Constantine, A.D. 312–315, Rome
 Sacchi, Andrea, Marcantonio Pasqualini Crowned by Apollo, circa 1640, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Mantegna, Andrea, Triumph of Caesar, distemper on canvas, 1478–1494, London, Royal Collection, St. James' Palace
 Raphael, Triumph of Galatea, 1514, Rome, Villa Farnesina
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Marie de Médicis Cycle, oil on canvas, 1623–1625, Paris, Louvre

- Rubens, Peter Paul, Henry the IV Cycle, oil on canvas, 1627, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Giamberti, Marco del Buono, and Apollonio di Giovanni di Tommaso, Conquest of Trebizond, circa 1460, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Poussin, Nicolas, Inspiration of the Epic Poet, oil on canvas, 1640, Paris, Louvre
- Poussin, Nicolas, Inspiration of the Lyric Poet, oil on canvas, 1640, Hanover, Germany, Niedersächsische Landesgalerie
- Poussin, Nicolas, Triumph of Neptune and Amphitrite, oil on canvas, 1634–1637, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
- Poussin, Nicolas, Triumph of Pan, oil on canvas, 1634–1637, London, National Gallery
- Poussin, Nicolas, Triumph of Bacchus, oil on canvas, 1634–1637, Kansas City, Missouri, Nelson Gallery
- Poussin, Nicolas, Triumph of Silenus, oil on canvas, 1634–1637, London, National Gallery
- Mellon, Claude, engraving, frontispiece for Works, 1642, by Horace, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
- Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique, Apotheosis of Homer, oil on canvas, 1827, Paris, Louvre

Further Reading

- Alciati, Andrea, Emblematum libellus cum commentariis, Padua, Italy: 1531, and many other editions
- Bock, Henning, The Complete Catalogue of the Gemäldegalerie, Berlin, New York: Abrams, 1986; London: Thames and Hudson, 1986
- Cartari, Vincenzo, Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi, Venice, Italy, 1557
- Cheney, Liana, The Paintings of the Casa Vasari, New York: Garland, 1985
- Clark, Kenneth, The Art of Humanism, New York: Harper, 1983
- del Vita, Alessandro, Lo Zibaldone di Giorgio Vasari, Rome, 1938
- Ferguson, George, Signs and Symbols in Christian Art, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1966
- Friedlaender, Walter, Poussin, New York: Abrams, 1989; London: Thames and Hudson, 1989
- Hall, James, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art, rev. ed., New York: Harper, 1979
- Harris, Ann Sutherland, Andrea Sacchi, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1977
- Hibbard, Howard, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York: Harrison House, 1980
- Katzenellenbogen, Alfred, Allegories of the Virtues and Vices, New York: Harper, 1962
- Mallon, Elizabeth, The Iconography of the Sarcophagus of Janius Bassus, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990
- Mâle, Émile, L'art religieux de la fin du Moyen Âge en France, Paris, 1949
- O'Reilly, Jennifer, Studies in the Iconography of the Virtues and Vices in the Middle Ages, New York: Garland, 1988
- Piobb, P. V., Clef universelle des sciences secrètes, Paris: Library Fleury, 1950
- Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, Rome, 1603; New York: Garland, 1970
- Saslow, James, The Medici Wedding of 1589: Florentine Festival as Theatrum Mundi, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1996
- Schiller, Gertrud, Iconography of Christian Art, 2 vols., Greenwich, Connecticut: New York Graphic, 1971
- Sebastian, Santiago, Alciati Emblems, Madrid, Spain: Akal/Arte y Estetica, 1993
- Seigle, Jerrold, "Virtù in and Since the Renaissance," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Stewart, Frank Henderson, Honor, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994
- Valeriano, Piero, Hieroglyphica sive De sacris Aegyptiorum, 1521
- Wheelock, Arthur K., Jr., Anthony van Dyck, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1990
- Wright, Christopher, Poussin Paintings, London: Jupiter, 1984

HUMORS

Zirka Zaremba Filipczak

The following topics are covered in the discussion of the theme Humors:

HUMORS

CONTRAST BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN

Herman Jansz Muller, after Maarten van Heemskerck, "Cholerici" and "Phlegmatici," from Four Temperaments, from Heemskerck Album, 1566, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum. (Courtesy of Rijksmuseum-Stichting, Amsterdam, The Netherlands)

For more than two millennia Western Europeans differentiated human beings as having hot or cold, dry or wet bodies. Thinking about people in terms of their temperature and degree of wetness was part of the humoral theory that originated in classical antiquity, especially in texts attributed to Hippocrates, Aristotle, and Galen. The theory survived through the Middle Ages (stimulated by the triumph of Aristotelianism in the thirteenth century), the Renaissance, and most of the seventeenth century. Widespread acceptance of the theory did not, however, make it a common subject of art. Relatively few works illustrated humoral beliefs as directly as the series The Four Humors that Herman Jansz Muller engraved in 1566 after drawings by Maarten van Heemskerck. Nevertheless, a great many subjects and motifs (for example, the god Apollo and the nymph Daphne; river gods) can be understood better knowing what humoral ideas the artists and contemporary viewers accepted as given.

According to the theory of humors, the four elements of fire, air, water, and earth made up the whole physical world. These same elements also constituted the human body, in which they were identified as humors (black bile, red bile, phlegm, and blood). Medieval microcosm/macrocasm diagrams illustrated this idea when they paired each element with its corresponding humor. Illness resulted from the abnormal rule of a single element. Because physicians believed that blood contained each of the other humors in addition to itself, bloodletting became popular as one way of bringing the humors into proper balance. Even in a healthy body, however, one element predominated, making that person melancholic (black bile), choleric (red bile), phlegmatic (phlegm), or sanguine (blood). Of course a body's temperature and degree of wetness could not be represented directly, but they could be evoked through juxtapositions. For example, flames recur throughout the scene in the first print of van Heemskerck's series to indicate the dominance of fire in the men represented, all hot, dry choleric. Phlegmatics, cold and wet like their watery setting, appear in the next work in the series. The other two engravings in the series feature melancholics, cold and dry like the rocky earth prominent in that scene, and sanguines, hot and wet like air (the element to which van Heemskerck makes least visible reference).

What caused one element to become primary in a given person? As the looming presence of planetary gods and goddesses above their small human subjects in van Heemskerck's The Four Humors suggests, the position of the stars at the moment of birth inclined the newborn to a specific humor for life. This affected the person's intellectual and emotional as well as physical functioning, and so "temperament" served as a synonym for humor. Van Heemskerck's choleric, for example, behave far more aggressively than any other men in the series, his sanguines appear more pleasure loving, and his melancholics include men depressed to the point of suicide. Only the phlegmatics in the second print do not act lethargically. Instead, they exemplify professions considered natural for people born under the "wat'ry moon" (Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream 2:1:162) and thus fish and trap water fowl. Similarly, the choleric born under Mars, who radiates flames, include smiths working at a fiery forge. Such groupings of people under their ruling planets could easily be mistaken for "children of the seven planets," a closely related humoral subject occasionally represented after the fourteenth century (as in an anonymous fourteenth-century fresco in Padua, Italy, in the Salla della Ragione).

Although the stars set a humoral direction for life, substantial shifts took place during a person's lifetime. Shakespeare's "youth is hot and bold, age is weak and cold" (Passionate Pilgrim, 12:7) carried biological, not just metaphorical, significance. A young man tended to be sanguine, hot and wet, but as he matured his heat turned dry and he grew choleric. Dryness remained as he aged but heat diminished, inclining him to cold-dry melancholy. Finally, in advanced old age, came the influence of the least desirable humor of all, the cold, wet phlegmatic. The ages of the humans in van Heemskerck's series fit this sequence, except for the phlegmatics in the second print, who are not old. In some works, however, including the 1644 edition of Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, the "Flegmatico" has a long, white beard. Having lost his own internal heat, he wears a long robe for warmth. His passive pose also reveals his phlegmatic state.

The biological identification of aged men with cold, wet water helps explain why it became customary in classical antiquity, and then again in the Renaissance, to depict river gods as men who are old, as in Nile at the Vatican Museums and Rhône, by Jean-Baptiste Tuby, in the garden at Versailles, France. Likewise, when Roman artists symbolized the four seasons by personifications of varying ages, they used old men for winter, characterized as a cold, wet time, as in Jacopo Tintoretto's Allegory of Winter at the Carnegie Institute Museum of Art in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

Van Heemskerck's The Four Humors dates from 1566, but where would it fit along a time line of humoral illustrations? Although the theory originated in fifth-century B.C. Greece, no surviving classical art focused directly on the humors, but only on the related subjects of the elements and the seasons. Medieval manuscript illustrations of humoral themes produced up to the 1300s generally used a quadripartite format to show that the human body included all four of the elements, as was the case in an anonymous illustration in St. Bede's De temporum ratione (circa 1200). In the 1300s, however, the focus shifted to humoral imbalance. First the children of the planets became an occasional subject in the 1300s. Then in the late 1400s, after the invention of printing made humoral ideas far more readily available, artists again began occasionally depicting the four humors. Prints such as those by van Heemskerck visually conveyed humoral concepts to an unprecedentedly wide audience.

The demise of humoral theory began about a century after van Heemskerck created The Four Humors. John Donne registered this change in The Second Anniversary of the Progres of the Soule:

Have not all soules thought
For many ages, that our body is wrought
Of Ayre, and Fire, and other Elements?
And now they think of new ingredients.
(Divine Poems, V)

The “new ingredients” about which he wrote were “chymical,” part of the new, chemically oriented medicine of the mid-seventeenth century. Like most of his contemporaries, however, Donne still held to the traditional view; for him the human body remained “a little world made cunningly / Of Elements . . .”, as had been accepted for more than two millennia.

Even after the theory as a whole ceased to be accepted in Western Europe, separate parts of it remained in circulation. Identifying individuals with one of the four humors proved particularly tenacious, and as a subject lasted far into the nineteenth century. For example, Johann C. Lavater’s Physiognomische Fragmente, an influential book published in the late 1770s and reprinted through the nineteenth century, included engraved profiles representing the four humors.

Artists did not illustrate all the leading humoral ideas with equal directness. If texts and images that dealt with humoral material are compared, a major discrepancy emerges. The written sources directly and repeatedly linked dominant humor and sex. “The man is hot and dry and the woman cold and wet.” This statement by Marin Cureau in L’art de connoistre les hommes (1660) succinctly summarized an idea already accepted for more than two millennia. Texts also attributed the conventional inequalities between the sexes in status, intelligence, bravery, constancy, and capacity for action to men’s greater heat, women’s greater wetness. Yet no pictorial images drew an explicit contrast between the typical choleric man and phlegmatic woman. This absence helps explain why art historians have given other humoral ideas considerable attention but, unlike historians of science, have barely discussed the variable of sex; hence its emphasis here.

Although never explicitly illustrated, the widely shared belief in the hot dryness of men and the cold wetness of women influenced both the choice and the interpretation of a whole range of subjects and motifs. For instance, viewers understood the mythological subject of Apollo and Daphne (for example, Gian Lorenzo Bernini’s sculpture in the Borghese Gallery in Rome) in various ways, but part of its popularity undoubtedly derived from how fully it fit humoral expectations. A hot, dry male, the god of sunlight himself, and a cold, wet female, the water nymph Daphne, are the main protagonists. Since herbal knowledge was widespread, many viewers understood that when the fleeing Daphne changed into a laurel tree, henceforth a symbol of Apollo, she underwent a double metamorphosis. The laurel was not cold and wet, as Daphne had been. As George Sandys noted in his commentary on the story in Ovid’s Metamorphoses Englished (1632), “this tree is concentrated to Apollo, or the Sunne, as agreeing with his nature, being hot and dry.” In fact, the laurel was “hot and very drie, saith Galen” (John Gerard, The Herbal, 1633).

The explanation of Christian commentators for why water ruled in women and fire in men originated in the Garden of Eden. Significantly, when Hendrick de Clerck and Denis van Alsloot included personifications of the elements around Adam and Eve in their Paradise with the Four Elements, they portrayed Water as a woman and Fire as a man. All four elements had coexisted harmoniously within human bodies prior to the fall, but in disharmony thereafter. Because Eve bore the greater blame for eating the forbidden fruit, the heavy, low-ranking element of water henceforth ruled in her body and those of her female descendants, making them passive. In other words, she became cold and wet, like the fruit she holds. Assigned less blame, Adam and his male descendants became subject to fire, a higher ranking element whose dominance made them active. In paintings of Adam and Eve, as in other subjects, skin color often carried part of the humoral story. That was why “complexions” became yet another synonym for humors. “If white it argues wet” (Phineas Fletcher, The Purple Island, II:17:5). Eve’s whiter skin testifies to her phlegmatic humor, not just to women’s more domestic lives.

Already colder in the womb than a man, a woman typically remained colder even if born under the same planet as a man. Thus a male “child of Mars” would be far hotter and drier than a female. But as the first print of van Heemskerck’s series exemplifies, artists rarely included women among the “children” of the sun or Mars, both of which were consistently associated with dry heat.

Innately cold and wet, women normally gained heat from a relationship, from sexual involvement with men, or from exceptional love of God and humankind. Thus Venus, Charity, and other lustful or loving women were often pictured with a torch, a flaming heart, or some other reference to their heat. Van Heemskerck included women in The Four Humors solely as companions of the sanguine youths ruled by Venus. As Michel de Montaigne remarked in “On Some Verses of Virgil,” his contemporaries contradictorily wanted women to be “both hot and cold,” and this inconsistency is amply evident in representations of women.

Other than such situational gains in heat, a woman did not undergo the marked humoral changes standard in a man’s life. Thus when a man finally turned phlegmatic in his old age, he became what a woman had largely remained since birth. Consequently, artists could interchange images of a young woman or an old man in allegories of the elements. It made biological sense to contemporary viewers for a young man to personify fire, but for an old man—or a young woman—to personify water, as in Jacob Matham’s engraving The Four Elements, after Hendrik Goltzius.

“Why are not women bald? Because they are cold and moist, which are the causes that the hair remaineth.” This quotation comes from the Problemata, a series of brusque questions and answers misattributed to Aristotle. The text focuses on illness, but also generalizes about healthy people. Repeatedly, it describes women as wet, a condition they shared with children. New editions of this memorable publication poured from Western European presses during the sixteenth century, particularly during the first decade and then again in the 1560s and 1570s. The popularity of the Problemata may have contributed to a contemporaneous shift in iconography: beginning in the late sixteenth century, more images identified women with water. The woman-water motif took various forms.

Certain subjects changed to include water. Medieval art had placed a stable, clothed personification of Fortuna on dry land, but late sixteenth- and seventeenth-century art relocated her body, now nude and precariously balanced on a sphere, right on top of waves. That setting had only been implied in ancient Roman depictions of Fortuna standing at a rudder, as appropriated by Peter Paul Rubens in Fortuna in the Prado in Madrid, Spain. The new image of Fortuna embodied the widely shared belief that women's wetness made them inconstant. An increase in sea voyages of trade and exploration would sufficiently explain Fortuna's repositioning if, without precedent, many images at the time were not associating women with water. For example, seventeenth-century portraits often placed the woman near a fountain, and Anthony van Dyck introduced the motif of her actually touching the water.

Depictions of traditional subjects that juxtaposed woman and water, such as standing at a well or bathing in a garden or a forest, also multiplied during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Rubens, for example, depicted all the leading bathing subjects, the Old Testament's Bathsheba, the apocryphal Susanna, and classical mythology's Diana with her nymphs (already shown as a bather in Hellenistic and Roman art). Rembrandt van Rijn and his followers, however, favored the woman at a well—Rebecca and the Samaritan woman.

What makes the proliferation of bathing women—and the contemporaneous decrease in bathing men—intriguing is that these pictorial changes happened while Western Europeans virtually stopped bathing. Worry about syphilis, which led to the closing of most public baths, turned into a general dread of water. Even physicians rejected bathing with water as dangerous. "The bath, except for medical reasons when absolutely necessary, is not only superfluous, but very prejudicial to men. . . . The bath destroys the body. . . . Bathing fills the head with vapours. It is the enemy of the nerves and ligaments" (Theophraste Renaudot, Recueil général des questions, 1655). The conflicted feelings toward women manifest in the witchcraft trials, which peaked between the mid-sixteenth and the mid-seventeenth centuries, were more subtly evidenced by the rapid increase in images identifying women with water when extensive contact with water became feared.

Apprehension probably gave new meaning and greater interest to a traditional mythological subject that brought together women and water in a dramatic scene of fatal harm to a helpless man: Diana and Actaeon. It proved particularly popular around 1600 when numerous artists, including Joachim Wtewael in a painting in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, depicted how the goddess punished the young hunter because he saw her bathing. Lacking her bow, she scooped up water and splashed him. As soon as the water touched his head, Actaeon suffered a double metamorphosis. From a human he turned into a stag; from being hot he became a cold animal, devoid of the masculine bravery that his former heat had generated.

What about subjects, however, that associated water and a man with a supernatural function or origin? With such subjects as St. John baptizing, Moses or St. Peter striking a rock to produce water, or St. Hyacinth walking on water, the man controlled the water, but it did not dominate within his own body, unless he was old. By contrast, viewers knew water to be integral to the very identity of Diana, "all moist and cold" (Shakespeare, The Two Noble Kinsmen 5:3:25).

The main humoral ideas that Western Europeans accepted as givens found expression in another form of visual culture: fashionable clothing. By the early modern period clothing substantially reshaped the appearance of human bodies, in keeping with the distinctions that humoral theory made between men, women, and children. Although probably neither makers nor wearers consciously intended the clothing to convey how people's temperature and wetness varied with their sex and age, that was the result. Clothed bodies fit humoral expectations far better than undressed bodies.

"Why have women narrower breasts than men? Because there is more heat in men, which doth naturally move to the uppermost part of them, making those parts large and great . . . but in women cold predominates, which naturally tends downward." This description from the highly popular Problemata could readily be applied to early modern clothing, especially from the second half of the sixteenth century. A "downward" silhouette resulted from women's cone- or bell-shaped skirts and their flattened bodices. Conversely, hose, and then the newly fashionable pants, helped make men's "uppermost part" look "large and great." The padded and decorated codpieces in vogue during the 1500s (as shown in van Heemskerck's The Sanguine Temperament) likewise had humoral significance. They gave sartorial acknowledgment to Galen's conviction that men and women had the same genitals, but women lacked sufficient heat to externalize theirs. Accessories reinforced the message conveyed by the main silhouette. Given the watery origin of pearls, for example, the pearl necklaces, earrings, and bracelets that women wore in such profusion, especially in the 1600s, only strengthened their own identification with water.

Even children's dress changed in keeping with humoral beliefs. Starting around the mid-sixteenth century, little boys as well as girls began to wear floor-length dresses, which made them all look like women. This new fashion fit the established humoral view that little boys as well as girls were wet and, some argued, cold like women. Old men wore long gowns for practical reasons. Nevertheless, their costume again increased their resemblance to women, an appropriate change given their growing coldness and, eventually, wetness. Women's basic silhouette did not change much between childhood and old age, however, a visual parallel for their general lack of humoral development.

With the eighteenth century, only particular humoral notions continued to be accepted, but not the theory as a whole. Nevertheless, the silhouettes of men's, women's, and children's clothing retained many of the shapes developed when fashion and humoral theory had visibly intersected.

See also Bath/Bathing; Melancholy; Metamorphosis; Seasons

Selected Works of Art

Humors

Mundus, Annus, Homo, manuscript illumination, De natura rerum, eighth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. lat. 6413, fol. 5v)

Man and the Four Elements, manuscript illumination, De temporum ratione, circa 1200, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Nationalbibliothek (Ms. 12600, fol. 29r)

Four Temperaments, manuscript illumination, first half of fifteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. nouv.acq. Fr. 337)

Four Humors, woodcut, Augsburg Calendar, circa 1480, Zürich, Germany, Zentralbibliothek

Muller, Herman Jansz, after Maarten van Heemskerck, The Four Temperaments, engraved series, 1566, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Jegher, Jan Christoffel, De Vier Complexien, woodcuts, 1603, Rome

Gheyn, Jacob, I de, after Hendrik Goltzius, Lute Player Representing Sanguine Temperament; Soldier Representing Choleric Temperament; Saturn Representing Melancholic Temperament; Old Fisherman Representing Phlegmatic Temperament, engravings

Mola, Pier Francesco, The Phlegmatic Temperament, Venice, private collection

Four Humors, sculpture, Versailles, France, Gardens at Versailles

Contrast Between Men and Women

Clerck, Hendrick de, and Denis van Alsloot, Paradise with the Four Elements, Schleissheim, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Further Reading

Allen, Prudence, The Concept of Woman: The Aristotelian Revolution 750 B.C.–A.D. 1250, London: Macmillan, 1985

Babb, Lawrence, The Elizabethan Malady: A Study of Melancholia in English Literature from 1580–1642, East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1951

Colantuono, Anthony, "Dies Alcyoniz: The Invention of Bellini's Feast of the Gods," Art Bulletin 73 (June 1991)

Dixon, Laurinda, Perilous Chastity: Women and Illness in Pre-Enlightenment Art and Medicine, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1995

Draper, John, The Humors and Shakespeare's Characters, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1945

Klibansky, Raymond, Erwin Panofsky, and Fritz Saxl, Saturn and Melancholy, London: Macmillan, 1964

Macleane, Ian, The Renaissance Notion of Woman: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual Life, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1980

Murdoch, John, Album of Science, Antiquity and the Middle Ages, New York: Rizzoli, 1984; London: Macmillan, 1984

Panofsky, Erwin, The Life and Art of Albrecht Dürer, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1955

Schiebinger, Londa, The Mind Has No Sex?, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and London: Harvard University Press, 1989

Seznec, Jean, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, New York: Harper, 1953

Veldman, Ilja M., "Seasons, Planets and Temperaments in the Work of Maarten van Heemskerck: Cosmo-Astrological Allegory in Sixteenth Century Netherlandish Prints," Simiolus 2 (1980)

HUNTING/HUNTER/HUNTRESS

Sarah S. Gibson

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Hunting/Hunter/Huntress:

PREHISTORIC CAVE
PAINTINGS

ANCIENT CLASSICAL

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

LE JARDINIER ET SON SEIGNEUR. 2^e planche. Fable LXIV.

Jean-Baptiste Oudry, "Le Jardinier et son Seigneur," engraving, from Jean de La Fontaine, Fables Choisies (Paris, Desaint & Saillant, et Durand, 1755–1759), second plate, fable 4 of book 4 in volume 2, labeled fable 64. (Courtesy of the Sterling and Francine Clark Institute)

Hunting, or the chase for wild animals for food or sport, has existed as a primary subject in the visual arts since the Paleolithic Age. For these early hunters, life revolved around the pursuit of game. Representations of the chase and prey cover the walls of caves and are incised on rocks throughout southwestern Europe and North Africa. The exploits of great hunters and huntresses fill the realms of mythology and religious symbolism. What had occupied entire cultural groups gradually became the privilege of an upper stratum of society, with an emphasis on the individual prowess and courage of individual hunters. Display of the accoutrements of the hunt reflected the chase becoming sport. Even in the modern world, the hunting motif retains the power to evoke the image of an outdoor world far removed from daily urban reality.

In the powerful animal images of the great Franco-Cantabrian caves of the Paleolithic Age, such as Altamira in Spain and Lascaux in France, we sense the all-pervading obsession of early hunters with their prey. Still, we do not know whether these images represent purely artistic impulses, aids to magical rites, or both. The ultimate intention of the rock art in Africa is equally obscure.

Many millennia later, however, Egyptian and Mesopotamian art showed two strands that are more familiar and that would persist for many centuries. The hunt and the hunter are depicted as metaphors of royal power. Primarily in Egypt, hunting is also frequently shown as a sport enjoyed by the upper classes in general. The theme is depicted in many Egyptian tomb paintings and reliefs and involves a wide variety of animals. An example from the Old Kingdom is the hippopotamus hunt, a relief from the tomb of Ti, in which harpoon-wielding men in reed boats pursue the animal through the papyrus marshes. In a realistic, spontaneous scene from the tomb of User-het at Thebes (mid-Eighteenth Dynasty), the royal scribe had himself depicted (imitating his pharaoh, Amenhotep II) in a chariot pursuing a fleeing host of antelopes and hyenas as well as a hare and a fox. A fowling scene from the tomb of Nakht, another scribe of Thebes, dated to the reign of Thutmose IV (mid-Eighteenth Dynasty), depicts the dead man hunting birds and harpooning fish. The implication is that these men will spend part of their afterlife in these pleasant pursuits.

A different emphasis appears in the well-known scene from Ashurbanipal's palace at Nineveh, the ancient capital of Assyria (now in Iraq), in the British Museum in London. The king's chase for lions and wild asses demonstrates his personal skill, courage, and power over all the beasts of the Earth, thus making him worthy to rule over his human subjects. The unforgettable image of the mortally wounded lion, blood pouring from arrow wounds and streaming from its mouth, yet still defiant, is the ultimate tribute to the king's prowess. Other Assyrian, Babylonian, and Hittite portrayals of hunting and hawking make clear that these occupations are the privilege of the ruling classes, an emphasis that will be found in European art as well.

Hunting for pleasure does not occur in the Bible. In fact, only two biblical figures—Nimrod (Genesis 10:9) and Esau (Genesis 25:27–31)—are identified as hunters in the Old Testament, and hunting is incidental to their other, more important activities. Only Esau is portrayed with any reference to his hunting abilities. Esau, the first-born of Isaac and Rebecca and older twin of Jacob, is described as a skillful hunter who prepared savory dishes for his father with the meat obtained by his prowess. Returning weak with hunger from one of his forays, he agreed to surrender his right of primogeniture to his brother Jacob in return for bread and lentil soup.

Although it was not an especially popular subject, there is a painted chimney fireplace decoration, Hunt of Esau (1555–1560), at the Château d'Ecouen in Val d'Oise, France, in which the young hunter is displayed against a landscape. Somewhat later, the sale of the birthright formed a popular subject in seventeenth-century Dutch painting. Hendrik Terbrugghen painted at least two versions around 1627, one of which is now in Berlin and the other in the Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection in Madrid, Spain. Esau is accompanied by his hunting dogs and holds a dead animal.

Similarly, the Greeks and Romans regarded hunting as a sport as well as a school for war. Additionally, they developed a rich mythology of gods, heroes, and heroines who were mighty hunters and huntresses. Innumerable representations of mythological hunts decorate Roman sarcophagi. All these myths pervaded Western culture, although their popularity varied through time.

Among the most frequently portrayed myths was the hunt for the Calydonian boar, a savage animal killed in a great hunt organized by Meleager, a son of Oeneus, king of Calydon, in which the huntress Atalanta participated. The rampaging boar had been turned loose by the goddess Artemis (Roman Diana), daughter of Zeus (Jupiter) and Leto (Latona), twin sister of Apollo, and patroness of the hunt. Diana was often represented carrying bow and arrow, wearing animal skins, or accompanied by a troop of animals.

In sixteenth-century France, during the reign of Henri II, there was a veritable infatuation with Diana as goddess of the hunt, due no doubt partly to the role of Diane de Poitiers as royal mistress and partly to a desire to glorify the favorite royal sport of hunting. At the Château d'Anêt, designed for Diane de Poitiers by the architect Philibert de l'Orme, representations of the great goddess abound. One of the most beautiful is a marble fountain, possibly from the studio of Jean Goujon (circa 1549), in which the nude Diana reclines gracefully with her companion stag. A bronze relief in demi-lune form attributed to Benvenuto Cellini, Nymph of Fontainebleau (circa 1545), may also represent the goddess with her stag. Now in the Louvre in Paris, Nymph of Fontainebleau was intended by François I for the Château of Fontainebleau. However, after his death, Diana de Poitiers persuaded Henri II to give it to her for Anêt. These images of Diana seem to have inaugurated the seventeenth- and eighteenth-century vogue for mythological portraits of women assuming the guise and attributes of the goddess, as in Jean-Marc Nattier's painting Marie-Adélaïde of France as Diana (circa 1745). Diana's popularity stretches into the twentieth century, when Paulanship sculpted several versions of her running with her hounds.

Derived primarily from Ovid's Metamorphoses, as were so many of the tales of gods and goddesses, the narrative of Diana and Actaeon remained popular in post-classical art. Painted versions range from Titian to Paolo Veronese, Giovanni Tiepolo, and Eugène Delacroix. Perhaps the appeal was to be found in the extremity of the goddess's punishment for what seems a misfortune rather than a crime. The story says that Actaeon discovered Artemis as she was bathing in the nude accompanied by her nymphs. For such a violation of her chastity, she transformed the hunter into a stag that was then torn to pieces by his own hounds.

Unlucky chance, similar to Actaeon's, frequently dominates the relations of humans with the gods; many such encounters revolve around hunting, such as the tale of Cephalus and Procris. According to Ovid, Procris gave her husband, Cephalus, a magic spear that never missed its mark and a dog, Laelaps, that always caught its prey. Procris, believing gossip that Cephalus was having a liaison with another woman, followed him on a hunting expedition. Hearing movement in the bushes, Cephalus mistook her for an animal and killed her with the magic spear. A moving depiction of the end of this episode is Piero di Cosimo's The Death of Procris (circa 1506), in which the dog too is bowed down with bewilderment and grief. This narrative would also find many interpreters throughout the centuries.

The aristocracy of Europe appears to have been obsessed with hunting from the Middle Ages on, perhaps reaching its apogee in the seventeenth century. Of course, the meat resulting from the pursuit of game, birds, and fish was an important part of the diet, and exclusive access to it was for a long time a jealously guarded privilege. Hunting was so much a part of yearly activities that portrayals of hunting scenes are prominently featured in medieval manuscript calendar scenes, as, for example, the August and December scenes by the Limbourg Brothers from the Très Riches Heures of Jean, Duke de Berry.

Frederick II, Holy Roman Emperor, wrote an important book on hunting with birds, De Arte Venandi cum Avibus, of which an elaborately illustrated copy from around 1260 is found in the Vatican Library. This treatise on falconry emphasizes the care and training of these birds of prey and is also an important early work of ornithology. Many of the depictions and comments on bird behavior and habitats are apparently based on empirical observation.

Medieval hunting scenes appear in various media and settings. Ambrogio Lorenzetti's fresco Effects of Good and Bad Government (1340s) in the Palazzo Pubblico in Siena, Italy, depicts a group of nobles under good government riding out from the city to enjoy their falconry. The mere presence of a falcon on the wrist came to be a sign marking noble status and wealth, as in Francesco Traini's Triumph of Death (after 1348) in the Campo Santo in Pisa, Italy. The angel of death flies over a group of the dead toward a garden where a group of men and women are gathered. They can be identified as noble by the presence of falcons and dogs and by their leisurely activities of conversation, music making, and meditation.

Tapestries and wall paintings with courtly images of hunting, hawking, and even fishing decorated the palaces and hunting lodges of the nobility. Many of these are "encyclopedic" in that they show different kinds of hunting, different game, or successive phases of the hunt. In the Palace of the Popes at Avignon, France, the Studiolo of Clement VI, called the Chambre du Cerf (Room of the Stag), was frescoed by Matteo di Giovanetti with various types of hunting scenes, such as with falcons and with greyhounds. Perhaps inspired by Franco-Flemish tapestries, a fishing scene and bird catchers are also portrayed. In another example, Devonshire Hunting Tapestries (circa 1450), fragments of four separate sets, now in the Victoria and Albert Museum in London, combine hunts for boar and bear, otter and swan, and deer.

As these images reflect a way of life, so did various books, the best known of which is probably Livre de la Chasse (Book of the Hunt), written in 1405–1410 by Gaston III, Count of Foix, known as Gaston Phébus. Many copies of this book exist, and one of the most striking is in the Pierpont Morgan Library in New York. This copy was probably made for John V, Duke of Brittany, around 1410. With chapters on each beast of prey and on the various kinds of dogs used to pursue them, it also emphasizes a particular virtue of hunting—it prevents sloth, the source of all evil thoughts. Thus, the art of venery slips easily into an allegory of "spiritualized hunting." A similar evocation of the salubrious nature of the hunt is found in Henri de Ferrière's Livre du Roi Modus et de la Reine Ratio (Book of King Modus and Queen Ratio, 1379). Dealing with hawking as well as hunting, like the Book of the Hunt, it is a manual of hunting methods with an ethical intention. The notion of virtue associated with hunting was revived in the nineteenth century in response to public criticism of rural sports.

A notable Christian assimilation of the chase is found in the hunt for the unicorn. Depicted on tapestries, this theme, found in northern Europe at the end of the Middle Ages, functioned as an allegory of the incarnation of Jesus Christ in the womb of the Virgin Mary. Among preeminent examples are the series of six tapestry pieces The Hunts of the Unicorn (1490–1500), now at The Cloisters in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, and another series, The Lady with a Unicorn, at the Musée de Cluny in Paris.

Eustace and Hubert of Liège are two Christian saints invoked as patrons of the chase and hunters. Although their legends differ, their attributes are very similar. Both are often depicted with horse, hound, and horn while experiencing a vision of a stag with a crucifix between its antlers. The story of the legendary St. Eustace is recounted in the Golden Legend of Jacobus da Voragine; St. Hubert was the Bishop of Tongres and Maastricht around 665. St. Eustace's cult was especially popular in France and Germany. Toward the end of the Middle Ages, his legend became intertwined with that of St. Hubert, and his cult fell into neglect. Among his best known representations is a painting by Antonio Pisanello, now in the National Gallery in London. Images of St. Hubert appear as late as 1758, when Carle Vanloo painted this subject for Louis XV for the chapel of his hunting lodge in the forest of Yvelines in France (now in the Church at Rambouillet, France).

In Islamic art, the hunter with his falcon is often a metaphor of the soul's search for God, although the motif can also be connected with a lover's pursuit of his beloved. Thus, the secular and the divine are reconciled in images appearing in works ranging from book illustrations to textiles, including carpets.

European hunting scenes also frequently contain an undercurrent of amorous dalliance, sometimes depicted quite overtly. The chase is not limited to the animals alone. As the milieu is out of doors in woodlands or flowering fields, a connection with the Garden of Love (another popular courtly motif) is evident. In fact, the entire hunting genre can be construed as an elaborate metaphor of the pursuit of the sexes. In Ars Amatoria, Ovid suggested the hunt as an amatory pursuit, and in Aeneid, Virgil had used the simile of Dido, the mythological founder and first queen of the ancient city of Carthage in Libya, as a wounded hind. Images of Dido and Aeneas, son of Aphrodite, taking refuge in a cave after being caught in a storm during an elaborate hunt were popular, as were those of the Greek hero Adonis being seduced by Aphrodite as they rest from hunting. The connections between the pursuit of game and the pursuit of the opposite sex are thus made explicit.

By far, the most persistent notion of hunting has been as a prerogative of the upper classes of society. As a sport, hunting offered the opportunity to display heroism in an act of danger and to demonstrate the skill and strategy needed to kill the game. A proper training ground for kings and nobility, hunting became a major form of court entertainment and a vehicle for kingly glorification. Pictorial examples include the tapestry series designed by Bernart van Orley, Hunts of Maximilian (circa 1560).

Jean-Baptiste Oudry's mid-eighteenth-century design for an engraving illustrating Jean de La Fontaine's fable of the gardener and his seigneur portrays the elements of the courtly pastime—and some of its drawbacks from the viewpoint of the common man. Reveling in the day's sport, mounted hunters follow closely on their pack of hounds coursing a hare through a cabbage patch. As the fable says,

Farewell chicory and leeks
Farewell ingredients for the soup pot
. . . these are games for the Prince.
But . . . dogs and men do more damage in one hour
Than all the hares of the province in a hundred years.

Scenes of famous hunts were considered appropriate decorations for hunting lodges, as were portraits of favorite hounds or pictures of game, alive or dead. Cosimo de' Medici ordered a tapestry set for his villa at Poggio a' Caiano, Italy, from Jan van der Straet of Bruges, Belgium (known as Stradanus). This set, widely disseminated by means of engravings, reestablished the ancient theme of pitting men against exotic beasts, a theme that would be magnificently exploited by Peter Paul Rubens in his vast portrayals of wolf, lion, boar, and bear hunts. These depict the encounter between two equal adversaries, dramatically emphasizing the fact that the outcome is by no means certain.

Frans Snyders painted similar scenes with wild animals. In his painting of 1625–1630, now in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, a number of hunting dogs chase a wild sow and her litter across a background of wooded landscape. Snyders concentrates on the climactic moment when the hounds—one evidently highly prized because he is attired in a protective leather coat—reach their prey.

In the nineteenth century, Eugène Delacroix and Antoine-Louis Barye took up the motif of animals pitted against animals. In the wake of the French conquest of North Africa, Delacroix also depicted Arabs in heroic combat with lions, as in his three versions of a lion hunt (1855, 1858, and 1861). The dramatic ferocity of the images recalls the tradition of Rubens and Snyders. This combat between equals later metamorphosed into images of futile resistance of creatures who presented no risk to the hunter.

As the middle classes grew in numbers and accumulated wealth, they appropriated the tastes and fashions of the aristocracy. Not only could they indulge in hunting, but they also discovered that by acquiring pictures they could assume the status associated with this socially exclusive activity. Such pictures included not only narrative scenes, such as Henry Alken's foxhunts, but also hunting variants, such as the dead-game pieces of Jan Fyt, Jan Weenix, and Frans Snyders. The game, or trophy, piece enjoyed great popularity in seventeenth-century Holland; subsequently in eighteenth-century France, exemplified by Jean-Baptiste-Siméon Chardin's many paintings; and finally in the nineteenth century in the United States with still lifes such as William Harnett's After the Hunt (1883).

By the late eighteenth century, hunting had become far more accessible to the middle classes, and the element of danger had considerably lessened for most sportsmen. Connotations of established social status remained, but public criticism had arisen, especially in England. Rural sports were associated with backward country squires, and satirical representations of hunts emerged, such as those in which the hunted fox becomes the hunter. These variations on the world-upside-down motif date to the medieval bas-de-page images of rabbits shooting and netting their human prey.

Devotees of the sport fought back, emphasizing the moral virtues of the healthy life of the country in contrast to the decadence of city life. Thomas Rowlandson underscored this opposition in his prints Four O'Clock in the Country and Four O'Clock in the Town (both 1785). In the former, a virile country squire rises with the sun for a morning's sport; in the latter, in a scene reminiscent of William Hogarth, a debauchee has to be put to bed at dawn after a night of revelry.

For many nineteenth-century Americans, the notion of hunting was dominated not by the typical English fox chase on horseback with hounds but by the solitary trapper-hunter in a wilderness untouched by civilization. By a trick of inversion, the old-world aristocracy is replaced by an image of the independent man of the woods in a paradise on Earth, albeit a paradise often tinged by melancholy, as in Winslow Homer's Hound and Hunter (1892) or his many other paintings of hunting in the Adirondack Mountains. The commonest of men thus becomes the true aristocrat. Charles M. Russell, in Buffalo Hunt (circa 1890) in the C. M. Russell Museum in Great Falls, Montana, takes a different approach. It is closer to the drama of Delacroix in portraying a wild melee of animals and men—by the 1890s an evocation of a truly vanishing world.

Although Alfred Munnings found a ready market for his paintings among the upper classes, as, for example, in Huntsman with Hounds, Zenner Hill, Cornwall (1914), for the most part the exploits of sportsmen have been a subject of little interest to the general public. Although the hunting picture continues to exist, it appears most frequently as a cover illustration for magazines such as Field and Stream. No longer associated primarily with the upper classes, hunting has nevertheless become a genre without a substantial audience. However, its long life and varying manifestations suggest that a new transformation is always possible.

See also Bacchanalia/Orgy; Sport

Selected Works of Art

Prehistoric Cave Paintings

- Lascaux Cave, circa 15,000–13,000 B.C., Dordogne, France
- Pêche-Merle, circa 15,000–13,000 B.C., Lot, France
- Niaux, circa 15,000–13,000 B.C., Ariège, France
- Deer Hunt*, wall painting, circa 15,750 B.C., Çatal Hüyük, Turkey
- Wounded Bison*, circa 15,000–10,000 B.C., Altamira, Spain

Ancient

- Hippopotamus Hunt*, painted limestone relief, circa 2400 B.C. Saqqara, Egypt, Tomb of Ti
- Fowling Scene*, painted relief, circa 1450 B.C., Thebes, Egypt, Tomb of Nebamun
- Hunting Scene*, painted limestone relief, Eighteenth Dynasty, Thebes, Egypt, Tomb of User-het
- Canaanite Hunting from His Chariot*, gold bowl, circa 1400 B.C., from Ugarit, Damascus, Syria, National Museum
- Lion Hunt of Ashurnasirpal II*, alabaster, ninth century B.C., from Calah, London, British Museum
- Ashurbanipal Hunting Lions*, alabaster, circa 650 B.C., from Nineveh, London, British Museum
- Dying Lioness*, limestone, circa 650 B.C., from Nineveh, London, British Museum

Classical

- Artemis and Actaeon*, limestone relief covered with stucco, part marble, formerly painted, metope from Temple E at Selinus, circa 460 B.C., Palermo, Italy, Museo Archaeologico Nazionale
- Lion Hunt*, mosaic, circa 300 B.C., Pella, Greece
- Hadrian as a Hunter*, marble relief tondo, circa A.D. 130–138, Rome, Arch of Constantine
- Meleager: Calydonian Hunt*, Roman sarcophagus, late third century A.D., Bedfordshire, England, Woburn Abbey

Medieval

- Vision of Saint Eustace*, wall painting, twelfth century, Zenobani, Georgia, Church of the Holy Saviour
- Frederick II, De Arte Venandi cum Avibus, illuminated manuscript, circa 1260, Vatican, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana (Ms. Pal. lat. 1071)
- Hunter Rabbit with His Victim*, detail from illuminated manuscript, Romance of Alexander, 1338–1344, Oxford, England, Bodleian Library (Ms. Bodley 264, fol. 81v)
- Lorenzetti, Ambrogio, Effects of Good and Bad Government, fresco, 1340s, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico, Council Chamber
- Giovanetti, Matteo di, Chambre du Cerf, fresco, 1343, Avignon, France, Palais des Papes
- Traini, Francesco, Triumph of Death, fresco, after 1348, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santo, south wall

Renaissance

- Ferrière, Henri de, Le Livre du Roi Modus et de la Reine Ratio, illuminated manuscript, 1379, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (BN fr. 12395)
- Phébus, Gaston, Le Livre de la Chasse, illuminated manuscript, 1405–1410, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (BN fr. 616)
- Limbourg Brothers, Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, illuminated manuscript, 1413–1416, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé (Ms. 65, 2484)
- Pisanello, Antonio, The Vision of Saint Eustace, painting, circa 1435, London, National Gallery
- Devonshire Hunting Tapestries*, circa 1450, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
- Uccello, Paolo, The Hunt in the Wood, before 1475, Oxford, England, Ashmolean Museum
- The Lady with a Unicorn*, tapestry, circa 1495–1500, Paris, Musée des Thermes et de l'Hôtel de Cluny
- Carpaccio, Vittore, Hunting on the Lagoon, circa 1490–1496, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- The Hunts of the Unicorn*, tapestry, circa 1490–1500, New York, Metropolitan Museum, The Cloisters Collections
- Dürer, Albrecht, The Vision of Saint Eustace, engraving, 1501
- Cosimo, Piero di, The Death of Procris, painting, circa 1506, London, National Gallery
- Pinturicchio, and studio, The Hunt of the Calydonian Boar, fresco from Palazzo Pandolfo-Petrucchi, 1512, Siena, Italy, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Cranach, Lucas the Elder, The Stag Hunt, painting, 1540, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art
- Cellini, Benvenuto, Nymph of Fontainebleau, bronze relief, 1545, Paris, Louvre
- Titian, Diana and Actaeon, painting, 1546–1559, Edinburgh, Scotland, National Gallery of Scotland
- Fogolino, Marcello, Hunting Scene, fresco, 1548, Gorizia, Italy, Palazzo Lantieri, Sala d'Armi
- Goujon, Jean, studio of, Diana with Stag, marble fountain, circa 1549, Paris, Louvre
- School of Fontainebleau, Diana the Huntress, painting, circa 1550–1560, Paris, Louvre

Hunt of Esau, painted fireplace decoration, 1555–1560, Val d'Oise, France, Château d'Ecouen, Chamber of the Duc de Montmorency

Orley, Bernart van, Hunts of Maximilian, cartoons and tapestries, circa 1560, Paris, Louvre

Veronese, Paolo, Atalanta Receiving the Boar's Head from Meleager, painting, circa 1561–1563, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Veronese, Paolo, Diana Huntress, painting, circa 1565–1570, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Hunters in the Snow, painting, 1565, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

School of Fontainebleau, Diana Caressing a Stag, marble bas-relief, 1565–1568, Paris, Musée des Thermes et de l'Hôtel de Cluny

Straet, Jan van der, Series of 28 Hunting Tapestries, engraving, 1567–1578

Momper, Joos de, the Younger, Landscape with Boar Hunt, painting, before 1600, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Seventeenth Century

Prieur, Barthélemy, Diana, bronze sculpture, 1603, Fontainebleau, France, Musée National du Chateau

Snyders, Frans, Boar Hunt, painting, 1610, Prague, Czech Republic, Národní Muzeum v Praze

Rubens, Peter Paul, Diana and Her Nymphs Departing for the Chase, painting, circa 1617, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art

Snyders, Frans, Stag Hunt, painting, 1620s, Milan, Italy, Pinacoteca di Brera

Gentileschi, Orazio, Diana the Huntress, painting, 1624–1626, Nantes, France, Musée des Beaux Arts

Snyders, Frans, Boar Hunt, painting, 1625–1630, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Terbrugghen, Hendrik, Esau Selling His Birthright, painting, circa 1627, Madrid, Spain, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection

Terbrugghen, Hendrik, Esau Selling His Birthright, painting, circa 1627, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

Honthorst, Gerrit van, King Charles and Queen Henrietta Maria/Apollo and Diana, painting, 1628, East Molesey, Surrey, Hampton Court Palace

Birkner, Wolfgang, Jacht Buch, manuscript, 1639, Gotha, Germany, Landesbibliothek

Snyders, Frans, Game and Poultry, painting, 1640s, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Bol, Ferdinand, Aeneas and Dido Hunting, paintings, 1647, London, Ranger's House, Blackheath; Stockholm, Sweden, Bergsten Collection

Hyre, Laurent de la, Countess of Beauvais as Diana, painting, 1656, Châlons-sur-Marne, France

Fyt, Jan, Dogs Guarding Booty, painting, 1659, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Sammlungen des Regierenden Fürsten van Liechtenstein

Lorrain, Claude, View of Carthage with Dido, Aeneas, and Their Suite Leaving for the Hunt, painting, 1676, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Eighteenth Century

Weenix, Jan, Game and Fruit, painting, 1704, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Diana and Actaeon, painting, circa 1720–1722, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Boucher, François, Leopard Hunt, circa 1736, Amiens, France, Musée de Picardie

Boucher, François, Diana Returning from the Hunt, painting, 1745, Paris, Musée Cognac-Jay

Nattier, Jean-Marc, Marie-Adélaïde of France as Diana, painting, circa 1745, Versailles, France, Château de Versailles

Dunthorn, James, John Sidney and His Hounds at a Farmhouse Near Hadleigh, Suffolk, painting, 1765, Upperville, Paul Mellon Collection

Rowlandson, Thomas, Four O'Clock in the Country; Four O'Clock in the Town, hand-colored engravings, 1785

Nineteenth Century

Barye, Antoine-Louis, Python Crushing a Crocodile, bronze, 1840, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Delacroix, Eugène, Lion Hunt, painting, 1855, Bordeaux, France, Galerie des Beaux Arts

Delacroix, Eugène, Summer: Diana and Actaeon, painting, begun 1856 (unfinished), São Paulo, Brazil, Museu de Arte

Renoir, Pierre-Auguste, Diana (The Huntress), painting, 1867, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Delacroix, Eugène, Lion Hunt, painting, 1858, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Delacroix, Eugène, Lion Hunt, painting, 1861, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute

Harnett, William, After the Hunt, painting, 1883, Columbus, Ohio, Gallery of Fine Arts

Homer, Winslow, October Day, watercolor on paper, 1889, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Russell, Charles M., Buffalo Hunt, painting, circa 1890, Great Falls, Montana, C. M. Russell Museum

Homer, Winslow, Hound and Hunter, painting, 1892, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Remington, Frederic, Unexpected Shot, wash drawing, circa 1896, Shelburne, Vermont, Shelburne Museum

Twentieth Century

Munnings, Alfred, Huntsman with Hounds, Zennor Hill, Cornwall, painting, 1914, London, Richard Green Gallery

Manship, Paul, Diana (Running with Hound), bronze statuette, 1921, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Carnegie Institute

Ernst, Max, The Hunter, oil on canvas, 1926, Brussels, Belgium, collection of Max Janlet

Further Reading

Alfassa, Paul, "Les tapisseries des 'Chasses de Maximilien'," Gazette des Beaux-Arts 62 (1920)

Alpers, Svetlana, The Decoration of the Torre de la Parada, Brussels, Belgium: Arcade Press, 1971

- Baillie-Grohman, William Adolph, Sport in Art: An Iconography of Sport, London: Ballantyne, 1913; New York: Abrams, 1963
- Balis, Arnout, Rubens Hunting Scenes, London: H. Miller, 1986
- Baratte, François, "A propos de la 'Chasse au léopard' de François Boucher," La Revue du Louvre et des Musées de France 40 (1990)
- Bok-van Kammen, Weimoet, Stradanus and the Hunt (Ph.D. diss., Johns Hopkins University, 1976)
- Coumoussi, Anita, "Une représentation rare de la vision de St. Eusache," Cahiers Archéologiques 33 (1985)
- Daltroop, George, Die Kalydonische Jagd in der Antike, Hamburg, Germany: P. Parey, 1966
- Deuchar, Stephen, Sporting Art in Eighteenth Century England: A Social and Political History, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1988
- Digby, George, The Devonshire Hunting Tapestries, London: H. M. Stationary, 1971
- Egerton, Judy, British Sporting and Animal Paintings, 1655-1867, London, Tate Gallery for the Yale Center for British Art, 1978
- _____, British Sporting Paintings, Richmond: Virginia Museum of Fine Arts, 1985
- Finlay, Nancy Ann, Animal Themes in the Painting of Eugène Delacroix (Ph.D. diss., Princeton University)
- Freeman, Margaret Beam, The Unicorn Tapestries, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1985
- Gallego, Julian, Goya y la Caza, Madrid, Spain: El Vinson, 1985
- Hanaway, William L., Jr., "The Concept of the Hunt in Persian Literature," Boston Museum of Fine Arts Bulletin 69 (1971)
- Honoré Labande, Léon, La Palais des Papes et les Monuments d'Avignon au XIVe Siècle, Marseilles, France: F. Détaille, 1929
- Langer, Sandra, "Call of the Wild," Arts Magazine 59 (January 1985)
- Lavin, Irving, "Cephalus and Procris: Transformations of an Ovidian Myth," Journal of the Warburg Institute 17 (1954)
- _____, "Cephalus and Procris: Underground Transformations," Journal of the Warburg Institute 17 (1954)
- Pavière, Sydney, A Dictionary of British Sporting Painters, Leigh-on-Sea, England: F. Lewis, 1980
- Reed, Henry, The A. B. Frost Book, Charleston, South Carolina: Wyrick, 1993
- Robels, Helle, Franz Snyders: Stilleben und Tiermaler, Munich, Germany: Deutsches Kunstverlag, 1989
- Roethlisberger, Marcel, "La tenture de la Licorne dans la collection Borromée," Oud Holland 82 (1967)
- Rosand, David, "Rubens's Munich 'Lion Hunt': Its Sources and Significance," Art Bulletin 59 (March 1969)
- Shifman, Barry, "Le déjeuner royal des chasses en porcelaine de Sèvres," Revue du Louvre et des Musées de France 40 (1990)
- Schneebalg-Perelman, Sophie, Les Chasses de Maximilien, Brussels, Belgium: Editions de Chabassol, 1982
- Sullivan, Scott, The Dutch Gamepiece, Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Allanheld, 1984
- Tatham, David, "Trapper, Hunter, and Woodsman: Winslow Homer's Adirondack Figures," American Art Journal 22 (1990)
- Velmans, Tania, "L'Église de Zenobani et la thème de la vision de St. Eustache en Géorgie," Cahiers Archéologiques 33 (1985)
- Williamson, John, The Oak King, the Holly King, and the Unicorn, New York: Harper, 1986
- Wind, Geraldine, "Sport for Jove," Gazette des Beaux-Arts (March 1987)

IMAGINATION/ CREATIVITY

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Imagination/Creativity:

ST. LUKE PAINTING THE VIRGIN

THE ARTIST IN HIS STUDIO
ARTISTS' STUDIOS

IMITATION

ACADEMIES

THE ARTIST'S INSPIRATION

Rogier van der Weyden, Saint Luke Painting the Virgin and Child, 1435–1440, oil and tempera on panel, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

Imagination is synonymous with the Greek phantasia (imagining). Imagination is the mind's capacity to generate images of objects, states, or actions that have not been felt or experienced by the senses. Over the centuries, philosophers have concerned themselves with the explanation of imagination and creativity. Many of them have harked back to Plato's concept that time is the moving image of eternity where the world is an image or an imitation of the eternal forms of ideas. Plato states in the Republic that art is an imitation of an imitation. Aristotle expanded the theory of imitation by considering that art imitated not necessarily actual things but possible things.

In the Renaissance, the concepts of imagination and creativity were fused with the idea of imitation, a translation of the Greek term mimesis. With their interest in classical theories of art and the revival of such, Renaissance theorists initiated an interpretation and application of the nature of imitation and invention as well as the correlation of these ideas to poetry and music, the sister arts (Panofsky, 1968; Lee). The theory of imagination or mimesis achieved full study during the eighteenth century with the work of Abbé Du Bos in Critical Reflections on Poetry, Painting and Music (1719).

To the idealists, imagination consisted of two aspects: reproductive and productive imagination (Immanuel Kant) or fancy and constructive imagination (Samuel Taylor Coleridge). Reproductive imagination is intuitive and a response of the senses. Productive imagination realizes or brings to focus intuitive imagination. The freely creative and transforming power of the imagination was a central principle of Romanticism (Coleridge).

According to Benedetto Croce, the early twentieth-century idealist, imagination is the creation of an individual intuition and is central to the aesthetic creation. Thinkers of the later twentieth century place the emphasis on the process or results of imagination, that is, on creativity. Sigmund Freud's analysis on the subject focuses on personal creativity in terms of sublimation. Nikolai O. Losski and Nicolas Berdyaev hold that creativity is an essential characteristic of both God and the individual, whereas Alfred North Whitehead emphasizes that creativity is the category of the ultimate, which is a constant process in the universe. The nineteenth- and twentieth-century position on imagination and creativity made a clear-cut distinction between the two, a distinction not made in the Renaissance. This essay discusses various artistic approaches to the philosophical concepts of imagination and creativity.

An exponent of the sixteenth-century quest for the understanding of these concepts is the Florentine painter, architect, and writer Giorgio Vasari, who stated,

Many painters achieve in the first design of their work, as though guided by a sort of inspirational fire, something of the good and a certain measure of boldness; but afterwards, in finishing it, the boldness vanishes. (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. V)

Furthermore, Vasari's explanation of artistic creativity is based fundamentally on the Italian Renaissance tradition, which considered creativity to be a faculty present in all human activity (Panofsky, 1968).

Vasari's conception of artistic creativity is related to this theory of painting, as is seen in the Chamber of Fame in his house in Arezzo, Italy (Allegory of Painting, 1542). He believed that there were two alternatives in a painter's development or achievement of artistic creativity: imitation (imitazione) and invention (invenzione) (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. II). Imitation is the copying of art as a method of learning, whereas invention is independent of imitation and constitutes the means for conceiving artistic ideas. Imitation serves to guide and teach the artist in composing and creating perfection. For Vasari, imitation draws on three different sources. The first two are copying from nature (copia dal vero) and copying the masters. He emphasized that copying from nature is important for artists so that they may learn to create forms that are alive (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. I). It also helps the artists to learn how to draw in a way that eventually will lead to drawing anything from memory, without need for a model. In the Chamber of Fame, the Fine Arts appear to be creating from memory, as no model is seen. Vasari's idea of giudizio (judgment) is also related to selection from an improvement on nature. Thus, artists must study antiquity and the masters so that they may learn how others have acquired the experience of imitating nature.

The third aspect of imitation, wherein artists copy or quote from their own work, demonstrates the manner in which the arts surpass nature. Vasari found examples of this achievement in the works of Titian, Michelangelo, and Raphael. In the Chamber of Fame, Vasari quotes from his own work: The portraits in the ovati are after the woodcuts of the second edition of his Vite (Lives of the Artists). Around the chamber ceiling, each image of the Fine Arts is in the process of creating a work of art through a fusion of imitation and invention. Indeed, here is a pictorial commentary on the methods and classification of the arts that was later set down in words in Vasari's own writings.

Vasari combines these three types of imitation in his painting Saint Luke Painting the Virgin (1562–1565), located above the altar in the Chapel of the Artists, also known as the chapel for the Accademia del Disegno in Florence, Italy. In this work, Vasari portrays himself as St. Luke. The patron saint of artists is drawing a portrait of the Madonna and Child in his studio, where one sees his box of paints, his palette, and his maulstick. His assistant grinds color pigments in the background. Two onlookers, beside a bull, the attribute of St. Luke, admire the rendering seen in the easel painting. The disegno (drawing) on the canvas illustrates Vasari's theory that disegno is the principle of art. The Madonna and Child have appeared in the artist-saint's studio to guide him in his design as well as in his observation of nature. The indication of guidance can be observed in the Madonna's active participation and instruction to the painter regarding how to paint her. The concepts of imitation (copia dal vero) and judgment (giudizio) are clearly expressed.

The ideas of disegno in Saint Luke Painting the Virgin refer in part to previous works by Vasari, for example, the Fine Arts on the ceiling of the Chamber of Fame. Vasari continues to express his artistic theories of invention and imitation in another room of the Casa Vasari, the Chamber of Fortune. In the lower section of the north wall, where themes of ancient painters are illustrated, one sees a depiction of Zeuxis in his studio selecting parts of the most beautiful women for his painting of Helen (or Venus). Zeuxis, as well as Vasari, tries to surpass nature through the process of selection and judgment. In the Sala Fiorentina in Vasari's house in Florence, Vasari again repeats the same theme of Apelles the artist (always with Vasari's features). In his studio, Apelles is painting a nude portrait of Juno/Diana (the personification of power/nature).

In the painting St. Luke Painting the Virgin, Vasari expresses his theory of art. Vasari, as St. Luke, receives divine inspiration from the Madonna and Child. The artist imitates from nature (copia dal vero); St. Luke (as Vasari) draws from life, as the Madonna and Child are his models. The artist invents and surpasses nature by imitating himself or quoting himself from previous works—"the artist is working in his studio." Vasari varies from the actual, live model (Madonna and Child) and repeats earlier statements on the same theme: Drawing (disegno) is the principle of art. Finally, the onlookers oversee, analyze, and admire the artist at work. The act of judgment is expressed in their faces and their gestures. Giudizio, or judgment, on the part of the viewer is essential for the deification of art as well as the fame of the artist. Vasari's self-imitation (imitare se stessi) is achieved because the artist has quoted from his own previous works, as observed in the St. Luke painting.

The theme of St. Luke painting the Virgin was a popular theme in the Renaissance throughout Europe because it combined and reflected the concepts of creativity as well as the artist's imagination. The representations and compositions for this theme derive in part from the illuminated manuscript tradition, especially the illumination of Marcia or Tamara painting her self-portrait in Boccaccio's book Noble and Famous Women (1401–1402), illustrated for the Duke of Berry and now in Paris (Bonafoux, p. 8). Seated at her desk, Marcia holds a mirror while painting herself. Behind her are brushes, jars of paint, and a book of hours resting on a table and in front of her a self-portrait on an easel and the painter's palette with three brushes.

The artist is finishing the last touches on her portrait. The richly patterned designs on the wall contrast with the simplicity of Marcia's dress and hairdo. It is interesting to note that the painted self-portrait is larger than her reflected image. Has the painter wished to aggrandize herself, or is the largeness because she is using the mirror to portray herself?

Boccaccio's Marcia takes a step further in the investigation of a painter by painting not only a religious female (nun) but also a persona. She portrays a self-portrait and the activities of an artist, for example, looking in the mirror and painting what she sees in it on an easel. Marcia shows a sense of scrutiny and scientific investigation as she studies the physical reality before her. What she has drawn is carefully conveyed; the portraiture is an accurate rendition of reality. Marcia as a painter is involved with two realities: the reflection of her image in the mirror that she holds and the painted self-image that she has depicted by viewing herself in the mirror. Unlike the discrepancies seen in the perspectival rendition of the overall composition—that is, the floor and table are tilted and the table behind the painter is not proportionate in size—the placement of the seated figure in relation to the mirror, the reflection of the portrait in the mirror, and the painted portrait on the easel are all accurately and proportionately interrelated and rendered. Marcia has carefully studied nature and observed its spatial complexity.

Marcia is aware of the fourteenth-century Italian tradition of St. Luke Painting the Virgin (Levey, pp. 14–16). Although there was no muse of painting in the early Renaissance, according to art historian Michael Levey, the emergence of St. Luke in the West established the association of a founder figure with a patron saint of painters. Florentine painter Cennino Cennini calls St. Luke the first Christian painter. Depictions of St. Luke at this time show a seated St. Luke painting at an easel. The image portrayed in the painting is a Madonna and Child, and the interior setting is surrounded with painters' paraphernalia—the environment alludes to a painter's studio. Thus, the artist portrayed himself as St. Luke, the patron saint of painters.

Most of these portraits of St. Luke have physical, if not psychological, resemblances to the painter. Other artists have also observed St. Luke at work: Hinrich Bornemann the Younger, St. Luke Painting the Virgin (1499), a diptych with a self-portrait in the lower right, at the Hauptkirche St. Jacobi in Hamburg, Germany, and Pierre Mignard, St. Luke Painting the Virgin (1695), in the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Troyes, France. On the left of St. Luke, the artist himself appears holding palette and brushes. In Italian manuscripts of the early fourteenth century, St. Luke paints the Virgin in his studio without external guidance or spiritual assistance, his imagination and internal inspiration providing the saint with inspiration. In the fifteenth century, representations of St. Luke were associated with activities and influences of the messenger god Mercury, as in the Master of the Planet's engraving Children of Mercury (1460–1465) in the British Museum in London. This planetary god ruled the realm of intelligence and creativity. In the northern Renaissance, works representing St. Luke painting the Virgin in his studio include Rogier van der Weyden's St. Luke Painting the Virgin (1435–1440) at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Colijn de Coter's St. Luke Painting the Virgin (1505) at the Église Notre-Dame-Allier in Veuire, Niklaus Manuel's St. Luke Painting the Virgin (circa 1505), and Jan Gossaert's St. Luke Painting the Virgin (circa 1515) at the National Gallery of Prague in the Czech Republic. The saint is drawing or painting from his vision of Virgin and Child, that is, from imagination. However, Manuel's representation illustrates the influence of illuminated manuscripts, as he paints only the Virgin and requires no model or vision for his inspiration. In other instances, St. Luke's creativity or imagination is guided by divine intervention in the form of an angel. The celestial tutor assists St. Luke in painting the apparition of Virgin and Child, as seen in Jan Gossaert's St. Luke Painting the Virgin (circa 1525) in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria, and Maerten van Heemskerck's St. Luke Painting the Virgin (1532) in the Frans Hals Museum in Haarlem, The Netherlands. In Gossaert's painting, St. Luke kneels to sketch the Virgin (as in Rogier van der Weyden's painting and his own Prague representations), who has appeared in a cloud before him. St. Luke is inspired by the vision; however, in his representations he is assisted and instructed by an angel who stands behind him. Van Heemskerck's painting also depicts St. Luke in his studio. The saint/painter is seated on a sarcophagus surrounded by classical elements (a mask, a Bacchic figure, and a relief of the Rape of Europa) alluding to the erudition of the painter. The vision of the Virgin and Child—or the models for the painter—are illuminated by a torch-bearing angel.

Artists throughout Europe continued to depict this religious theme during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, perhaps paralleling the development of botteghe (workshops) into schools for artists, or academies. The academies were set up to promote discussion among artists and thus broaden their artistic knowledge. These academies, such as Vasari's Accademia del Disegno in Florence and the Accademia di San Luca in Rome, had St. Luke as the patron of their arts. Agostino Veneziano painted such an academy in 1531 in his Bandinelli's Academy in Rome, now in the British Museum in London. Skulls and skeletons can be seen in this sculptor's studio, reflecting the contemporary interest in anatomy, while the plaster casts of classical statuary clearly demonstrate the renewed fascination with antiquity. Here, artists are inspired by observed objects. Later other academies focused not on the religious aspect of their origin but on their function as centers of training and learning. Theodor Galle and Jan van der Straet (Johannes Stradanus) demonstrate this shift in the engraving Dutch Studio in the Sixteenth Century. In this elegant studio, the master is painting an image of St. George from imagination while an assistant executes a lady's portrait. Another apprentice copies a bust, another cleans a palette, and two studio hands grind and mix colors. The learning room is filled with paintings, in process or finished, classical sculptures, and other artistic paraphernalia. The illustration of creativity or imagination is represented in several aspects. The master paints from internal inspiration, for he is a genius. The assistant paints from a natural model, and the apprentices copy from plaster casts of classical statuary. For them, unlike their master, imagination derives from external observation, which is sometimes second-hand.

The academy continued to develop and expand through the centuries: in the seventeenth century with the French Academy in Paris; in the eighteenth century with the Academy in Amsterdam (The Netherlands), The American School, and The British Royal Academy; in the nineteenth century with the proliferation of state and city academies; and in the twentieth century with the growth of art schools and art departments in universities (Bellony-Rewald). For Vasari, the establishment of the Accademia del Disegno was dictated by artistic necessity to foment discussion of the aims of the arts, to teach the principle of disegno in Florence, and to foster the cinquecento theories of art.

These cinquecento ideas about artistic creativity combined with the conception of poetic inspiration in relation to yet another central idea: ut pictura poesis (as is painting, so is poetry). Artists and theoreticians of the cinquecento, including Leonardo da Vinci, Carlo Dolce, Giovanni Paolo Lomazzo, and Vasari himself frequently employed this phrase, derived from Horace. The idea of ut pictura poesis captures the complementary nature of poetry and painting, equating the inspiration of the poet with the imagination of the painter. Both are concerned with the imitation of nature, the painter through the use of visual elements—line, color, tone, texture, and shape—and the poet through words. Leonardo, commenting on the versatility of the painter, remarked on this parity: "And if a poet should say: 'I will invent a fiction with a great purpose,' the painter can do the same, as Apelles painted Calumny . . ." If poetry deals with moral philosophy, painting deals with natural philosophy. Poetry describes the action of the mind; painting considers what the mind may effect by the motions. If poetry can terrify people by hideous fictions, painting can do as much by depicting the same things in action. In his Dialogue on Painting, Dolce expressed similar sentiments, characterizing the poet as a parlante dipintore (a speaking painter) and the painter as a poeta mutolo (a mute poet). Lomazzo's Trattato dell' arte della pittura, scultura et architettura, summarized Leonardo's and Dolce's conceptions of the relationships between poetry and painting (Lee; Armenini). Torquato Tasso referred to the poet as a pittore parlante (speaking painter) in Del Poema Eroico. Years later, Vasari wrote in the Ragionamenti that "it is permissible for the brush to treat philosophical subjects as narrative, since poetry and painting, as sisters, use the same means" (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. VIII).

The addition of poetry to the realm of the arts is most revealing because it alludes to the Renaissance Neoplatonic concept of furor poeticus (poetic inspiration). This concept derives from the writings of the Neoplatonic philosopher Marsilio Ficino, who explained that there are four forms of inspiration, or furor divinus. One of these is furor poeticus, or the frenzy of the poet, as stated by Ficino's Platonic Theology: Concerning the Immortality of the Soul (1474, VIII), an intellectual force that is intuitive, creative, and contemplative. Another probable source is Leon Battista Alberti's treatise On Painting, where he described painting as highest among the arts because "it contains a divine force." In cinquecento art, the paradigm for the pictorial representation of furor poeticus is Raphael's Poetry (Numine Afflatur) on the ceiling of the Stanza della Segnatura. Some years after Raphael's rendering, this conceit became so popular that even Andrea Alciati and Cesare Ripa had an emblematic entry for it in their books. In the Chamber of Fame, the concept of furor poeticus (poetic inspiration) is manifested not only by the depiction of Poetry but also by the fact that all the Fine Arts are themselves seen to be in the process of creating an art form. In his writings, Vasari related the concept of furor poeticus to the creation of visual art:

Many painters achieve in the first design of their work, as though guided by a sort of inspirational fire, something of the good and a certain measure of boldness; but afterwards, in finishing it, the boldness vanishes. (Vasari and Milanesi, vol. V)

Furthermore, Vasari's explanation of artistic creativity is based fundamentally on the Italian Renaissance tradition, which considered creativity to be a faculty present in all human activity.

The artistic conception of ut pictura poesis appears to be illustrated in the Chamber of Fame in that Poetry is portrayed among the Fine Arts, and Painting shows a portrait of a man holding a scroll. This is the poet Dante. The latter resembles Raphael's Parnassus, where the poet Sappho holds a scroll bearing her name.

On November 14, 1593, the Academy was inaugurated in the church, and Federico Zuccaro was elected president (principe). The instruction and discussions on art were organized in the following manner. Every day they attended mass; after the service, students would listen to theoretical debates about art initiated by Federico; and Federico's nephew Romano Alberti recorded these lectures. The artistic ideas that were developed from these debates and the compiled explanatory notes formulated Federico's book. With the notes of Alberti we know that the lectures dealt with two factors: instruction and theory. Instruction focused on the artist's education, that is, explanations and definitions of the ABCs of painting, and the lectures on theory contained discussion on the theories of art postulated by Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas, Alberti, Albrecht Dürer, Pico della Mirandola, Vasari, and Lomazzo and explanations of the metaphysical and theological nature of design (disegno).

Federico's theory is modeled to answer one question: How does an artist create a work of art? His answer is that creativity is manifested through design; therefore, his theory of art emphasizes the theory of design, both internal and external (disegno interno e disegno esterno). Unlike Vasari, Federico does not instruct the artist how to make a work of art. His concern is how the idea of art appears in the mind of the artist and how it is translated into the form of a drawing. His table on the property and quantity of design clearly explains how the artist's idea moves from God to the artwork. In an Aristotelian fashion, Federico describes the process for design from the abstract concept of the idea to the practical or material execution of the design idea (starting from the top of Federico's diagram). A divine spark suggests the name and then the properties or qualities of circumscription, mensuration, and form (image). These qualities in turn give substance to a form and figure by simple outlines. This appearance reveals the light of the intellect represented through the instruments of pencil or pen, and the result creates a design. As a Christian of the sixteenth century, Federico explains the origin of design, or disegno, in terms of the number three, which composes God's name and the Trinity, as in di-segn-o, or Dio (Italian for "God"), and segn (Italian for segno, or "sign") for design. Influenced by St. Thomas Aquinas's Summa theologiae ("God, as a creator, also 'designs' internally and externally, so to speak," I, 1-15), Federico in his writings states that the structure of the word disegno contains "the true sign of God within us" (vero segno di Dio in noi). Design extends from the internal to the external, that is, from the image in mind to the drawing on paper. Federico states that "one should remember that there are two kinds of operations: external ones like drawing, outlining, shaping, building; and, internal ones like reasoning and desiring." Internal design is a concept or idea formed in the artist's mind by God, and external design, or artistic representation, is the manifestation on paper of that concept or idea. Internal design is "free from its execution in any artistic medium." Because of Federico's intellectual investigations on the creation of art, his book, according to distinguished art historian Sydney Freedberg, is the "most systematic and the most lucid" on the aesthetics of maniera (style).

During the seventeenth century, the concept of imitation was fused with inspiration or imagination. In Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1603), the personification, or figurazione, of Imitation (Imitazione) is described: A woman holds a palette in her right hand and a mask in her left hand, and a monkey is at her feet. The element of imitation can be seen in works of art, which explains why the palette is depicted as alluding to the copying of other forms in terms of color and figures seen in nature. The mask and the monkey symbolize the imitation of human actions. For Ripa, the monkey copies human gestures and actions, and the mask recalls the comedies in which human life is performed with different actors who imitate daily life. Annibale Caracci's Allegory of Painting or Man with a Monkey (1605) and Artemisia Gentileschi's Allegory of Painting (1620) reflect Ripa's description. In the eighteenth century, Jean-Baptiste-Siméon Chardin elaborated this idea of imitation further by humorously replacing the artist with a monkey in The Monkey-Painter (circa 1740), now in the Louvre Museum in Paris.

For Cesare Ripa, Imagination is the personification of a beautiful female who is richly dressed, has wings, wears a feather in her hair, and is seated on a stone while looking at her reflection in a mirror held for her by a page in sixteenth-century costume. Insects are flying around her head, and, seeing them, she recoils from her reflection. The richness of the woman's dress indicates the rich variety of thoughts and ideas of which the imagination is capable. The wings suggest the spiritual (i.e., mental) nature of imagination, for it is not earth-bound.

In the seventeenth century, the fusion between the origins of the theories of imagination and creativity still relate to two ideas: imagination or creativity derives from outside, that is, from divine intervention (angel, muse) or from inside, that is, artistic genius. For example, Caravaggio's second version of The Inspiration of Saint Matthew (1602) in the Contarelli Chapel of the Church of San Luigi dei Francesi in Rome represents St. Matthew writing on the inspiration of the moment while guided by divine intervention, the angel. Caravaggio's painting was influenced by the Venetian Francesco Bassano, whose The Inspiration of Saint John the Evangelist (1590) in the Birmingham Museum and Art Gallery in Birmingham, England, reflects the same type of inspiration. This celestial inspiration for representations of evangelists through angelic assistance is a continuation of Christian iconographic tradition. Divine inspirations are depicted not only in Christian but also in mythological stories, and especially in French Baroque paintings.

For example, Nicolas Poussin's The Inspiration of the Epic Poet (1640) in the Louvre is a pastoral landscape in which monumental figures of Calliope (muse of heroic epic) and Apollo (god of poetry and music) assist a poet composing the hymns. Influenced by ancient sarcophagi, Poussin achieves a Hellenistic grandeur in his allegorical figures contrasting with the earthly and heavy form of the poet (Oberhuber, p. 188). Poussin differentiates between the divine (Calliope and Apollo) and the natural (poet) realms. In the natural realm, the poet seeks inspiration, which Apollo gives as he directly points to the poet's notations. In the divine realm, Calliope accompanies the Greek god without interfering with his inner inspiration.

Poussin's Inspiration of the Lyric Poet (1640) in the Niedersächsische Landesgalerie in Hanover, Germany, shows a compositional arrangement that is influenced by ancient sculptural reliefs. The poet, in a supplicant position, drinks the inspirational nectar provided by Apollo from the Castilian spring while a putto crowns him with laurel. In contrast, in The Inspiration of the Epic Poet, the poet seeks divine inspiration as Apollo guides him to write. The muse, Calliope, reverently observes the putto's coronation of the poet—an occasion of Olympian solemnity. Both paintings are examples of Poussin's use of the Hypolidian mode.

Poussin defines his theory of imagination and artistic creativity by modes, which he defines as the ratios or measures and the forms that we employ to do anything (Jouanny). The French painter enumerates the modes that derive from Pythagorean, Platonic, and Aristotelian sources. The Dorian mode was firm, grave, and severe and was applied to matters that were grave, severe, and full of wisdom. The Phrygian mode represented subjects that were vehement, furious, and highly volatile and was suitable primarily for battles. The ancients invented and employed the Ionic mode to represent dances, bacchanals, and feasts. The Lydian mode was used for mournful subjects, and the Hypolidian mode "fills the soul of the beholders with joy." These poetical paintings convey exactly John Milton's attitude in Ad Patrem as he convinces his father, in Hypolidian terms, to release him from his promise to suppress his poetic aspirations in favor of the ministry:

Do not you look down on song divine, creation of the bard, for naught graces more finely than does song and his heavenly source, his heavenly seed, his mortal mind in origin. (Patterson)

For an artist, the source of imagination does not always give benign and divine guidance. Sometimes, diabolic interference reminds the artist of the ancient saying, Ars longa vita brevis (art is long, life is short), as in Arnold Böcklin's Self Portrait with Death Playing the Fiddle (1872) in the Nationalgalerie, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz in Berlin. Here, he portrays himself in the act of painting, but he is suddenly distracted by a haunting musical sound: Death is playing a single-stringed fiddle while laughing at the artistic creation. Böcklin's portrayal of Death alludes to his and other artists' fear of artistic failure and evanescent fame.

The Renaissance representations of imagination or creativity usually are set in an artist's studio and include a painting with a religious theme and Neoplatonic references regarding the artist as creator imitating God, the divine creator. Through the centuries, however, the studio as an environment of inspiration, or a place for creation, develops a more complex meaning and begins to investigate further the source of artistic creativity, moving away from the Platonic and focusing on the Romantic interpretation of the artistic genius as a human maddening force (Levey; Bellony-Rewald). The studio becomes a center of learning for the artist, where artworks are collected, visitors are invited to see and judge works of art, and models are employed for the artist's inspiration. These circumstances can be seen in the paintings of many artists, including Willem van Haecht II's Alexander in Apelles' Studio (circa 1625) in the Bestegui Collection in Paris; Rembrandt van Rijn's Studio (1660) in the Staatliche Kunstsammlungen in Weimar, Germany; Jan Miense Molenaer's Painter's Studio (1631) in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin; Diego Velázquez's Las Meninas (1656) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain; Luca Giordano's Rubens Painting an Allegory of Peace (circa 1680), also in the Prado; François Boucher's The Painter in His Studio (circa 1770) in the Louvre; Jan Stolker's Rembrandt in His Studio (1781) in the British Museum in London; Louis-Léopold Boilly's Young Woman Seated in Front of an Easel (circa 1840) in the Pushkin Museum in Moscow; Jean Alaux's Ingres' Studio in Rome (1818) in the Musée Ingres in Montauban, France; Edward Matthew Ward's Hogarth's Studio (1863) in the City Art Gallery in York, England; Hendrik Jacobus Scholten's Princess of Orange in van der Helst's Studio (circa 1860) in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam; Nicaise de Keyser's Raphael in His Studio (1865) in a private collection in England; Gustave Courbet's L'Atelier (1855) in the Louvre; and Henri Fantin-Latour's A Studio in the Batignolles (1870) in the Louvre.

During the post-Renaissance, the visual imagery used in paintings of artists' studios paralleled the representations of artists' participation in academic centers for artistic training and exposition of their work. Although artists of this modern era were often trained and dependent on an academic center, they became interested in creating a professional studio for exhibiting and discussing their artworks with friends and patrons and in teaching about art. Examples of studios as gathering places for artists include Frederic Edwin Church's studio-palace at Olana, built in the 1870s, in New York State; the studio represented in Frédéric Bazille's The Artist's Studio (1870) in the Louvre; Augustus Saint-Gaudens's Arts Student League in New York (1892); Pablo Picasso's studio at Bateau-Lavoir in France (1904); Henri Matisse's studio-apartment at the Hotel Regina (1960s); and Jackson Pollock's barn on Long Island, New York (1960s) (Bellony-Rewald).

In the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, illustrations of the artist's imagination take on sexual overtones. The artist's muse of inspiration during the Renaissance is transformed or replaced by the nude model, an object of intellectual and physical stimulation during the modern era. Freud's impact on the concept of imagination and creativity is evident among contemporary artists and writers as they focus more on the object painted (Picasso painting his models with a phallic brush) than the subject thought (Albrecht Dürer's engraving Melancholia I, 1514).

Is there a gift of talent or genius that makes some individuals uniquely able to create? Or are ordinary individuals at times lifted by divine inspiration to a level of genius? Those who adopt the latter position have often embodied the source of Inspiration in the figure of a Muse. Originally a Greek invention to explain the creative imagination of historians, poets, dancers, and musicians, the idea has been expanded to include artists. The ancient Greeks had nine Muses—the daughters of Mnemosyne (Memory) and Zeus—who inhabited streams and had the ability to impart inspiration. They are depicted in a Roman relief found near Ostia, Italy, each with an attribute of her particular specialty. They were often associated with Apollo and depicted on Mount Helicon, or Mount Parnassus, their abode.

In the medieval period, some other form of divine aid often supplied the inspirational role of the Muses. For example, in the ninth-century Gospel Book of Archbishop Ebbo of Reims, St. Mark, a figure of swirling energy in a frenzy of creation, looks to his symbol of the winged lion with scroll for inspiration as he dips his pen into the ink pot. In the twelfth-century Gospel Book of Abbot Wedricus, St. John is helped in the writing of his Gospel by the hand of God coming out of the sky and holding a dove close to his ear.

Painters of the Renaissance put the Muses to a variety of uses, from merely decorative figures to purveyors of complex iconographic meaning. For example, Andrea Mantegna used them in his Parnassus (1497) to celebrate the marriage of Francesco Gonzaga and Isabella d'Este and to provide an allegory of marital harmony under which the arts would flourish. At the end of the nineteenth century, the winged horse Pegasus swoops down in the upper panel to touch the raised arms of the young artist in Xavier Mellery's large double painting L'Ispirazione. In the lower panel, a winged figure touches the head of a naked young man surrounded by the nine classically dressed Muses.

In more modern times, muses have often been specific women who indeed had an inspirational influence over artists. For example, in the nineteenth century, the painter Anselm Friedrich Feuerbach relentlessly and obsessively painted his model, mistress, and muse, Nanna. In the twentieth century, the prolific sculptor Gaston Lachaise produced few works that were not images of his wife, Isabel. He described their meeting:

At twenty, in Paris, I met a young American person who immediately became the primary inspiration which awakened my vision and the leading influence that has directed my forces. Throughout my career as an artist, I refer to this person by the word "Woman." (Lachaise, as quoted in Nordland, p. 8)

The voluptuous yet elegant volumes of Isabel's form were lovingly repeated with many variations in Lachaise's sculptures. According to American painter and poet Marsden Hartley, Lachaise saw "the entire universe in the form of a woman" (as quoted in Sculpture of Gaston Lachaise, p. 27), and the "woman" was clearly recognizable as Isabel.

The surrealists, who delved into the unconscious and encouraged free expression of sexuality as their source of inspiration, turned to Sigmund Freud and the Marquis de Sade in their desire to revolt against an exhausted and discredited society at the end of World War I. They experimented in automatic writing, collage, and the "collective imagination" of "Exquisite Corpses," for which each artist contributed a portion of a composition on folded paper without seeing the rest of the paper. They recast the passive-dependent nineteenth-century woman as a sensuous and surreal child of nature—ethereal, erotic, hypnotic, and transforming—and were capable of giving form to the underlying erotic energy of their art.

The name for the surrealists' muse, Gravidia, was adapted from a novella by Wilhelm Jensen about a young man who is attracted to a Roman bas-relief of a striding woman whom he names Gravidia. His obsessional dream about her leads him to visit Pompeii, Italy, where he meets a mysterious woman with Gravidia's features and walk. Sigmund Freud's analysis of this novella impressed the surrealists, and they adopted the name Gravidia for the gallery they opened in Paris and used the name as an equivalent for the muse in their paintings. Within their circle in Paris in the 1920s, Gala, the wife of the surrealist poet Paul Eluard, acted as a real-life muse, especially in her relationships with Eluard, Max Ernst, and Salvador Dalí. It is reported that whenever an especially successful painting or poem was created, the comment would be, "Ah well, he was in love with Gala then" (Chadwick, p. 50).

Whether imagination and creativity come from divine aid or good training, from imitation or invention, or from genetic genius or the inspiration of a woman, artists have found it necessary to speculate and theorize about this source and to give it a visual form in their work. Whether in the Muses, St. Luke, Ripa's emblems, the artist's studio, or Gravidia, artists have paid tribute to the mysterious forces that inspire their imagination and creativity.

See also Artists/Art

Selected Works of Art

St. Luke Painting the Virgin

Weyden, Rogier van der, Saint Luke Painting the Virgin and Child, panel, 1435–1440, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
Master of the Planet, Children of Mercury, engraving, 1460–1465, London, British Museum

Bornemann, Hinrich the Younger, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, diptych, 1499, Hamburg, Germany, Hauptkirche St. Jacobi

Coter, Colijn de, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, panel, 1505, Vieure, France, Église Notre-Dame-Allier

Manuel, Niklaus, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, panel, circa 1505, Bern, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum

Gossaert, Jan, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, panel, circa 1515, Prague, Czech Republic, National Gallery

Gossaert, Jan, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, circa 1525, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Heemskerck, Maerten van, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, 1532, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Frans Hals Museum

Vasari, Giorgio, Saint Luke Painting the Virgin, panel, 1562–1565, Florence, Italy, Santa Annunziata, Capella degli Artisti

Mignard, Pierre, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, 1695, Troyes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

The Artist in His Studio

Self-Portrait, from Noble and Famous Women, by Boccaccio, circa 1401, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Vasari, Giorgio, Zeuxis's Story, fresco, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari, Chamber of Fortune

Vasari, Giorgio, Apelles' Stories, fresco, 1554, Florence, Italy, Casa Vasari, Sala Fiorentina

Molenaer, Jan Miense, Painter's Studio, 1631, Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen

Velázquez, Diego, Las Meninas, 1656, Madrid, Prado

Giordano, Luca, Rubens Painting an Allegory of Peace, circa 1680, Madrid, Prado

Boucher, François, The Painter in His Studio, circa 1770, Paris, Louvre

Stolker, Jan, Rembrandt in His Studio, 1781, London, British Museum

Boilly, Louis-Léopold, Young Woman Seated in Front of an Easel, circa 1840, Moscow, Russia, Pushkin Museum

Alaux, Jean, Ingres' Studio in Rome, 1818, Montauban, France, Musée Ingres

Ward, Edward Matthew, Hogarth's Studio, 1863, York, England, City Art Gallery

Scholten, Hendrik Jacobus, Princess of Orange in van der Helst's Studio, circa 1860, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Keyser, Nicaise de, Raphael in His Studio, 1865, England, private collection

Courbet, Gustave, L'Atelier, oil on canvas, 1855, Paris, Louvre

Fantini-Latour, Henri, A Studio in the Batignolles, 1870, Paris, Louvre

Bazille, Frédéric, The Artist's Studio, oil on canvas, 1870, Paris, Louvre

Böcklin, Arnold, Self Portrait with Death Playing the Fiddle, 1872, Berlin, Nationalgalerie, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz

Artists' Studios

Frederic Edwin Church's studio-palace at Olana, 1870s, New York

Augustus Saint-Gaudens's Arts Student League, New York, 1892

Pablo Picasso's studio at Bateau-Lavoir, Paris, 1904

Henri Matisse's studio-apartment at Hotel Regina, 1960s

Jackson Pollock's barn on Long Island, New York, 1960s

Imitation

Chardin, Jean-Baptiste-Siméon, The Monkey-Painter, oil on canvas, circa 1740, Paris, Louvre

Ripa, Cesare, Imitazione, woodcut

Haecht, Willem van II, Alexander in Apelles' Studio, circa 1625, Paris, Bestegui Collection

Academies

Zuccaro, Federico, Drawing of Antiquity, 1585, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Veneziano, Agostino, Bandinelli's Academy in Rome, engraving, 1531, London, British Museum

Galle, Theodor, and Jan van der Straet, Dutch Studio in the Sixteenth Century, engraving, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Dürer, Albrecht, Melancholia I, engraving, 1514, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Vasari, Giorgio, Frontispiece, woodcut, from Lives, 1550

The Artist's Inspiration

The Nine Muses, relief found near Ostia, Italy, Rome, Capitoline Museum

Saint Mark, illumination from Gospel Book of Archbishop Ebbo of Reims, A.D. 816–835, Épernay, France, Municipal Library

Saint John the Evangelist, illumination from Gospel Book of Abbot Wedricus, circa 1147, Avesnes, France, Société Archéologique

Duccio, The Muses, marble relief, 1457, Rimini, Italy, Cappella San Francesco

Mantegna, Andrea, Parnassus, 1497, Paris, Louvre

Raphael, Parnassus, 1510–1511, Rome, Vatican, Stanza della Segnatura

Primaticcio, Francesco, The Nine Muses, fresco, 1539–1542, Château de Fontainebleau, Galerie Basse

Veronese, Paolo, Muse of Painting, before 1588, Detroit, Michigan, Art Institute

Bassano, Francesco, The Inspiration of Saint John the Evangelist, oil on canvas, 1590, Birmingham, England, Birmingham Museum and Art Gallery

Caravaggio, The Inspiration of Saint Matthew, oil on canvas, 1602, Rome, Church of San Luigi dei Francesi, Contarelli Chapel

Gentileschi, Orazio, and Artemisia Gentileschi, The Nine Muses, from Allegory of Peace and the Arts Under the English Crown, fresco panels, 1638–1639, London, Marlborough House

Poussin, Nicolas, The Inspiration of the Epic Poet, oil on canvas, 1640, Paris, Louvre

Poussin, Nicolas, Inspiration of the Lyric Poet, oil on canvas, 1640, Hanover, Germany, Niedersächsische Landesgalerie

Ripa, Cesare, Imaginazione, woodcut, in Iconologia, 1618

Drouais, François Hubert, Madame Du Barry as a Muse, 1771, Versailles, France, Musée

Delacroix, Eugène, The Muse of Aristotle, ceiling painting, 1845–1847, Paris, Palais de Luxemborg, Senate Library

Feuerbach, Anselm, Nanna, 1861, Karlsruhe, Germany, Staatliche Kunsthalle

Feuerbach, Anselm, Nanna, 1861, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie

Mellery, Xavier, L'Inspirazione, oil on canvas, begun 1885, Anversa, Koninklijk, Museum voor Schone Kunsten

Aman-Jean, Edmond-François, Hesiod Listening to the Inspirations of the Muse, oil on canvas, circa 1890, Los Angeles, California, Los Angeles County Museum of Art

Puvis de Chavannes, The Inspiring Muses Acclaim Genius Messenger of Light, 1895, Boston, Public Library

Rodin, Auguste, The Sculptor and His Muse, bronze sculpture, 1895, San Francisco, California, Palace of the Legion of Honor

- Rousseau, Henri, The Muse Inspiring the Poet, before 1910, Basel, Switzerland, Öffentliche Kunstsammlung
- Lachaise, Gaston, Standing Woman (Elevation), bronze sculpture, 1912–1927, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Gallery
- Chirico, Giorgio de, The Disquieting Muses, 1916–1918, Milan, Italy, private collection
- Lachaise, Gaston, La Force Éternelle (Woman with Beads), bronze sculpture, 1917, Northampton, Massachusetts, Smith College, Museum of Art
- Tanguy, Yves, Genius, oil on canvas, 1926, Paris, private collection
- Lachaise, Gaston, Standing Nude, chrome sculpture with black onyx base, 1927, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Dalí, Salvador, Gravida, pen and ink, 1930, private collection
- Picasso, Pablo, The Muse, 1937, Paris, Musée National d'Art Moderne; New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Masson, André, Gravida, 1939, Knokke-le-Zoute, Belgium, Gustave J. Neliens Collection
- Dalí, Salvador, Portrait of Gala, 1935, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Further Reading

- Armenini, De' veri precetti della pittura, Venice, Italy, 1587
- Barash, Moshe, Theories of Art: From Plato to Winckelmann, New York: New York University Press, 1985
- Barocchi, Paola, editor, Trattati d'arte del cinquecento fra maniersimo e controriforma, Bari, Italy: Laterza and Figli, 1960
- Bellony-Rewald, Alice, and Michael Peppiatt, Imagination's Chamber: Artists and Their Studios, Boston: Little, Brown, 1982
- Blunt, Anthony, Artistic Theory in Italy: 1450–1600, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1968
- _____, Nicolas Poussin, New York: Bollingen Foundation, 1957
- Bonafoux, Portraits of the Artists: The Self-Portrait in Paintings, New York: Rizzoli, 1985; London: Macmillan, 1985
- Borinski, K., Die Antike in Poetik und Kunsttheorie von Ausgan des klassischen Altertums bis auf Goethe und Wilhelm von Humboldt, Leipzig, Germany: Herder, 1914
- Chadwick, Whitney, Women Artists and the Surrealist Movement, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1985
- Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, Biographia Literaria, 1817
- de Ruvo, V., "La Concezione Estetica di Giorgio Vasari," in Studi Vasariani, Florence, Italy: G. S. Sansoni, 1952
- Freedberg, Sydney Joseph, Painting in Italy, 1500–1600, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1971
- Gedo, John, The Artist and the Emotional World: Creativity and Personality, New York: Columbia University Press, 1996
- Jensen, Wilhelm, Gravida, issued with Sigmund Freud's Delusion and Dream in Wilhelm Jensen's "Gravida," Los Angeles: Sun and Moon Press, 1993
- Jouanny, Charles, editor, Correspondence de Nicola Poussin, Paris, 1911
- Lee, Rensselaer, Ut Pictura Poesis: The Humanistic Theory of Painting, New York: New York University Press, 1967
- Levey, Michael, The Painter Depicted: Painters as a Subject in Painting, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1981
- Lomazzo, Giovanni Paola, Trattato dell' arte della pittura scultura et architettura, Milan, Italy, 1590
- Mendelsohn, Leatrice, Paragoni: Benedetto Varchi Due Lezzioni and Cinquecento Art Theory (Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan, 1968)
- Nordland, Gerald, Gaston Lachaise: The Man and His Work, New York: G. Braziller, 1974
- Oberhuber, Konrad, Poussin: The Early Years in Rome, New York: Hudson River Press, 1988
- Panofsky, Erwin, Studies in Iconology, New York: Harper, 1962; London: Macmillan, 1970
- _____, Idea: A Concept in Art Theory, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1968
- _____, Problems with Titian Mostly Iconographic, New York: New York University Press, 1969
- Patterson, Frank Allen, editor, The Complete Works of John Milton, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1940
- Prinz, Worlfram, "I ragionamenti del Vasari sullo sviluppo e decline delle arti," in Il Vasari: Storiografo e Artista, Florence, Italy: Leo S. Olschki, 1976
- Roskill, Mark, Dolce's Aretino and Venetian Art Theory of the Cinquecento, New York and London: Thames and Hudson, 1968
- The Sculpture of Gaston Lachaise*, New York: Eakins Press, 1967
- Seznec, Jean, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, New York: Harper, 1961
- Smyth, C. H., Mannerism and Maniera, New York: J. G. Augustin, 1963
- Summers, David, The Judgment of Sense, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and London: Harvard University Press, 1987
- Vasari, Giorgio, Le vite dei piu eccellenti pittori, scultori, et architettori, edited by Gaetano Milanesi, Florence, Italy, 1970
- Wind, Edgar, Pagan Mysteries in the Renaissance, New York: Norton, 1968

JOURNEY/FLIGHT

Sarah S. Gibson
Alicia Craig Faxon

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Journey/Flight:

TROJAN WAR

JASON AND THE ARGONAUTS

THESEUS

ODYSSEUS (ULYSSES)

AENEAS'S FLIGHT FROM TROY

VENUS AND ADONIS

HERO AND LEANDER

CUPID AND PSYCHE

JOURNEYS TO THE UNDERWORLD

DELUGE

PATRIARCHS

EXODUS

CHRIST'S DESCENT INTO HELL (LIMBO)

BOOK OF TOBIT

JOURNEY OF THE MAGI

FLIGHT INTO EGYPT

PRODIGAL SON

CHRIST TAKING LEAVE OF HIS MOTHER

ST. URSULA

TONDAL

OTHER PILGRIMAGES

OTHER CHRISTIAN JOURNEYS

WAR

ALLEGORICAL

DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY

TWENTIETH-CENTURY
JOURNEYS

METAPHORICAL JOURNEYS

OTHER DEPARTURES AND JOURNEYS

The Embarkation of St. Ursula, circa 1654–1656, tapestry, wool, and silk, probably designed by La Champagne La Faye, woven by Pierre Dumon, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, gift of Hugh R. Sharp Jr. and Bayard Sharp. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

A journey is described by various names: voyage, travel, trip, embarkation, flight, exodus, excursion, emigration, or immigration. Journeys are undertaken for many different reasons: to visit friends, to conquer enemies, to gain riches, to seek adventure, to flee oppressors, or to establish new homes. Travelers may set out alone with only the clothes on their backs or with families and goods in luxurious accommodations. The traveler may wander aimlessly, have a complicated itinerary, or have only magic instructions as a guide. A number of journeys are described with great length in sacred texts and works of literature. On the other hand, visual depictions of journeys are limited to one place and one instant and tend to focus on one point in the narrative. The artist often chooses the departure, some defining incident on the journey, or the traveler's return.

Departure, the act of going away or of leaving a place or person, has many aspects. It implies a separation from someone or something that may or may not be permanent and that may entail pain, sadness, or even despair. Conversely, departure is a starting forth for a new life or venture, a new course of action, or a new beginning and in this sense may embody hopefulness, excitement, or joy. The act of departure seems to be omnipresent—people have been parting from one another or from some place for one reason or another for as long as recorded time. Voluntary leave-takings are often tinged with pathos or tragedy when the viewer is aware of the outcome of the story. Sometimes, such departures are really less than voluntary because the protagonists may have been constrained to leave because of duty, economics, political pressure, or the will of the gods. Departure scenes occur widely in works of art based on myth and legend and on Old and New Testament narratives. They also occur in genre scenes.

The Trojan War provides a prototypical farewell scene when the Trojan hero Hector takes leave of his wife, Andromache, to go into battle. Their infant son, Astyanax, frightened by his father's armor, begins to cry, whereupon Hector, removing his crested helmet, takes the child in his arms to reassure him. Hector did not meet his death in the coming battle with Ajax, but medieval romances ignored this detail and preferred to think of Hector's farewell as preceding his fatal encounter with Achilles. Antecedents of the parting scene can be found in Greek paintings depicting women bestowing arms on warriors prior to the departure for battle, which in turn found their source in the mythical story of the sea goddess Thetis giving arms to her son Achilles. Early examples are The Departure of a Warrior on a lekythos (circa 450 B.C.) in the Antikenmuseum in Berlin and Hector and Paris Taking Leave of Andromache on a terra-cotta krater (circa 540 B.C.) from Vulci, Etruria, now in the University Museum in Würzburg, Germany. In the fifth century B.C., images of the bestowal of arms change to women pouring ritual wine as departure libations for the warriors as in Departure on the libation cup (circa 430 B.C., now in the Antikenmuseum in Berlin. In the eighteenth century, Hector's farewell had been codified as a theme of the conflict between duty to one's country and to one's family, as can be sensed in Charles-Antoine Coypel's Hector Taking Leave of Andromache (circa 1711) in the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Tours, France.

The theme of the departure of the warrior was reenacted in different times and places throughout the history of art. For example, Henry Nelson O'Neil's nineteenth-century painting Eastward Ho! August 1857 shows women and children bidding farewell to the soldiers as a British troop ship departs to quell the Indian Mutiny. The popularity of the painting led O'Neil to paint the sequel, Home Again, 1858, showing the returning troops welcomed home by their families.

Nineteenth-century genre painting also reflected the poignancy of emigrants forced to journey to a new land. Although emigrants could choose to stay in their country, economic forces were as ruthless in determining the necessity to leave their homeland and journey to a new land as were conquering armies or commands from divine authorities (see the essay Expulsion). The acts of departing and leave-taking are such recurrent phenomena that they occurred frequently in genre painting of this era. A vast number of other scenes of departure also have had visual interpretations, ranging from John the Baptist Leaving His Parents to Go into the Wilderness (1450–1460) by Giovanni di Paolo in the Art Institute of Chicago to The Departure of Elizabeth of France for Spain (circa 1848) by Eugène Isabey in the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore, Maryland. A much more lighthearted view in a tourism vein is depicted in Édouard Manet's The Departure of the Folkestone Boat (1869) in the Philadelphia Museum of Art in Pennsylvania.

A departure scene from the Bible that was often portrayed is that of Jesus Christ taking leave of his mother, a part of the Passion iconography. Examples include a woodcut by Albrecht Dürer from the Little Passion series (1509–1511), an Italian Renaissance painting by Correggio (before 1514) in the National Gallery in London, and an early sixteenth-century painting by Gerard David in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. The artists emphasize the pathos of the scene, which is a voluntary departure but one that is the foreordained initial episode in the tragic drama about to unfold.

Although emigration may be a journey by ship, it may also be the weary trudging of refugees on foot who were exiled from their homes for political, religious, or economic reasons. At times, emigration has been for economic reasons and at other times for religious freedom, as when the Pilgrims first left for Holland and then for North America. The history of the United States can be seen in terms of emigrations from Europe, Africa, and Asia. Some of these were voluntary (the Pilgrims) and some involuntary (the slave trade from Africa). The story has continued from the landing of the Virginia and Massachusetts Bay colonists in the seventeenth century to the migrations of the Haitian boat exiles in the 1990s. A series of emigrations have also occurred within the United States (to the West and to Alaska especially) and are summed up in art in Emmanuel Leutze's mural Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way in the Capitol in Washington, D.C.

Quite different emotions are found when considering those themes of travel undertaken by heroes in search of adventure. Heroes tend to be travelers—restless or ambitious adventurers embarking on rescues, quests, and conquests or in search of a goal. Psychiatrist Carl Jung observed that traveling is an urge of aspiration, that is, of an unsatisfied longing that never finds its goal. This would be true of Lord Byron's romantic heroes but less true of the ancient Greek heroes Jason or Theseus, who had specific goals in mind. Jung posited that the goal of the heroes was to find the lost mother, but it could also be flight from the mother's domination.

Classical sources tell of a number of journeys of heroes. One is the story of Jason, whose uncle had usurped his father's throne. When Jason requested its return, his uncle Pelias said he would restore the throne as soon as Jason brought back the Golden Fleece to Colchis. Jason built a ship of 50 oars called the Argo and was joined by 50 Argonauts, among them the heroes Hercules, Theseus, Meleagar, the Dioscuri, and Orpheus. Finally, after many adventures, Jason gained the Golden Fleece with the aid of the sorceress Medea, daughter of the keeper of the fleece. The main literary sources in classical times for this story are Pindar, a fifth-century B.C. poet, and Ovid's Metamorphoses. William Morris provided an updated version in his epic poem The Life and Death of Jason (1867). Representations in art include that of Jason seizing the Golden Fleece on a red-figure vase (circa 470–460 B.C.) by the Orchard Painter in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. J. M. W. Turner provides a more modern vision in his painting Jason (1802) and his etching and mezzotint from the painting (1807).

The story of Theseus, the son of the king of Athens, tells of many adventures on his various journeys. Perhaps best known, and most often depicted, is his journey to Crete as one of seven youths and seven maidens sent by ship as tribute to Minos, king of Crete, to be sacrificed to the Minotaur. Theseus, helped by Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, overcomes the Minotaur but abandons Ariadne on his way home. His story appealed to many artists. For example, Luca Cambiaso painted a series of frescoes, Myth of Theseus (circa 1565), for the Palazzo della Meridiana in Genoa, Italy, and André Masson executed a series of surrealist paintings, Story of Theseus (1938–1939).

Odysseus (Ulysses in Roman mythology) is the archetypal adventurer whose wanderings during the return journey to his kingdom of Ithaca following the Trojan War are detailed in Homer's Odyssey. Many works of art focus on specific encounters with danger on his journey: the Lotus-Eaters, Polyphemus the Cyclops, Circe, the Sirens, Scylla and Charybdis, Calypso, Leucothea, and Nausicaä. His return to Ithaca and his wife, Penelope, is also frequently depicted. A few works form series depicting his adventures, as Pinturicchio's Scenes from the Odyssey (circa 1480s). Of the earlier representations in the classical era, the late first-century B.C. wall paintings Voyages of Odysseus from a house on the Esquiline Hill in Rome, now in the Museo Profano in the Vatican, are the most dramatic and well preserved. His adventures have also been dealt with in many derivative works and in an opera, The Return of Ulysses (1640) by Claudio Monteverdi.

The destiny not only of the individual but of a whole people may be decided in the course of a journey. One might imagine that the Babylonian epic of Gilgamesh, with its story of the flood, was the oldest account of journeys by sea. However, it was actually antedated by a Sumerian source that depicts the water god Enki telling King Ziusudra to construct a large boat to escape the flood of seven days and seven nights, which destroyed all other life on Earth—an obvious prefiguring of the biblical account of Noah. The embarkation of Noah, his family, and two of every species of animals on Earth in the ark is another version of the destruction of the Earth by flood, told in Genesis 7:1–17. The biblical flood lasted 40 days and 40 nights and is attested to by archaeological evidence in the vicinity of Mount Ararat in Turkey, where the ark reputedly landed. It is shown in art by Jan Brueghel the Elder's Collecting the Animals on the Ark (circa 1613) at Apsley House in London; Guido Reni's The Building of the Ark (1608) in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia; and Nicolas Poussin's Winter (1664) in the Louvre in Paris from his series Seasons, which contains an ark on the waters of the flood and desperate survivors looking for refuge in the foreground. In Poussin's painting, the ark is a symbol both of baptism (waters of the flood) and of salvation. The ark is also used as a symbol of the church, thus “the Ark of our Salvation.” An American version of the scene is Charles Wilson Peale's Noah and His Ark (1815) in the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia.

Another Old Testament journey is that of Abraham leaving Ur of the Chaldees for Canaan, recounted in Genesis 12: 1–8. Giovanni Benedetto Castiglione (also known as Il Grechetto) painted several versions of Abraham's journey to the Land of Caanan. His Abraham's Journey to the Land of Canaan (circa mid-seventeenth century) concentrates on a close-up view of the patriarch with only two young travelers and a few animals.

Another patriarch who wandered extensively was Jacob, whose departures are rather frequently depicted. In Claude Lorrain's painting Landscape with the Voyage of Jacob to Canaan (1677) at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, Massachusetts, the story has become subordinate to a masterful depiction of landscape.

Another important biblical search for a new land was narrated in the book of Exodus, which describes how Moses led the children of Israel from Egypt to the Promised Land after 40 years of wandering in the wilderness (Exodus 14–40). This time, the circumstances of the departure were not so harrowing, nor was the ultimate destination unknown. Surprisingly, although the important incidents on the journey to Canaan are often illustrated—including the parting of the Red Sea, Moses receiving the tablets of the law, and the worship of the golden calf—the actual departure itself seems not to have been a favorite scene. J. M. W. Turner painted a series, Plagues of Egypt (circa 1800, Tate Gallery in London), by which Moses forced Pharaoh to release the Israelites. Cornelis Bos engraved a lively scene, Israelites Bearing the Ark Across the River Jordan (1547). The most dramatic event of the emigration—the Red Sea drowning the pursuing Egyptians after the Israelites had safely crossed it—is depicted by artists ranging from an anonymous Byzantine in Paris Psalter (circa 900, Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris) to Titian's large woodcut of the crossing, Red Sea (sixteenth century).

One of the most charming biblical journeys is that of Tobias and the angel, described in the apocryphal Book of Tobit. The young Tobias is sent by his blind father to Media to collect money due him. Tobias is accompanied by his faithful dog and by the Archangel Michael. Along the way, Tobias catches a fish in the Tigris River that they take with them as they continue their journey. Tobias collects the money and meets his cousin, Sarah, a young woman who has had seven husbands killed by a demon on the wedding night. Following the advice of Michael, Tobias burns the fish innards and exorcises the demon. Tobias returns home with the money, a wife, and the remains of the fish, which he uses as an unguent to cure Tobit's blindness. The story contains all the elements of a mythical journey—the goal achieved, the prize claimed, the woman won, and the return accomplished—plus many Christian and secular associations that were exploited in paintings. Paintings of the subject were commissioned to celebrate the journey of a favored son, with his visage becoming that of Tobias. Votive paintings of the healing of Tobit demonstrated the wish of patrons for a similar cure. The fish was associated with Christ and his ability to heal; Tobias, as a sign of filial piety and devotion, became a precursor of Christ. The story also acts as a powerful example of the comforting presence of a guardian angel. Artists illustrated all aspects of the story, but the most popular scene depicted Tobias and the angel, gaily walking along a road, often in an animated conversation. A scampering dog usually accompanies them, and sometimes Tobias carries the fish in a sort of sling. They readily evoke the camaraderie of travelers and the freedom of life on the road. Of all artists who illustrated the Book of Tobit, Rembrandt van Rijn is the artist most closely associated with it. Rembrandt painted many Bible subjects, but the Book of Tobit claims the most works of art—about 55 extant drawings, etchings, and paintings. Art historian Julius Held speculates not only that the filial piety of the story appealed to Rembrandt but also that Rembrandt's own father was blind.

In the New Testament, the journey of the Magi found in Matthew 2:1–12 is not specifically described as entailing a voyage by ship, but Benozzo Gozzoli represented it with the sea in the distance in his fresco Procession of the Magi (1459–1463) in the Palazzo Medici-Riccardi in Florence, Italy. Although this fresco implies a sea journey, most representations of the journey of the Magi do not include this detail. In the foreground of his painting The Adoration of the Magi (1423), Gentile da Fabriano shows the Three Kings offering their gifts to the Christ Child while in the background the same figures are mounted on horses in a large procession making their way into the city. In the nineteenth century, James Tissot shows the Magi at the head of a long camel caravan winding through mountains in his painting The Journey of the Magi (circa 1894).

Journeys in the form of flights are undertaken to escape destruction or imprisonment. A notable classical flight, detailed in book I of Virgil's Aeneid, was forced on Aeneas, a Trojan leader, by the fall of Troy to the Greeks, leaving the hero to embark on a series of adventures ending with the transplanting of Greek culture to Latium, or Italy. The Christians were inventive in adapting pagan themes to demonstrate continuity between the pagan and Christian worlds. For them, the image of Aeneas and his old father, Anchises, came to symbolize God's design for the unification of the civilized world under Rome as well as the spread of the faith from that divinely ordained seat of Christendom founded by Aeneas's descendants. Aeneas's flight can be understood on several levels: historical, cultural, religiously symbolic, and moral, by way of injunction to practice filial piety. Raphael's incorporation of a figure of a young man carrying an older one on his back in the fresco The Fire in the Borgo (1514–1517) in the Stanza dell'Incendio in the Vatican was an immediately recognizable symbol for Rome. Andrea Alciati's emblem "Pietas filiorum in parentes" (emblem 49 in Viri Clarissimi D. Andrea Alciati, Emblematum Liber, 1531) was understood by Renaissance humanists as an ethical and moral message. Federico Barocci's The Flight of Aeneas from Troy (1598) and Gian Lorenzo Bernini's Aeneas, Anchises and Ascanius (circa 1619), both in the Borghese Gallery in Rome, each developed versions of the subject in different media—Barocci in paint, Bernini in marble—that conveyed these multiple layers of meaning to the viewer. The eighteenth century retained an interest in classical allusions, but moral and ethical precepts became so attenuated that Pierre Lepautre's marble rendition of Aeneas and Anchises (1716) was relegated to the Tuileries Gardens in Paris.

Aeneas's departure from Troy was not only a departure for a new land but also a flight that had a biblical counterpart in the Gospel story of the flight of Mary, Joseph, and the Christ Child to Egypt. In the New Testament, the flight into Egypt can be seen as a journey forced by Herod's resolve not to be supplanted as king of the Jews. The story of the escape of Mary, Joseph, and the Christ Child into Egypt is told in Matthew 2 and shown in works such as Giotto's fresco (1305–1306) in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy; Cosimo Tura's The Flight into Egypt (fifteenth century) in New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art; and Philipp Otto Runge's Rest on the Flight into Egypt (1805–1806) among others.

Examples of the story abound in various media. The illuminated manuscript Les Très Belles Heures of the Duke of Berry (circa 1400) shows Flight into Egypt taking place in a wintry landscape with bare ground and trees. Martin Schongauer's engraving (circa 1470) and Albrecht Dürer's woodcut (1504–1505) of this subject employ similar forest backgrounds, Dürer having been influenced by Schongauer. In Schongauer's rendition, a palm tree is bent downward by an angel to provide dates to feed the Christ Child. Sometime before 1515, Joachim de Patinir painted Flight into Egypt, now in the Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten in Antwerp, Belgium, in which the tiny figures are set in a vast landscape spotted with buildings. Annibale Carracci's Flight into Egypt (1600–1604) in Galleria Doria-Pamphili in Rome is set in the Roman Campagna, echoing Patinir's formula of an ideal landscape as a setting for small figures from religious stories.

Historical flights, too, found visual interpreters, such as Napoleon's Retreat from Moscow (1879) painted by Robert Gibb II. The subject had also been depicted previously in Jean-Louis-Ernest Meissonier's 1814 (1864) and in Théodore Géricault's series of lithographs Return from Russia (1818). Another historical flight, James II of England Fleeing After the Battle of the Boyne (1888), was painted by Andrew Carrick Gow.

Love is also an incentive for embarking on journeys and for restraining loved ones who wish to leave. One celebrated encounter in classical mythology was that of Venus, the goddess of love, and the mortal youth Adonis. In the Metamorphoses, Ovid says that Orpheus told the tale to an audience of birds and animals, saying that Venus departed first, returning to her swan-drawn chariot. Most artists since the Renaissance have preferred to follow Titian in his Venus and Adonis (1553, Prado in Madrid, Spain) in picturing the dramatic moment when Venus attempts to restrain or dissuade her lover from leaving her for his hunt. As a reminder of Venus's own departure, Titian's painting includes, in the upper right, a tiny figure of the goddess in a chariot from which a ray of light descends to a grove of trees, where Adonis lies mortally wounded. Later artists usually omit this part of the story but often include a small Cupid aiding his mother in trying to restrain Adonis, as in Jean-Baptiste Regnault's painting of 1810 in the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Rouen, France.

Another lovers' parting, destined to be their last, was that of Hero and Leander, a tale best known from Musaeus's Greek poem of the late fourth or fifth century A.D. These star-crossed lovers lived on opposite sides of the Hellespont, and every night Hero lit a torch in a tower to guide Leander as he swam to her from Abydos on the Asian shore. One night during a storm, the torch was extinguished, and Leander drowned. On finding his body, Hero threw herself into the sea and was drowned. Artists usually chose to depict the moments when Leander drowns while Hero waits and looks for him or when his corpse is being pulled from the sea. There are a few exceptions, however, such as J. M. W. Turner, who chose to show their previous night's parting, perhaps as a portent of dire things to come, in The Parting of Hero and Leander (1837) in the National Gallery in London. Turner also painted another famous departure of a lover, that of Aeneas from Dido in The Departure of the Fleet (1850) in the Tate Gallery in London. Aeneas's parting from Dido is usually referred to as an abandonment and was an endlessly popular theme for many centuries.

The journey of the princess Psyche in search of Cupid is also a familiar tale from The Golden Ass of Apuleius. Curious about the lover she had never seen, Psyche spills a drop of oil from her lamp on the sleeping Cupid, causing him to leave her. She wanders the Earth, fulfilling seemingly impossible tasks set for her by the jealous Aphrodite (Venus) in order to find him again. She finally reaches Mount Olympus and is reunited with Cupid. The story has often been used to represent the searching and frustrations of the human soul and the final reunion in death. Many artists have depicted the theme. The most common subject is Psyche's first sight of the sleeping Cupid, but other artists have depicted the wandering of Psyche and her marriage to Cupid on Olympus. The story of Psyche was frequently used for cycles of fresco decorations, as by Giulio Romano (1528) in the Palazzo del Tè in Mantua, Italy, and series of prints, such as those by Max Klinger (1880).

Another form of the journey frequently depicted in art is the pilgrimage. Although all the major religions involve pilgrimages to sacred places (Muslims are instructed to visit Mecca, Saudi Arabia, at least once), Christian works of art have left the most copious record in art. The first goal of Christian pilgrimages was to visit the sites associated with the life of Jesus Christ. In the fourth century, Helena, the mother of Emperor Constantine, erected the Church of the Holy Sepulcher on the site of the tomb she identified as that of Jesus Christ. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher was later replicated in Europe and became a substitute goal for the pilgrim, especially when the original sites became more difficult to visit. Soon the burial places of saints and the sites of their martyrdoms also became the goal of pilgrims. Journeys to sacred sites were increasingly undertaken to expiate sins and to acquire relics. A series of hospices, the most famous being in the Alpine passes at Simplon, Septimer, and Great St. Bernard and at St. James of Compostela in Santiago, Spain, were set up to shelter pilgrims on their journeys. Even as late as the nineteenth century, Lourdes, France, became a new pilgrimage site.

In Japan, where pilgrims once walked the 900-mile circuit of the 88 Buddhist temples on the island of Shikoku, the birthplace of the great eighth-century Buddhist monk and teacher Kokai, tens of thousands now take a high-speed bus tour. Even in modern secular culture, fans of rock stars and other celebrities make pilgrimages to sites associated with their heroes. For example, Graceland, the home of Elvis Presley in Memphis, Tennessee, hosts hundreds of thousands of fans who come to visit his grave or participate in the Elvis Presley International Tribute Week.

In works of art, Christian pilgrims can be recognized by their attributes: a gray hooded cowl with a broad belt and a red cross, a broad-brimmed hat, staff, sack, and a gourd or scallop shell. Saints James the Greater, Roch, Bridget, and Alexis are often depicted in this garb in paintings and sculpture. St. James, for example, in the 1490 painting Saint James the Greater by Bartolomeo Vivarini in the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles, California, carries a staff on which a scallop shell hangs, an attribute derived from the distinctive badge worn by pilgrims to the saint's shrine at Santiago de Compostela in Spain.

One of the most intriguing pilgrimages depicted in art is that of St. Ursula. The story is taken from the Golden Legend by Jacobus da Voragine, archbishop of Genoa, Italy, in the thirteenth century. It tells of Ursula, a princess of Cornwall who agreed to marry the pagan son of the king of Britain if he became a Christian and waited three years while she went on a pilgrimage to Rome. The prince decided to become a convert. They set out together for Rome, where he was to be baptized. Ursula was accompanied by 10 female virgin companions whose numbers were multiplied somewhere along the line into 11,000: 1,000 for each of the original 10 and another 1,000 for Ursula herself. (The increase is probably due to misreading the numerals on an inscription.) Making stops at Cologne, Germany, and Basel, Switzerland, they eventually reached Rome, where they were married by the pope. On the return trip, Ursula met her martyrdom when the Huns besieging Cologne massacred them.

Among the most enchanting depictions of the 11,000 virgins is Hans Memling's châsse (reliquary, 1489) made of gilded wood in the form of a Gothic church shrine with six painted panels detailing the narrative events and now located in the Hospital of St. John in Bruges, Belgium. In 1490–1498 in Venice, Italy, Vittore Carpaccio also painted a series of nine canvases incorporating new elements into the Ursula legend. Claude Lorrain took up the theme in Seaport with the Embarkation of St. Ursula (1641), now in the National Gallery in London, showing a majestic seaport in which the figures have become subordinate to the setting. The Embarkation of St. Ursula is also shown in a French tapestry woven by Pierre Dumon (1654–1656), now in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. Here, the princess with attendants is pictured on the left and the ships, ready to sail, on the right. The textures of the robes, trees, waves, and sails are marvelously captured. The organization of the tapestry is similar to Claude Lorrain's paintings in which the sun illuminates the horizon and grandiose buildings line the harbor. Lorrain painted a number of harbor scenes, some of them showing specific embarkations, such as The Embarkation of the Queen of Sheba (1640), also in the National Gallery in London.

Some of the more disturbing travelers are those who have no destination or home to which to return. Such was Ahasuerus, the Wandering Jew, who mocked Christ on the road to Calvary and was condemned to wander over the face of the earth until Judgment Day. Gustave Doré's illustrations of the legend (1857) echo the original curse, as Ahasuerus seeks rest in his wanderings over continents and centuries. When the Jew ascends a mountain road, a wayside cross recalls his sin; when he seeks refuge in an inn, an angel blocks his way; on the Rhine, the waters reflect the face of Christ; and in a graveyard, the Jew's shadow assumes the shape of Christ bearing the cross. Despite his courting every danger, he cannot rest. Finally, at the Last Judgment, he sinks into a pit of demons.

Life is depicted allegorically as a journey. In Thomas Cole's series of four paintings The Voyage of Life (1840) at the Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute in Utica, New York, the stages of life from birth to old age are shown as a voyage that begins in childhood and moves toward a heavenly vision in old age.

An allegorical use of the journey can also be seen in Jean-Antoine Watteau's The Embarkation for Cythera (1717) in the Louvre in Paris. Another version, Pilgrimage to Cythera, painted two years later, is in the Charlottenburg Palace in Berlin. Cythera is the island where Venus (Aphrodite) reputedly was born. Water and snow-peaked mountains are visible in the distance, however, the elegantly dressed courtiers in the foreground, in different stages of falling in love, may be the real subject of the painting, representing a progressive pilgrimage into the experience and commitment of love. This painting of a journey to Venus's symbolic island of love is sometimes regarded as a happy journey, as the dream of love fulfilled, and sometimes as a journey tinged by melancholy and sadness, a symbol of the disillusion and ephemeral nature of love. It has also been suggested that the painting shows not a joyous departure but a return filled with regret (Levey, p. 181). Art historian Donald Posner reminds us that a voyage to Cythera was an established topos and an old literary theme, whereas a return was not (Posner, Antoine Watteau, p. 192). Watteau suggests ambiguity of emotion (are these people sad or happy?) and of direction (are they coming or going?). His treatment of the pictorial space underscores the ambiguity inherent in the painting, making possible these multivalent explications, all revolving around the universal theme of the journey.

The return of the traveler is depicted in many paintings. Odysseus returning to his patient wife, Penelope, is perhaps the most common theme from classical sources. The soldier returning from war has evoked many poignant genre paintings. Perhaps the most often painted biblical return is that of the prodigal son.

In Christian teaching, the parable of the prodigal son (Luke 15:11–32) is concerned with the ultimate redemption of humankind. The prodigal, asking for and receiving his share of his father's estate, departs from the paternal home and, after wasting his substance, returns home, begging forgiveness. In medieval thought and depictions, these events were symbolically significant, and often the inclusion of allegorical figures emphasized the point. The story of the prodigal son is equated with the journey of humanity away from God and its ultimate reconciliation with Him. The medieval habit of typological exegesis emphasizes the parallels between the Old and the New Testaments and presents Adam as the precursor of the prodigal (Verdier, p. 25). A tapestry set (circa 1485) in the J. B. Speed Museum in Louisville, Kentucky, and the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore reflects these interpretations.

By the sixteenth century, the moral significance of the parable had become more important than its liturgical and typological implications. The story was portrayed as a dramatic narrative rather than a series of symbolic scenes. Some episodes, such as the prodigal's departure, his repentance among the swine, and his return home, were emphasized over others, as shown in Philips Galle's series of engravings after Maerten van Heemskerck's Parable of the Prodigal Son (1562; Haeger, 1988, p. 127). Heemskerck includes a scene that, although without a direct biblical source, had earlier become part of the story: the expulsion of the prodigal from the inn by the courtesans. Thus, the fundamental story of sin, suffering, repentance, and forgiveness is reduced to the essentials that show God's ultimate mercy.

Art historian Barbara Haeger points out that the parable accorded well with the Protestant belief that one is saved by grace alone and that merit plays no part in redemption (Haeger, 1986, p. 134). Thus, Cornelis Anthonisz's set of six woodcuts from the 1540s can be regarded as a sectarian interpretation of the parable. Anthonisz reverts to the medieval practice of including allegorical figures not in the biblical text, such as a figure of Conscientia (Conscience), who holds up to the departing youth the tablets of the law on which he turns his back. Also included in this series is the scene of his expulsion from the inn by the courtesans.

Perhaps the most famous representation of the Return of the Prodigal Son is the oil painting (circa 1668–1669) by Rembrandt in the Hermitage. Here we see the son, returning from his journey, kneeling at his father's feet, his clothes patched and torn, his bare feet protruding from the wreck of his shoes. His face is partially hidden in the embrace of his father's welcoming arms. Rembrandt painted this work a short time before his death in 1669. He may have been seeing himself as a prodigal son returning to God at the end of his life. In the hidden face of the voyager and in his position looking into the picture, however, he may also stand in the place of the viewer, implying that we are all prodigal children, returning to the embrace of our Father's love from our earthly voyaging. In the early twentieth century, John Collier switched the gender and produced a painting of the return of The Prodigal Daughter (1903), her gaudy clothes revealing the life she has led. The open Bible on the table of the sparsely furnished home and her plainly dressed, austere parents reveal the confining morals of the home she once left and to which she has now chosen to return.

The journey to the underworld includes classical and Christian examples. The voluntary journey to the underworld is rarely taken for pleasure or even curiosity; this journey usually involves the fulfillment of a task or the deliverance of a loved one. In Mesopotamian mythology, Gilgamesh negotiates Enkidu's return from the underworld, and Dumuzi achieves the return of Ishtar (or Inanna). However, Dumuzi, like Persephone in Greek myth, must spend six months of every year in the netherworld. Orpheus, by playing his seductive music, convinces Pluto, the king of the classical underworld, to allow him to bring back his dead wife, Euridyce, from Hades, only to lose her at the entrance because he could not keep from looking at her. The hero Hercules makes two trips to Hades, the first time as one of his labors to bring back the three-headed guardian dog Cerberus from Hades and the other time to restore Alcestis to the land of the living. Aeneas goes to the underworld to consult his dead father, Anchises, about his destiny, and Odysseus makes a similar journey to consult the seer Tiresias, his own mother Anticleia, and other shades for directions to return home to Ithaca.

In Christian art, Christ takes a journey to hell, or Limbo, after his entombment to liberate the Old Testament patriarchs, prophets, martyrs, and forebears. The story appears in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus. Depictions, although rare after the sixteenth century, often include Christ holding the banner of the Resurrection, smiting Satan, and extending a hand to an elderly Adam and Eve, followed by Moses, David, John the Baptist, and others.

Another method of taking a journey is through the medium of the dream, as in the Vision of Tondal, originally a twelfth-century story of a knight who in a dream visits hell, purgatory, and heaven. His visions are graphically illustrated in an illuminated manuscript from 1474, perhaps by Simon Marmion, in the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles, California.

The most famous, and the best illustrated, journey to hell is that by Dante and Virgil in the thirteenth-century Divine Comedy. Dante's graphic descriptions of the 24 circles of hell and the sinners that inhabit them have influenced the conception of the underworld reflected in world literature and art ever since.

The artistic depictions of the underworld range from the merely dark and gloomy to the horrible and monstrous. Greek and Roman depictions of Hades, mainly in vase paintings, concentrate on the actions of the figures rather than the background. The classical Hades seems to be a murky mirror of life above ground, with the pomp and ceremony of the court of Pluto and Persephone, much like that of earthly rulers. Depictions of the Christian hell, on the other hand, usually focus on the horrendous monsters and devils torturing sinners, with the travelers usually cast as observers. The many illustrators of Dante include such diverse artists as Botticelli, Luca Signorelli, William Blake, Gustave Doré, and Robert Rauschenberg. They have used a series of scenes from the narrative, and they give the best sense of the progress of a journey. Only Nardo di Cione's fresco in Sta. Maria Novella in Florence follows Dante's description of hell and manages to depict all the 24 circles in one fresco.

Another category of journeying might be the metaphorical, or imaginary, journey. One such journey is the journey of the soul, illustrated as early as an Egyptian ceiling painting in the tomb of Ramses VI (1137 B.C.) in the Valley of the Kings in Egypt. Here, the departed pharaoh's soul is shown journeying through the skies in a soul boat to reach the other world. In the nineteenth century, the metaphorical journey was symbolized by Odilon Redon's L'Oeil, comme un ballon bizarre, se dirige vers l'infini (1882, "The eye, like a bizarre balloon, directs itself toward the infinite"). Edvard Munch described a metaphorical journey of two souls meeting in space in Encounter in Space (1899), a color woodcut. In the twentieth century, Adolph Gottlieb, among others, described a metaphorical journey of despair in Descent into Darkness (1947), now in the Museum of Modern Art in New York. Although the composition is abstract, the deepening blue of the ground and the figure pointing downward accurately describe a journey of melancholy and sadness.

The theme of journeying has had other significant visual representations in the twentieth century. Max Beckmann's triptych Departure (1921–1933) in the Museum of Modern Art in New York commemorates his departure from Nazi Germany, first to Holland, then to the United States. The central panel shows a boat with a mother and child and two oarsmen, and the two side panels detail the Nazi atrocities the voyagers are fleeing. Ljubov Popova's oil painting The Traveler (1915) employs a vocabulary of the flattened forms of cubism and the repeated diagonals of futurism to give the dynamism of a traveler moving in space. The African American artist Jacob Lawrence produced a series of tempera paintings on journeying in The Migration of the Negro (1940–1944), now in the Phillips Collection in Washington, D.C. He shows the migrants leaving southern towns to come north to work, especially in the war industry.

Probably because of her own frequent relocations, surrealist artist Remedios Varo executed a number of paintings of mythic journeys. Her Exploration of the Sources of the Onnoco River depicts a woman in a fanciful boat and combines a real journey in Venezuela with imaginary explorations in a surrealist vocabulary. Journeys in space are celebrated in Robert Rauschenberg's Stoned Moon (1969), a series of 33 lithographs commemorating the flight of the spacecraft Apollo XI, the first manned flight to the moon.

Literary sources for journeying abound, from the Odyssey to the present. For example, the theme of Ulysses' adventures inspired Alfred, Lord Tennyson's poem "Ulysses." Tennyson perhaps best sums up the archetypal compulsion of the journey in this poem:

I cannot rest from travel: I will drink
Life to the lees . . . I am become a name
For always roaming with a hungry heart . . .
I am part of all that I have met;
Yet all experience is an arch where thro'
Gleams that untravell'd world whose margin fades, for ever and for ever when I move . . .
"To strive, to seek, to find and not to yield."

In twentieth-century poetry, this quest is summed up by T. S. Eliot in Four Quartets, in part III of "The Dry Salvages": "Not fare well / But fare forward, voyager." Perhaps the best known twentieth-century literary use of the Ulysses theme is James Joyce's monumental novel Ulysses, which places the stream-of-consciousness, interior monologues of the main Dublin characters (Stephen Dedalus, Leopold Bloom, and his wife, Molly Bloom) into the structure of the Homeric poem. Henri Matisse illustrated Joyce's Ulysses with six etchings: Calypso, Nausicaä, Circe, Aeolus, Polyphemus, and Ithaca (1935).

Lord Byron's life was a series of journeys in foreign lands, ending in his death in 1824 in Missolonghi, fighting for Greek independence. Many of his heroes, like himself, felt themselves to be exiles embarking on numerous voyages, as in his poems Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Manfred, and Don Juan, among others. These in turn were illustrated by a number of nineteenth-century artists, among them J. M. W. Turner, whose Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1832) is in the Tate Gallery in London; Ford Madox Brown in Manfred on the Jungfrau in Manchester; John Martin in Manfred in Birmingham, England; and Eugène Delacroix in The Shipwreck of Don Juan in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris.

The subject of journeys has fascinated writers and artists. Each individual's experience includes the adventure of leaving home, the mysterious appeal of the unknown, and the pleasure of the warm welcome of return. Thus, the events of one's own life can resonate with the many narratives and depictions of the traveler, the pilgrim, and the wanderer.

See also Funeral/Burial; Path/Road/Crossroads; Visiting/Visitation

Selected Works of Art

Trojan War

Hector and Paris Taking Leave of Andromache, terra-cotta krater, circa 540 B.C., from Vulci, Etruria, Würzburg, Germany, University Museum

Kleophrades Painter, Attic Painter, Patroclus Taking Leave of Achilles, attic red-figured stamnos, early fifth century B.C., Rome, Villa Giulia

The Departure of a Warrior, lekythos, circa 450 B.C., Berlin, Antikenmuseum

Departure, libation cup, circa 430 B.C., Berlin, Antikenmuseum

Coypel, Charles-Antoine, Hector Taking Leave of Andromache, circa 1711, Tours, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Restout, Jean, Hector Taking Leave of Andromache, painting, 1728, New York, collection of Mrs. Ruth Blumka

Kauffman, Angelica, Hector Taking Leave of Andromache, painting, circa 1769, London, Tate Gallery

Gianni, Felice, Hector's Farewell to Andromache Before His Battle with Ajax, drawing, circa 1815, New York, Cooper-Hewitt Museum

Chirico, Giorgio di, Hector and Andromache, painting, 1917, Milan, Italy, collection of Gianni Mattioli

Chirico, Giorgio di, Hector and Andromache, painting, 1954, Rome, collection of Vittorio de Sica

Jason and the Argonauts

Orchard Painter, Jason, red-figured krater, 470–460 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Antonio, Filarete, Jason and the Argonauts, relief, bronze doors, 1433–1445, Vatican, St. Peter

Turner, J. M. W., Jason, oil, 1802, London, Clore Gallery

Engel, Josef, The Amazons and the Argonauts, marble sculpture, circa 1851, Royal Collection, Osborne House, Isle of Wight

Ernst, Max, The Argonauts, painting, 1933, Paris, Jacques Tronche Collection

Beckmann, Max, The Argonauts, triptych, 1949–1950, New York, private collection

Theseus

Uccello, Paolo, Episodes from the Myth of Theseus, painting, circa 1460, Seattle, Washington, Art Museum

Cambiaso, Luca, Myth of Theseus, series of five frescoes, circa 1565, Genoa, Italy, Palazzo della Meridiana

Canova, Antonio, Theseus and the Minotaur, marble sculpture, 1781–1783, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Masson, André, Story of Theseus, series of paintings, 1938–1939, private collection

Odysseus (Ulysses)

Agesandros of Rhodes, Akonadorus and Polydorus of Rhodes, Odysseus's Voyages, marble, 175–150 B.C., Sperlonga Museum

Voyages of Odysseus, fresco, first century B.C., Vatican, Museo Profano

Apollonio di Giovanni di Tomasso, The Adventures of Ulysses, painting, mid-fifteenth century, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute

Pinturicchio, Scenes from the Odyssey, oil, circa 1480s, London, National Gallery of Art

Jordaens, Jacob, Odysseus and Polyphemus, painting, circa 1530–1635, Moscow, Russia, Pushkin Museum
 Preller, Friedrich the Elder, Seven Landscapes from the Odyssey, 1830, Leipzig, Germany, Bildenden Künste
 Matisse, Henri, Calypso; Nausicaä; Circe; Aeolus; Polyphemus; Ithaca, etchings for Ulysses, by James Joyce, 1935
 Picasso, Pablo, Ulysses and the Sirens, painting, 1947, Antibes, France, Musée Grimaldi Manship, Paul, Circe Enchants Ulysses' Sailors, bronze statuette, 1957, Washington, D.C., National Museum of American Art

Aeneas' Flight from Troy

Aeneas Carrying Anchises from Troy, attic black-figured amphora, circa 500 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
Caricature of Aeneas Rescuing Anchises and Ascanius from Troy, Roman wall painting from Herculaneum, first century A.D., Naples, Italy, National Museum
 Raphael, The Fire in the Borgo, fresco, 1514–1517, Vatican, Stanze dell'Incendio
 Alciati, Andrea, Pietas Filiorum in Parentes, woodcut from Viri Clarissimi D. Andrea Alciati, Emblematum Liber, 1531, Augsburg, Germany
 Barocci, Federico, The Flight of Aeneas from Troy, painting, 1598, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Aeneas, Anchises and Ascanius, marble sculpture, circa 1619, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Lepautre, Pierre, Aeneas and Anchises, marble sculpture, 1716, Paris, Tuileries Gardens
 Van Loo, Carle, The Flight from Troy, painting, 1729, Paris, Louvre
 Guiard, Laurent, Aeneas and Anchises, terra-cotta sculpture, circa 1737, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University, The Art Museum
 Turner, J. M. W., The Departure of the Fleet, painting, 1850, London, Tate Gallery

Venus and Adonis

Titian, Venus and Adonis, painting, 1553, Madrid, Prado
 Mignard, Nicolas, Venus and Adonis, painting, circa 1650, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Institute of Art
 Boullongue, Louis, Venus and Adonis, painting, 1688, Versailles, France, National des Châteaux des Versailles et de Trianon
 Lemoyne, François, Venus and Adonis, painting, 1729, Stockholm, Sweden, Nationalmuseum
 Regnault, Jean-Baptiste, Venus and Adonis, painting, 1810, Rouen, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Hero and Leander

Carracci, Annibale, Hero and Leander, fresco, 1597–1600, Rome, Palazzo Farnese, Galleria
 Etty, William, The Parting of Hero and Leander, painting, circa 1827, London, Tate Gallery
 Turner, J. M. W., The Parting of Hero and Leander, painting, 1837, London, National Gallery

La Farge, John, Swimmer: Leander, watercolor, 1866, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery
 Manship, Paul, Leander, bronze statuette, 1955, St. Paul, Minnesota, Museum of Art

Cupid and Psyche

Sellaio, Jacopo del, The Story of Cupid and Psyche, pair of paintings, circa 1490, Cambridge, England, Fitzwilliam Museum
 Romano, Giulio, The Story of Psyche, cycle of 23 frescoes, 1528, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo del Tè, Sala di Psiche
 Giambologna, Psyche, marble statue, circa 1570–1572, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
 Jordaens, Jacob, Jupiter's Eagle Helping Psyche to Fetch Water from the Styx, painting, circa 1652, Pau, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Klinger, Max, Cupid and Psyche, cycle of 46 etchings, 1880
 Rodin, Auguste, Zephyr and Psyche, marble statue, before 1906, Paris, Musée Rodin

Journeys to the Underworld

Hades' Kingdom, with Hercules and Cerberus, Apulian krater, Karlsruhe, Germany, Badische Landesmuseum
 Mantegna, Andrea, Orpheus in the Underworld, ceiling fresco, 1468–1474, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo Ducale, Camera degli Sponsi
 Dosso Dossi, Aeneas in the Elysian Fields, 1525–1530, Ottawa, Ontario, Gallery of Canada
 Giulio Romano, Orpheus Playing in Hades Before Pluto and Proserpine, fresco, 1527–1528, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo del Tè, Sala di Ovidio
 Brueghel, Jan the Elder, Aeneas with the Sibyl in the Underworld, circa 1600, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Guercino, Ulysses and Tiresias in Hades, 1615–1617, Cento, Italy, Pinacoteca Civica
 Coypel, Antoine, The Descent of Aeneas into Hades, 1616–1617, Paris, Louvre
 Jordaens, Jacob, Odysseus Taking Leave of Circe and Descending into Hades, circa 1630–1635, Ponce, Puerto Rico, Museo de Arte
 Campen, Jacob van, Hercules Hauling Cerberus Out of the Underworld, circa 1645, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Maulbertsch, Franz Anton, Orpheus in the Underworld, Playing for Pluto and Proserpina, circa 1785–1786, Graz, Austria, Graf Collection
 Delacroix, Eugène, Hercules Bringing Alcestis Back from the Underworld, 1862, Washington, D.C., Phillips Gallery
 Leighton, Frederic, Hercules Wrestling with Death for the Body of Alcestis, 1869–1871, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
 Corinth, Lovis, Ulysses in the Underworld, etching from Antique Legends series, 1919

Deluge

Noah's Ark, miniature from A French Book of Hours, fifteenth century, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery (W. 292)

Leaving the Ark, miniature from Bedford Book of Hours, circa 1423, London, British Library (Add. Ms. 18850, fol. 166)
 Reni, Guido, The Building of the Ark, oil on canvas, 1608, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Brueghel, Jan the Elder, Collecting the Animals on the Ark, oil, circa 1613, London, Apsley House
 Castiglione, Giovanni Benedetto, Noah Loading the Animals into the Ark, painting, circa 1630, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Poussin, Nicolas, Winter, oil, 1664, Paris, Louvre
 Peale, Charles Wilson, Noah and His Ark, oil, 1815, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts

Patriarchs

Castiglione, Giovanni Benedetto, Abraham's Journey to the Land of Canaan, painting, second quarter of seventeenth century, Cambridge University, Fitzwilliam Museum
 Claude Lorrain, Landscape with the Voyage of Jacob to Canaan, painting, 1677, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute
 Giordano, Luca, Rebecca's Journey to Canaan, painting, 1685–1687, Madrid, Prado

Exodus

Byzantine School, Paris Psalter, manuscript, circa 900, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
 Bos, Cornelis, Israelites Bearing the Ark Across the River Jordan, engraving, 1547
 Castiglione, Francesco, Exodus of the Hebrews, painting, last quarter of the seventeenth century, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Titian, Red Sea, sixteenth century, woodcut
 Turner, J. M. W., The Fifth Plague of Egypt, oil on canvas, exhibited 1800, Indianapolis, Indiana, Museum of Art
 Turner, J. M. W., The Tenth Plague of Egypt, oil on canvas, exhibited 1802, London, Tate Gallery

Christ's Descent into Hell (Limbo)

Harrowing of Hell, illuminated manuscript Staatsbibliothek Psalter, thirteenth century, Munich, Germany, Staatsbibliothek (I, V.13, fol.27)
 Duccio, Descent into Limbo, from Maestà Polyptych, 1308–1311, Siena, Italy, Duomo
Harrowing of Hell, illuminated manuscript Holkham Bible, circa 1320–1330, London, British Museum (Ms.Add. 47682, fol. 34r)
 Bonaiuti, Andrea, The Descent into Limbo, fresco, circa 1472, Florence, Italy, Santa Maria Novella, Spanish Chapel
 Bellini, Giovanni, Descent into Limbo, 1475–1480, Bristol, England, Museum and Art Gallery
 Dürer, Albrecht, Christ's Descent into Limbo, 1510, woodcut

Book of Tobit

Book of Tobit, sculpture on archivolt, 12 episodes, thirteenth century, Chartres, France, Cathedral, north door of transept

Pollaiuolo, Antonio, Tobias and the Archangel Raphael, 1464, Turin, Italy, Pinacoteca Real
Tobias and the Angel, circa 1467, London, National Gallery
 Botticini, Francesco, Tobias and the Three Angels, circa 1470, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Lippi, Filippino, Tobias and the Angel, oil, before 1504, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Hemessen, Jan van, Tobit's Sight Restored, 1555, Paris, Louvre
 Matteo, Rosselli, The Guardian Angel, first half of the seventeenth century, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
 Parrocel, Pierre, The Book of Tobit, 14 paintings, late seventeenth century, Marseilles, France, Musée Borely
 Elsheimer, Adam, Tobias and the Archangel Raphael Returning with the Fish, circa 1610, London, National Gallery
 Lastman, Pieter, Wedding Night of Tobias and Sarah, 1611, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
 Domenichino, Landscape with Tobias Laying Hold of the Fish, 1617–1618, London, National Gallery
 Lastman, Pieter, The Angel, Tobias, and the Fish, oil, circa 1630, Budapest, Hungary, Museum of Fine Arts
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Tobias Healing His Father's Blindness, 1636, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie
 Rembrandt van Rijn, The Angel Raphael Leaving the Family of Tobias, 1637, Paris, Louvre
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Tobit and Anna Waiting, 1659, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum van der Vorm
 Steen, Jan, Marriage of Tobias, 1667–1668, Brunswick, Germany, Staatliches Herzog Anton-Ulrich Museum
 Steen, Jan, The Angel Raphael Casting out the Devil Asmodeus, before 1679, The Hague, The Netherlands, Museum Bredius
 Turner, J. M. W., Tivoli: Tobias and the Angel, circa 1835, London, Tate Gallery

Journey of the Magi

Gentile da Fabriano, The Adoration of the Magi, tempera on wood panel, 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Sassetta, Journey of the Magi, tempera and gold on panel, circa 1435, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Gozzoli, Benozzo, Procession of the Magi, fresco, 1459–1463, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Medici-Riccardi
 Tissot, James, The Journey of the Magi, oil on canvas, circa 1894, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Institute of Art

Flight into Egypt

Giotto, The Flight into Egypt, fresco, 1305–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
 Broederlam, Melchior, Flight into Egypt, painting, 1394–1399, Dijon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
Flight into Egypt, manuscript illumination for Les Très Belles Heures of the Duke of Berry, circa 1400, Brussels, Belgium, Bibliothèque Royale (Ms. 11061–61, fol. 106)
 Guise Master, Flight into Egypt, manuscript illumination for Book of Hours, circa 1420–1425, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (Ms. 1004, fol. B54)

- Master of the Gold Scrolls, Flight into Egypt, manuscript illustration for Book of Hours, Brussels, Belgium, Bibliothèque Royale (Ms. 9798, fol. 86r)
- Schongauer, Martin, Flight into Egypt, engraving, circa 1470
- Dürer, Albrecht, Flight into Egypt, woodcut, 1504–1505
- Patinir, Joachim de, Flight into Egypt, painting, before 1515, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten
- Tura, Cosimo, The Flight into Egypt, oil, fifteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- David, Gerard, Rest on the Flight into Egypt, oil, circa 1510, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Amstel, Jan van, after, Flight into Egypt, painting, second quarter of the sixteenth century, Ascona, Switzerland, Collection Bentinck-Thyssen
- Gassel, Lucas, Flight into Egypt, painting, 1542, Maastricht, The Netherlands, Bonnefantenmuseum
- Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Flight into Egypt, painting, 1563, London, Courtauld Institute Galleries, Princes Gate Collection
- Carracci, Annibale, The Flight into Egypt, lunette painting, oil, 1600–1604, Rome, Galleria Doria-Pamphili
- Poussin, Nicolas, The Flight into Egypt, painting, early 1630s, Worcester, Massachusetts, Worcester Art Museum
- Tiepolo, Giandomenico, Episodes on the Flight into Egypt, etching series, 1750–1752, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
- Runge, Philipp Otto, Rest on the Flight into Egypt, oil, 1805–1806, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Prodigal Son

- The Parable of the Prodigal Son*, tapestry, circa 1485, Louisville, Kentucky, J. B. Speed Museum; Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
- Anthonisz, Cornelis, The Departure of the Prodigal Son, The Expulsion of the Prodigal Son, woodcut series, 1540s
- Galle, Philips, The Departure of the Prodigal Son, engravings, 1562
- Testa, Pietro, The Prodigal Son: The Departure, etching, 1644–1650
- Wael, Jan Baptiste de, The Prodigal Son Expelled from the Tavern, etching, 1658
- Rembrandt van Rijn, The Return of the Prodigal Son, oil, circa 1668–1669, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
- Tissot, James, The Parable of the Prodigal Son, No. 1: The Departure, etching and drypoint, 1881
- Collier, John, The Prodigal Daughter, 1903, Lincoln, England, Usher Museum and Art Gallery

Christ Taking Leave of His Mother

- David, Gerard, Christ Taking Leave of His Mother, painting, early sixteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Dürer, Albrecht, Christ Taking Leave of His Mother, woodcut from Little Passion, 1509–1511
- Correggio, Christ Taking Leave of His Mother, oil on canvas, before 1514, London, National Gallery
- Altdorfer, Albrecht, Christ Taking Leave of His Mother, painting, 1520, London, National Gallery

- Coecke van Aelst, Pieter I, Christ Taking Leave of His Mother, painting, second quarter of sixteenth century, Glasgow, Scotland, Glasgow Art Gallery

St. Ursula

- Carpaccio, Vittore, St. Ursula Taking Leave of Her Father, painting, 1490–1498, London, National Gallery
- Memling, Hans, Chasse of St. Ursula, gilded and painted wood, 1489, Bruges, Belgium, Hospital of St. John
- Lorrain, Claude, Seaport with the Embarkation of St. Ursula, painting, 1641, London, National Gallery
- Dumon, Pierre, The Embarkation of St. Ursula, tapestry, circa 1654–1656, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Tondal

- Marmion, Simon, Vision of Tondal, illuminated manuscript 1474, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum

Other Pilgrimages

- Vivarini, Bartolomeo, Saint James the Greater, tempera on panel, central panel from polyptych, 1490, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, St. Roch as a Pilgrim, oil on canvas, circa 1730–1735, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Fogg Art Museum
- Blake, William, Sir Geoffrey Chaucer and the Nine and Twenty Pilgrims on the Journey to Canterbury, 1808, Glasgow, Scotland, Pollock House
- Eastlake, Charles Lock, Italian Scene in the Anno Santo: Pilgrims Arriving in Sight of Rome and Saint Peter's: Evening, 1827, Woburn Abbey, Duke of Bedford Collection
- Turner, J. M. W., Childe Harold's Pilgrimage—Italy, oil on canvas, exhibited 1832, London, Tate Gallery
- Carus, Carl Gustav, Pilgrim in a Rocky Valley, oil on canvas, circa 1841, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Nationalgalerie
- Belly, Léon-Adolphe Auguste, Pilgrims Going to Mecca, oil on canvas, 1861

Other Christian Journeys

- Giovanni di Paolo, John the Baptist Leaving His Parents to Go into the Wilderness, 1450–1460, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
- Claude Lorrain, Port of Ostia with the Embarkation of St. Paula, painting, 1640s, Madrid, Prado
- Claude Lorrain, The Embarkation of the Queen of Sheba, painting, 1640, London, National Gallery

War

- Géricault, Théodore, Return from Russia, series of lithographs, 1818
- Boissard de Boisdenier, Joseph-Ferdinand, Episode on the Retreat from Moscow, painting, 1835, Rouen, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Meissonier, Jean-Louis-Ernest, 1814, oil, 1864, Paris, Louvre
- O'Neil, Henry Nelson, Eastward Ho! August 1857, oil, 1857, private collection

O'Neil, Henry Nelson, Home Again, 1858, 1859, private collection
 Gibb, Robert II, Retreat from Moscow, 1879, Art Market
 Orchardson, William, Napoleon on Board the Bellerephon, painting, circa 1880, London, Tate Gallery
 Gow, Andrew Carrick, James II of England Fleeing After the Battle of the Boyne, painting, 1888, London, Tate Gallery

Allegorical

Watteau, Jean-Antoine, The Embarkation for Cythera, oil, 1717, Paris, Louvre
 Watteau, Jean-Antoine, Pilgrimage to Cythera, circa 1719, painting, Berlin, Charlottenburg Palace
 Cole, Thomas, The Voyage of Life, oil, 1840, Utica, New York, Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute
 Leutze, Emmanuel, Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way, mural, Washington, D.C., National Capitol
 Beckmann, Max, Departure, triptych, oil, 1932–1935, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Dante's Divine Comedy

Nardo di Cione, The Inferno, fresco, 1350s, Florence, Italy, Santa Maria Novella
 Botticelli, illustrations to Inferno, 32 drawings, circa 1480s, Berlin, Germany, Kupferstichkabinett
 Flaxman, John, illustrations to Divine Comedy, 1793, London
 Delacroix, Eugène, Dante and Virgil in the Underworld, oil, 1822, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Doré, Gustave, L'Enfer de Dante Alighieri, Paris, Librairie de L. Hachette et Cie
 Rauschenberg, Robert, Thirty-four Drawings for Dante's Inferno, 1959–1960, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Twentieth-Century Journeys

Popova, Ljubov, The Traveler, oil, 1915, Pasadena, California, Norton Simon Art Foundation
 Beckmann, Max, Departure, triptych, oil on canvas, 1921–1933, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Lawrence, Jacob, The Migration of the Negro, tempera on masonite, series, 1940–1944, Washington, D.C., Phillips Collection
 Gottlieb, Adolph, Voyager's Return, oil on canvas, 1946, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Varo, Remedios, Exploration of the Sources of the Onnoco River, oil, 1959, private collection
 Rauschenberg, Robert, Stoned Moon, series of 33 lithographs, 1969

Metaphorical Journeys

Journey of the Soul, ceiling painting, 1137 B.C., Thebes, Egypt, Valley of the Kings, tomb of Ramses VI
 Redon, Odilon, L'Oeil, comme un ballon bizarre, se dirige vers l'infini, lithograph from À Edgar Poe, 1882
 Munch, Edvard, Encounter in Space, color woodcut, 1899
 Gottlieb, Adolph, Descent into Darkness, oil on masonite, 1947, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Other Departures and Journeys

Pintoricchio, Departure of Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini for Basel, fresco, 1503–1508, Siena, Italy, Cathedral, Piccolomini Library
 Velde, Willem van de, the Younger, The Embarkation of Charles II at Scheveningen, painting, circa 1660, London, Wallace Gallery
 Isabey, Eugène, The Departure of Elizabeth of France for Spain, painting, circa 1848, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Doré, Gustave, illustrations to The Legend of the Wandering Jew, by George W. Thornbury, 1857
 Herdman, Robert, Mary Queen of Scots' Farewell to France, painting, 1867, private collection
 Manet, Édouard, The Departure of the Folkestone Boat, painting, 1869, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art
 Corot, Jean-Baptiste-Camille, The Farewell of Faust and Marguerite, drawing, 1871–1872, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Further Reading

Coleman, Simon, and John Elsner, Pilgrimage: Past and Present in the World Religions, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1995
 D'Oench, Ellen, Prodigal Son Narratives, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Art Gallery, 1995
 Eliade, Mircea, The Myth of Eternal Return, or, Cosmos and History, translated by Willard R. Trask, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1971
 Gerson, Paula, and Jeanne Krochalis, Annie Shaver-Crandel, Allison Stones, The Pilgrim's Guide to Santiago de Compostela: A Critical Edition, London: Harvey Miller, 1995
 Haeger, Barbara, "Cornelis Anthonisz's Representation of the Parable of the Prodigal Son: A Protestant Interpretation of the Biblical Text," Netherlands Kunsthistorisch Jaarboek 37 (1986)
 ———, "Philip Galle's Engravings After Maarten van Heemskerck's 'Parable of the Prodigal Son,'" Oud Holland 102 (1988)
 Held, Julius, Rembrandt and the Book of Tobit, Northampton, Massachusetts: Gehenna Press, 1964 Homer, Iliad
 ———, Odyssey
 Hunt, E. D., Holy Land Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982; New York: Oxford University Press, 1984
 Kramer, Samuel Noah, From the Tablets of Sumer, Boulder, Colorado: University of Colorado Press, 1956
 ———, Sumerian Mythology, New York: Harper, 1961
The Legend of St. Ursula and Her Companions, London: Hotten, 1969
 Levey, Michael, "The Real Theme of Antoine Watteau's 'Embarkation for Cythera,'" The Burlington Magazine 102 (1961)

- Nochlin, Linda, "Watteau: Some Questions of Interpretation," Art in America 73 (1985)
- Nolan, Mary Lee, and Sidney Nolan, Christian Pilgrimage in Modern Western Europe, Chapel Hill, North Carolina: University of North Carolina Press, 1989
- Nouwen, Henri Josef Michel, The Return of the Prodigal Son, New York: Doubleday, 1992; London: Dutton, Longman and Todd, 1994
- Posner, Donald, Antoine Watteau, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1984
- _____, "Les Fêtes Galantes d'Antoine Watteau, Pélerinages Pour Cythère et Autres Lieux d'Amour," L'Oeil 350 (1984)
- Reader, Ian, and Tony Walter, Pilgrimage in Popular Culture, London and New York: Macmillan, 1993
- Rosasco, Betsy, "A Terracotta Aeneas and Anchises Attributed to Laurent Guiard," Record of the Art Museum (Princeton University) 45 (1985)
- Rosemblum, Robert, Transformations in Late Eighteenth Century Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1976
- Scherer, Margaret, The Legends of Troy in Art and Literature, New York: Phaidon Press, 1963
- Stafford, Barbara Marie, Voyage into Substance: Art, Science, Nature, and the Illustrated Travel Account, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1984
- Steer, John, "Watteau Reconsidered," Art and Artists 223 (1985)
- Taggard, Mindy Nancarron, "A Source for the Interpretation of Murillo's Parable of the Prodigal Son: The Golden Age Stage," Revue d'Art Canadienne 14 (1987)
- Tennyson, Alfred Lord, The Poetic and Dramatic Works, New York: Houghton, 1898; London: Dent, 1910
- Turner, Victor, and Edith Turner, Image and Pilgrimage in Christian Culture: Anthropological Perspectives, New York: Columbia University Press, 1978
- U.S. National Gallery of Art, Watteau, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1984
- Verdier, Philippe, "The Tapestry of the Prodigal Son," Journal of the Walters Art Gallery 18 (1955)

JUDAISM

Nancy Frazier

The following motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Judaism:

MENORAH

STAR OF DAVID

TORAH

TALLITH

LION

SYNAGOGUE

TYPOLOGY

HOLOCAUST

George Segal, The Holocaust, 1982, sculpture, New York, Jewish Museum. (Copyright VAGA, Courtesy of the Jewish Museum/Art Resource, New York)

This essay treats the subject of Judaism from the point of view of the main symbolic objects used in Jewish worship. These objects, often works of art, have also become signs and symbols of the Jewish people. The essay also gives an example of how a story from the Jewish scriptures has been used typologically in Christian and Islamic works of art. In addition, it mentions how a most momentous event in Jewish history, the Holocaust, has been reflected in art. It does not deal with the image of the Jewish people in art, although a few references to this subject appear in the “Further Reading” section.

A bas-relief panel on the Arch of Titus shows triumphant Romans carrying off the menorah from the Temple in Jerusalem after their conquest of Judea in the year A.D. 70. There could hardly be a more boastful record of victory or, to the Jews, a more wrenching symbol of defeat. The menorah (a branched candelabra) is probably the most widely recognized, if not the most important, symbol of Judaism—the religion, philosophy, and way of life of the Jewish people.

According to Judaic tradition, God gave Moses a detailed pattern for the menorah: “And thou shalt make a candlestick of pure gold . . .” (Exodus, 25:31; Tanakh). Its iconographic ancestry undoubtedly derives from the concept of the Tree of Life, a multicultural theme that winds through the millennia, from cylinder seals of the ancient Middle East to the designs of American Shakers. The menorah’s historic existence is confirmed by archaeological finds, namely plaster fragments of the earliest known representation of a temple menorah, dating from the reign of Herod (37 B.C.–4 B.C.), found during excavations of the Old City of Jerusalem in 1969.

Stone menorahs survive from a third-century synagogue near Tiberias, Israel. On the mosaic pavement of sixth-century Beth Shean in Israel, stone and glass tesserae in six varying hues show two large menorahs flanking what is probably a synagogue facade and entrance with a shrine, or Torah ark, beyond it. Such images, linking portal and candelabra, are frequent; the entryway represents the gate of the lord, and the lamp signifies divine light. This popular combination has even been discovered on Oriental rugs of Mamluk and Ottoman origin—beautiful examples of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century artistry, several examples of which can be found in the Textile Museum in Washington, D.C. These rugs closely resemble prayer rugs woven for Islamic worshipers, yet they were used as Torah curtains, or parokhets, in a synagogue.

In the complex and controversial symbolism of Marc Chagall’s White Crucifixion (1938) in the Art Institute of Chicago, the Jewishness of Jesus Christ on the cross is depicted by the Jewish prayer shawl he wears for a loincloth and by the menorah that burns beneath his feet. In 1965, American artist Ben Shahn calligraphed a Jewish prayer book called a Haggadah. The frontispiece for this is a buoyant, stylized menorah in shades of blue, purple, and gold. A menorah is the emblem of the state of Israel, and a great bronze menorah, sculpted by Benno Elkan, stands before the entrance to the Israeli Knesset. A gift from the British Parliament, the menorah is decorated with scenes from Jewish history.

Also synonymous with Judaism today is the six-pointed star, popularly known as the Star of David. In Hebrew, it is actually called Magen David, which is translated as “shield of David.” This symbol, entirely unrelated to Jewish religious belief or ritual, is found as early as the Bronze Age. It may have had magical significance then, and it certainly has had since. For example, in the seventeenth century, it was an alchemical sign for the harmonious unification of the antagonistic elements fire and water. Also in the seventeenth century, the six-pointed star appears as Islamic ornamentation, where it is set in grillwork, with light filtering through, as on a window of the Alhambra, the Moorish palace in Granada, Spain. Some 500 years earlier, it was used to decorate the episcopal throne in the Cathedral of Anagni in Italy—an elaborate and elegant hexagram in marble surmounting a throne guarded by two lions.

The history and meaning of the star as a Jewish insignia is vague, although it is seen in cabalistic writings. During the nineteenth century, the star was consciously and insistently adopted as a Jewish symbol. This effort to devise a recognizable insignia was taken up by the Zionist movement. Then, during the twentieth century, the Nazi regime in Germany endeavored to turn the Jewish Star of David into a badge of shame, using it to mark Jews to separate them from the rest of the population. Millions of Jews were sent to their deaths with the star patched onto their prison uniforms. (Identifying Jews as pariahs in Nazi Germany echoed a similar practice in Christian countries during the Middle Ages, when a dress code forced Jews to wear cone-shaped hats and emblematic yellow patches.) Art Spiegelman, who redefined cartoon art with his 1973 comic book Maus, A Survivor’s Tale, about his parents’ experiences under the Nazi regime, drew Jews as mice and Nazis as cats. In panels inked in black and white, white stars stand out in chilling contrast against black jackets worn by victim mice.

Despite the Nazi outrage, and to commemorate their survival of the Holocaust, Jews tenaciously and defiantly celebrated the symbolism of the six-pointed star after World War II. Outlined in blue against a white background, it flies boldly on the national flag, heralding the independence of the state of Israel.

Although less quickly identifiable to non-Jews, numerous other religious and ceremonial objects—Judaica—have deep significance in Jewish life and make their way into its symbolism. The so-called Law of Moses, the Torah (or “teaching”), is the core of Judaic thought. In its written form, the Torah scroll is kept in the place of honor in the house of worship. Inscribed according to specific instructions, the Torah's parchment is never touched by hands but is read with the help of a yad (Hebrew "hand"), a silver pointer the end of which is shaped like a miniature hand with a pointing index finger. The yad is moved along the Torah text as the lines are read.

The Torah is lavishly clothed and ornamented and is usually housed in a protective enclosure called the ark. (Definitions and practices vary slightly, depending on traditions developed in the Diaspora.) Iconography of the ark and of the Torah and its accoutrements (including cover, shield, and "crown") are distinct. These are all fashioned as beautifully as possible according to the concept of heightening the sanctity of a mitzvah—a religious duty or commandment of God—by embellishing the object used to perform it. As mentioned, the ark is often in the form of a portal and usually has columns on either side and a pediment or arch above. Not only is this idea of a doorway to the sublime an ageless and multicultural theme, but in every era it has been interpreted according to contemporary architectural style and taste.

The shawl, or tallith, that Chagall used in White Crucifixion to designate Christ's Jewishness is, in reality, worn around the shoulders and sometimes covers the head during prayer. Images of Jews wearing this blue- or black-striped mantle while praying at the wall of Jerusalem are familiar. Worshipers also wear small leather boxes (tefillin) strapped against the upper arm and forehead. These contain scriptural passages. The Praying Jew (Rabbi of Vitebsk), also by Chagall, wears both tallith and tefillin. Earlier than White Crucifixion, this painting is equally disturbing, but in a very different way. The Praying Jew shows influences of the expressionist and cubist movements current in Paris, where Chagall lived when he painted it in 1914. The subject expresses an ominous tension and calls to mind the pogroms in the artist's native Russia.

From its earliest days to the present, lions have guarded the Torah, at least symbolically. Certainly, the lion is an outstanding symbol of Judaism—there are seven words for lion in Hebrew, and the lion is mentioned 150 times in the Hebrew scriptures. King David was said to have the "heart of a lion" (II Samuel 17:10). It was written of the Israelites that they would "rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion" (Numbers 23:24). In fact, lions in Jewish imagery are often called the Lion of Judah, and of the 12 tribes of Israel, the tribe of Judah has a lion for its symbol. (In fact, the only biblical personage specifically named the Lion of Judah is Jesus Christ.) A pair of fifth-century B.C. marble lions found in the synagogue of Sardis, Turkey, are believed to have been brought from a temple to the Asian nature goddess Cybele, who was also guarded by a pair of lions. Even in periods when the prohibition against representational imagery, explicit in the Second Commandment and in Deuteronomy, has been taken most literally, the only figure sculpted in the round that was allowed in a synagogue was that of a lion.

The frequency of the lion's evocation in Jewish rabbinic writings, folklore, and folk art, as well as in the scriptures, is matched by the diversity of roles the lion plays, switching from ally to enemy, from a symbol of strength and goodness to wrecker of havoc and evil. No single image ornaments a greater number or variety of Judaica than does the lion, from wedding certificates to sarcophagi and from wine cups to illuminated manuscripts. Moreover, the lion of Judaic tradition has antecedents in both Mesopotamian and Egyptian legend and art and is succeeded by lions in Christian and Islamic iconography and by holy and secular imagery throughout world history.

Themes explored so far are connected to Jewish religious practices. Complexities alluded to by Chagall's Crucifixion series become manifest beginning in the Christian era. Even the name of the scriptural text is controversial: "Old Testament" is a Christian term. It implies that the testament, or covenant, between God and the Children of Israel is outdated and has been supplanted by a new order (Goldberg and Rayner, p. 195). "The Old Testament is nothing but the New covered with a veil, and the New Testament is nothing but the Old revealed," St. Augustine wrote in The City of God (XVI, 26). This idea made its way into the visual arts in the form of two women—first and second brides of the Lord—Synagogue and Church. Characteristically, Synagogue is shown holding the tablets of Mosaic law. A veil covering her eyes denotes that she is blind to the new, Christian order, and the broken lance in her hand expresses the idea that the integrity of Judaism has been shattered (Snyder, p. 224).

Despite the Christian belief that the New Testament eclipsed the "Old," history as told in the Jewish Bible was handed down through Christianity and then Islam. Pictorial tradition is also shared by the three religions. Recognizable, representational imagery is theoretically prohibited in Jewish and Islamic traditions, but both have energetically overcome that proscription. The earliest examples extant of Jewish narrative imagery date from the mid-third-century Dura-Europas synagogue, now in Syria, where frescoes illustrate important biblical episodes. Scholars believe that long-lost illustrated manuscripts preceded the frescoes of Dura, providing a source for Christian as well as for Jewish paintings.

The non-Jew's ability to lay claim to stories from the Jewish tradition relies on a widespread practice of appropriation called typology. Typology is a system that allows later ecclesiastics to see events described in Jewish scriptures as prefiguring what was to come; thus, Christianity can be argued as a self-fulfilling prophesy. For example, from a Christian typological perspective, the near immolation of Isaac is equated to God's sacrifice of Christ. The wood that Isaac carried for the sacrificial fire represents the cross, the ram is Christ crucified, and the thorns in the thicket are the crown of thorns.

The sacrifice of Isaac is among the most popular subjects in all three monotheistic traditions. It was found illustrated on the floor mosaic of the sixth-century Beth Alpha synagogue. Figures here are drawn in childlike outline. Abraham faces forward, flanked by the ram caught in the thicket on his right and the burning bush at his left; he holds Isaac in one hand and his sword in the other. In Christianity, the theme of the sacrifice of Isaac was most famously chosen, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, to be illustrated in the competition for the design of the doors of the Baptistry in Florence, Italy. Lorenzo Ghiberti won the commission. His design, while centuries advanced in both time and technique, nevertheless shares with the sixth-century rendering a similar sense of awe at the event depicted. Ghiberti's image combines the violence of the scene—Abraham's sharp knife is exceedingly close to Isaac's throat—with fluid movement of drapery and the ripple of muscle in Isaac's young body. In stunning contrast to the Jewish and the Christian images is an Islamic miniature from Turkey by Luquman-i-Ashuri in the Zubadad al-Tawarikh (Sacrifice of Isaac) (1583). Capturing the same moment of arrested action, this representation is, however, as sophisticated in execution as the synagogue mosaic is naive and as still in mood as Ghiberti's scene is turbulent.

In one of the most curious and interesting Jewish illuminated books, the German Birds' Head Haggadah (circa 1300) in the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, the illustrator has avoided any risk of overstepping the Second Commandment by providing the main characters with birds' heads. Some 350 years later, Rembrandt van Rijn treated the subject with full-blown drama, capturing the moment in which the angel swoops down with wings outspread and grasps Abraham's hand. In Leonard Baskin's 1977 interpretation of the cataclysmic story The Altar in the Jewish Museum in New York, the angel's wings are fused with the figure of Isaac, and the ram stands astride the youth's outstretched legs.

As the centuries progressed, personalities and stories from the Old Testament seemed to become more self-contained, interesting as much for their psychology and plots as for typological significance. This is apparent in pictures such as Peter Paul Rubens's masterpiece Daniel in the Lion's Den in the National Gallery in Washington, D.C.; Artemisia Gentileschi's Judith and Maidservant with the Head of Holofernes in the Detroit Institute of Arts in Michigan; Elizabeth Jane Gardner Bouguereau's The Shepherd David Triumphant in the National Museum of Women in the Arts in Washington, D.C.; or the many renderings of The Finding of Moses from the Renaissance onward. Nicolas Poussin was especially preoccupied with the character of Moses and painted most of the significant events in the prophet's life.

Moses is an awesome Jewish figure in all the arts and the most frequently mentioned Old Testament figure in the New Testament. He also occupies an important place in the Koran. According to Islamic belief, Moses prophesied the coming of Muhammad (Encyclopedia Judaica, vol. 12, p. 402). Moses is quickly identifiable when he is holding the tablets of the law, often with Mount Sinai and a bolt of lightning in the background. During the Renaissance, he was frequently given horns due to a mistranslation of a phrase describing beams of light emanating from Moses' head. Examples include the statue of Moses by Claus Sluter in Well of the Prophets (1395–1403) in Dijon, France, and Michelangelo's Moses (1515–1516) in San Pietro in Vincoli in Rome.

In the twentieth century, ideas and images of Jewish spiritual life, such as the menorah and the Magen David, retain their significance. However, the Nazi Holocaust has brought the presence and fate of Jews and Judaism into a new historical context. A legacy of images in art and literature related to catastrophe continues to grow. Art Spiegelman's Maus, A Survivor's Tale has been mentioned. Note also Pablo Picasso's confusing, chaotic mound of bodies in The Charnel House (1944–1945) in the Museum of Modern Art in New York. George Segal's The Holocaust (1982) in the Jewish Museum in New York is among the most chilling of Holocaust memorials. A plaster-white lone survivor stands behind barbed wire and in front of a pile of chalky white casts of human bodies. These corpses are laid down so that they form a starlike shape. Alluding to Eve, one woman holds a half-eaten apple; suggesting Abraham and Isaac, a boy and old man are paired; a figure with arms outstretched evokes the suffering of Jesus; and one configuration of legs might even be construed to resemble a menorah. Thus, although describing an event of contemporary history, Segal's work recalls several themes that have been woven through the Jewish religion from its inception.

See also Light I; Light II; Logos/Word; Offering; Protestantism; Sacrifice

Selected Works of Art

Menorah

- Arch of Titus*, sculpture, first century A.D., Rome
- Joseph, Scribe of Pontarlier, Pentateuch, Megillot, Haftarot, and Job, manuscript, circa 1300, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. Heb. 36, fol. 283v)
- Pile Carpet with Hebrew Inscription*, Washington, D.C., The Textile Museum
- Chagall, Marc, White Crucifixion, 1938, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
- Boller, Johann Adam, Hanukkah Menorah, New York, Jewish Museum
- Shahn, Ben, Haggadah for Passover, Washington, D.C., Library of Congress, Rare Book and Special Collections Division, Rosenwald Collection

Star of David

- Episcopal Throne*, Anagni, Italy, Cathedral
- Chagall, Marc, Praying Jew, before 1985, Jerusalem, Israel Museum
- Hanukkah Lamp*, cast brass, Austrian Empire, nineteenth century, Prague, Czech Republic, State Jewish Museum
- Portable Ark and Altar*, Washington, D.C., Jewish War Veterans' National Memorial Museum, Collection Martin Weitz
- Spiegelman, Art, Maus, A Survivor's Tale, New York, Random House, 1973

Torah

- Hart, Solomon Alexander, The Feast of the Rejoicing of the Law at the Synagogue of Leghorn, before 1881, New York, Jewish Museum

Tallith

- Kaufmann, Isador, Portrait of a Boy, late nineteenth century–early twentieth century, Prague, Czech Republic, State Jewish Museum
- Chagall, Marc, The Praying Jew (Rabbi of Vitebsk), 1914, Chicago, Illinois, Art Institute
- Brandon, Édouard, Silent Prayer, Synagogue of Amsterdam, "The Amids," before 1903, New York, Jewish Museum

Lion

- Sarcophagus*, catacombs, Beth She'arim, Israel

Lion Mosaic, synagogue, sixth century, Beth Alpha, Israel
Manuscript, illuminated German mahzor depicting the Gates of Mercy on the backs of two lions, fourteenth century, New York, The Jewish Division of the New York Public Library

Paper-cut, ring, Baruch Zvi Memorial Plaque and Omer Calendar of a Society for the Study of Mishnah, New York, Jewish Museum

Synagogue

Burial of Synagoga, Worship of the Brothers Limbourg, manuscript, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Codex Fr. 166 fol. 40v)

Ecclesia and Synagoga, manuscript, Paris, Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal (Codex Th. 26)

Typology

Sacrifice of Isaac, mosaic, sixth century, Beth Alpha, Israel
 Ghiberti, Lorenzo, The Sacrifice of Isaac, gilt bronze, 1401–1402, Florence, Italy, National Museum

Luquman-i-Ashuri, Zubadad al-Tawarikh (Sacrifice of Isaac), illuminated manuscript, 1583, Dublin, Ireland, Chester Beatty Library (Gen.R. 30:19, Ms 414, fol. 68v)

Birds' Head Haggadah, Sacrifice of Isaac, German manuscript, circa 1300, Jerusalem, Israel Museum (Ms. 180157, fol. 30)

Baskin, Leonard, The Altar, print, 1977, New York, Jewish Museum

Sluter, Claus, Well of the Prophets, 1395–1403, Dijon, France
 Michelangelo, Horned Statue of Moses, 1515–1516, Rome, San Pietro in Vincoli

Holocaust

Picasso, Pablo, The Charnel House, 1944–1945, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Segal, George, The Holocaust, sculpture, 1982, New York, Jewish Museum

Further Reading

Bohm-Duchen, Monica, After Auschwitz: Responses to the Holocaust in Contemporary Art, London: Lund Humphries, 1995

Brenner, Michael, The Renaissance of Jewish Culture in Weimar Germany, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1996

Center for Jewish Art, Journal of Jewish Art, Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1980

Encyclopedia Judaica, Jerusalem: Keter, 1971

Freudenheim, Tom, "Books on Art and the Jewish Tradition," Jewish Book Annual 48 (1990)

Goldberg, David, and John D. Rayner, The Jewish People: Their History and Their Religion, New York and Harmondsworth, Middlesex: Viking, 1987

Gutmann, Joseph, editor, Beauty in Holiness: Studies in Jewish Customs and Ceremonial Art, New York: Ktav, 1970

———, Jewish Ceremonial Art, New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1964

The Jewish Museum of New York, Treasures of the Jewish Museum, New York: Universe, 1986

Kampf, Avram, Jewish Experience in the Art of the Twentieth Century, South Hadley, Massachusetts: Bergin and Garvey, 1964

Kanof, Abram, Jewish Ceremonial Art and Religious Observance, New York: Abrams, 1970

———, Jewish Symbolic Art, New York: Gefen, 1990

Metzger, Therese, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages: Illuminated Manuscripts, New York: Alpine Arts Collection, 1982

Narkiss, Bezalel, editor, Picture History of Jewish Civilization, Secaucus, New Jersey: Chartwell, 1978

Nochlin, Linda, and Tamar Garh, The Jew in the Text: Modernity and the Construction of Identity, London: Thames and Hudson, 1995; New York: Thames and Hudson, 1996

Revel-Neher, Elizabeth, The Image of the Jew in Byzantine Art, Oxford: Pergamon Press, 1992

Roth, Cecil, Jewish Art: An Illustrated History, New York: Ktav, 1968

Snyder, James, Northern Renaissance Art, New York: Abrams, 1985

Widoger, Geoffrey, editor, Jewish Art and Civilization, Secaucus, New Jersey: Chartwell, 1972

JUDGMENT

Andrew Stephen Arbury

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Judgment:

JUDGMENT SPIRIT OF DAN
CULTURE: GA WREE-WRE

JUDGMENT: ALLEGORY

JUDGMENT OF AMETO

JUSTICE OF BRUTUS

JUDGMENT OF CAMBYSES

JUDGMENT OF CAMILLUS (CAMILLUS AND THE SCHOOLMASTER OF THE FALERII)

JUDGMENT OF EMPEROR
OTTO

JUDGMENT OF MANLIUS
TORQUATUS

JUDGMENT OF MIDAS

JUDGMENT OF OSIRIS

JUDGMENT OF PARIS

JUDGMENT OF SOLOMON

VIRGINIA

ARCHANGEL MICHAEL WEIGHING SOULS

CHRIST AS JUDGE

ETIMASIA (HETOIMASIA), OR PREPARED THRONE

JUDGMENT OF ZALEUCUS
(SELEUCUS)

LAST JUDGMENT

LITERARY/MUSICAL JUDGMENTS

FOLKTALES/FAIRY TALES

Peter Paul Rubens, Judgment of Paris, circa 1636, painting, London, National Gallery.
(Courtesy of the National Gallery, London)

Judgment has been a crucial concept in the development of human civilization. It pervades secular and sacred law and morality and in many cultures is seen as the final determining event before passing into the afterlife. As such, stories and visual representations of various judgments are prevalent in literature and art. Several historical judgments have survived the centuries and are depicted in painting. These stories give us a moral sense of both justice and injustice and are all the more compelling because they are believed to have actually occurred.

The judgment of Cambyses was a well-known event from ancient times whose story was related by the Greek historian Herodotus. Cambyses was the king of the Medes and Persians in the sixth century B.C. who sentenced the corrupt judge Sisamnes to be flayed alive. The flayed skin was used to upholster the seat of the throne of judgment. Cambyses then appointed the executed judge's son to serve in his father's place and told him never to forget in what way his seat was cushioned. The Judgment of Cambyses (1498) by Gerard David in the Groeningemuseum in Bruges, Belgium, shows the gruesome flaying of the judge in the foreground and the son seated on the skin-covered throne in the background. In an interesting political twist, however, the judge has the features of Peter Lanchals, who had betrayed the city of Bruges to the Holy Roman Emperor Maximilian I.

The judgment of Zaleucus (Seleucus) relates the story of the lawgiver of the Greek colony Locris in southern Italy in the seventh century B.C. Zaleucus was the first to codify the Greek law that incorporated the lex talionis, or the concept of an eye for an eye. According to tradition, he had to pronounce judgment on his own son who was accused of adultery, the punishment for which was the blinding of both eyes. A man of great morality, he had no choice but to pronounce the verdict of guilty. The citizens of the town would have rescinded the sentence out of respect for Zaleucus, but he refused to be a hypocrite to the laws he had promulgated. Instead, he had one of his son's and one of his own eyes gouged out. The story was portrayed in the early sixteenth century by Perino del Vaga in a fresco in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy.

The judgment of Otto III deals with an unjust judgment in the tenth century. The wife of Emperor Otto III made sexual advances to a married German count, but when he rejected her, she falsely accused him in revenge, and Otto III had him beheaded. The count's widow sought to prove her husband's innocence and underwent ordeal by red-hot iron, a medieval practice to establish the truth. The widow held the red-hot iron bar and remained unharmed, thus revealing the empress's treachery. To atone for his wrongful judgment, Otto sentenced his wife to be burned at the stake. Both incidents are shown in Dirck Bouts's Justice of Emperor Otto III in the Musées Royaux in Brussels, Belgium.

Another unjust judgment was that against Phocion, an Athenian general in the fourth century B.C. who was judged a traitor simply because he sought reconciliation between the Athenians and Alexander the Great. He was charged with treason and forced to drink hemlock, but shortly after his death a statue was raised in his honor.

The most famous historical judgment comes from the Bible: the judgment of Solomon (I Kings 3:16–28). Two prostitutes each gave birth to a child at the same time. One child died, and both women claimed the living child as her own. King Solomon had to judge which of the two prostitutes was the real mother. He did so by threatening to have the living child cut in two so that each mother could have half a child. On hearing this pronouncement, the true mother renounced her claim on the child in order to spare it. Realizing that only the real mother would make such a sacrifice, he restored the child to her. This incident was thought to prefigure the Last Judgment, and it has been widely depicted in Western art. One of the better known versions is by Nicolas Poussin (1649) in the Louvre in Paris.

The judgment of Brutus may be myth rather than history. Lucius Junius Brutus was the nephew of Tarquin, the last king of Rome. Brutus was present when Lucretia disclosed her rape by Tarquin's son, Sextus, and killed herself. Brutus avenged Lucretia's honor by expelling the Tarquins and establishing a Roman republic, becoming one of the first two consuls of the new republic. Shortly thereafter, a royalist conspiracy was uncovered that implicated both of Brutus's sons: Titus and Tiberius. As consul, Brutus judged his sons guilty at their trial and condemned them to death. He watched as his sons were tied to stakes, flogged, and beheaded. Paintings of this example of stern Roman justice were commissioned for courts of justice in the Baroque era. Rembrandt van Rijn painted the judgment scene (1626), now in the Stedelijk Museum De Lakenhal in Leiden, The Netherlands, but the subject is disputed by some. Jacques-Louis David portrayed a scene following the executions when the dead bodies are brought to Brutus's house (1789, at the Louvre in Paris). In the eighteenth century, the story appeared in James Thomson's poem Winter (1726) and was the subject of Vittorio Alfieri's tragedy Bruto Primo (1783).

Other examples of Roman judgment involve Camillus, Manlius Torquatus, and Virginia. Camillus was the Roman dictator who besieged the Etruscan town of Falerii in the fourth century B.C. A traitorous Falerian schoolmaster offered his pupils as hostages to Camillus, but Camillus was so outraged by the schoolmaster's treachery that he ordered him stripped naked and his hands bound behind his back. He then let the children drive the schoolmaster back to town with sticks. The Falerians were so moved by this example of Roman integrity that they surrendered. Poussin's rendering of the story depicts Camillus on a seat of justice with the schoolmaster being driven away by his pupils (circa 1637, in the Norton Simon Museum in Pasadena, California).

Manlius Torquatus was a fourth-century B.C. Roman consul who judged his own son guilty of military disobedience. His son, a rash soldier, had killed a Latin enemy in single combat even though Manlius had forbidden that type of warfare. The son defended his action by claiming he had been challenged, but Manlius ordered his execution. Manlius is usually depicted enthroned on a seat of judgment with his son in the executioners' hands or with an executioner holding up the son's decapitated head (Ferdinand Bol, seventeenth century, in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, The Netherlands).

In Roman legend, Virginia, daughter of the centurion Virginius, was coveted by Appius Claudius, a Roman decemvir in the fifth century B.C. Appius schemed to acquire the young virgin by having one of his favorites claim her as a former slave and then bring the matter before him. Because Appius was a magistrate, he had the authority to judge in his own favor, which he did. But before the girl could be led away, her father rushed forth and stabbed her to save her from Appius's lust and unjust sentence. This event triggered the fall of the decemvirs.

The most famous judgment in classical mythology was one that had the most severe consequences. Paris, the son of King Priam of Troy, was asked to judge which of the three goddesses—Aphrodite (the goddess of love), Hera (the wife of Zeus), or Athena (the goddess of wisdom)—was the most beautiful. All three goddesses attempted to bribe Paris. Athena promised him victory in battle, Hera offered him land and material riches, and Aphrodite promised him the love of the most beautiful woman in the world, Helen, queen of Sparta. Paris chose Aphrodite and awarded her the golden apple, inscribed "To the fairest." Paris then abducted Helen and carried her back to Troy. This act provoked the Trojan War. The judgment of Paris is perhaps the most often depicted judgment scene in Western art, after the Last Judgment. The story communicates the idea that although physical beauty is enticing, it can be destructive. It was a favorite theme of the German painter Lucas Cranach. Other notable versions are by the Flemish painters Peter Paul Rubens and Jacob Jordaens.

Another mythological judgment was that of King Midas. A flute-playing contest between Apollo (the god of music) and Pan (the god of shepherds and flocks) was judged by the mountain god Tmolus in the presence of Midas. Tmolus declared Apollo the winner, but Midas disagreed and proclaimed Tmolus's decision unjust. Apollo "rewarded" Midas for his judgment by giving him the ears of an ass. In another version of the myth, Midas judges the contest. This version is the one most often depicted in art, such as Domenichino's fresco (1616–1618) in the National Gallery in London.

Celtic mythology also contains tales of judgment. Amaisgen, a Druid warrior and poet, was said to have pronounced the first judgment in Ireland by deciding that Eremon would be king, thus beginning the legendary Milesian dynasty of Ireland. Sometimes the judgment involved dire consequences, as it often did in Greek mythology. Bricriu Nemthenga (of the Poisoned Tongue), the champion of Ulster, was asked to judge a contest between the brown bull of Cuailgne and the white horned bull of Connacht on the Plain of Aei. Before he could pronounce his judgment, fighting bulls trampled him to death.

The eschatology of most religions deals with a divine final judgment of one's behavior on Earth. This concept emerges as early as the third millennium B.C. in Egypt, where the god Osiris was the principal judge of the dead. Each deceased person had to be judged for his deeds during his life. This event is depicted in numerous papyrus scrolls of the Book of the Dead. Horus (the god of light) leads the soul of the deceased into the Hall of Judgment, where Osiris sits on his throne. The soul must confess any sins committed in life in the form of 400 statements of the things it did not do. Then the soul's heart is weighed against the feather of Truth on a balance by the jackal-headed god Anubis (psychostasis). If the heart is judged truthful and Osiris declares the soul "true of voice," it can rejoin its ancestors in the Land of Reeds. If the heart is judged false, then a waiting monster that was part crocodile, part leopard, and part hippopotamus devours the soul. This event is never depicted in the Book of the Dead, however, because its many spells protected the soul.

Ancient Greek mythology held no clear concept of life after death—the dead became impotent shades wandering around Hades. Thus, there was no final judgment, although there were judges. Rhadamanthys, who was renowned for his wisdom and justice on Crete, became, along with his brother Minos, a judge in Hades after his death. According to Homer, however, they did not judge the deeds of humans but settled disputes among the shades. In Norse mythology, not even the gods were immortal. At Ragnarok, or the doom of the gods, the world was destroyed and consequently no final judgment of souls took place again. A Norse god, Forseti, dispensed justice, however.

The Zoroastrian religion has two judgments: that of one's soul and that of one's entire being (a universal judgment). Rashnu, Mithras, and Sraosha, who decide the fate of souls at the Chinvat Bridge (the Bridge of the Separator), carry out the first judgment. The bridge widens to allow the good souls to cross easily to paradise, where the Ameshas (the immortal holy ones) welcome them. The bridge narrows for the bad souls, forcing them to fall off into the gulf of Dusahk, where Devs (evil spirits) torment them. In Islam, at the Day of Judgment, Allah will judge all individuals and reward them with paradise for good behavior and with punishment in hell for bad behavior.

Judaism does not elaborate on life after death, but it does embody the concept of a Messiah who will judge human actions and reward the good and punish the bad. The concept of judgment applies to another aspect of Judaism, however. Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, is revered as the Day of Judgment. It begins a 10-day period known as the Days of Awe and concludes with Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. This period is a time for an ethical and religious reassessment of one's life—a kind of self-judgment. According to Jewish tradition, all the people pass before God during the Days of Awe, and He judges who shall live and who shall die during the coming year.

Because of Islamic and Jewish strictures against figural imagery, judgment scenes do not appear in the art of these two religions. This is not the case with Christianity. The belief in an apocalyptic end of the world and subsequent judgment of all souls by God or Jesus Christ inspired many representations of the Last Judgment in Christian art. At first, the scene was shown symbolically. In Byzantine art, the Etimasia (Hetoimasia), or prepared throne, indicated the concept of the Second Coming of Christ and the Final Judgment. This empty throne presented one or more of Christ's attributes (book or scroll, dove, crown, purple cloth, instruments of the Passion, or apocalyptic lamb) before a golden cross. In early medieval art in the West, the Last Judgment was also usually shown symbolically in the guise of the parable of the wise and foolish virgins or the separating of the sheep from the goats, as in a mosaic in S. Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna, Italy. Later, Christ was shown on the throne, typically in the center. The saved are on his right and gain access to heaven; the damned are on his left and are cast into hell. Often the side of the damned is emphasized, and their gruesome tortures tend to dominate the scene. This was especially true during the Middle Ages, when the didactic nature of visual imagery was important to a largely illiterate congregation.

Horrible scenes of hell and damnation were probably quite effective in convincing people of the wisdom of avoiding evil deeds here on Earth. One Renaissance version by Luca Signorelli dispenses with the saved souls altogether and concentrates only on the damned being cast into hell by demons (1499–1504, Cathedral of Orvieto, Italy). Perhaps the most famous Last Judgment in art is Michelangelo's fresco (1534–1541) in the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican. In it, Michelangelo infused his personal feelings: He portrayed himself as the flayed skin of St. Bartholomew and, according to Giorgio Vasari, portrayed Biaggio da Cesena, Pope Paul III's master of ceremonies, as Minos because he had criticized the nudes in the painting. The torment of the damned is continued in the next century with Peter Paul Rubens (Last Judgment, circa 1616, Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany) and Jacob Jordaens (Last Judgment, 1653, Louvre). Twentieth-century artists often treat the theme differently. Stanley Spencer set it in a contemporary local scene (Resurrection Cookham, 1923–1926, Tate Gallery in London), and Frederick Kiesler tried to capture its threatening mood with environmental sculpture (The Last Judgment, 1958–1959, collection of Mrs. Kiesler).

In addition to a final judgment, the Christian Bible also contains many references to other types of divine judgment and to human judgment. The causes of divine judgment are human frailties such as disobedience (II Chronicles 7:19–22), rejecting God's warnings (II Chronicles 36:15–17), or idolatry (Jeremiah 7). The manifestations of divine judgment include physical destruction, such as the Great Flood (Genesis 7:6–24) and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Genesis 19:24–29); material ruin, such as the loss of crops (Malachi 3:11); spiritual blindness (Isaiah 6:9–10); and eternal damnation for sins, such as acquiring wealth as an end in itself (Luke 12:16–21, 16:19–31). In dealing with human judgment, people are called on to imitate God by judging others righteously (Luke 12:57) and to judge oneself before judging others (Matthew 7:1–5). People should abound in love so that they are better able to judge what is best in the Christian sense (Philippians 1:9). The Bible contains examples of good and bad judgment. A false judgment results when Joseph is unfairly judged based on the circumstantial and sham evidence provided by Potiphar's wife (Genesis 39:10–20). This illustrates the inherent weakness in many human judgments. Warnings against hasty and revengeful judgment appear in the story of David and the contemptuous Nabal, whom David had protected. David had the good sense to listen to the wisdom of Nabal's wife, Abigail, and did not kill Nabal for refusing him food (I Samuel 25:20–35).

Finally, judgment is endemic to fairy tales and folktales, whose purpose often is to teach the concepts of justice and morality. In "Twelve Brothers" (Grimm's Fairy Tales), the queen's wicked mother-in-law is sentenced to be put into a barrel filled with boiling oil and poisonous snakes for maliciously slandering the innocent queen. In "Brother and Sister" (Grimm) the stepmother/witch and her daughter are sentenced, respectively, to be burned to death and to be torn to pieces by wild beasts for killing the queen and putting the witch's daughter in her place. In many tales, the evil person suffers the judgment that he or she pronounced on the hero or heroine, such as being rolled down a hill inside a nail-studded barrel. This is what happened to the malicious chambermaid who forced the princess to exchange places with her in "The Goose Girl" (Grimm).

Another type of folktale involving judgment is the so-called dilemma tale (i.e., judgment tale) of Africa. Dilemma tales are a form of short story whose ending either is open to speculation or is morally ambiguous. This kind of conclusion allows the listener to ponder the most just solution to the dilemma posed in the story. Often the problem is to judge who is at fault when everyone seems equally guilty. One dilemma tale tells of a boy who must choose between loyalty to his kind foster father, who raised him, and loyalty to his biological father, who is cruel and unjust.

Judgment spirits also have an important role in African culture. Such a spirit from the Dan culture of western Africa is Ga Wree-Wre. He is personified with a mask, such as the one in the Virginia Museum in Richmond. When this mask makes one of its rare appearances in the village, the dancer's slow and dignified movements intensify its authority as a judge of disputes. In fact, the wearer of the mask does not dance, but walks and sits. The judgments of Ga Wree-Wre are delivered by a human speaker who stands next to the mask as it hears the disputes.

Judgment is a key human concept. Its portrayal in art reflects a similar belief common to many of the world's religions: the reward of life after death for those who do good on Earth. Fair judgment has been a cornerstone of humanity since ancient times, and the survival of famous historical and mythological judgments in literature and art attest to its significance. Folktales that embody the idea of the judgment of good and evil are especially important because they have the unique ability to entertain and to instruct at a basic level. Perhaps such folk and fairy tales have done more to establish social norms than have the great works of art portraying scenes of judgment.

See also Abduction/Rape; Choice/Choosing; Justice

Selected Works of Art

Judgment Spirit of Dan Culture: Ga Wree-Wre

Ga Wree-Wre, mask, Dan culture, Liberia/Ivory Coast, late nineteenth–early twentieth century, Richmond, Virginia Museum of Fine Arts

Judgment: Allegory

Judgment, twentieth card of the Major Arcana of the tarot, late fourteenth century

Judgment of Ameto

Embriachi Workshop, Venice, Italy, Ameto Judges the Life of Industry Superior to the Life of Leisure, carved bone and horn relief on hexagonal wooden box, circa 1400, Richmond, Virginia Museum of Fine Arts

Justice of Brutus

Rembrandt van Rijn, Justice of Brutus, 1626, Leiden, The Netherlands, Stedelijk Museum De Lakenhal
David, Jacques-Louis, Brutus and His Dead Sons, 1789, Paris, Louvre; Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
Brutus Condemns His Two Sons, Titus and Tiberius, engraving from Rollin's Historia Romana, 1816

Judgment of Cambyzes

David, Gerard, The Judgment of Cambyzes, 1498, Bruges, Belgium, Groeningemuseum
Rubens, Peter Paul, Judgment of Cambyzes, before 1640, Potsdam, Germany, Bildergalerie

Judgment of Camillus (Camillus and the Schoolmaster of the Falerii)

Poussin, Nicolas, Camillus and the Schoolmaster of the Falerii, circa 1637, Pasadena, California, Norton Simon Museum; Paris, Louvre
Schönfeldt, Johann Heinrich, Camillus and the Schoolmaster of the Falerii, before 1682, Kromh Haz, Archiepiscopal Museum

Judgment of Emperor Otto

Bouts, Dirck, Justice of Emperor Otto III, 1470–1475, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux

Judgment of Manlius Torquatus

Bol, Ferdinand, Judgment of Manlius Torquatus, seventeenth century, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
Cortona, Pietro da, Triumph of the Barberini, 1633–1639, Rome, Barberini Palace

Judgment of Midas

Schiavone, Andrea, Judgment of Midas, circa 1548–1550, Greater London, Hampton Court Palace, Royal Collection
Bourdon, Sébastien, Judgment of Midas, seventeenth century, Kingston Lacy, Dorset, England, National Trust
Spranger, Bartholomaeus, Judgment of Midas, before 1611, Nürnberg, Germany, Germanisches Nationalmuseum
Domenichino, Judgment of Midas, fresco, 1616–1618, London, National Gallery
Jordaens, Jacob, Judgment of Midas, circa 1636–1638, Madrid, Spain, Prado
Ricci, Sebastiano, Judgment of Midas, circa 1700–1705, Oxford University, Christ Church
Pannini, Giovanni Paolo, Judgment of Midas, circa 1750, private collection

Girodet-Trioson, Anne-Louise, Judgment of Midas, drawing, circa 1805, Paris, Louvre
Cotman, John Sell, Judgment of Midas, early nineteenth century, Norwich, Norfolk, Castle Museum

Judgment of Osiris

Last Judgment Before Osiris, painted papyrus scroll, The Book of the Dead, circa 1310 B.C., London, British Museum

Judgment of Paris

Judgment of Paris, hydria, fifth century B.C., Karlsruhe, Germany, Badisches Landesmuseum
Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Judgment of Paris, 1530, Karlsruhe, Germany, Staatlich Kunsthalle
Tintoretto, Judgment of Paris, 1543–1544, Padua, Italy, Museo Civico
Courteys, Pierre, Judgment of Paris, enamel on copper, before 1581, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, collection of the Prince of Liechtenstein
Aachen, Hans von, Judgment of Paris, 1590, Birmingham, England, Museum of Art
Jordaens, Jacob, Judgment of Paris, circa 1620, Coral Gables, Florida, Lowe Art Gallery
Rubens, Peter Paul, Judgment of Paris, circa 1636, London, National Gallery
Stella, Jacques, Judgment of Paris, 1650, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
Giordano, Luca, Judgment of Paris, circa 1670, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden Künste
Watteau, Jean-Antoine, Judgment of Paris, circa 1718–1720, Paris, Louvre
Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Judgment of Paris, before 1770, Innsbruck, Austria, Ferdinandeum
Donner, Georg, Judgment of Paris, bronze relief, circa 1732, Vienna, Austria, Österreichisches Barockmuseum
Boucher, François, Judgment of Paris, 1754, London, Wallace Collection
Fantin-Latour, Henri, Judgment of Paris, 1863–1865, London, Tate Gallery
Corinth, Lovis, Judgment of Paris, 1907, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Gemäldegalerie
Sargent, John Singer, Judgment of Paris, 1916–1921, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
Stuck, Franz von, Judgment of Paris, 1919, private collection
Chirico, Giorgio de, Judgment of Paris, 1946, Milan, Italy, private collection
Wright, John Buckland, Judgment of Paris, engraving, 1950, Christchurch, New Zealand, Canterbury Art Gallery
Seitz, Gustav, The Judgment of Paris, panel of Porta d'Amore doors, bronze relief, 1963–1969, Hamburg, Germany, Museum für Kunst und Gewerbe

Judgment of Solomon

Giorgione, The Judgment of Solomon, circa 1495–1496, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
Floris, Frans, The Judgment of Solomon, sixteenth century, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten

Aertsen, Pieter, Judgment of Solomon, before 1575, Sierra de Guadarrama, Spain, El Escorial
 Vos, Maarten de, Judgment of Solomon, late sixteenth–early seventeenth century, Bremen, Germany, Kunsthalle
 Francken, Frans the Younger, Judgment of Solomon, early seventeenth century, Linköping, Sweden, Stadsmuseum
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Judgment of Solomon, early seventeenth century, Copenhagen, Denmark, Statens Museum for Kunst
 Poussin, Nicolas, Judgment of Solomon, 1649, Paris, Louvre
 Giordano, Luca, Judgment of Solomon, mid-seventeenth–early eighteenth century, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Blake, William, Judgment of Solomon, circa 1799–1800, Cambridge University, Fitzwilliam Museum
 Leighton, Frederic, Judgment of Solomon, nineteenth century, London, South London Art Gallery
 Doré, Gustave, Judgment of Solomon, engraving, circa 1866

Virginia

Botticelli, The Story of Virginia, before 1510, Bergamo, Italy, Accademia Carrara
 Romanino, Virginus Kills His Daughter, before 1562, Trento, Italy, Castello del Buon Consiglio

Archangel Michael Weighing Souls

Gislebertus of Autun, Saint Michael Weighing Souls, detail of Last Judgment, circa 1130, Autun, France, St. Lazare, west tympanum
Archangel Michael Weighing the Souls of the Dead, German woodcut, fifteenth century
 Master of the Arguis, Legend of Saint Michael Altarpiece, panel, mid-fifteenth century
 Zenale, Bernardo, The Archangel Michael, late fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Pitti Palace
 Roberti, Ercole de', Saint Michael, before 1496, Paris, Louvre
 Ximenez, Miguel, Archangel Michael, before 1505, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Kulmbach, Hans Suess von, Rosary Triptych, central panel, before 1521, Madrid, Spain, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection
 Andrea del Sarto, Saint Michael Weighing Souls, before 1530, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Christ as Judge

Christ as Magistrate Presiding over a Council of Apostles (The Last Judgment), terra-cotta, from The Barberini Plaque, early Christian, Washington, D.C., Dumbarton Oaks
Christ as Judge Between Peter and Paul, circa 359, central panel of Upper Register of the Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, relief sculpture, Rome, Vatican Grottoes
Scenes of Judgment, with Christ as Judge, from a Southern German Psalter, circa 1260–1270, Zurich, Switzerland, Zentralbibliothek
 Pisano, Nicola, Apocalyptic Christ, detail of pulpit, 1265–1268, Siena, Italy, Cathedral
 Vasari, Giorgio, Christ as Judge, before 1574, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari

Etimasia (Hetoimasia), or Prepared Throne Mosaic, from central portion of triumphal arch, 432–440, Rome, Sta. Maria Maggiore
Mosaic, from dome mosaic, circa 450–460, Ravenna, Italy, Baptistry of the Orthodox Mosaic, central portion of triumphal arch, circa 526–530, Rome, S.S. Cosmas and Damianus

Judgment of Zaleucus (Seleucus)

Vaga, Perino del, Justice of Seleucus, fresco, early sixteenth century, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Last Judgment

Gislebertus of Autun, Last Judgment, west tympanum, circa 1130, Autun, France, St. Lazare
 Giotto, Last Judgment, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
 Eyck, Jan Van, Last Judgment, circa 1420–1425, New York, Metropolitan Museum
 Angelico, Fra, Last Judgment, 1438–1445, Florence, Italy, San Marco
 Weyden, Rogier van der, Last Judgment Altarpiece, 1445–1448, Beaune, France, Hospice
 Signorelli, Luca, The Damned Cast into Hell, fresco, 1499–1504, Orvieto, Italy, Cathedral, San Brizio Chapel
 Bosch, Hieronymus, Last Judgment Altarpiece, late fifteenth–early sixteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden Künste
 Orley, Bernaert van, Last Judgment, early sixteenth century, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten
 Tintoretto, Jacopo, Last Judgment, sixteenth century, Venice, Italy, Madonna dell' Orto
 Michelangelo, Last Judgment, 1534–1541, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Last Judgment, circa 1616, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Francken, Frans the Younger, Last Judgment, early seventeenth century, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie
 Jordaens, Jacob, Last Judgment, 1653, Paris, Louvre
 Doré, Gustave, Last Judgment, nineteenth century, La Rochelle, France, Musées Beaux-Arts
 Martin, John, Last Judgment, circa 1851–1853, London, Tate Gallery
 Martin, John, The Last Judgment, 1853, United Kingdom, Frank Collection
 Spencer, Stanley, Resurrection Cookham, 1923–1926, London, Tate Gallery
 Scipione, Gino Bonichi, The Apocalypse, 1930, Turin, Italy, Museo Civico
 Kiesler, Frederick, Last Judgment, bronze, aluminum, pewter, Lucite, gold leaf, and stainless steel, 1958–1959, New York, collection of Mrs. Frederick Kiesler

Literary/Musical Judgments

Boccaccio, Comedia delle Ninfe Fiorentine, Ameto judges the life of industry superior to the life of leisure, 1342
 Lyly, John, Midas, Midas' judgment, 1589

- Shakespeare, William, The Merchant of Venice, Portia, disguised as a lawyer, awards Shylock a pound of Antonio's flesh but no blood, 1598
- Shakespeare, William, King Lear, King Lear disinherits his daughter, 1606
- Cervantes, Miguel de, Don Quixote, Sancho Panza, "governor" of the Isle of Barataria, acts as judge, 1615
- Thomson, James, Winter, Brutus's judgment, 1726
- Smart, Christopher, Poems on Several Occasions, judgment of Midas, 1752
- Grétry, André, Le Jugement de Midas, comic opera, 1778
- Alfieri, Vittorio, Bruto Primo, tragedy, 1783
- Strauss, Johann, The Laughing Song, from operetta Die Fledermaus (The Bat), 1873
- Cools, Eugène, Le Jugement de Midas, opera, 1922
- Ashton, Frederick, and Lennox Berkeley, The Judgment of Paris, ballet 1938
- Folktales/Fairy Tales*
- "The Judgment of the Fox"
- "The Judgment of the Jackal" (India)
- "The Judgment of the Monkey" (Malaysia)
- "The Judgment of Karakash" (Ethiopia)
- "Cormac's Judgment" (Ireland)

Further Reading

- Bestmann, Lieselotte, Michelangelo, das Jungste Gericht im Kontext des ikonographischen Programms der Sixtinischen Kapelle, Hamburg, Germany: Verlag an der Lottbek, 1993
- Bevington, David, et al., Homo, Memento Finis: The Iconography of Just Judgment in Medieval Art and Drama, Kalamazoo: Western Michigan University Press, 1985
- Caygill, Howard, Art of Judgement, Oxford, England, and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1989
- Ehrhart, Margaret, The Judgment of the Trojan Prince Paris in Medieval Literature, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1987
- Harbison, Craig, The Last Judgment in Sixteenth Century Northern Europe, New York: Garland, 1976
- Henrich, Dieter, Aesthetic Judgment and the Moral Image of the World: Studies in Kant, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1992
- Hermeren, Goran, Influence in Art and Literature, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1975
- McFee, Graham, Much of Jackson Pollock is Vivid Wallpaper: An Essay in the Epistemology of Aesthetic Judgments, Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1978
- Meyer, Heinz, Das Ästhetische Urteil, Hildesheim, Germany: Olms, 1990
- Scruton, Roger, Art and Imagination: A Study in the Philosophy of Mind, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982; South Bend, Indiana: St. Augustine's Press, 1997
- Toulouse, François, Le Jugement de Cambyse, Paris: P. Horay, 1984
- Wind, Edgar, "Love and Strife in the Judgment of Paris," in Pagan Mysteries in the Renaissance, London: Faber, 1958; New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1958

JUSTICE

Gina Strumwasser

The following motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Justice:

DIKE AND ASTREA (JUSTICE)

JUSTICE AS CARDINAL

VIRTUE OR ALLEGORICAL
FIGURE

JUSTICE THEMES

CXX.

IUSTITIA.

120.

*Rex Zaleucus tulerat legem eandemque severissimam.
Cujus filius cum eam violasset ut sibi filioque alter
ex duobus oculis erueretur, praecepit. Id amoris ejus Iustitiae merito potestribuere.*

Die Berechtigtheit.

Zaleucus sein Gesetz nicht bricht, man ihm und Sohn ein Aug aufsucht.

Cesare Ripa, Justice, from Iconologia, Hertel edition, 1758–1760, reprinted, New York, Dover Publications, Inc., 1976. (Courtesy of Dover Publications)

From ancient Babylonian law to modern-day film, images of justice persist. Perhaps the oldest written account of justice dates from Hammurabi, who developed a series of laws and advanced the idea of justice. In the Code of Hammurabi, “if a man destroy the eye of another man, they shall destroy his eye.” The code is engraved on an elongated stela (circa 1760 B.C.) on which Hammurabi offers his laws to an enthroned sun god. Inspired by the “king of justice,” the Covenant Code of Moses mirrors Hammurabi’s punitive interpretation: “. . . thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe” (Exodus 21:23–25).

The iconographic term justice is associated with reason, fairness, righteousness, and wisdom. Justice is served in the process of decision making and the act of judgment. In most modern societies, it is conveyed through law. From biblical times, the terms justice and judgment were used interchangeably. Accordingly, the person who imparts justice is the magistrate or judge. Although vindictiveness and revenge are related to judgment, justice has a positive connotation because a correct decision determines the “just” punishment or reward.

Zeus (or Jupiter), the king of the gods, was the custodian of justice for the Greeks and Romans. As the patron deity of fairness and the image of moral authority, he oversaw oaths, contracts, and all things legal or binding. He supervised terrestrial relationships and directed all interactions in the heavens. Zeus was a source with whom to be reckoned, and in the encounters between gods and humans, ethical lessons were learned. Because of the superiority of the gods, only they served justice, but it was Zeus who determined the limits, and those who transgressed the divine boundaries were appropriately punished.

Justice was humorously served by Vulcan, the god of fire, who caught his wife, Venus, the goddess of love, entwined with Mars, the god of war, in a fishnet he had constructed. The behavior of these divine characters, all immortals of the same rank, established patterns for earthly behavior.

Justice was a pervasive symbol for the ancients. According to Plato (Republic, books 1 and 4), justice was a significant “quality” or virtue that, along with wisdom, courage, and self-discipline, contributed to the welfare of the state. For Cicero, Roman law was the foundation of society. Both Plato and Cicero believed that the administration of justice was the responsibility of those who govern. This was true in the Renaissance as well. In the Courtier, Baldassare Castiglione defended justice as the most important obligation that “falls to the prince.”

Parallel to Plato’s “qualities,” justice is considered the most significant of the four cardinal virtues, which also include prudence, fortitude, and temperance. The virtue of justice, prescribed by moral or lawful acts that govern relationships, provides an inalienable and natural right to life. In regard to the state, justice protects against oppression and warfare and ensures harmony, tranquillity, and prosperity. Hope, faith, and charity, the three theological virtues, often appear together with the cardinal virtues in iconographic programs.

The pursuit of justice in the afterlife with a system of reward and punishment was a consideration of Plato. Similarly, Cicero believed that “there was a place reserved in heaven” for those who ensure justice (On the Republic). For St. Augustine, justice ruled in the true City of God. In the Book of the City of Ladies, Christine de Pizan proposed that three women, Reason, Rectitude, and Justice, build a holy city. Dante recognized the importance of justice in his Divine Comedy, wherein God executes justice according to deed. In Inferno, the magnitude of the earthly sin determines punishment. Because the extent of sin is not as great in Purgatorio, retribution is equitably presented. Justice’s reward of peace and happiness in Paradiso is decided for the select, whose will echoes that of the divine. Even later, Baldassare Castiglione’s sense of justice expressed in his Courtier also derived from a faith in God.

As supreme judge as well as ruler of heaven and Earth, Jesus Christ is treated as a symbol of justice. At the Last Judgment, justice is served when the righteous are separated from the sinners. The weighing of the souls of the dead, or psychostasis, is governed by Archangel Michael, whose sword and scales resemble those of justice.

In the Bible, God instituted justice for Adam and Eve’s transgression. The serpent who had instigated the fall was condemned to go upon the ground, Eve to bear the pain of childbirth, and Adam to toil the earth. The justice of King Solomon is especially well known in his wise judgment against the woman whose baby died and who claimed the right to another.

Old Testament heroines Susanna and Judith are also images of justice. For Susanna, the victim of the lustful advances of the elders, Daniel served as the vehicle of justice. For bearing false witness against Susanna, Daniel separated the two elders to obtain the truth. Susanna was saved, and the elders were justly punished.

Judith’s heroic deed is told in the Book of Judith, part of the Roman Catholic canon since the Counter-Reformation. According to the story, the Assyrians, led by the general Holofernes, laid siege to the city of Bethulia. To save her people, Judith went to the Assyrian encampment, posing as a spy. Smitten by the beautiful Jewish widow, Holofernes invited her to a banquet in his tent. When he had drunk too much and was “dead” asleep on the bed, Judith took his sword and decapitated him.

In the medieval Speculum humanae salvationis, the Virgin Mary is depicted in connection with Judith as well as two other heroines: the biblical Jael and the historical Tomyris. As a model of justice, the Virgin Mary tramples her adversary, the devil, with the instruments of the Passion as Judith conquers Holofernes with her upraised sword. By slaying her nation’s enemy, Judith is regarded as an image of justice and was so interpreted in the Middle Ages. Like David, with whom she is often associated, Judith played an active role to save her people. Her judicious action, risking her life to slay her nation's enemy, was considered a wise and prudent act. She was judged by the elders of the city of Bethulia, from whom permission for her actions was required for a woman and a widow. Judith was determined to save her country; and she resolved in her mind, through contemplation, intelligence, common sense, and prayer, the manner in which she would proceed. Her successful effort and celebrated determination seem to prefigure the allegorical figure of Justice.

The allegorical figure of Justice, popularly regarded throughout history for her wisdom, compassion, and sense of reason, is identified in ancient literature as a female and is personified in art as a beautiful woman. By the Baroque period, the attributes of a sword and scales, common to Justice, are codified by Cesare Ripa.

Although it is difficult to find concrete examples in antiquity, one can picture Justice by means of surviving literary passages. In Hesiod's Theogony, Justice, or Dike, is the daughter of Zeus, or moral authority, and Themis, or law. Dike sits to the side of Zeus as he determines judgment, and justice prevails under the influence of law. Pausanias describes a sanctuary (Periegesis of Greece, book 3, chap. 2:1–22:3) dedicated to Aphrodite Migonitis, near which Menelaus placed two statues, one of the goddess Thetis and the other the goddess Praxidicae, the Exacters of Justice. Later, he documents another statue group of “a beautiful woman [who] is punishing an ugly one, choking her with one hand and with the other striking her with a staff. It is Justice who thus treats Injustice” (chap. 18.1–18.3). Hesiod, in Works and Days, gives the most poetic expression, which describes Justice as “wrapped in a mist,” following men who do not “deal straightly with her.” But those who do deal straightly “prosper,” and “their city flourishes” (ll. 221–225). Ovid records a temple dedicated to Iustitia, the Roman equivalent of Dike (Epistulae ex Ponto, 3.6.25), and at times in inscriptions, Justice has the title Augusta, the same designation as empress.

In the early fourteenth century, Giotto included the virtue of justice in the decoration for the Scrovegni (Arena) Chapel in Padua, Italy. Justice has an important place with the other cardinal and theological virtues and the cardinal sins. Justice is perceived as a crowned image of the “New Law” (Bongiorno, p. 19) and is seated within a structure, reminiscent of the throne of the Ognissanti Madonna, which resembles an abridged Gothic church. She supports a scale with each hand. Placed on the balances are two angels. One reaches toward a seated image to the right of Justice, as if to crown a just person, and to the left the other angel raises a sword to behead an apparent wrongdoer. Justice is depicted in conjunction with Injustice, and although Giotto depicts Injustice as a male, 300 years later, Cesare Ripa will define the allegorical figure as a female. A frieze beneath each personification illustrates the virtue or vice above. Interpretations of the meaning of these scenes vary according to the author. Below Justice, the rendering of men hunting on horseback and women dancing, later to inspire Ambrogio Lorenzetti, illustrates the joyful pride in a well-run city and the peace of mind that justice brings to any state. The riders may also refer to commutative justice, symbolizing the importance of commerce within each town (Bongiorno, p. 20). Accompanied by the rewarding and the avenging angels, Justice has been linked to distributive justice, which monitors the following of statutes and regulations of behavior and their respective punishment and praise (Lohuizen-Mulder, p. 62). Because the building of the chapel was begun to expiate the sin of usury of Enrico Scrovegni's father, the virtue of justice, interpreted here as penance, has a personal significance for the family (Tuve, 1966, p. 71).

By the trecento, justice had become more associated with the idea of civic pride. Although Giotto's decoration for the great hall of the Florentine Palazzo del Podesta in Florence, Italy, no longer exists, Giorgio Vasari described it. Represented in the fresco was a figure of the Commune “attended by four virtues,” one of whom was Justice pictured with “arms.” Inspired by Giotto, Ambrogio Lorenzetti's Palazzo Pubblico personification had a parallel meaning.

Ambrogio painted Justice twice in The Allegory of Good Government (1338–1340) in the Sala della Pace at the Palazzo Pubblico in Siena, Italy. Distributive Justice is represented second in size only to the ruler of the Commune and is portrayed on the left as an enthroned judge securing balances in her hands. Similar to the Scrovegni Justice, her determination will result in positive or negative retribution. Indeed, the meaning of the iconographic program depends on the collaboration of the three figures—Justice, the Common Good, and Tyranny—and reflects fourteenth-century political ideology (Rubinstein, p. 189). The virtue of Justice is depicted again on the far right of the composition with the remaining “civic” virtues. She appears as an instrument of the Commune as a crowned young woman holding another crown, an upright sword, and the severed head of a man. Additionally, the sword and the head are symbols of the Old Testament heroine Judith.

Justice also served as a decoration intended for the Doges Palace in Venice, Italy. The virtue of Justice, flanked by St. Michael and St. Gabriel, was painted in the fifteenth century by Jacobello del Fiore. Justice is seated in the center of a horizontal panel, with lions by her side, a scale in her left hand, and an upright sword in her right hand. Echoing images of the Virgin Mary, Justice wears a crown and is sumptuously attired. On her left, the Annunciate Archangel Gabriel with lily in hand looks toward her. On the right of Justice, Archangel Michael glances downward at a dragon, which he tramples at his feet. No longer abbreviated, these two angels, the rewarding Gabriel and the avenging Michael, reflect the frescoes by Giotto and Ambrogio. The lily and the sword are also attributes of Jesus Christ, the celestial judge, at the Last Judgment. St. Michael weighs the souls of the dead with scales, a familiar symbol of justice.

Northern Europe also required the representation of justice through illustration of particular historical events. According to Erwin Panofsky (pp. 216–217), the group of four men represented on the far left panel of Jan van Eyck's Ghent Altarpiece (1426–1432) are the “Just Judges” and prefigure “justice paintings” of later artists. While occupying a special place on a sacred altarpiece dedicated to God, they serve as foundation for later histories of the institution of secular justice.

Rogier van der Weyden, Dirck Bouts, and Gerard David translated the personification of Justice into themes dependent on historical precedent. Although now lost but known from copies in tapestries, four scenes of justice painted by Rogier van der Weyden for the courtroom of the city hall in Brussels, Belgium, represented the justice of Trajan and the justice of Herkinbald.

Also, Dirck Bouts's Justice of Emperor Otto III (1470–1475, sometimes entitled Wrongful Execution of the Count, or Ordeal of the Countess) and Gerard David's The Judgment of Cambyses (1498) treat a similar theme. These events were employed to encourage devotion to justice and to foster civic pride as the foundation of a well-run government. Perhaps the stories were also recognized as earthly symbols of divine justice.

In a more intimate setting meant for personal consumption, the personification of Justice was included in decorations for the Studiolo of Isabella d'Este in Mantua, Italy. In Pallas Expelling the Vices from the Garden of Virtue, the ancient goddess of wisdom is depicted in a plush landscape and is accompanied by three cardinal virtues, who appear in the sky inside a cloud. Justice (identified by her upright sword and scales), Temperance, and Fortitude assist Pallas (Athena/Minerva) in liberating the imprisoned Mother of Virtue by expelling Venus and the vices from the garden. The idea of reason is pictorially described as it triumphs over sensuality.

In Correggio's Allegory of Virtue (1532–1533), commissioned to complement Andrea Mantegna's paintings, a young woman is surrounded by the attributes of Fortitude, Prudence, Justice, and Temperance, which are visualized by a lion's skin, a sword, snakes, and a bridle, respectively. Seen in association with Minerva, these figures represent all that is good in the actions of humanity. Unlike earlier trecento examples, the Christian virtue of justice is portrayed in conjunction with a pagan goddess.

By the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, justice was also employed as a popular culture image and a model of "royal virtue" associated with terrestrial rulers. For example, Astrea, the Roman goddess of justice, was seated among the seven planets for the presentation of Girolamo Bargagli's play La Pellegrina. It is possible to re-create the performance of 1589 from surviving drawings by Bernardo Buontalenti. According to Virgil in the Fourth Eclogue, Astrea, depicted with upright sword and scales, introduces the Age of Gold. In addition, decorations for the triumphal entry of Louis XIII at Avignon, France, in 1622 included a "Fountain of Justice" as a part of the "progression [of] virtues" through which the king was transported (Strong, p. 245).

In Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, the Allegory of Justice is rendered as a blindfolded woman adorned with a crown and dressed in white. The white of her clothing is a necessary requirement of the judge whose decision must be without flaw, and the royal garments denote "the most splendid of concepts." Because justice depends on "reason" rather than emotion, she is depicted with her eyes covered. She holds a pair of scales in her left hand and an upright sword in her right. Both symbols are common to the other personifications of Justice presented. Although the scales represent the equality of the law that is due each individual, the sword and fasces depict punishment. Similar in meaning, they portray the power of justice to avenge crime and wrongdoing. In addition, the dog, long interpreted as an image of friendship, and the snake, a symbol of hatred, are considered negative influences on true justice. Other attributes are placed on a table nearby. The scepter is a sign of authority, the books convey the importance of written law, and the skull serves as a reminder of earthly mortality, "which justice does not suffer, for [she] is eternal" (Ripa, emblem 120).

Although the image of justice is understood as a woman, the act of justice and the enactment of justice, or punishment, are depicted as a man. According to Ripa, there is an explicit distinction in the representation. In earlier medieval examples, tripartite justice is portrayed as allegory, judge, and prosecutor. By the seventeenth century, the allegorical figure of Justice no longer appears involved with the determination or punitive process. Although symbols abound, Ripa renders Justice empowered less and represents Judgment and Punishment as her authoritative masculine counterparts. Similar to the English Suffragette posters of the early twentieth century, Justice, imaged as a blindfolded woman with sword pointed downward and with incapacitated scales, is excluded from participating in the debate on the Reform Bill (Tickner, pl. V).

The story employed in the Hertel edition to elucidate Ripa's Allegory of Justice relates to the ancient ruler of Locris, King Zaleucus, whose austere laws provided the foundation for the Greeks. According to the code, adultery was punished by the loss of eyes, and when Zaleucus's son committed this crime, he asked that one of his own eyes be taken to save that of his son. The eyes seem indicative of justice, "an eye for an eye," as documented originally in the Code of Hammurabi and the Covenant Code of Moses.

In the United States, justice has always been an important ally of the people. Court magistrates, justices of the law, and judges have the power to enforce the law, to punish the criminal, and to perform marriage ceremonies. The Department of Justice was established in 1870 as an independent agency to protect federal law and ensure the rights of each citizen. The conclusion of the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag, "With liberty and justice for all," has become a paradigm for all democratic countries.

The theme of justice is represented in art through stories with worthy precedent from the Bible, mythology, and ancient history. The Greco-Roman world understood justice as a personal symbol as well as a more pervasive one relating to the state. In early Christianity, justice was associated with faith and personified as a cardinal virtue. In the later Middle Ages, it was popularly portrayed as an image of civic pride. In the Renaissance, the figure of Justice was accompanied by pagan deities; by the Baroque period, it was codified as an allegory. Admired for her notable wisdom and flawless judgment, Justice is rendered almost visually synonymous with the Virgin Mary. Never lacking in proper decorum, she is depicted as a dignified woman dressed in regal attire. Unlike so many virtuous women transformed into objects of sexuality, Justice remains esteemed.

See also Calumny; Fortune; Judgment; Misfortune

Selected Works of Art

Dike and Astrea (Justice)

Dike (Justice) Defeating Adikia (Injustice), vase painting, late sixth century B.C., Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Buontalenti, Bernardo, Astrea (Justice), drawing, before 1608, Florence, Italy, Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale

Justice as Cardinal Virtue or Allegorical Figure

Jesse Tree, illuminated manuscript, Lambeth Bible, twelfth century, London, Lambeth Palace Library (MS. 3, fol. 198r)

- Iustitia*, illuminated manuscript, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum (Ambraser Codex, fol. 11r)
- Justice*, manuscript, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms franc. 9186, fol. 304r)
- Christ on the Cross with Four Virtues and Mary and John*, stained glass, Lüneburg, Germany, Monastery of Wienhausen
- Giotto, Justice, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena (Scrovegni) Chapel
- Lorenzetti, Ambrogio, The Allegory of Good Government, 1338–1340, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico, Sala della Pace
- Justice*, capital, late fourteenth–early fifteenth century, Venice, Italy, Doges Palace
- Master of the Lazzaroni Madonna, Justice, San Francisco, California, Fine Arts Museum, Roscoe and Margaret Oakes Collection
- Fiore, Jacobello del, Justice with Saints Michael and Gabriel, early fifteenth century, Venice, Italy, Accademia
- Piero della Francesca, Triumph of Federigo da Montefeltro with Justice and Other Cardinal Virtues, 1465–1470, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Pollaiuolo, Piero del, Justice, 1469–1470, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Mantegna, Andrea, Expulsion of the Vices from the Garden of Virtue, 1504, Paris, Louvre
- Gambello, Vettor di Antonio, Justice, medal, Ravenna, Italy, Museo Nazionale
- Raphael, Dream of Scipio, 1500, London, National Gallery
- Raphael, Justice, 1509–1511, Vatican, Stanza della Segnatura
- Andrea del Sarto, Justice, 1513–1514, Florence, Italy, S.S. Annunziata
- Beccafumi, Domenico, Justice, 1533–1535, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico, Sala del Concistoro
- Correggio, Antonio, Allegory of Virtue, 1532–1533, Paris, Louvre
- Beccafumi, Domenico, Justice, before 1551, Lille, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Salviati, Francesco, Justice, before 1563, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale
- Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Justice, before 1569, Brussels, Belgium, Royal Library
- Ripa, Cesare, Allegory of Justice, from Iconologia, 1758–1760
- Prud'hon, Pierre-Paul, Justice and Divine Vengeance Pursuing Crime, 1808, Paris, Louvre
- Prell, Hermann, Justice, before 1922, Hildesheim, Germany, Town Hall

Justice Themes

- Babylonian stela inscribed with the Law Code of Hammurabi, circa 1760 B.C., Paris, Louvre
- Eyck, Jan van, Just Judges, from Ghent Altarpiece, 1426–1432, Ghent, Belgium, St. Bavo
- Weyden, Rogier van der, Justice of Trajan and Herkinbald, tapestry, Bern, Switzerland, Historisches Museum
- Bouts, Dirck, Justice of Emperor Otto III (Wrongful Execution of the Count, or Ordeal of the Countess), 1470–1475, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux
- Cossa, Francesco del, March (Borso Administering Justice), before 1477, Ferrara, Italy, Palazzo Schifanoia, Sala dei Mesi
- David, Gerard, The Judgment of Cambyzes, two panels, 1498, Bruges, Belgium, Groeningemuseum

- Rouault, Georges, Men of Justice (Three Judges), 1928, Paris, Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville

Further Reading

- Bongiorno, Laurine Mack, "The Theme of the Old and the New Law in the Arena Chapel," Art Bulletin L:1 (1968)
- Cast, David, The Calumny of Apelles, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1981
- Cohen, Morris L., Law: The Art of Justice, New York: Macmillan, 1992
- Gans, Edward, and Edward Kisch, "The Cambyzes Justice Medal," Art Bulletin XXIX:1 (1947)
- Gilbert, Allan, Dante's Conception of Justice, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1925
- Lohuizen-Mulder, Mab Van, Raphael's Images of Justice-Humanity-Friendship, Wassenaar, The Netherlands: Mirananda, 1977
- Panofsky, Erwin, Early Netherlandish Paintings, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1953
- Ribner, Jonathan P., Broken Tablets: The Cult of the Law in French Art from David to Delacroix, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993
- Ripa, Cesare, Baroque and Rococo Pictorial Imagery [Hertel edition of Iconologia], New York: Dover, 1971; London: Constable, 1971
- Rosenberg, Charles, "The Iconography of the Sala degli Stucchi in the Palazzo Schifanoia in Ferrara," Art Bulletin LXI:3 (1970)
- Rowley, George, Ambrogio Lorenzetti, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1958
- Rubinstein, Nikolai, "Political Ideas in Sienese Art," Journal of the Warburg Courtauld Institutes XXI (1958)
- Strong, Roy, Splendor at Court, Boston: Houghton, 1973
- Stubblebine, James, editor, Giotto: The Arena Chapel Frescoes, New York: Norton, 1969
- Tickner, Lisa, The Spectacle of Women, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1988
- Tuve, Rosemund, Allegorical Imagery, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966
- , "Notes on the Virtues and Vices," Journal of the Warburg Courtauld Institutes XXVI (1963)
- van der Velden, Hugo, "Cambyzes for Example: The Origins and Function of an Exemplum Iustitiae in Netherlandish Art of the Fifteenth, Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," Simiolus 23:1 (1995)
- , "Cambyzes Reconsidered: Gerard David's Exemplum Iustitiae for Bruges Town Hall," Simiolus 23:1 (1995)
- Verheyen, Egon, The Paintings in the Studiolo of Isabella d'Este at Mantua, New York: New York University Press, 1971
- Warner, Marina, Monuments and Maidens, New York: Atheneum, 1985; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1985
- Wilson-Chevalier, Kathleen, "Sebastian Brant: The Key to Understanding Luca Penni's Justice and the Seven Deadly Sins," Art Bulletin 78:2 (1996)
- Wind, Edgar, "Platonic Justice Designed by Raphael," Journal of the Warburg Courtauld Institutes I (1937)

KISS/KISSING

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following motifs, periods, and cultures are covered in the discussion of the theme Kiss/Kissing:

ANCIENT THEMES

ASIAN THEMES

BIBLICAL: LEAVE-TAKING

BIBLICAL: MEETING,
GREETING

BIBLICAL: BETRAYAL

BIBLICAL: ADORATION

SECULAR: CONJUNCTION AND SYMPATHY

SECULAR: LOVE, DESIRE

THE KISS OF DEATH

THE KISS OF PEACE

The Early Italian Poets from Guido to Dante translated by D. G. Rossetti in the metres of the originals

LONDON: Smith & Elder, 1864

Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Study for the Rose Garden, preliminary sketch for title page of Early Italian Poets (1828–1882), Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Print Department Special Fund. (Courtesy of Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

Although the twentieth-century perception of kissing tends to be in terms of love or passion, historically it has had a number of other meanings, such as a sign of adoration or a token of friendship. There is the kiss of peace, the kiss of betrayal, the kiss of death, and the kiss of reconciliation. The kiss is a way of worshiping idols, even a means of healing. In the tradition of childhood, to kiss a cut or bruise will “make it all better.” And, of course, there is the kiss of transformation in fairy tales, which turns a frog into a prince or a beast into a man, as in “Beauty and the Beast,” and the kiss that wakes the princess in “The Sleeping Beauty.”

In ancient times the most common public form of kissing was idol worship: adoring the statue or icon of a deity. This practice was specifically prohibited in the Old Testament, not only in the Second Commandment to make no graven images (Exodus 20:4–5) but also in specific condemnation of the worship of Baal (I Kings 19:13–18) and the making of images to kiss (Hosea 13:2).

Classical art contains very few representations of kissing; although kissing is mentioned in classical literature in appropriate contexts, such as Penelope’s kissing Odysseus on his return to Ithaca (Odyssey, book XXIII) and in Ovid’s Ars amorata. Helen of Troy is associated with kissing but mainly in poetry after the classical era, as in Christopher Marlowe’s Dr. Faustus:

Was this the face that launched a thousand ships,
And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?
Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss!

The Roman belief that the last breath of a dying person contained the essence of the soul, which could be trapped by another person, led to poignant descriptions of deathbed kisses. Virgil describes Dido’s sister, after Dido’s suicide, capturing her soul with a last kiss (Aeneid, IV, 684–485). Venus is also described by the Greek bucolic poet Bion as desiring a last kiss from the dying Adonis so she may incorporate the essence of her lover.

Adonis, wake and give Me one last kiss
Long as a kiss may live,
Until in this
Kissing, thy spirit do
From body part,
And breathed be unto
My lips and heart.
(Bion, Lament for Adonis, I, 45)

Kissing is used allegorically to connote conjunction or sympathy, as in “Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other” (Psalm 85:10). The painting Italia and Germania (1829) by Johann Friedrich Overbeck shows two women personifying the two nations about to kiss each another.

The Bible and Christian literature, on the other hand, have many references to a great variety of kissing. One of the most important in the early church ritual was the osculum pacis (kiss of peace), exchanged between Christians as a part of the church service. Deriving from Paul’s belief that the body of a true Christian is the temple of God (I Corinthians 3:16–17; 6:19), the kiss of peace gave expression to the unity and shared spirit of the congregation. Now the ritual is usually relegated to exchanging the peace by handshaking but also with embraces between spouses and friends. A mosaic in the Palatine Chapel in Palermo, Italy, shows Saints Peter and Paul exchanging the kiss of peace. One of the most beautiful representations of this exchange is the photograph The Kiss of Peace (1869) by Julia Margaret Cameron, which interprets the spirit of the gesture with consummate skill.

Another example in biblical times was that of kissing the hand or foot in humility. Although there is no direct reference to the three kings (or Magi) kissing the Christ Child when they came to present their gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, artists have interpreted the phrase in Matthew 2:11, they “fell down, and worshiped him” by showing a king kneeling and kissing the Christ Child’s foot, as in Gentile da Fabriano’s The Adoration of the Kings (1423) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy, or Paolo Veronese’s version (1578) in the National Gallery in London. Dante Gabriel Rossetti used kissing in his altarpiece The Seed of David, in the Llandaff Cathedral in Wales, as a differentiation between the great and the humble, with the shepherd kissing the babe’s hand, the king his foot. Rossetti wrote to his aunt, Charlotte Polidori, on June 25, 1864, “She holds his hand for the shepherd, and his foot for the king to kiss—so showing the superiority of poverty over riches in the eyes of Christ.”

Kissing was also part of the ritual of leave-taking in the Bible, as in the parting of David and Jonathan (I Samuel 20:41–42), shown in David’s Leave-Taking of Jonathan (1642) by Rembrandt van Rijn, in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia. Kissing was also associated with meeting as well as embracing, as in the representations of Mary’s parents The Meeting of Anna and Joachim at the Golden Gate (1305–1306) by Giotto in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy, and in Albrecht Dürer’s Life of the Virgin print cycle (1511–1515).

The most dramatic kiss in the Bible is, of course, Judas’s kiss of betrayal to single out Jesus Christ for soldiers to arrest. This is consummately represented by Giotto in the Arena Chapel fresco (1305–1306), in which Judas wears a cloak of gold in which he enfolds Jesus as he kisses him—an obvious symbol of his betrayal of Christ for money. Because the kiss was so holy in Christian ritual, the act was seen as an ignominious betrayal, not only of Christ but of the sanctity of the kiss.

The literary life of kissing is long and studded with illustrious examples of various types of kisses. A small sampling would include the kiss of exuberant youth from Shakespeare's "Sweet-and-Twenty" with its last couplet:

Then come kiss me, sweet-and-twenty!
Youth's a stuff will not endure.

and Ben Jonson's "To Celia":

Drink to me only with thine eyes
And I will pledge with mine.
Or leave a kiss but in the cup
And I'll not look for wine.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson's view of kisses is one of remembrance of the past in "Tears, Idle Tears" from The Princess, part IV:

Deep as remember'd kisses after death
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feign'd
On lips that are for others: deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
O Death in Life, the days that are no more!

Romantic and passionate kisses between two lovers, and kissing as a sign of love with a merging of the two participants, is conveyed by Dante Gabriel Rossetti in both art and verse. His drawing Study for the Rose Garden (1861) in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, meant as a study for a frontispiece for his book of translations of poems by Dante Alighieri and his circle, shows a young man and woman passionately kissing. The model for the man was Rossetti's friend poet Algernon Swinburne, who wrote about the experience to his friend R. Monckton Milnes:

Rossetti has just done a drawing of a female model and myself embracing—I need not say in the most fervent and abandoned style. . . . Everyone who knows me already salutes the likeness with a yell of recognition. When the book comes out I shall have no refuge but the grave.

Actually, the representation is rather chaste, but Swinburne loved to exaggerate.

Rossetti's poem "The Song of the Bower," written around the same time, although not published until 1870, is a good deal more passionate:

What were my prize, could I enter thy bower,
This day, to-morrow, at eve or at morn?
Large lovely arms and a neck like a tower,
Bosom then heaving that now lies forlorn.
Kindled with love-breath (the sun's kiss is colder!)
Thy sweetness all near me, so distant to-day;
My hand round thy neck and thy hand on my shoulder
My mouth to thy mouth as the world melts away.

Other examples of romantic kissing in art are Jean-Honoré Fragonard's charming The Stolen Kiss (before 1788), in the Hermitage, in typical eighteenth-century rococo style; Gustav Klimt's highly stylized The Kiss (1907–1908), in the Österreichische Museum in Vienna, Austria; and Edvard Munch's merged forms in the woodcut The Kiss (1896–1897), reputedly inspired by Rossetti's kissing figures in Paolo and Francesca.

The medieval imagination engendered no more famous kiss than that of Paolo and Francesca. In canto V of the Inferno, Dante describes how Francesca da Rimini, a young woman betrothed to the deformed Giovanni Malatesta, fell in love with his brother Paolo. One day, as Francesca and Paolo were reading together, they were overcome with passion and kissed. Giovanni discovered them and stabbed them both. They not only shared a kiss but also their deaths, and thanks to Dante's genius, a famous eternity together in the second circle of hell. Their kiss was depicted not only by Rossetti but also by John Flaxman, J. A. D. Ingres, and William Blake, among other artists.

From ancient times, kissing was a sign of homage, as in a knight kissing his liege's hand or an aristocrat kissing a lady's hand. The kiss sealed the vow of vassalage between vassal and lord in feudal times. Only the lord would confer a kiss on the mouth; the vassal would bestow his kiss on the foot or the hand. This usage still takes place in the modern ecclesiastical ritual of kissing the pope's ring. The vow of vassalage formed the basis of the medieval love-service vow between a lady and her knight and perhaps the basis of the wedding kiss. A more secular version can be seen in the formal European custom of kissing a lady's hand in greeting, celebrated in the immortal words of Anita Loos from the song "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes":

A kiss on the hand may be quite continental,
But diamonds are a girl's best friend.

Another usage of kissing is connected with relinquishing something or "kissing it good-bye." Blake's poem Eternity alludes to this concept:

He who bends to himself if a Joy
Doth the winged life destroy;
But he who kisses the Joy as it flies
Lives in Eternity's sunrise.

A more somber view of kissing is that of the kiss of death, which has two meanings, one literal and one metaphoric. The literal meaning was given by William Rossetti to his brother's illustration in a book of Tennyson's poems (1857) of St. Cecilia, who is being kissed by a masculine angel as she plays an organ. When questioned about its meaning, William said he thought Dante Gabriel was representing the kiss of death by the angel as a foreshadowing of the saint's martyrdom. Rossetti also used the kiss as a harbinger of death in his large oil painting Dante's Dream of the Death of Beatrice (1871), where the figure of Love, clad in scarlet, leans over to kiss the recumbent Beatrice on her funeral bier. The more metaphysical use of the phrase "the kiss of death" is to suggest that an action will totally kill the success of a project, even if it is a well-meaning endorsement or speech.

An exactly opposite view of kissing stresses its reviving power, either from a deep sleep or even death. This is the fairy-tale kiss that awakens the sleeping princess, which can be seen in psychological terms as an arousal of latent sexuality. The kiss of the beloved is even credited with waking a lover from the dead, as in Mary Ashley Townsend's poem Creed, stanza 1:

I believe if I should die
And you should kiss my eyelids when I lie
Cold, dead and dumb to all the world contains,
The folded orbs would open at thy breath,

And, from its exile in the isles of death,
Life would come gladly back along my veins.

